Jones put his hands down. "Ah!" he said, invitingly, "who is the lady? One of her intimate friends, I'll wager. And you pretend not to know why she has gone?"

"Lady!" Uxhill fiercely exclaimed. "What are you talking about? I have said nothing about any lady."

"Then what the devil do you want a divorce for? To be revenged? That is not very gentlemanly. To see your name in the papers? Without enjoying it very much, you have seen it there before. To recover Mowgy? But you would spoil her with concessions, and ruin her with chocolates. Unless you propose to marry somebody else, what good, then, will a divorce do you? But that's it. Nobody ever wanted a divorce for any other purpose. It was devised for that. Marriage is the earliest of institutions. Divorce was invented three weeks later. It is perfectly clear to me, and, if to me, how much more so must it have been to your wife?"

"But," Uxhill expostulated, "you—"

With a gesture Jones hushed him. "And you have called her crazy! Good God! It is considerate that she is, and, what is more, high-bred. On discovering your intentions, without a word, without a reproach, she leaves you, and leaves you to your conscience. That I call very fine. Always I have admired her, but never as now; and as for getting a divorce for you, frankly, Uxhill, I will see you damned first."

"But, confound it!" the routed wretch, in utter exasperation, cried, "you have the cart before the horse. You jump at the conclusion I am to remarry. Supposing I am. I had no idea of it before she left, and, consequently, she could not have, either."

"Oho! It is only since, then, that you have met Number Two? It seems to me that you have been devilish expeditious."

"Well,—er, no. I had met her before."

"Where?"

"Here."

"In this house?"

Uxhill nodded.

Jones nodded back. "That is just what I said. If Number Two is not an intimate friend of your wife, she at least has been her guest. What your wife saw I don't know. No one ever does know what women see. They have eyes in the back of their head. But, without giving you the chance to suspect that she saw anything, she washes her hands of you both. I call that very fine. Now, whoever Number Two may be is immaterial. But, I submit that your wife is worth a hundred of her. The one decent course for you to pursue is to find her, go on your knees to her, and promise to mend your ways."

Jones' cigar had gone out. He put it down and got up.

"Apropos. How is Miss Sixmith? I suppose I may take it for granted that she is contemplating matrimony also?"

To the question, as well as to the remark, Uxhill, instead of replying, got behind them into what had gone before.

"I have nothing to go on my knees for," he said, and, as though to emphasize the statement, he also stood up. "Nothing. Maud had no more cause for leaving me than I had for leaving her. In spite of which, and rather precisely on that account, I did try to find her. I tried so hard that I lost myself. I shall not try again."

"But you will try for a divorce?"

"I certainly shall."

"Well, you took the wrong bull by the horns when you said you expected me to get it for you. By the way, what is your opinion of horsehair?"

"Horsehair!" Uxhill echoed blankly.

"Yes; not long ago I saw Nora in the street. I stopped and asked her about Mowgy. She told me she was all right again, adding that she herself had been attending to some horsehair. I could not quite congratulate her. My grandmother, who lived in Washington Square, made her house hideous to me with furniture covered with it."

From the dining-room, the two men had passed to the other. Jones gazed about at the harmony of its fittings.

"In addition to matrimony, you are not," he continued, "contemplating any such further atrocity, are you?"

"No," said Uxhill absently. He had hardly heard.

But Jones had had enough; he got into his coat and got away.

VI.

ABOVE, on the ceiling, the cupids lounged and laughed. To them nothing whatever was of any importance. In their attitude was supreme philosophy. When Jones had gone, Uxhill stared at them, but unseeingly. The beauty of their significance was undiscerned. He was angry at the world, at himself, but, most, at Jones. A remark of the lawyer's, suggesting that he find Maud and go on his knees to her, rankled.

You don't rob a man and beat him, and then expect him to apologize, he told himself. Though, perhaps, lawyers do. Of course, though, he understood, Jones' admiration for Maud was so exalted that it put her on a pedestal which an earthquake could not shake. At the same time it was very tedious, for now he would have to get some else. But, whom? It was not that attorneys were lacking. The woods were full of them. Some had the theory of law, but not the practice; some knew the practice, but not the law; while the majority were profoundly ignorant of either. It was certainly very tedious.

In considering it, anger receded, as anger always does. In its place weariness came. From the debilitating effects of the journey to nowhere and back he had not yet fully recovered. Recognizing the fact, he ambled off to bed, which is always a very safe thing to do.

On the morrow he lunched at the Athenæum, afterward played bridge, and without bothering to return and dress, dined there, trying to feel that he was enjoying himself.

The effort was not successful. The solitude of his house accompanied him. The gloom of it mantled him like a disease. In the cards which he held he saw other faces than those which they portrayed. Sometimes Maud's, sometimes Stella's, sometimes both, sometimes so confusingly that he was in doubt who was Queen of Hearts.

In this confusion and the doubt of it, he succeeded very perfectly in making himself very agreeable. His money ran like a fox before the hounds. The men with whom he played had never suspected before what a thoroughly good chap he was. Incidentally, when over the true identity of the Queen of Hearts, the doubt came; always after it there trailed the memory of Maud's ruthless desertion; while, before him, surged a vision of Stella's starlike eyes. Then, although the doubt retreated, the money did not return.

Those eyes were a godsend to the men that sat about. Stocks were abyssmally low that winter, with every menace of going lower yet. No one knew where the subsidence would cease. The men who were not hurt felt that they were,—asking themselves were they going to the poor-house, and telling each other that they were already there,—questions and answers which Uxhill's cheques momentarily relieved, and which, gladly enough, he would have enlarged if only their multiplication could have relieved him.

Time, in which all things unfold, disunite, and reassemble, alone could do that. Meanwhile the sense of desolation in which he groped, and which, when noticed at all by those who sat about, was attributed to the preoccupations of play, instead of diminishing, so heightened that he felt he could stand it no longer, that he must see Stella, that the touch of her hand in his could alone dispel the gloom of the solitude which the presence of others only increased.

Uxhill had not an idea where the girl's lodgings were. But, Patmore must know, he reflected. Patmore had had charge of her things. He got the man on the telephone, and got, too, the address,—a street in the West Hundreds, to which at once, in a club motor, he went as fast as the motor could go, determining, in transit, that so would he prevail with her that thereafter, until the divorce was secured, she would consent to see him each day. It was damned nonsense, he told himself, that she should hold herself so aloof. Yet, in his heart, it was nonsense for which he admired her the more. Everything she had done or said, even to that, particularly to that, had made him see that she was one whom always he could wholly trust,—one whose mind was clean as wholesome fruit, one who, in respecting herself, compelled others to respect her, one who could never derogate from her own ideals,—a girl who could make a boor chivalrous, and the chivalrous bend the knee.

Nonetheless, he determined to prevail with her. Ordinarily, of course, he would not have attempted to. But he had the blues, and those blues she alone could cure. To others than lawyers, practice and theory are not the same.

In the present instance, however, it so fell about that they were forced to fuse. At the address in the West Hundreds, an address, Uxhill discovered, which resumed itself into a private hotel,—for young women only, and superselect young women at that,—there could be no prevailing, no resistance, either.

That morning Miss Sixmith had gone to Canada, though whether to Montreal, Ottawa, or Quebec, she had temporarily omitted to state.

In circumstances such as these, to natures such as Uxhill's, a physician of the soul once offered the following very excellent prescription: Lascia la donna e studia la matematica.

Unconsciously, Uxhill rememorated it. Only for mathematics he substituted cards. The motor scurried him back to the green baize of the tables, where the money he got rid of was so profusely distributed that, when at last he left for his empty house, he was the most popular man in the club.

"What was it?" he asked himself in the cab that took him away; "what was the name that Sayce gave to the malady which he said psychology recognized, and which consists in the fear of going home? Anyway," he decided, "I have it. Moreover, as Stella has so arranged things as to prevent me from seeing her until I have the divorce, I will start for Rhode Island to-morrow."

There are morrows that never dawn.

VII.

THE next morning, Uxhill found himself inundated with the usual letters, which, as usual, he did not read. But, on one of them was an imprint that tempted. It was that of Crumings & Kim, the attorneys who had so civilly acquainted Tatum of their authority to accept service in any action against Mrs. Gerald Uxhill which Gerald Uxhill, esquire, might bring.

The present communication was equally civil. It set forth the perfectly legitimate wish of their client to recover her wardrobe, and suggested that, with Mr. Uxhill's permission and at Mr. Uxhill's convenience, packers would be sent.

In pauses of his perplexities, Uxhill had thought of this before. In ordinary circumstances, long since the things would have been shipped. If he had been unable to detain the lady, certainly he had no wish whatever to detain her clothes, or any of the thousand accessories that go to the making of a woman's atmosphere in her home. But, how may things be shipped to one who has no known address? The fact had affected him. It had seemed to him that Maud, in her flight, had taken only necessities, abandoning everything else; unwilling to be cumbered with objects associated with him. Whatever the cause of her going, he felt that he had not deserved that.

Then, too, there were Mowgy's toys, the little precious things which were hers, which she liked no one but herself to touch, but which occasionally, as a great treat, she displayed, one after another, admiringly to her papa. These things Uxhill knew that the child would miss, knew that their absence would hurt her with one of those hurts of childhood that are the more tragic in that they are inexplicable, and, as such, never forgot. What hurt her at all, hurt him far more.

Now, on receipt of the letter, he gnawed at his moustache. In view of the fact that, already, he had been officially acquainted with the existence and attributes of Crumings & Kim, it was for him to have offered to dispatch the things, instead of growling around like a dog in the manger, until prompted regarding a matter, of which, unprompted, he should have written himself. After all, it was but a detail. Yet, to the fastidious, details count.

There and then, Uxhill gave orders to have the things packed, and to Crumings & Kim he wrote a line setting forth that at any time the next day the effects would be delivered to anybody they might send. "Or," he was about to add, "to any address with which I am furnished."

But, that he judged superfluous. Crumings & Kim would furnish nothing. Yet, that which they would not furnish, he might obtain. There was nothing whatever to prevent him from having the things followed. Where they went, Maud would be, and Mowgy as well. No ; there was nothing to prevent him except his conceptions of what's what. An enterprise of that nature would, he reflected, be distinctly underhand. At the same time there was nothing particularly open and above board in the manner in which Maud had taken herself and his child away. Even so, the methods of other people cannot legitimatize any lack of square-dealing in your own. Then, too, in love and war, women have not always the same high regard for what's what which they might. They are the weaker vessel, and must be treated as such. Moreover, and here was the main point, to which Uxhill in his cogitations reached at last: A gentleman never sees anything that was not intended for him.

As a result, he left the matter to take care of itself. But, for that day at least, he thought the journey to Rhode Island might as well be postponed. Then, the orders given, the letter dispatched, he got away into club-land, where he remained until night.

The morrow was more episodical. By the afternoon train he proposed to go to Newport. Long before that train had any intention of starting, the morning post brought him a note of legal thanks, saying that shortly an expressman would stop by for the effects.

With that the episodical day began.

A trifle before noon, Uxhill was in the hall. He had been helped into his coat.

His hat had been handed him. A man held his stick, which, his gloves buttoned, he was about to take, when the bell rang and there was the expressman, a blond giant, producing an order for trunks.

Uxhill looked at it. "Where are you to take them?" he asked.

"To the Buckingham, sir."

"What! To the Buckingham, on Fifth Avenue?"

"Yes, sir."

The Buckingham was less than a mile away, practically around the corner, five minutes in a cab, ten on foot. Uxhill passed on and out. Beyond was Central Park, swooning in excesses of snow, striated with trees, from the branches of which icicles hung and glittered. Though the cold was polar, the sky was equatorially blue. The eager air, that slapped you with a smart that made your cheeks feel like porcelain, had in it little motes that dazzled. But, the exhilaration which the sheen of them induced, Uxhill at first did not notice.

He was occupied with a novelty which he had encountered in the pocket of his overcoat, the pistol which, on the spur of the moment, he had told Patmore to get for him, and then had utterly forgot. What earthly use had he for it? he asked himself. Hold-ups do not occur in the daytime, in Vanity Square at least, and, at night, not being as mad about exercise as Jones was, he was never on foot.

Then, precisely as he had forgotten that he told Patmore to put the thing in his pocket, he forgot that it was there. He had other matters on his mind. The fact that Maud was within hailing distance routed everything else. The sheer simplicity of it bewildered. There were times when he fancied her in Mexico, others when he believed she might be on the Mediterranean, but always nebulously in some spot which he never could find, and to which he never would know why she had gone.

Instead of which, she was around the corner, the toss of a stone from the Athenæum Club. But, though the simplicity of that was startling, yet, he reflected, it coincided curiously with her entire sans-gêne. Quite as her attorneys had made it clear that it was immaterial to her whether he brought suit, or whether he did not, so, obviously, it was one to her whether or not he chanced on her in the street.

Only, Uxhill told himself, the obvious is misleading. It was all too damned obvious to be other than phantasmagoric. For what in the world was there to prevent him from marching to her rooms, marching in, and marching Mowgy away? It was absurd on the face of it. She could not be at the Buckingham. Probably Crumings lodged there, or Kim, and one or the other of them had the trunks fetched to the hotel for subsequent transshipment.

In Uxhill's brisk descent of the Avenue, already the Park and its excesses of snow had been left behind. The Plaza, too, he had passed. Before him the Cathedral tossed, like cries, its spires in the biting air. The brick and brown of the Buckingham were just beyond. In a moment he would know.

In a moment he did. Entering the hotel, he went to the desk and asked if Mrs. Uxhill was in, producing a card on which the clerk scribbled a number, gave it to a bell-boy, and told him he would see.

Maud was there, then. In a crescendo of bewilderment he turned away, contemplating with unseeing eyes piles of papers and magazines which another desk contained,—a contemplation which the bell-boy interrupted.

The party was out.

Well, why not? Uxhill reflected. It might be so. He could, of course, sit about and wait. He could also go away and return, demand access to Mowgy, and, the demand denied, apply for a habeas corpus.

At the thought of all that he felt extraordinarily hot, and, unbuttoning his overcoat, strode out into the eager air. It nipped him. He meditated an immediate descent on some one of the many lawyers that he knew, and mapped an instant campaign. But, in the refreshment of the air, he concluded that the telephone might spare him any such bother, and, besides, in the present and surprising condition of things, it were, perhaps, better to see if he could not get Jones to learn for him the lay of the land.

Then presently he reached the club, where latterly he had become so popular. At the time it was empty. In the reading-room, before an open fire, two old men were comparing ailments. Otherwise there was no one. Uxhill got out of his coat, went to the telephone-room, told the operator to call Jones, and, at once almost, he was talking to him, telling him that Maud was at the Buckingham, asking him to go to her, and to insist that, without forcing him to uncivil proceedings, she give up the child.

"And herself, too, of course," Jones replied.

"You may say, if you like, that I have but one desire regarding her, and that is never to see her again."

"I'll be shot if I do!" Jones shouted back. "I will carry no such message.

But, your child is a different matter. I will see about that. Where are you?"

"At the Athenæum."

"Stay there, then, until you hear from me."

It was then one by the clock. It would, Uxhill knew, be at least an hour before he could possibly hear. He joined the old men. But, their complaints failed to interest him very deeply. The haunting query had returned. Yet, not as before. The enigma of the great Why was as mysterious as ever, but the solution over which he had puzzled had lost its disturbing force. It could no longer change the course of events. He had been shamelessly treated, and though an explanation of that treatment might possibly be forthcoming, yet for it there could never be the slightest excuse. While one old man was telling of his lumbago, and another of his gout, such were Uxhill's thoughts.

Pretexting a pretext, he left them and ordered lunch. In spite of the walk, the eager air and the bite of it, he was not very hungry that day. He wished to the devil it were all over. He wished that he and that lovely girl were sailing away to some lovely shore, where, in a fever of perpetual caresses, perpetual summer would be theirs. He thought of Bora Bora. But he put it from him. It was too much of a job to get there.

Zante occurred to him, the isola d'oro, the hyacinthine isle, where the slopes and intervales are rose when they are not purple, where the sky is a stretch of silk wadded with films of pink cotton, where there is no violet deeper than the velvet of its nights, where the air, a bath of gold, is shuttled with the color of dreams, with dreams changing colors,—with salmon, saffron, and smalt.

In the beauty of it all, Stella would fit like a flower of flesh, and at sight of her the grave Ionians would stop, and, musing, wonder could the young Venus of their ancient faith again from the sacred sea have arisen.

It was a delightful picture. It needed only the accompaniment of a little music to be perfect. Having intercepted it, and, incidentally, having eaten a suprême of chicken with a big bit of pistache in the middle, Uxhill lit a cigar, long, thin and black, at the end of which those casements formed that open on the marvel of lands where dreams come true, and then, it may be, occasionally turn into nightmare. On the fair perspectives Uxhill gazed until a head-waiter, approaching, arranged a chair for Mr. Yoda Jones.

Uxhill started. But, then, he had been far away. He looked at Jones, then at his watch. It was just three. Such were the imaginary enchantments which the imaginary casement disclosed that time had passed unnoticed. He had fancied it much earlier and said as much,—a remark which Jones treated like a cobweb.

Seating himself and addressing Uxhill without the faintest exhibition of any one of the many bagatelles of the intercourse known as courteous, "You can," he announced, "see your child whenever you get ready. It is your right, in the first place; moreover, it is one that nobody proposes to contest. But"—, and Jones, as he threw out the monosyllable, gave Uxhill a look that was tantamount to a blow—, "take the child away and it is murder."

"What?"

"You understand English, I believe?" Jones, poking his head out like a turtle, inquired. "Yes. Well, I said murder. M-u-r-d-e-r! Did you get it? You will kill your wife,—that's what you'll do; confound you."

"But, see here!" Uxhill furiously interjected; "hold on a minute. What the devil are you driving at? What did she say?"

"I have told you," Jones curtly, with his most brutal air, replied.

"You have not told me why she left me."

"I have that. I told you before I saw her. She left because of your matrimonial intentions."

"But, confound it, at the time I had none. The idea had not entered my head. How could it have?"

"Perhaps," said Jones, "you had it subconsciously and talked of it in your sleep. How do I know what you did, or what you did not?" he angrily resumed. "I asked your wife if she cared to tell me her reason. She answered that when you were free, you would marry Miss Sixmith."

At that, Uxhill, who had been leaning on the table, staring at Jones, sank back in his chair.

"God alone knows where she got that. The only people who knew are Miss Sixmith and myself. Certainly she did not get it from me, and she could not have got it from Miss Sixmith. Miss Sixmith knew no more than I did where she was."

"On the contrary, Miss Sixmith knew very well where she was. She knew that she was in bed,—ill there."

"But, confound it, can't you or won't you understand that at that time I had not asked Miss Sixmith to marry me?"

"Oh, I hardly suppose that in so many words you made a formal proposition that she should accord you her hand in holy matrimony. But, that she was aware of your intentions is clear from the fact that your wife was also."

Uxhill pulled at his moustache. The obstinate stupidity of Jones irritated him so that he could have struck him. But, in the clubdom of Vanity Square, a relapse into such primal primitiveness does not do.

"I tell you," he angrily repeated, "that I had no such intentions. Miss Sixmith could not have been aware of them, or Maud, either. But, let it go. Was that her reason for leaving?"

"I hardly see what better reason she or any other woman could have. When I asked her she said at once that you proposed to marry again, and, as you had admitted it, I could not deny it. It was then that she said she would not contest any action; on the contrary, that she would facilitate you; but, she told me to beg you to leave her the child. I felt it my duty to say that if, instead of facilitating you, she resisted any action you brought, and showed how you had been carrying on under her nose, it was she who would get the decree and the child as well."

"I was not carrying on under her nose," Uxhill ragingly retorted; "it is an outrage for you to suggest it."

"When I told her that," Jones imperturbably pursued, "she replied that she would not contend with you, but that if you took the child, you would take her life with it. Now, Uxhill—"

"Yes, I know, you want me to be lenient with a woman who drove me nearly if not quite insane, who for no reason whatever, for none, I tell you, for there was none, left me, abducted my child and went to her father."

"From whom, by the way, you abducted her, and who, when she sought refuge with him, told her that she had made her bed, and that she could lie on it. After taking her from her home, you have forced her from yours. She has nowhere to go. Only her child has she left to her, and you want to take that. You have ruined her life. But ruin is not enough for you. You want to kill her as well. Were it not for the child she would be glad to have you, glad to go, glad to be dead. And it is you who have brought her to that. But, you have been able to only because she loved you. It is a fine reward. I told her so. Yes, and she would not listen to me. She would listen to nothing against you. Uxhill, do you hear what I am saying? She stopped me when I started to tell her what I thought of you. Well, at any rate, I have told you. I should have suffocated if I had not."

Jones turned, and, with an uplift of the chin, summoned a waiter. "Fetch me a whiskey and soda."

Uxhill turned also. He felt profoundly misused. Prior to Maud's exit, save for one brief mood that had departed as abruptly as it had come, save that and an equally brief passage-at-arms, there had been nothing in his conduct to which a saint could object, there had been nothing on his conscience which a seraph would reprove. He felt that. He felt it so strongly that he felt that everybody concerned ought to feel it, too. Instead of which, through some unaccountable shuffle of the cards, one that he could no more explain to himself than he could explain Maud's exit, he who had done nothing, and to whom everything had been done, suddenly, through this prodigious shuffle, was turned into a villain in a melodrama, feeding on women's tears. He was guiltless, yet held guilty, while the real criminal was converted into a suffering angel before his eyes.

Strangling an oath, he stared at Jones, who, having had his say, was refreshing himself with a great glass of bubbling stuff that had effected its entrance with a pop!

At other tables other men were lunching belatedly. Without, in the hall, others were entering a room where Uxhill's money had run like a fox. From without came the jingle of sleigh-bells, the cries of brutes swearing at their horses, the sound of hammering and of engines working at the ceaseless skyscrapers ceaselessly going up, the metallic roar of the city.

Of it all, Uxhill was unconscious. One fact alone stood out. He was inexplicably misused. Jones, through some impediment of thought, was not only incompetent to see things as they were, but now, after having damned him up hill and down, was affecting, if you please, a remoteness that seemed to say, you are not fit to be spoken to.

Thereat, as though to put an accent on this impression, Jones, the bubbling stuff absorbed, stood up, and, without as much as a nod, marched off.

But, that was the extra drop. Uxhill felt not merely misused, but robbed. Jones was taking away with him the opportunity of being told what a confounded ass he was; what a confounded ass he had always thought him,—a confounded ass, indeed, with whose asininity he wished nothing further to do.

That robbery was more than Uxhill could bear. He started from his seat. But, in the hall, in which Jones' retreating back was still discernible, were men with whom Uxhill was very popular; a group of them detained him, asking were he not to join them, urging him to come and play. When he was free of them, Jones, like a fiend on the stage disappearing in a trap, had entered a lift and vanished.

When, ultimately, Uxhill reached the hall below, the doorman told him that Mr. Jones had just gone.

Maltreated, misused, robbed-to-boot, Uxhill became immediately conscious of a sense of being absolutely alone. The colossal city had been converted suddenly into a desert, in which, Stella gone, there was not a soul with whom he cared to exchange a word.

No; not one. Only a little girl, too young to understand.

VIII.

CHILDREN do not consider the future, they do not bother over the past; to them the present is alone important. We have much to learn of children. Apart from the charm of their charming philosophy, they are anarchists every one. They all wish to do what pleases them,—and what wish is more natural? Sometimes their wish is realized; then, instead of being anarchists, they are autocrats; for, when you come to look at it, an anarchist merely wants to do that which an autocrat can.

To Uxhill, Mowgy was an autocrat. He never thought of thwarting her. Now, the memory of her recurring, he got from the club, and made for the hotel.

At the desk orders evidently had been received. There was no sending of cards or waiting about; a bell-boy, directed at once what to do, led him to a dim hall and to a door, where he knocked.

But, Uxhill, unaccustomed to such formalities, opened it and beheld a room, at one end of which Nora stood, looking extremely uncomfortable, while, on the floor, was Mowgy.

The child turned, distended her mouth demeasurably, got precipitately to her little feet, with a bleat of joy hurled herself in his arms, and then, after the fashion of children who invariably persecute those that love them, she proceeded to tyrannize.

"Take me home," she ordered.

At the side of the room a lateral door, behind which he divined the presence of Maud, silently was closing.

Uxhill kissed the little girl. "Yes, dear, presently."

"No; now," the child insisted.

But at the door through which he had come there was fresh knocking. A waiter appeared with bread and butter and strawberry jam, which Nora took from him.

"You must eat your supper first," said Uxhill, striving not to thwart but to temporize. "We will talk about it afterward." He turned to the nurse. "Nora," he added, "you need not wait."

Nora, who, at the moment, was arranging the child's supper, looked if possible still more uncomfortable. She glanced at Uxhill, but gingerly, out of the corner of an eye, instantly averted. But, presently, through the lateral door, with another furtive look, she departed.

Uxhill, occupied with Mowgy, did not notice. He got a chair and seated himself beside her.

"Now, tell me all about where you have been."

Mowgy was a small person much given to routine. Heretofore, at supper, there had been stories. What heretofore had been must therefore be now. Besides, what were papas for except to entertain little girls? After a long, leisurely bite at her bread, she made that point very clear. Uxhill knew that it was idle to argue. Like water from a faucet, he poured a story forth. When it was done she exacted another. Then, the jam finished, her hunger for food and fiction appeased, she got back to her original demand.

Again Uxhill had to temporize. He told her that it was getting late, that presently all good little girls would be in bed, that only papas who were very big and very strong ever thought of being out at such an hour, but that, perhaps, the next day, he would come for her and Nora.

"And mamma, too, of course," said Mowgy, to whom the oversight was an accident, and to whom also the objections appealed.

"Now, you run to her," Uxhill replied; "but say good-night to me first."

The child did as she was bid. Patting him on the cheek, she said good-night, and going to the door that led to the adjoining room, kissed her hand to him as she opened it.

Uxhill went out into the hall. Beyond, a woman was loitering, a maid, he thought, but who, as he approached, he saw was Nora. She was holding her hands, in an attitude respectful and shrinking.

"Mr. Uxhill, sir," she began, "you won't take Mowgy, will you?"

"Not to-night; certainly not."

"Not to Miss Sixmith, sir?"

Uxhill had spoken, as he went on, without stopping, over his shoulder. At this he stopped short.

"But what," he curtly inquired, "has Miss Sixmith got to do with it?"

"Oh, sir, excuse me, sir; but I have been with Miss Maud, with Mrs. Uxhill, I mean, sir, since she was a little baby, and I am afraid, sir—"

Surprisedly Uxhill stared at the woman. She seemed afflicted with ague. She was trembling, and a handkerchief, which nervously she had been tormenting in her hands, she put to her eyes.

"Afraid!" he exclaimed, "afraid of what?"

But now Nora, covering her face with her handkerchief, sobbed merely.

"Afraid of what?" he repeated. What the dickens ailed the woman, he wondered.

"You—you know, sir," she whimpered.

"But, hang it, I don't know; what in the world are you crying about?"

"It's the—it's the—it's the horsehair. Oh!"

"Horsehair!"

But, Nora, the handkerchief still at her face, was slinking away. She reached the door from which he had come. It engulfed her.

"Horsehair!" Uxhill, following her with his eyes, reiterated. "She's cracked."

"Horsehair," he resumed to himself, as without bothering to wait for the lift, he went down the stairs; "who was it spoke to me about horsehair?"

He had forgotten. It was, perhaps, some club stupidity garnered at cards. But, horsehair is a thing too unsuggestive to be discussed even by people who talk about nothing. The fact perplexed him. But what perplexed him most was Nora.

For years he had seen her tending Maud and Mowgy with a sort of slavish devotion, yet otherwise prim, angular, rigid, respectability personified, trustworthiness made nurse, the ideal servant, and now suddenly afraid of her shadow.

"Certainly she is cracked," he decided. "They are all cracked. Nora, Maud, Jones, the whole lot of them ought to be in Bloomingdale!"

At the thought of Jones, the recollection of the manner in which he had carried on that afternoon, ousted Nora and her craziness. Except on the theory that Jones was so dead in love with Maud that nothing she could possibly do would seem to him other than celestial, and anything, no matter how justified, done her, would seem to him distinctly infernal, except on that theory, Uxhill could conjecture nothing that would serve at all to explain the rhyme and reason of his attitude that day.

But, he suddenly queried, did it not explain more? Did it not explain the whole situation? Did it not explain Maud's exit, which, in forcing him to get a divorce, left her free to marry this imbecile? In explaining that, it explained, too, Jones' obstinacy in maintaining that Maud had left him because of what he was pleased to term his matrimonial intentions. That, of course, was all damned nonsense; Maud never could have left him for any such reason. At the time she went he had no intentions at all. The intentions had come later. He had admitted that to Jones. Jones had repeated the admission to Maud, and between them, as an excuse for her desertion, they had concocted this cock-and-bull story. It was all clear as day, and showed, too, why Jones had refused to act for him. Of course, the scoundrel would not act for him,—he proposed to act for her! It was a conspiracy, that's what it was,—a dirty, diabolic plot.

Long since, Uxhill had reached the street. Cold as it was, the aspects of the tortuous situation made him far hotter than he had been when he had stalked from the hotel earlier in the day. In his excitement he had passed the Athenæum. He turned back and entered the club on the heels of a man muffled to the ears, who greeted him warmly, with affectionate solicitude. It was Sayce.

The club now was crowded. In a great room that looked on Fifth Avenue were thick groups. In the main hall there were more. Through coils of men, servants in livery passed with diminutive decanters, with mineral waters, cocktails, cigars.

Sayce unmuffling himself had the mufflings taken away.

Uxhill, too, got out of his coat. "Are you to dine here?" he asked. Without waiting to learn, he added, "Let's go upstairs. I must speak to you."

Already men were approaching. Among others the old man who had told Uxhill about his gout that noon. But, Sayce, knowing from experience what to expect, eluded him, and, followed by Uxhill, fled to a lift that shot them out of reach, landing them on a floor on which was the library, a room to which nobody ever went unless, the diminutive decanters urging, occasionally a member dropped in on the slumberous armchairs that were there.

Now it was peopled only with the caryatides of the bookshelves, the demigods that never die, but who, in a club like this, get dusty. Barring the bedrabbled immortals, the room was empty.

Sayce, letting himself on a sofa, looked at Uxhill.

"Any news?"

"What do you think?" Uxhill replied, squatting in a neighborly three-cornered chair as he spoke. "My wife and child are at the Buckingham. I have just come from there. I saw the kid, and see now the whole thing. The other night I spoke to Jones about getting a divorce. He came here to-day and abused me like a pickpocket. Why? Why, indeed! Because, after the divorce, he proposes to marry the lady."

Sayce ran a hand through his hair and stared surprisedly. He was not surprised in the least. From the start he had suspected something of the sort, only he had been far too civil to intimate it.

"But, dear boy, did Jones say so?"

"No, ruffian that he is, he lacked the pluck, but—"

Sayce nodded. "He has certainly always admired her very much. But so have I. So has everybody. Mrs. Uxhill is one in a million. It hardly follows, though, that—"

Uxhill interrupted him. "I, too, thought her one in a million, one in a billion, for that matter. That, though, is neither here nor there. The point is that Nora is stark, staring mad, and I want you, if you will, please, to look her over and pack her off. Mowgy is not safe with her; she can't be—"

"Nora!" Sayce exclaimed. "I won't say it is not possible, for everything is, but—"

"Yes, I know. But, wait a second. Not ten minutes ago, with tears in her eyes, shaking from head to foot, she told me that she was afraid of—what do you suppose? Horsehair! Not a horsewhip, but horsehair. Why should anyone be afraid of that? And crying and sobbing over it, too. Isn't that enough? Isn't it clear that she is cracked? By George, I believe they all are."

"Hold up a bit," Sayce threw in. "How did it come about? What was it in connection with?"

"In connection with Mowgy. She said she was afraid of horsehair for her. Horsehair, now! There is nothing evil about horsehair, is there?"

Sayce tormented an eyebrow. "Horsehair per se, no. On the contrary, it is the outside of a horse, and that, Palmerston said, is the best thing for the inside of a man. But, he did not mean when taken internally. Then it might be unpleasant."

"But, whoever would think of taking it internally?"

"Nobody with any sense, of course. But in medico-legal lore there is a mythical case in which a person, without sense and without scruples either, administered it feloniously. The effort was unsuccessful. But, the story got about, got twisted, as all stories do, and, in the legend, which still survives, the victim died."

"I never heard of such rubbish."

"There is nothing curious in that. What is curious is the fact that Nora should have. I don't understand it, and what I don't understand, I don't like."

"Nor I," said Uxhill. "Who does?" Suddenly he started. "There," he exclaimed, "I have it! Somebody else has talked horsehair to me. I had forgotten whom. Like that, it just came to me! It was Jones. He asked me what I thought about it?"

"About horsehair?" Sayce repeated gravely. Then he, too, abruptly started. Something forgotten must as suddenly have occurred to him. For a moment, his face, not grave merely but perplexed, he sat in silence.

"What do you make of it?" Uxhill asked.

"Do you know," Sayce answered, rising as he spoke, "I believe I will go and see Nora. I believe I will go now. Will you wait here?"

"I will order dinner. What would you like?"

"A bit of beef and a baked apple."

"Not together!" Uxhill called after him.

But Sayce had gone.

Uxhill rang, got the dinner-bill for the day, wrote a list of dishes, among which beef and apple were presumably included, and, going to the shelves, took down a dusty immortal, one at whose shrine often, in younger days, he had paused, and read again the verse of Leconte de Lisle, the royal "Midi," the prodigious "Vision de Brahma," the enchanting "Sommeil de Leïlah."

Twice a servant came, telling him that dinner was announced, but he did not heed. In the opiates of the evocations he forgot Sayce, forgot himself, and so forgetting, forgot, too, his little human soap-bubble loves and hates.

But a third summons awoke him.

"What time is it?" he asked.

"After nine, sir."

"After nine?" It seemed incredible. Sayce had been gone since seven. Usually he looked a patient over and in five minutes, Good-day. Uxhill wondered what possibly could be detaining him.

"I wish, please," he ordered, "that you get the doorman to send into the Buckingham and inquire of Dr. Sayce when he will be back. Dr. Sayce is with Mrs. Uxhill."

He turned again to the drugs in the book, to the "Dies iræ,"—the sorcery of a somnambulist of song. It lulled him.

In the process the servant returned.

"Dr. Sayce, sir, left the Buckingham some time ago. Yes, sir."

"But, didn't he come back here? He must be in the club."

"No, sir; the doorman says not, sir."

Perplexed, Uxhill got up. He did not at all understand. But then latterly a number of things had managed to elude his comprehension. This was but another.

With the idea that he might get the physician's secretary on the wire, he went down to the telephone-room and told the operator to call Dr. Sayce. When presently, in a little booth which the man indicated, he took up the receiver, he found that at the other end of it was Sayce himself.

"Hello!" he exclaimed. "What the dickens is the matter? I thought you were coming back."

Then through the instrument came the physician's answering voice:

"Uxhill, it is not for me to condemn anyone; but to you I intend never to speak again."

"Sayce!" Uxhill protested.

The cry lost itself. At the other end connection had been cut.

In the booth was but a stool, on which Uxhill sat, a ledge on which the telephone stood with a blank wall behind it, into the blankness of which he stared.

Was the whole world mad? he wondered, or was he?

With such queries for companions, dazed and a bit dizzy, he sat. The desertion of Maud had been to him unfathomable. The ruffianism of Jones had been relatively just as strange. But, more inexplicable than either was this slap in the face. An hour or two before, in the hall without, a man who had greeted him with solicitude and affection now refused, indeed, to condemn him, and refused to speak to him as well. No; that man would not condemn him. Yet, condemn him for what? For what? Nor would he speak to him either. And why?

"Why?" he repeated to the wall. But the wall was not responsive.

Could it be that he was really mad, and that these things were hallucinations? But to this, also, the wall, like the telephone, was dumb.

That evening he had hit, or, what amounted to the same thing, thought he had hit, on a theory that explained, more or less well, everything that had occurred.

But, in this new affront, any validity the theory may have had took itself off with a run. For admitting a conspiracy, certainly Sayce was not in it, yet his attitude was quite, if not more, unaccountable than the attitude of those that were. Evidently, if he himself was not mad, and evidently he was not, then there was something else. But what? Though he tormented himself into madness in an effort to learn, he knew that he would never succeed. Had Patmore refused to serve him or the chef torn his apron off, he would have thought merely that the air of free America had gone to their heads and let it go at that. But that Sayce should turn on him,—no, that, he decided, was something which he had awaited as little as that Mowgy should do so herself.

And who knows, the poor devil reflected, but that to-morrow she may?

Who knows, he added in the miserable undertone of miserable thought, but that Stella will catch the infection and turn from me, too?

For it was an infection. What else could it be? First, Maud, then Jones, now Sayce. It was but a question of time when his sister would catch it, and everybody would go, everybody down to and including Patmore and the chef. Yet, if it were not an infection, then, in some strange and subtle way, he had become as one accursed, one who, for some sin unknown to him, those for whom he cared shrank from and shunned.

"Are you using the 'phone, sir?"

At the door of the booth the operator stood, eyeing him curiously. In that booth he had seen many men talking to the instrument, but none ever to themselves. He did not regard it as legitimate.

"Oh!" said Uxhill. Then, rallying, he added, "They appear to have cut me off."

With his usual indifferent air, he got out, got his coat, got a cab and drove to that house of his that was haunted now, and perhaps forever, with the ghosts of the living,—with the memories of those who had known him and would know him no more.

IX.

SNOW was falling steadily in small, slow flakes. Uxhill did not notice. When a man speaks to another as Sayce had to him, the first aid for the injured Dante supplies: "Non ragionam di lor' ma guarda e passa."

To Uxhill, mere human, natural pride counselled the adoption of that very excellent advice. But, pride is a screen behind which we rage at our ease. There are occasions when it is much braver to dare to be simple. The reason of the affront was wholly unimaginable. Behind it, too, were possible vastnesses in which imagination might readily weary itself uselessly away, the great blank voids of the inscrutable, where thought either falters or else, returning, saddens us with its hopeless mien.

Pride, natural and human, counselled Uxhill to have no further heed of Sayce, to proceed without argument on his way. But, the equally human and natural desire to know, which, unappeased, may gnaw more sharply than hunger, fastened on him so irresistibly that, lowering the window of the cab, he threw at the driver Sayce's address.

The cab veered, turned into a side street, where presently it stopped.

Uxhill got out. Before him was a brown door, through which again and again he had passed, and at which, shortly now, a maid appeared, who, before he could question, told him that Dr. Sayce was not in. She might as well have held her tongue.

Uxhill, with that peremptoriness which was usual to him, strode by her, strode down the hall to another door, which, without the formality of a knock, he threw open and saw, before an open fire, beneath a big chandelier and behind a small table at which were two chairs, Sayce, standing bolt upright, looking remarkably red.

At the sight of Uxhill he stamped a foot. If a face can flame his did. If eyes could kill his would have.

"I am not at home!" he bawled.

"Not to me, I am aware. Your servant has so informed me. But why?"

"Because I am out. Is not that enough? What more do you want?"

Uxhill nodded. "Yes. But you owe it, not necessarily to me, but certainly to yourself, to say why. I have done nothing to deserve it."

Furiously through his hair, Sayce ran a hand.

"Nothing! Nothing! Then tell me what something is? Or, rather, don't tell me. I don't want to hear. I refuse to listen. Leave my house. You tarnish it."

Uxhill, closing the door behind him, toweringly advanced on the fiery little man.

"For that, were you a bit younger and a bit bigger, I would knock you down. You know it. It is your advantage. It is one, though, that a gentleman would not take. Don't do so again. I am here for an explanation. I propose to have it. But, meanwhile, in spite of your years, I will thrash you if you presume again on my forbearance."

"Thrash me!" Sayce shouted, his face livid, one arm half raised, the other shaking at his side. "If I had a pistol here I would give you the bullet you deserve."

"Ah, indeed!" Uxhill answered, negligently producing the novelty which that morning he had found in his pocket. "Well, now, here is one. It will enable us to talk on equal terms. I thank you for reminding me of it."

Sayce glared and dropped into one of the chairs by the table at which he stood.

On that table Uxhill put the pistol, shoving it over to where Sayce was, and, removing his hat, took the other chair and sat down.

But, at this, Sayce got up, turned his back on Uxhill, took a poker and lunged viciously at the fire. It was not redder than he.

The bent back before him Uxhill addressed.

"Will you tell me now in what way I have been so unfortunate as to offend you?"

Sayce, the poker still in his hand, wheeled like a rat.

"Offend me! Your language is singularly colorless. Offend me! The one thing in life I cared for you have taken.

No wonder your wife had to go,—while she still had the strength. Such things are not done, not by Apaches even. Never for an instant would I have let that girl within a mile of you could I have conceived what you would do."

Sayce paused, yet only for lack of breath. But, Uxhill, who, in mounting amazement, had disentangled from the unrolled skein of words an inkling of what he meant, sprang to his feet.

"But, Sayce, I never knew that you cared for her. You did not say, nor did she. Not for a moment did it occur to me—"

"Why should I have said anything? Besides, it is your wife that should have occurred to you. Your wife who—"

Hotly Uxhill interrupted him. "I assure you that not until my wife had gone did I say a word to Miss Sixmith."

"Oh, you don't have to assure me of that. If you had, she is not the girl to have listened. The marvel of it is that even afterward, when your wife had gone, she consented. But she little knew that your wife had to go,—while she could."

"While she could!" Uxhill repeated.

"Yes, while she had the strength. It was infernal, the whole of it, even to your acting, even to your surprise when she had gone, even to your idea that you did not exist. Where did that come from except from the fact that were this thing known you would cease to?"

"Thing! What thing? What on earth—"

"Yes, infernal!" Sayce, brandishing the poker, shouted. "And in spite of it, you have the assurance to force your way here and to tell me not to presume on your forbearance. Yours, indeed! Don't presume on mine. There is your pistol. Take it. Go home and shoot yourself."

The chiding of a torrent is futile. There are torrents of passion which words are as useless to stem. They must exhaust themselves before speech may prevail. The rabid denunciation of himself at which Uxhill was forced to assist was wholly incomprehensible. One dim point alone was dimly clear, the man's undivined infatuation for the girl who was dear, too, to him. The rest was thick darkness.

"Yes, go," Sayce cried, his great eyebrows raised and contracted, the poker hanging in his hand. "You came for an explanation. You have had it. You have had more than you asked. You have had two. Take them and be off, take the pistol also, or, if that is too much for you, take your infernal drug."

Uxhill, the thick darkness grown thicker about him, managed here with contrasting composure to interrupt again.

"But, Sayce, what are you talking about? To what drug do you refer? To the opiate you gave me? Why should I take that? Might it not be better if you took some yourself?"

Sullenly, Sayce looked at him, and, bending, hissed, "You know the drug I mean, one of which the final effect may be delayed at will for weeks, for months, during which it simulates an ordinary disease, and, the more infernally, in that its absorption removes it beyond the chance of detection. That is the drug I mean, and which in your hands failed only because Nora was one too many for you; because she secreted enough for analysis and learned that it was orsere, horsehair as she got it, the most subtle poison known, and with which you were dosing your wife,—and why? Because a girl existed who would not listen to a married man. Because that man's wife eliminated and perhaps the girl might! That was your infernal plot!"

At this fresh freshet of words, Uxhill again assisted, but now as one does at the sight of monsters emerging in nightmare, monsters that come, grimace, evaporate, instantly replaced by others more monstrous still. Uxhill could not stay them, he could not hide from them, he could not even cry out. He was dumb, only, unfortunately not deaf. But the darkness was less thick.

"Yes, that was your plot. Jones, whom I saw, told me about the girl; Nora about the drug."

"Told you?" said Uxhill mechanically. The monsters were still about him. But dawn was breaking. Dream may be numbing in horror, but sometimes the actual is worse. Before Uxhill a dream was receding. In its place was the real.

"She told you?" he repeated in the same absent, mechanical way, occupied not with Nora, but the real. Yet, in his eyes and face so expressive must the real have been, that at some apperception of it suddenly taking shape, Sayce coerced, stepped back.

The doctors disagree. Some deny telepathy. Others declare that thoughts may be transmitted without signs, apparatus, or words, through the sheer impact of their force.

Perhaps they may. But this, at least, is certain. Something in Uxhill's eyes and face passed from him to Sayce. From his hand the poker fell, noisily, with a thud. Affrightedly he started.

"No, no; not that!"

His hands had gone to his head. He seemed to be pressing at what had got there.

"No, no; she never did. Oh, Uxhill," he called. "A girl like that! You don't know her. She could not. Don't you see that she could not? Why should she? Don't you see that she had no reason at all?"

But, here a very curious thing happened. Sayce seemed to lose control of his legs. He had been standing, monologuing abjectly at Uxhill. Now, however, without falling or any effort to save himself, but precisely as though his legs had melted under him, he sank to the floor.

If Uxhill saw, he did not heed. Something else that had fallen was occupying him, the weight of ignorance that had been so heavy, in place of which now was something heavier still. He could not quite shoulder it. Sayce, who was weaker, it had felled.

"But, she did!" on the floor, groveling there, the old man cried.

Truth is an objective phenomenon. It acts in us and on us like a chemical precipitate. Sayce had given it no thought, and before him it stood revealed. The revelation, which ordinarily would have got at him hours before, but which his great love interfering had delayed, was crushing him now with its blinding force. The attitude of Uxhill, his strange quiescence at the infamous charge, some gleam of the real which he, in seeing, made Sayce intercept, these things encountering in memory incidents, some overlooked, others dismissed; words uttered by Nora accusing not Uxhill but the girl, words that he had indignantly hushed, — these things combining and from the chemistry of the mind there emerged the truth.

"She did," he repeated, crouching in the sudden light. "Only one conversant with the minute phenomena of disease could have done it. Only one conversant with medicine could have so graduated the doses that only the symptoms of anæmia appeared. She knew. You didn't."

From the floor he crawled to a chair, raised himself on it and sat nodding at the illusion that had unmasked. The illusion had been to him dearer than life. He had lost it.

"Yes, she knew. She forgot that I loved her, remembering that you are rich."

Then, at the truth, he shuddered.

Before Uxhill, too, an illusion had unmasked, dropped its domino, stepped from its disguise, stripped itself bare. In one of the fancy balls which the imagination provides for days he had been roaming. But, the high walls of the revel had crumbled. From the ruins a leprous horror oozed. In the fetid air swung the Why, vomiting its rhymes and reasons, suffocating him with hideous retrospects, through which zigzagged the heightening horror that that sweet life of Maud's had seemed to her menaced,—and by him!

From that he shrank, and, shrinking, turned, picked up his hat, hurried to the hall, to the snow, to the waiting cab.

In the hall the servant who had told him Sayce was not in stood, her back to the wall. Opening the brown door, he swung it after him, but, through it, just as it was closing, a sound flew, repercuted.

Irresolutely, his hand on the knob, he listened.

Before him on the box, in a coat of snow, the cabman sat.

"Did you hear that?" Uxhill asked.

"It was a gun, I guess."

Uxhill threw back the door, passed in again to the room beyond, where, at the threshold, the servant, white as the snow in the street, hovered, without courage to enter.

Within, beneath the big chandelier, Sayce lay, huddled in a heap, his face covered with blood, the pistol beside him.

Uxhill hurried forward, knelt to his old friend, spoke to him, touched him. Rising and uncovering his head, he turned to the scared white maid.

"Ring for the police. I wish I could wait. But I cannot."

Again through the hall he went, got to the street, told the cabman to drive to the Buckingham, telling him to drive quickly.

X.

DEATH may be the last to occur, but it may also be the least. Many are the things that are worse. The abrupt exit of Sayce, vacating existence in the crash of faith demolished, had stirred Uxhill, though less than the emotions preceding. He was too violently affected already to regard it other than as an inferior horror, attributable, as was all else that had occurred, to one who, an illusion unmasking, from a saint had changed into a saurian.

In every affection there is the germ of hate. Hatred is but love reversed. In Uxhill's heart a hole had been dug and, the contents displaced, such was the revulsion that, about the neck of the girl where he had thought to put his arms, could he have got his fingers and pressed them there till her reptile ghost emerged, he would have died of delight.

Where she was, no one, perhaps, but Sayce could have told. But, wherever she was, the noise of the suicide would follow and alone to her tell the reason. No doubt it was by way of precaution against a possible charge, which the divorce proceedings might provoke, that already she had taken herself to some spot, from which, once the proceedings effectual and the divorce decreed, she could descend in vampirish beauty, capture him with her Madonna air that was lethal as the Borgias, coerce him with her small, thin hand that was steady as the Brinvilliers, and yield to him her cool, chaste lips that were malignant as virus.

At the memory of the spell, impermanent yet real, which those lips had exerted, the surer knowledge of their nameless shames recurred, and it was with a horror of them, horror of her, horror of himself, superposing on the still deeper horror which another had undergone, that Uxhill got from the cab and entered the hotel.

At the office he did not stop; he knew the way, he needed no herald, and up in the lift that had taken him that afternoon he soared, alighting in the hall where Nora had cowered, and down it he went to the room where Mowgy was sleeping. Adjoining it was another where he knew that Maud must be.

A moment he waited. Like Mowgy, perhaps, she, too, was sleeping, and if aroused, might come to the door, see him, think he had returned to finish his work, and, shudderingly, slam and bar it.

Even so he must bear it. At last he had got at the Why, and to that, surely, if through the door itself, she would listen.

A moment he waited. Then, tentatively, he knocked. The door opened. Before him was Maud, her head lifted suddenly in that attitude a deer has when surprised, yet without alarm, with none of the dread he had feared, with wonder merely. Then at once she seemed to understand. One hand of hers was concealed by the door. The other that hung at her side moved up a little and back, the contraction of it reiterating the surprise which her face expressed.

"Maud!"

It was all he found, but in it he put his heart, his soul, the agony of his great despair. Again he uttered it, but this time he was in the room, the door closing behind him.

"Maud! Only for the old days' sake, only for them, give me a moment now."

He was eating her with his eyes, and into the famine of them she peered. But there was no fear in her own, a query merely, a perplexity and a doubt.

"All the afternoon I had expected you, and when you came to Mowgy, but not to me—"

"Don't speak to me, don't answer me, only look at me while I tell you that if I had a thousand lives I would give each one for you."

But, she was looking at him, her lips half parted, the glories of her eyes aglow. He had no need to ask her that.

"Each one," he repeated. "Was there nothing to say it to you? Nothing to say I could not harm you?"

The doubt now must have been going, the perplexity and query, too, for to those half-parted lips a sad little smile had come. She looked away and then at him, and then away, far away, once more.

"Harm that comes to a woman from the man she loves, if she love him enough, she can endure. But had you wished to harm, would you have gone to find me? Would you have been ill because you could not? I have been very wrong. I believed that you and that woman were trying to, and without reproach I would have let you, but I could not leave Mowgy to be killed by her, too. Not that you would have permitted that, but she would have died, as I might have."

"I know it," he answered. "But, if I had known it too late, if you had died, died thinking me in league with that reptile, the torments of the lowest depths of Dante's seventh hell would have been myrrh and cassia by comparison to what I should have suffered. Yet, how you could have thought me capable of conceiving such a thing—"

"You conceived no such thing," she interrupted. "Yet, why I thought you had you can explain to yourself better than I."

"Yes. I will tell you. It is my confession—"

Again she interrupted him. "One that I will not hear. That you had an interest in that woman I knew. I know, too, it has gone. You would not be here had it not. But what it was I forbid you to tell. It has gone; let it go. Don't speak of it. Let it be a thing forgot. I won't have it between us."

The room was comfortless and chill. Unconsciously it oppressed. Uxhill moved nearer to his wife. He was so close to her now that he caught the odor of her hair. It had in it the scent of flowers that are far away.

"Nor I. I will have nothing between us. Nothing. But that reptile must be fanged."

"Gerald! Who is there to do it but you and I? It would be public, and what a legacy for that child!"

"If you had only told Sayce."

With the same sad smile she answered, "I could tell no one anything that reflected on you."

His hat he still held; he put it down, and took her hand in his.

"Meanwhile I have waded from horror to horror, but horror's crown of horror is that you could have thought me capable of this thing."

"Gerald, forgive me."

"No, Maud, forgive me."

"Then let us both forgive." For a moment she hesitated. Slowly with that motion the swan has she turned her head aside. "Are you still planning to go to Rhode Island?"

"I promised Mowgy to take her home to-morrow."

Quickly she looked up. "And you propose to?"

"I promised. But, she stipulated that you should go, too. Will you? Tell me."

Her eyes were in his. From his hand her own went up about him. The other joined the first. They made a necklace there.

"I will tell you that the very weariest river winds somewhere safe to sea."

XI.

A GERMAN, whom only Frenchmen read, said that happiness is illusory. But, is not horror more so? Pain, it may be, is necessary for the equilibrium of things. It may be, also, that evil is good which we do not understand. Both, perhaps, are needful. But, not horror. Otherwise it could not be so evanescent. The horror that had fastened on the Uxhills dissipated itself as horror always does, for even when it lingers you get accustomed to it and it ceases to be that.

Since the crowning horror at which Uxhill had protested, a year and a day had gone. It was the pre-Lenten season, which in Vanity Square is the most turbulent of all, a succession of regal dinners and royal balls, for which, from overseas, occasionally, come people of mark.

Among others were the Gemine, Uxhill's sister and brother-in-law, who, obligingly, stopped at his house.

Mme. Gemine, Sally as she was generally known, had not been in the States since her marriage, and latterly she had been urgent to display their exuberance to her prince, who, however, cared very little for exuberant things. He was good-looking, as many Romans are; he spoke English without accent as many Romans do, and he approached everything with a polite remoteness of demeanor which was due, not to hauteur, but timidity, to the fear of the fright of being bored.

A beautiful day, a beautiful book, the rustle of leaves, the ripple of waters, and no pauper could have been more content than this prince, descended from a Neronian consul. For his sins, the sins of some anterior life, perhaps, Sally was essentially worldly. She counted that day lost on which she had not spent a great deal of money, seen a great many people, and done a great many things, with perspectives of more extravagance and activity on the morrow. It was her cross that Gemine had no small talk, as it was his that she had no manners,—common crosses that made them an admirably assorted couple.

In Vanity Square they had now been a full fortnight, during which, had such gargantuanism been possible, each night they could have eaten a dozen dinners, each night they could have sat in as many boxes, attended as many affairs. But the end of the season was approaching. On the morrow they were off again, this time to the Riviera.

Now, as the curtain rises on the epilogue of the drama, they were shortly going on to the opera, pending which, at dinner, they were seated between Uxhill and Maud.

The room was unchanged, the table was the same, even the servants had not altered. Only, as is usual with people who have been in hell, Uxhill and Maud were a bit sobered.

"You two stick-in-the-muds," Sally was disdainfully remarking. "You do not know how bourgeoise you are. Is it not so, Mario?"

Mario, Prince Gemine, duke of Valtravaglia, marquis of Correse, lord of San Soria, patrician of Sienna and of Rome, was eating a white strawberry. He nodded absently. He agreed with whatever Sally said, with what anybody said. It saved time, labor, and breath. A tempestuous wife is very chastening.

"You will forget how to talk soon," Sally continued.

She was in white velvet. On her head was a tiara. About her jewels gleamed. She dazzled.

"You see," said Maud, in her low, sweet voice, "Gerald does not care to travel."

The statement was exact. Uxhill had journeyed enough,—to lands he did not wish to revisit.

Maud was in silk the color of pumpkin. So far from being bourgeoise, as always, she was charming.

"Fiddlesticks! he does not know what he wants; you either. It is positively indecent."

But at that Uxhill protested.

"Here, Sally, stop calling names."

"Shut up!" was the lady's prompt reply. She was smoking.

"Shut up!" she repeated. "Maud, you are boss in these diggings. Tell your people to pack and come with us to-morrow. In Monte Carlo you and Gerald will have something for your money. In April we can go up to the Rue de la Paix, from there over the Channel, and in June I will ship you back."

"Why in June?" Uxhill asked. "If we are there then, you might let us stay."

"Oh! as for that, stay as long as you like. But, in June, Mario and I go to the Finsburys."

"Are they nice?" Maud, who had never heard of the Finsburys before, inquired.

"She is a dear. You would love her. Gerald would, too. But not in the same way. I know him. I know him of old. Besides, I have observed her effect on Mario. Haven't I, Mario?"

"Lady Finsbury," said the last of the Gemine, "is the most beautiful woman I ever saw. But, her conversation,—" the prince made an almost imperceptible gesture,—"no, her conversation is less exalting."

"Englishwomen generally are rather heavy on hand," Uxhill, with an air of providing information, remarked.

"But she is not English," Sally resumed. "Finsbury's first wife was a colonial dwarf or a giant, I forget which, but something impossible. Finsbury, I know, had one child by her and a great deal to put up with. He told me all about it, and made me promise not to tell. He behaved, too, like such a gentleman. He wore crêpe on his hat for her for three whole months."

"That was very gentlemanly," said Uxhill. "But who consoled him?"

"The most beautiful woman that Mario ever saw. I don't think her as extraordinary as all that. But, she certainly is a dear. Finsbury's wife adored her. She was a friend of hers, and when she fell ill she nursed her devotedly. They were compatriots. The dwarf or giant Marchioness of Finsbury was a Canadian. So is this one. This one is the daughter of a brewer."

Sally looked at her prince. "Her father was a brewer, was he not, Mario?"

"A bacteriologist."

"Well, something of the kind. They made him a peer I know. Baron Sixmith, that was it. Gerald! Do be careful! A little more and that glass would have gone all over my dress, and I have no time to change it. By the way, what time is it?"

Sally, as she spoke, turned to Patmore. "Is the carriage here?"

"Yes, your highness," replied the butler to whom "excellency" was, perhaps, un-English, and, therefore, incorrect.

"Now, Patmore, don't be highnessing me. In this free-and-easy place Madam is enough. Maud," she continued, "Mario and I must run. You won't mind, will you?" she added, getting from her chair as she spoke. "Why, what on earth is the matter with you? You are as pale as a ghost."

"Damnation, Patmore!" exclaimed Uxhill, rising nervously, upsetting a chair as he did so. "You keep this room hotter than Tophet. Open a window."

Maud looked up at Sally and attempted to smile. She did not succeed very well, however. Her under lip was trembling. But, she managed to speak.

"For a moment I was a bit dizzy. I am quite right now."

With manifest concern, Sally contemplated her. "I thought you were going to faint. If you like, I won't go."

With the same little, tremulous look, Maud shook her head.

In the protest of it, Uxhill joined.

"No, Sally, it is only the heat; it affected me. Come, little girl," he added to Maud, "let's see them off."

As Sally and her prince passed into the drawing-room, he whispered, "Bear up."

But, presently, when on to the opera the others had gone, putting an arm about her, he led her to that sofa from which, long before, she had kissed her hand at him, and then, sauntering down the room, had played the slow, sweet air that told of lovers who are ceasing to love.

"Try and forget it."

"But, Gerald, how can I? Besides, you were right. We should have done something. Now she has killed that man's wife, and it is our fault."

"No, dear, it is you who were right. Our first concern was Mowgy. By comparison with her, what is the loss of a woman of whose existence we have learned only through hearing that she is dead? Even otherwise justice is not ours. True justice is pity. It was in that spirit we let her go."

"And Sayce, too, Gerald. Poor Sayce!"

"There, again, you see. We could not have prevented that either. That reptile was his ideal. He shot himself not because he had lost her, but because she happened to be different from what he thought. The ideal is a picture which we paint with our heart's blood, and we are not apt to feel pleasantly toward anyone who destroys it. Another man might have shot her,—he shot himself. Suicide is merely assassination driven in."

"It does all seem too terrible, though."

"The more reason why you should forget it. Sensible people think only of agreeable things, and disagreeable things they never mention."

"I fear I am not sensible, then."

"I know I did not use to be. Do you remember the night I told you to add up zeros?"

"I remember I could not."

"Nor I. I did not know their meaning. I have learned since. They mean eternity,—the eternity which I once thought had begun between us, and which I know now can never commence. Yes, zeros represent eternity, but they represent chaos as well. I have learned that, too. But, Maud, I have learned something further."

He paused and looked at her. In the pause she looked at him.

"Yes?" she murmured.

"I have learned that out of chaos issue stars, and, out of anguish, men."

Hours later, when Sally and her prince returned, they were still seated on that sofa.

"I have no idea, you know," Mme. Gemine, entering and perceiving them there, exclaimed, "how you two tiresome people can be so tiresome as to do nothing but—"

"But," the prince approaching with his polite remoteness of demeanor, continued for her, "to do nothing is less fatiguing than doing something, at least," he added with an almost imperceptible gesture, "in society as conducted here."

Uxhill, rising, helped his sister with a wonderful cloak of purple and gold which she wore, nodding, as he did so, very appreciatively at Gemine.

"Because people are not up to some devilishness, it does not follow at all that they need be alarmingly dull. Only, in this part of the planet, it will be a few hundred years before that fact is generally diffused. I know it took a miracle to get it through my head."

Sally, who had seated herself, was lighting a cigarette.

"Now, Gerald, that does sound interesting. Tell us all about it, and how it occurred."

But, to this day, neither Sally nor anybody else, for that matter, save Uxhill and Maud, have ever known the true story of the miracle in Vanity Square.

THE IMAGE IN THE SAND

A Love-Story Dealing with the Occult.

BY E. F. BENSON

12mo. Cloth, $1.50

"The Image in the Sand" is a book that will entertain every novel-reader and provoke discussion. It speaks emphatically for the development of Mr. Benson's powers as a writer, though it also emphasizes that lightness of touch and happy faculty for sketching character in outline which have marked his several former books.

> "Spiritualism, hypnotism, demoniac possession, white and black magic, Oriental theosophy—all are found among the component parts of this tale. The dénouement is decidedly original and highly imaginative. Decidedly, 'The Image in the Sand' will not fail to make a strong appeal to every one who has any love for the marvellous and the unknown—or who appreciates a very well-written story."—Brooklyn Eagle.
> "The author of 'Dodo' has written a 'thriller.' It is a spiritualistic story. Mr. Benson sets part of his story in the East, and part in London, and tells it in a manner to keep the reader wide awake and interested to the end."

> "Mr. McKean gets enviably far away from the smart novel that has the divorce court as its finale and the trite conclusion. A powerful moral novel, . . . that has little to do with the frivolities."

Benson was the author of 'Dodo,' a book about which every one was talking a few years ago, we expected to find that he had given us something pretty good in 'The Challoners.' We read it, breathlessly and absorbedly, and then we were of the opinion that he had given us a novel that is better than the book which made him famous."

The Monster

I

WHEN the clergyman had gone, the bride turned.

Before her was an open window before which was the open sea. In the air was a tropical languor, a savour of brine, the scent of lilies, the sound of mandolins that are far away. Below, in the garden, were masses of scarlet, high heaps of geranium blooms. A bit beyond was the Caprian blue of the San Diego Bay. There, a yacht rode, white and spacious. The yacht belonged to her husband who was beside her. She turned again and as passionately he embraced her; she coloured.

For the moment, as they stood there, they seemed so sheerly dissimilar that they might have come of alien races, from different zones. He, with his fair hair, his fair skin, his resolute and aggressive face, was typically Anglo-Saxon. She, with her delicate features, her dense black hair, and disquieting eyes, looked like a Madrilene Madonna—one of those fascinating and slightly shocking creations of seventeenth-century art that more nearly resemble infantas serenaded by caballeros than queens of the sky. There was a deeper contrast. He appeared frankly material; she, all soul.

Leisurely she freed herself.

"One might know," she began, then paused. A smile completed the sentence.

He smiled too.

"Yes, Leilah, one might know that however I hold you to me, I never can hold you enough."

"And I! I could be held by you forever."

On the door came a tap, rapid and assured. A page entered, the preoccupation of the tip in his face, in his hand a platter of letters.

The man, taking the letters, dismissed him.

"Miss Ogston," he continued. "From your father, confound him. It is the last time he will address you in that fashion. Miss Ogston," he repeated. "From the Silverstairs, I fancy. Gulian Verplank. There is but one for me."

He looked at his watch. "The launch from the yacht will be here shortly."

"When do we start?"

"Whenever you like. The Marquesas will keep. Bora-Bora will be the same whenever we get there. Only——"

"Only what?"

"I am in love with you, not with hotels."

"Let us go then. There will be a moon tonight?"

"A new one, a honeymoon, a honeymoon begun."

"Gulian! As if it could end!"

In pronouncing the "u" in his name her mouth made the sketch of a kiss.

"You would not wish it to?" he asked.

"When I die, perhaps, and even then only to be continued hereafter. Heaven would not be heaven without you."

She spoke slowly, with little pauses, in a manner that differed from his own mode of speech, which was quick and forceful.

Verplank turned to the letter that had been addressed to him, and which he still held. Without opening it, he tore it into long, thin strips. It was, he knew from the imprint, a communication of no importance; but, at the moment, the action seemed a reply to her remark. It served to indicate his complete indifference to everything and everyone save her only. Afterward, with a regret that was to be eternal, she wished he had done the same with hers.

Yet, pleased at the time, she smiled.

"Gulian, you do love me, but I wonder do you love me as absolutely as I love you?"

Verplank, with a gesture that was familiar to him, closed and opened a hand.

"I do not know. But while I think you cannot love me more wholly than I love you, I do know that to me you are the unique."

Leilah moved to where he stood.

"Gulian, and you to me. You are the only one." She moved closer. Raising her hands, she put them on his shoulders. "Tell me, shall you be long away?"

"An hour or two. Apropos, would you care to leave before dinner?"

"Yes."

"We will dine on board, then. Is there anything in particular you would like?"

"Yes, lilies, plenty of lilies; and pineapples; and the sound of your voice."

Lifting her hands from his shoulders to his face, she drew it to her own. Their lips met longly. With the savour of her about him, Verplank passed out.

Idly Leilah turned. Before her the sea lay, a desert of blue. Below, on the beach, it broke with a boom in high white waves which, in retreating, became faintly mauve. The spectacle charmed her. But other scenes effaced it; sudden pictures of the Marquesas; the long flight southward; the brief, bright days; the nights that would be briefer still. Pleasurably for a while these things detained her. Idly again she turned.

On the table were the letters. One was from an intimate friend, Violet Silverstairs, a New York girl who had married an Englishman, and who since then had resided abroad. The other was—or appeared to be—from Matlack Ogston.

Matlack Ogston was Leilah's father. That a father should write to a daughter is only natural. But that this father should write surprised her, as already it had surprised Verplank. When he mentioned whom the letter was from she had thought he must be in error. Now, as she opened it, she found that he had been. Her father had not written. The envelope contained a second envelope addressed to another person. This envelope had formerly been sealed and since been opened. It held three letters in an unknown hand.

She began at one of them. More exactly, she began, as some women do begin, at the end. The signature startled. At once, as she turned to the initial sentences, she experienced the curious and unenviable sensation of falling from an inordinate height, and it was not with any idea that the sensation would cease, but rather with the craving to know, which in certain crises of the emotions becomes more unendurable than any uncertainty can be, that she read the rest of the first letter; after it, the second letter, and the third.

Then, as truth stared at her and she at truth, so monstrous was its aspect that, with one shuddering intake of the breath, life withered within her, light vanished without.

When ultimately, without knowing who she was; when, conscious only of an objective self struggling in darkness with the intangible and the void, when then life and light returned, she was on the floor, the monster peering at her.

She disowned it, disavowed it. But beside her on the floor the letters lay. There was its lair. It had sprung from them, and always from them it would be peering at her, driving her mad with its blighting eyes, unless——

She got on her hands and knees, and from them to her feet. Her body ached from the fall, and her head was throbbing. With the idea that smelling salts, or some cologne water which she had, might help her, she went and fetched them from an adjoining room. They were not of much use, she found, though presently she could think more clearly, and in a little while she was considering the possibility that had loomed.

In certain conditions the soul gets used to monsters. It makes itself at home with what it must. Her soul, she thought, might also. But even as she thought it, she knew she never could. She knew that even were she able to succeed in blinding herself to this thing by day, at night it would crawl to her, sit at her side, pluck at her sleeve, wake her, and cry: "Behold me!"

It would cry it at her until she cried it at him. Then inevitably it would kill her.

She had been seated, bathing her head with cologne. Now fear, helplessness, the consciousness of both possessed her. They impelled her to act. She stood up. She looked about the room. Filled with flowers and sunshine, it said nothing. Beyond was the sea. It called to her. It told her that in a rowboat she could drift and be lost. It told her that that night she could throw herself from the yacht. The blue expanse, the high white waves, the little mauve ripples invited.

The room, though, with its flowers and sunshine, deterred. To throw herself from the yacht meant that she would have to wait. It meant more. It meant that she would have to see him. It meant that she would have to feign and pretend. These things she could not do.

There remained the rowboat. Yet, in some way, now, the sea seemed less inviting. At the thought of its embrace and of its depths she shrank. To die, to cease any more to be, to succumb like the heroines of the old tragedies to fate, at the idea of that, her young soul revolted. There must be some other course.

She looked from the window. Beneath, before the ocean, a motor was passing. The whirr of it prompting, flight occurred to her, an escape to some spot that would engulf her as surely as the waves. Hesitatingly she considered it. But there was nothing else. Moreover, if she were to go, she must go at once.

She turned, crossed the room, stooped, gathered the letters, and seated herself at the table. There she put the letters in another envelope which she addressed to Verplank. While writing his name, her hand trembled, it shook on the paper drops of ink. These she tried to blot, and made a smear.

Trembling still, she got up, went to the telephone, and attempted to speak. At first, too overcome to do so, she leaned against the wall. It did not seem possible that she could do this thing. But she must, she knew. At last, with an effort, she spoke.

"When does the next train leave San Diego? One moment. Have my servants sent to me; my servants, yes, and—and order a motor."

Again she leaned against the wall. The room had become intolerable. Into the languors of the air a suffocation had entered, and it was unconsciously, in a condition semi-somnambulistic that she found herself considering the pink of the ceiling, then the rose-leaves woven in the green of the carpet, the dull red of the table-cover, the darker red of a tassel, the tall vase that stood on the table and in which were taller lilies.

There, beneath them was the monster. Its vibrations, disseminating through the room, were silhouetted on the walls. She could not see them, but she could feel them. They choked her.

But now her servants appeared. Nervously, with an irritability so foreign to her, that they eyed each other uncertainly, she gave them hurried commands. These obeyed and the porters summoned, she passed, choking still, from this room, the secrets of which the walls detained.

It was perhaps preordered that they should do so. Long later, in looking back, she realised that destiny then was having its say with her, and realised also why. At the time, however, she was ignorant of two incidents, which, after the fashion of the apparently insignificant, subsequently became the reverse.

One incident had the porters for agent; the other was effected by a maid who supervened. The porters, in removing the luggage, collided with the table. The inkstand, the tall vase with the taller lilies, were upset; the vase, spilling water and flowers, fell broken on the floor; from the stand, ink rippled on the red of the cloth, on the darker red of the tassels, on the envelope which Leilah had directed to Verplank. These things, a maid, summoned by the crash, removed.

When Verplank returned, the table was bare.

He did not notice. What he alone noticed was Leilah's absence. She is below, he told himself. Then precisely as she had summoned her servants, he summoned his.

"Roberts," he said presently to a man. "Find Mrs. Verplank. Then get my things together. We start at once."

For a moment the man considered the master. At once civilly but stolidly he spoke:

"Mrs. Verplank has gone, sir."

Verplank, who had turned on his heel, turned back.

"What?"

"The hotel is full of it, sir. When I found that Mrs. Verplank was leaving, I——"

"What!" Verplank, in angry amazement, repeated.

"Mrs. Verplank is taking the limited, sir. It was the clerk who told me."

Then, for a moment, the master considered the man. At the simple statement his mind had become like a sea in a storm. A whirlwind tossed his thoughts.

But Leilah was still too near, her caresses were too recent for him to be able to realise that she had actually gone, and the fact that he could not realise it disclosed itself in those words which all have uttered, all at least before whom the inexplicable has sprung:

"It is impossible!"

"Yes, sir, it does seem most unusual."

Verplank had spoken less to the man than to himself, and for a moment stood engrossed in that futilest of human endeavours, the effort to read a riddle of which the only Œdipus is time.

At once all the imaginable causes that could have contributed to it danced before him and vanished. He told himself that Leilah's disappearance might be an attempt at some hide-and-go-seek which shortly would end.

But he knew her to be incapable of such nonsense. Immediately he decided that his servant was in error, and that she was then on the yacht. If not, then, clearly she had gone mad, or else——

But there are certain hypotheses which certain intellects decline to stomach. Yet the letter from her father recurring to him, he did consider the possibility that she might have gone because of some secret of his bachelor life. Anything may be distorted. Unfolded by her father, these secrets, which in themselves were not very dark, might be made to look infernal, and could readily be so made by this man who was not only just the one to do it, but who would have an object in so doing. Always he had been inimical to Verplank, and this, the abandoned bridegroom then felt, not on his account, but because of his father.

The latter, Effingham Verplank, had been a great catch, and a great beau. His charm had been myrrh and cassia—and nightshade, as well—to many women, among others to an aunt of Leilah, Hilda Hemingway, whose husband had called him out, called him abroad, rather, where the too charming Verplank waited until Hemingway fired, and then shot in the air. He considered that the gentlemanly thing to do. He was, perhaps, correct. But perhaps, too, it was hardly worth while to go abroad to do it. Yet, however that may be, the attitude of the injured husband, while no doubt equally correct, was less debonair. He obtained a divorce.

The matter created an enormous scandal, in the sedater days when New York society was a small and early family party and scandals were passing rare. But, like everything else, it was forgotten, even, and perhaps particularly by the parties directly concerned. Hemingway married again; the precarious Hilda married also; the too charming Verplank vacated the planet, and his widow went a great deal into the world.

This lady had accepted the scandal, as she had accepted many another, with a serenity that was really beautiful. But, then, her seductive husband had always seemed to her so perfectly irresistible, so created to conquer, that—as their son afterward found it necessary to explain—it no more occurred to her to sit in judgment on his victims, than it occurred to her to sit on him. With not only philosophic wisdom, but in the true spirit of Christian charity, she overlooked it all.

The culminant episode in the matter—the death of the volatile Verplank—took place at an hour when his son was too young to be more than aware that his father had been taken away in a box. Leilah was even less advanced. It was years before she learned of her aunt's delinquencies. When she did, that lady had also passed away, as had previously passed a child of hers, one that, perhaps, did not belong to her first husband, and, certainly not to her second, the result being that, in default of other heirs, she left a fortune to Leilah, whose mother had left her another.

When her mother died, Leilah was in the nursery. Her father, who thereafter abandoned her to servants and governesses, she seldom saw. When she did see him, he ignored her completely. It was a way he had. He ignored also and quite as completely the son of the deadly Verplank.

To make up for it, or it may be to make trouble, the boy's mother never regarded Leilah otherwise than with that smile of sweet approbation with which she gratified all the world—all the world, that is, save those only who were not in hers. Among the gratified were the Arlington girls, two beauties, of whom the elder, Violet, was Leilah's closest friend.

It was at Newport, at Violet's wedding to Silverstairs, a young Englishman who had followed her from Europe, and who at once took her back there; it was at this ceremony, in which Leilah participated as bridesmaid, and Verplank as best man, it was then that both became aware of a joint desire. It seemed to them that they were born to love each other, to love always, forever. Forever!—in a world where all things must end, and do. But the eagerness of it was upon them. Leilah wrote to her father. Verplank wrote to him also.

Matlack Ogston ignored Verplank's letter as invariably he had ignored Verplank. His daughter's he promptly returned. Across it was scrawled one word. That word was No.

Interests more commonplace had meanwhile transported Verplank from Newport to San Francisco. Informed of the veto, which to Leilah was an incentive and to him an affront, he had wired her to meet him at Coronado, this resort in Southern California which together they had been preparing to leave.

The night previous, on a yacht chartered at the Golden Gate, Verplank had arrived. It was by train, the next morning, that Leilah had come. The wedding followed. Before them lay a world of delight.

This was hardly an hour since. Now, like a bubble, abruptly that world had burst.

Yet why?

In that query was the riddle which impotently Verplank was trying to solve. With a clutch at a possible solution, he turned to his servant:

"Roberts, get a motor. If Mrs. Verplank is not on the yacht, I will take a special, and follow her."

"Yes, sir. Shall you wish me to go with you?"

"No, stay here until you hear from me. At any moment Mrs. Verplank may return."

But Leilah did not return. Nor did the special, in which Verplank followed, overtake her. The first intelligence of her that reached him was the announcement of her engagement to another man.

II

IN Paris, many moons later, an Englishman, Howard Tempest, looked in, at the Opéra, on his cousin, Camille de Joyeuse. This lady, connected by birth with Britannia's best, and, through her husband, with the Bourbons, delighted the eye, the ear, and the palate. In appearance, she suggested certain designs of Boucher; in colouring and in manner, the Pompadour. Admirable in these respects, she was admired also, for her gayety, her tireless smile, and her chef. She had one of the best cooks in Paris—that is to say, in the world. Her husband, the Duc de Joyeuse, harmonised very perfectly with her. He had a head, empty, but noble, an air vaguely Régence. A year younger than herself, Time had had the impertinence to whiten his hair. The duchess was forty-two. Those unaware of the fact fancied her twenty-eight. The error greatly gratified this lady, who, familiarly, was known as Muffins.

One evening in May, Tempest entered her box, saluted her, examined the house, and, as, in a crash of the orchestra, the curtain fell, seated himself, in response to a gesture, beside her.

Camille de Joyeuse turned to him, and with that smile of hers, said: "Do not fail to come on Sunday, Howard. There is to be a Madame Barouffska, whom I want you to meet. She was formerly a Mrs. Verplank. Barouffski is Number Two."

"Verplank! Barouffski! What barbarous names!" Tempest exclaimed. He had vivid red hair, violent blue eyes, and a great scarlet cicatrix that tore one side of his face. In spite of the severity of his evening clothes, he looked rather barbarous himself. "What was she, a widow?"

"Yes, but with no tombstone to show. It appears that she was in love with Verplank for years, married him one minute and left him the next."

Tempest stifled a yawn. "How extremely fastidious!"

"She ran away, got a divorce, met Barouffski and married him."

"Very honourable of her, certainly. From what pond did you fish her?"

"The Silverstairs'. Violet Silverstairs is an American you know——"

"Know! I should say I did know. Though, if I did not, I would take my oath to it. It's got so a fellow can't stir without running into one of them. How does Louis like her?"

Louis was the duke.

The duchess displayed her beautiful false teeth. "Oddly enough, when he was in the States, he went hunting with her Number One."

"In the Rockies?" Tempest, with sudden interest, inquired. "In the Dakotas?"

"I fancy so. It was a place called, let me see; yes, Long Island, I think. I remember, he said it was very jolly."

Tempest tossed his red head. "Her Number Two, I suppose, is that chap I have seen at the Little Club. The Lord knows how he got there. He looks like a thimblerigger."

The duchess raised her opera-glass. "Possibly. Nowadays, so many men do, don't you think? There is Marie de Fresnoy with the Helley-Quetgens! You will have her next to you on Sunday, Howard. Do not lacerate her tender heart."

At the suggestion, Tempest made a face. His expression amused Camille de Joyeuse. Indulgently she added: "To make up for it you shall take Madame Barouffska out."

But now the curtain was rising. The clear brilliance of the house faded into a golden gloom.

On the Sunday following, when Tempest reached the Cours la Reine, in which his cousin resided, there was a motor before the perron, and from it a woman was alighting. As rhythmically, with a grace that is rare in women who are not ballerines, she mounted the stair, Tempest had a vision of a figure, tall and slight, of a mass of black hair, and of a neck emerging from ermine. In the anteroom above, while a servant took from her her cloak and another received Tempest's hat and coat, he saw that she was extremely beautiful.

Immediately a footman, throwing open a door, announced: "Madame la comtesse Barouffska!" He added at once: "Lord Howard Tempest!"

In this marriage of their names they entered a drawing room in which were the Joyeuses, the Fresnoys, the Silverstairs; others, also, who momentarily were indistinguishable. The room—large, wide, high-ceiled—was decorated gravely, with infinite taste. Beyond it, a suite of salons extended.

Camille de Joyeuse, advancing to meet her guests, presented Tempest to Mme. Barouffska.

In a voice which, if a trifle high, was fluted, the duchess added:

"My dear, this cousin of mine has a terrible reputation, and that, I am sure, will commend him to you."

With the semblance of a smile, Mme. Barouffska replied:

"You know I am never quite able to decide just what construction to put on your remarks."

"Put the worst, put the worst!" answered the duchess, whose costume left her splendidly nude. From a billowy corsage her shoulders and bust emerged as though rising through foam, while the light gold tissue of her gown accentuated the royal outlines of her figure.

Leilah Barouffska, slenderer, taller, wholly in white, contrasted etherially with her. Turning to Tempest she said:

"Lord Howard, I have heard so much that is interesting about you."

"Not from Muffins, then."

"Yes, but also from Silverstairs. He told me that you are the best gentleman jockey in England and a Sanskrit scholar besides."

"Oh, I can straddle a horse, if it comes to that, but otherwise he exaggerates. He has caught that from his wife—unless it happens to be from her sister."

At mention of the girl, Leilah, who had been looking across the room, turned to Tempest again. In looking she saw this young woman whose allurements—and possibilities—were generally regarded as excessive. Recently she had become engaged—perhaps for the tenth time. Coincidentally was the announcement that she was going in for light opera. Now, in reference to her, Leilah said:

"You have met Aurelia, then?"

"I found it very difficult not to."

"And this young Lord Buttercups to whom she is engaged, is he nice?"

Tempest adjusted his monocle. "Very. A trifle wrong in the upper story. So was his father. So was his grandfather. A fine old English family."

Faintly, as before, Leilah smiled. "I understand that Aurelia is studying for the stage. Such a queer idea, don't you think—for an American heiress, I mean."

Tempest, extracting his eyeglass, nodded. "Nowadays, unless an idea is queer, it can hardly be called an idea at all. But I am glad this young person is studying something. When she went to school she must have been taught everything which it is easiest to forget."

A servant announced:

"His Excellency, Mustim Pasha!"

The man who entered was short and stout. He had a full black beard, and the appearance, slightly Hebraic, which Turks possess.

After M. de Joyeuse had greeted him, he saluted the duchess.

Beyond, on a sofa, Violet Silverstairs sat talking to the Baronne de Fresnoy, a young woman who looked very much as might a statuette of Tanagra, to which Grévin had given two big blue circles for eyes, and a small pink one for mouth, but a statuette articulated, perhaps, by Eros, and costumed, certainly, by the Rue de la Paix—though a shade less artistically than Lady Silverstairs, who always seemed to have just issued from some paradise inhabited solely by poet-modistes, and who, in addition, possessed what Mme. de Fresnoy lacked, a face delicately and rarely patrician.

Adjacently was her sister, Aurelia, a girl with a face like an opening rose, and a frock of such astonishing simplicity that it looked both virginal and ruinous. This young person had the loveliest eyes imaginable. In them and about an uncommonly bewitching mouth was an expression quite ideally ingénue which, when least expected, it amused her to transform into one of extreme effrontery.

On one side of her was Lord Buttercups, an English youth, small, snubnosed, stupid. On the other lounged a Roman, Prince Farnese, a remarkably fine-looking pauper.

Turning from the girl's sister to the Turk, the young baroness called:

"Here, Musty, come and make love to us."

The Asiatic was about to abandon Mme. de Joyeuse, when doors at the farther end of the room were thrown open, and the duchess put a hand on his arm.

At table, Tempest, who had taken Leilah Barouffska out, found his seat indicated beside her. At his left was Mme. de Fresnoy, whom he detested. He turned to the American. At the moment some preoccupation, a nostalgia or a regret, contracted the angle of her mouth. The contraction gave her the expression which those display who have deeply suffered either from some long malady or from some perilous constraint.

Mechanically, Tempest considered a dish which a footman, his hands gloved in silk, was presenting. When he again turned to the American, it was as though a curtain had fallen or risen. Her face had lighted, and it was with an entirely worldly air that she put before him this unworldly question:

"Do you believe in fate?"

Tempest laughed. "Not on an empty stomach. I believe then in nothing but virtue."

Leilah put down her spoon. "It seems to me that our lives are sketched in advance. It may be that we have the power to amplify incidents or to curtail them, but the events themselves remain unchanged. They are there in our paths awaiting us. Though why they are there——"

As was usual with her, she spoke with little pauses, in a voice that caressed the ear. Now she stopped and raised the spoon, in which was almond soup.

Tempest took a sip of Madeira. "A pal of mine, a chap I never met for a number of reasons, though particularly, I suppose, because he died two thousand years ago, well, he told me that we should wish things to be as they are. I have no quarrel with fate. But if you have, or do have——"

A maître d'hôtel, after presenting a carp that had been arranged as though swimming in saffron, was supervising its service.

"Padapoulos," exclaimed the young Baronne de Fresnoy, whom the sight of the fish had, perhaps, excited, "Padapoulos told me that he dined best on an orchid soup, a mousse of aubergine, and the maxims of Confucius."

"Padapoulos," the legate of the Sublime Porte gravely commented, "is a poet, and a Greek. Add those two things together, and you get—you get——"

"Nothing to eat!" the young baroness, with an explosion of little laughs, threw at him. "Musty!" she cried. "Whom were you with at the Variétés last night? I saw you. Yes, I did. Oh, Musty, who would have thought that you would be unfaithful to me!"

"These Roumis!" the Turk mentally exclaimed. "If a wife of mine talked in that way I would have her impaled."

Beyond, across an opulent bosom, de Joyeuse and Silverstairs were talking sport. They delighted in things that men have always loved, the pursuit of prey, the joy of killing, the murderous serenity of the woods.

Farther up was Aurelia. As before, she had Buttercups on one side, Farnese on the other. She poked at the former.

"That horrid de Fresnoy woman is trying to flirt with you, Parsnips. Now, don't deny it. I don't blame her. You are too good-looking. When we are married—if we ever are—I'll make you wear a veil. You sha'n't go out except in a closed carriage. Yes, and with some big, fat, strapping woman to look after you.

Beatifically the youth considered her. "Couldn't you do that?"

Delicately Aurelia raised a fork. "I shall have my own affairs to attend to." For a second she nibbled. "I have a few on my hands as it is."

Buttercups stabbed at his plate. "I, too, may have business of my own."

"Business! Business!" The girl repeated. "You are so commercial—just like all the nobility. If you were not a peer you would be mistaken for one. It's quite painful."

"That may b-be," Buttercups spluttered. "But this idea of yours of going on the stage is quite as p-painful to me."

He hesitated, then, as though uttering a great moral truth, threw out:

"It's so dreadful to have your name in the papers!"

"And still more dreadful not to!" the girl threw back. She turned to Farnese. "You do nothing but eat!"

With large, melancholy, inconstant eyes the Italian looked at her. "It is my one consolation since you became engaged to that imbecile."

Aurelia pecked at her food. "One always feels quite safe with an imbecile, and that is so restful. Try it and see."

"I'd like to try it with you."

Aurelia put down her fork. "Am I your idea of an imbecile? You are flattering, if insincere."

Again the Roman covered her with his eyes. "It is rather difficult to be the one and not the other. But I am perfectly sincere in saying that you are my idea of perfection."

"Thanks, but, then, you are not mine."

"And might one ask what yours is?"

Dreamily, with an air of innocence that was infinite, Aurelia looked at him. "You will think it childish of me, perhaps, but, like all young girls—like all young and inexperienced girls—I have an ideal. A mere maiden's fancy, no doubt, and yet one which I cherish so. It is a vision which at times I have of a blind man, a deaf mute, a divine creature, invalid and octogenarian, who would not know what I did and would not care."

Pausing, she dropped her eyes and sadly shook her head. "You will tell me that he don't exist."

"He might be manufactured," Farnese cheerfully replied.

Then he, too, paused, drank of the wine before him, and, perhaps stimulated by it, whispered:

"Believe me, I feel as though I could cut my throat for you."

Maliciously Aurelia looked up. "When a man does not feel that way he has no feeling at all. One might even say that he is quite heartless."

Across the table, Tempest, turning again to Leilah, said: "Monsieur Barouffski is not here to-night."

At the remark, instantly in her face its former expression of constraint appeared.

"No, he is to join us later."

At the other end, where the duchess sat, everybody was laughing. The lady had been giving an account of a recent bankruptcy, that of Lord Auld Reekie.

"Heavens!" Violet Silverstairs exclaimed. "What will become of Bobbles!"

Bobbles was Lady Auld Reekie, a fair young craft of light timber and many sails.

Camille de Joyeuse, summoning her diligent smile, replied: "She will go into the hands of a receiver."

Another jest followed, and presently, in the contagion of it almost the entire table joined.

The delicately toxic fare, the slightly emotionalising wines, loosened tongues, robbing them of discretion, and, before the servants, as though the latter were deaf and dumb, hosts and guests revealed their naked minds.

"It is rotten to talk in that way before these men," Tempest exclaimed. "They get their wages with lessons in anarchy thrown in. It's too much."

"I had not heard," Leilah replied. "I was thinking of that friend of yours whom you never met."

Tempest laughed. "The one who said we should wish things to be as they are? Ah, well! I am afraid I am not up to that yet."

"Nor I. But who was he, if one may ask? Not Aristotle?"

"No, but, by the way, do you know whom Aristotle is supposed to be, or rather to have become? Herbert Spencer! An occultist told me. He told me also such a curious story. You have heard, have you not, of Apollonius of Tyana? Then you may remember it is said of him that he healed the sick, raised the dead, knew all things save the caresses of women, and spoke every language including that of colours. Well, the occultist told me that Jesus was a rabbi who surrendered his entity to the Christ, and afterward reappeared here as Apollonius. He said, too, that he was not crucified. Crucifixion, you know, is merely the symbol of initiation."

"And whom did he say was the Christ?"

"An envoy from a higher sphere."

Leilah inclined her head. "Yes, and there have, I believe, been others. From zeniths or from nadirs unknown to us, from planes, let us say, where all beatitudes are as usual as all shames are common here, spirits commissioned to regenerate the hearts of man pass into the slums of space. Confident, with a crown of light they come, only to return with one of thorns."

Tempest turned squarely in his chair. "That is a singularly beautiful idea!"

Again Leilah inclined her head. "It is beautiful. It is beautiful to think that earthward from some chromatic star the soul of Krishna may have sunk. But the idea is not mine. I found it in the Vidyâ."

This last statement was lost. Mme. de Fresnoy was insisting on Tempest's attention. Meanwhile a cygnet, its plumage replaced, a pond lily in its ochre beak, had been presented, carved and served. A salad, known as Half-Mourning, a composition of artichoke hearts and Piedmontese truffles, had departed with it. Now sweets had come, pastry light as a caress, volatile as an essence, that pastry of which the art is known only to the Oriental and the occasional cordon bleu.

Devoutly, with an air of invoking the Prophet, the Turk was absorbing it.

The young Baronne de Fresnoy, abandoning Tempest, looked at him. With a wicked glitter in her big blue eyes she called:

"Musty! Are you thinking of me?"

The pasha was framing a reply, a reply perhaps rather bald, when Camille de Joyeuse also addressed him. Presently she stood up. The others imitated her. The gayeties of the table were abandoned for the brilliance of the salons beyond.

Tempest, who had accompanied Leilah Barouffska said, as she seated herself:

"Are you to remain in Paris?"

Before answering, she looked up at him, for he was standing. "Who can tell what one will do? But I fancy so. We have taken a house in the rue de la Pompe."

"In the rue de la Pompe!" Tempest exclaimed. "That is where I live." He smiled. The fact that they were neighbours seemed to constitute a bond. "Whereabouts in the rue de la Pompe?"

"Next to the church."

"Do you find it convenient?"

A servant announced:

"Monsieur and madame Spencer-Poole!"

"You mean," Leilah replied, "am I a Catholic? No, I am an Episcopalian. But my views, I fear, are not orthodox. I have got so far that I believe fully in the Vidyâ."

She had cited the book at the dinner table but, at the time, distracted by Marie de Fresnoy, Tempest had not heard; now he exclaimed at it.

"The Vidyâ! Of all things! Why not the Upanishads?"

A servant announced:

"Madame la marquise de Charleroi!"

Leilah made a little gesture. "The Upanishads, too. I have great faith in them also. Their conceptions seem to me the most perfect that the human mind has evolved, that is, if it were a human mind that evolved them."

A servant announced:

"Madame la princesse Orlonna!"

"What particularly impressed you in them?" Tempest asked.

"The demonstration that life is a laboratory in which the strength of the soul is tried."

"And in the Vidyâ?"

"The fact that selfishness is the root of evil. That impressed me very much, primarily I suppose because it is true, but chiefly I think because I had not realized it before."

Tempest nodded. Never had he heard a mondaine cite the Upanishads. In no drawing room had he ever heard the Vidyâ mentioned. In his life he had not dreamed of having a digest of each produced in an atmosphere dripping with frivolities. As he nodded he reconsidered this woman. From the first he had realized that she differed from the ordinary society type. Now he saw that she belonged to a superior world.

"Do you not admire them, too?" Leilah, who had also been considering him, inquired.

Tempest adjusted his monocle. "You see, you know, the Self, the All-Self, the One, the oneness of self with everything, the oneness of all things with One, these minor motifs of theirs I may admire but I do not grasp. On the contrary, there is a certain voluminous complexity about them that makes me gasp. None the less they advance certain ideas which, while curious to the few and to the many absurd, are yet so mathematically evident; the fact for instance——"

A servant announced:

"His Highness monseigneur le prince Paul de Montebianco!"

"Monsieur Harris!"

The salons were becoming filled. The floor was swept by trains brief but brilliant. There was a multiplication of black coats, a renewed animation, a mounting murmur in which occasionally the name of a new arrival was lost.

The servant announced:

"Monsieur le vicomte and madame la vicomtesse de Helley-Quetgen!"

"Madame la princesse Zubaroff!

"Monsieur d'Arcy!"

"Monsieur le comte Barouffski!"

The last of these, a large man, very fair, with grey-green eyes, had a studied manner which, however, his voice relieved. As he advanced and addressed Mme. de Joyeuse, it sounded supple and silken, as indeed most Slav voices do.

Already groups had formed. The corner in which Tempest stood before Leilah developed another. The Spencer-Pooles approached. With them was d'Arcy, a young man abominably good looking, famous for the prodigious variety of his affairs.

Tempest who had continued talking, who had even been expounding and who now felt that he had been holding forth, moved on. He wanted to smoke and being an habitué of the household, he knew where the smoking room was.

There, before an open fire, his hands behind his back, in that after-dinner attitude which some men assume, M. de Joyeuse stood. He was telling of a stag hunt that had been held at Monplaisir, his estate.

The duke was not an impressionist, his description lacked colour. But de Fresnoy, who had been present, resaw it all; the sheen of the horses, the green of the whippers-in, the pink coats of the sportsmen, the blue dolmans of the officers that had ridden over from a garrison near by, the verdure of the forest's edge, the view, the scramble, the run, the quarry, the hallali of the huntsman, the leaping hounds, the fastidious ceremonial of the death and the sky of pale silk which draped with faint gold the magnificent brutality of the scene.

"It was just my luck to have missed it," Silverstairs threw in.

De Joyeuse turned to him. "We count on you next autumn. And on you also, mon vieux," he added to Tempest who had approached.

Tempest nodded. He was lighting a cigar. The operation concluded, he drew a chair beside Silverstairs. "Now tell me all about Madame B."

Silverstairs eyed him quizzingly. "She interests you?"

"Enormously."

"Then look out for Barouffski whom she interests still more."

Tempest shrugged his shoulders. "Was it her interest in Number One or Number One's interest in her that declined?"

"You mean Verplank?"

"I suppose I do. Anyway I mean her first husband. Why were they divorced?"

"Why? But my dear Tempest, divorce in the States is what racing is with us, a national amusement. Everybody takes a hand in it."

"The right or the left?"

"Both I fancy. Though in the case of Madame B. I have an idea that the right turned out to be wrong."

Tempest flicked the ashes from his cigar. "I may compliment you, Silverstairs. You have a manner of expressing yourself which is highly cryptic. But now, to an every day sort of chap like myself, would you mind being less abstruse?"

"I should feel sordid if I refused. Verplank is a very good sort, whereas this Barouffski is a rotter."

Tempest bowed. "Thank you for descending to my level. The long and short of it is that she has made a mess of it. Well, most people do. I don't wonder now that over the soup she talked about fate."

"Oh, as for that, after certain experiences of my own, with which, pray do not be alarmed, I have no intention of boring you, I have stopped wondering at anything at all."

"Silverstairs, in ceasing to be cryptic, do not become Spartan. My cousin told me that Joyeuse hunted with this, with What's-his-name, with—er——"

"With Verplank?"

"Yes, that he had hunted with him in the States. And that reminds me. What have you decided about that horse?"

Silverstairs pulled at his straw-coloured moustache. "I'll let you know to-morrow. When are you to be at home?"

"Any time after two."

Silverstairs nodded. "Very good, I will drop in on you."

From beyond, blue and vibrant, came the upper notes of a violin. In the now crowded salons a Roumanian, the rage of the season, a youth, very pale, with melancholy eyes, flowing hair and the waist of a girl, was executing a fantasy of his own.

De Joyeuse flicked a speck from his sleeve, threw back his noble and empty head, gave a circular look of inquiry, a little gesture of invitation, and accompanied by his friends, sauntered to the rooms without.

There, Barouffski after saluting Mme. de Joyeuse had engaged her briefly in talk. But her attention had been attracted rather than claimed by the Montebiancan prince, a young man extremely gentlemanly and equally modest who, with that diffidence which royals and poets share, stood bashfully at her side.

Barouffski, bowing again, passed on. During his short and entirely fragmentary conversation with Mme. de Joyeuse, his eyes had rummaged the room.

Leilah, meanwhile, rising from the sofa where she had been seated, moved with the inflammatory d'Arcy into the salon beyond.

Barouffski would have followed. But the young Baronne de Fresnoy addressed him. Perversely, with sudden glimpses of little teeth and an expression of glee in her piquant face, she asked:

"Was it you who performed that high act of gallantry at Longchamps to-day?"

"Was it I who did what?" Barouffski surprisedly exclaimed.

"What was it?" asked Aurelia, who with Buttercups in tow, had approached.

But Mme. de Fresnoy waved at her. "Go away my dear, it is not for an ingénue."

"Ah then, but you see," Aurelia indolently interjected, "I am tired of being an ingénue. An ingénue is supposed to be in a state of constant surprise and that is so exhausting."

None the less, with Buttercups still in tow she betook herself to a corner where she was promptly joined by Farnese.

Then at once to Barouffski, to Mustim Pasha, to the Helley-Quetgens, to others that stood about, the young baroness related a morsel of gossip, the report of which had been brought her but a moment before, a story that had one of the reigning demireps for heroine and for hero a man unidentified by the baronne's informant, the tale of an assault committed before all Paris, before all Paris that is, that happened to be at the races that day; an extravaganza in which the heroine, erupting suddenly on the pelouse before the Grand Stand, had, with her parasol, struck the hero over the head and had been about to strike him again, when he, pinioning her arms with his own, had to the applause of everybody, prevented the second assault by kissing her through her veil; after which releasing the lady, he had raised his hat and strolled away.

"Was it you, Barouffski?" Mme. de Fresnoy, the narrative at an end, inquired. "Was it?"

"I? Nonsense! Why should you ask?"

"It would be just like you, you know. Besides, I hear that the man was tall and good-looking."

"You are exceedingly complimentary. But the world is peopled with tall, good-looking men."

"Pas tant que ça," laughed the baroness. "Well, if it was not you, perhaps it was that man who is just coming in."

Involuntarily Barouffski turned, while a footman bawled:

"Monsieur Verplank!"

III

It was in circumstances which, if not dramatic, were, at least, uncommon, that Leilah Verplank met Barouffski.

At Los Angeles, after her flight from Coronado, she caught an express that would have taken her East. Even so, it could not take her from herself, it could not distance memory, it could not annihilate the past. The consciousness of that obsessed her. Each of her thoughts became a separate throb. About her head formed an iron band. Her body ached. She felt hot and ill. She had a sense of thirst, a sense, too, of fear.

In the compartment where she sat, a stranger came. She hid her face, covering it with her hands. The stranger sidled in between them, looked her in the eyes, penetrated them, permeated her, shook long shudders through her, shrieked at her: "I am Fright!"

She cried aloud. No one heard. She got to the door.

In the section immediately adjoining were her women. Perplexed at the start by her unaccountable flight and, since then, alarmed by the abnormal excitability which she had displayed, both, at the sight of her then, rushed to her.

Salt Lake was the first possible asylum. There, weeks later, Leilah arose from one of those attacks, which, for lack of a better term, has been called brain fever.

Like fire, fever may consume, it does not necessarily obliterate. The past remained. But in that lassitude which fever leaves, Leilah was able to consider it with a wearied certainty that no immediate effort could be required of her then.

"Forget," some considerate and subliminal self admonished. "Forget."

Even in sleep she could not always do that. But though she could not forget the past, she could, she believed, barricade herself against it. The idea was suggested by the local sheet in which she found an item about neighbourly Nevada. The item hung a hammock for her thoughts, rested her mentally, unrolled a carpet for the returning steps of health.

Verplank, meanwhile, misdirected at Los Angeles, reached San Francisco. Learning there that a party of three women had, that morning, at the last moment, embarked on the Samoa packet; learning also that of these women the central figure projected, or seemed to project, Leilah's silhouette, he wired for his yacht and sailed away in pursuit. But an accident supervening, the packet reached Samoa before him. When Verplank got there the boat was gone. Still in pursuit he started for the austral seas. There, the mistake discovered, hope for the time abandoned him and he landed in Melbourne, ignorant that the supremely surgical court of Nevada was amputating him from his wife.

In matters of this solemnity, the Nevada statutes require that one of the parties to the operation shall have resided for six months within the state. But at Carson, the capital, a town that has contrived to superpose the Puritan aspect of a New England village on the vices of a Malay port, in this city Leilah learned that statutes so severe were not enacted for such as she.

The information, tolerably consoling, was placed before her by a young Jew who, as she alighted from the train, divined her errand, addressed her with easy Western informality, put a card in her hand, offered his services, telling her as he did so that if she retained him he would have her free in no time, in three months, in less. It was a mere matter of money, he explained, and, what he did not explain, a mere matter of perjury as well, the perjury of local oafs ready to swear to whatever they were paid for, ready to testify for instance that they had known anybody for any required length of time. But the Jew in divining Leilah's errand divined too her loyalty. In speaking of fees, he kept manœuvres and methods to himself.

Leilah, repelled yet beguiled, succumbed. The Jew was retained and in a wretched inn her things were unpacked. At once a rain of days began, long, loveless days in which she tried to starve her thoughts into submission and bear the cross that had been brought.

The effort was not very satisfactory. The reason why she should have a cross and why it should be borne had never even to her devout mind been adequately explained. Hitherto she had not required any explanation and not unnaturally perhaps since she had had no cross to bear. The dogma that she in common with the rest of humanity must suffer because of the natural propensities of beings that never were, she had accepted as only such dogmas can be accepted, on faith. But in the dismal solitudes of Carson, faith faded, the dogma seemed absurd.

Then suddenly that which in her ignorance she took to be chance, supplied a superior view. While waiting in a shop for a slovenly clerk to do up a package, she looked at a shelf on which were some books—frayed, bedrabbled, second hand. Among them was a treatise on metallurgy, another on horse-breeding, a string of paper covered novels and the Vidyâ.

The title, which conveyed nothing, for that reason attracted. At random she opened the book. A paragraph sprang at her:

> "From debility to strength, from strength to power, from power to glory, from glory to perfection, from plane to plane, in an evolution proceeding from the outward to the inward, from the material to the spiritual, from the spiritual to the divine, such is the destiny of the soul."

Leilah turned a page. Another paragraph leaped out.

> "There is not an accident in our lives, not a sorrow, a misfortune, a catastrophe, a happiness that is not due to our own conduct in this existence or in a previous one. In accordance with the nature of our deeds there are thrown about us the tentacles of pain or the arms of joy."

But the slovenly clerk was approaching. Leilah closed the book, asked the price, paid for it, paid for the other purchase and went back to the inn where during the rest of the day she read the drama of the soul, the story of its emanation from the ineffable, of its surrender to desire, of its fall into matter, of its birth and rebirth in the mansions of life which are death, of the persistence there of its illusory joys, of the recurrences of its unenlightening trials, until, at last, some memory returning of what it had been when it was other than what it had become, it learns at last to conquer desire and accomplish its own release.

The drama, however old, was new to Leilah, and at first not very clear. But beneath it was a chain of causality, the demonstration that this life is the sum of many others, the harvest after the sowing, and, joined to the demonstration were corollaries and deductions which showed that sorrow, when rightly viewed, is not a cross but a gift, a boon granted to the privileged.

It was a little before she mastered the idea. When she had, the novelty of it impressed. At the back of the Vidyâ was a list of cognate works. She wired to San Francisco for them. Shortly they came, and in their companionship the rain of long, loveless days fell by.

Ultimately she sat on a high chair. An oaf asked her questions. Others testified. On the morrow a paper was brought her. It had on it a large seal, the picture of a big building, words that were engrossed, others in script.

She was free.

The knowledge brought no exultation. It was a hostage to joy, one of the many that she was to give.

Meanwhile she had written to Violet Silverstairs telling her that she had separated from Verplank, and asking might she join her. The answer, which was cabled, told her to come. That day she started.

The town house of the Earls of Silverstairs is in Belgrave Square. There are worse places. But to the American countess the discomforts of the residence were not to be endured. After one season she declined to put up with them. Pending an entire modernisation of the house, she and Silverstairs migrated to Paris, where they took an apartment, and a very charming one, in the rue François Premier.

In this apartment Leilah was made to feel that she was with friends, one of whom, however, could not get over the fact that she could not get at the facts in the matter.

"See here, Leilah," Violet Silverstairs said aggrievedly, not once, but fifty times, "it is downright mean of you to keep me in the dark. What was it that he did? Tell me."

The lady had known Verplank, as she had known Leilah, ever since she had known anybody. They had grown up together. Though not related by blood, they were by choice, which is sometimes thicker. In the circumstances it was perhaps but natural that she should call it mean, perhaps but human that she should be aggrieved.

The puzzle of the situation she put before her husband.

"What do you suppose it can be?" she asked.

But Silverstairs had no surmises to hazard.

"It must be something quite too dreadful," Violet continued. "One of those things, don't you know, that are said to change your whole life. She just sits about and reads queer books."

"Queer books!" Silverstairs surprisedly repeated.

"Yes, books that tell of planes and rounds and cycles and chains of lives and rebirths and redeaths. She believes in them, too. She told me so."

Silverstairs tugged at his moustache. "She might as well believe in the music of the spheres."

Violet looked at her lord. She loved him as certain delicately organized women do love men who are merely robust. But her affection did not warp her judgment. She know that within his splendid physique was a spirit, valiant perhaps, but obtuse.

"Well, why not?" she retorted. "Let a microphone receive from a steel plate the reflection of a star, and sounds are emitted, tones peculiar to the star itself. Those of the sun are blatant. Those of Arcturus are like little bells. Those of Sirius are as sobs from a zither. Everybody knows that. Why shouldn't she believe in the music of the spheres?"

"Gammon!" cried this man who at Eton and Christ Church had abundantly acquired everything which is most useless. "I never heard such rot."

"I dare say, but that is not the point. The point is that it is no joke to her."

Nor was it. Leilah at first refused to go anywhere, to see any one, to be present when there were guests. But Violet, declaring that she would have no moping in her diggings, forced her. It was very reluctantly that Leilah acceded. After a while she did so as a matter of course. Finally, as was inevitable, she accepted invitations elsewhere.

It was what Violet had aimed at, though not at all at the result. Yet that, Leilah, who had come to believe in karma, afterward regarded as fate.

Presently, it so fell about that at one dinner she had at her left a man whom she did not know, whose name she had not caught and with whom, during the preliminary courses, she had not exchanged a word. As the dinner progressed, cigarettes were served. Twice she refused them. The second time, as she turned again to the man at her right, she heard a cry, across the table she saw a face, the eyes staring, the features elongated. At once there was an uproar, behind her there was a crash, she was torn bodily from her chair, a piece of tapestry had been thrown about her and in it she was rolled on the floor by the man whom she did not know.

Probably, at no dinner, anywhere, had a woman suffered such indignities. She was so telling herself when she realised, as she immediately did realise, that the man and others who had joined him, were but occupied in saving her life. Her dress had caught fire and it was in this flaming fashion, hurled on the floor by a stranger and there brutalised by him, that she made the acquaintance of Count Kasimiérz Barouffski.

The sack of her costume forced her to return to the rue François Premier, where at five o'clock the next day, Barouffski appeared. He appeared the day following, the day after, the day after that.

These attentions Violet Silverstairs viewed with suspicion.

"I verily believe," she said to Leilah, "that it was that polecat who set you on fire, and if he did no one can convince me that he did not do it on purpose."

"Violet!"

"That's right, fly at me. I thought you would. Are you going to take him?"

In an elaborate drawing room in the rue François Premier the two women were having tea. Leilah, without replying, raised her cup.

Violet cocked an eye at her. "One would have thought that you had had enough of matrimony. But perhaps your intentions are not honourable."

Leilah reddened. "Violet!" she again exclaimed.

"My dear," Lady Silverstairs resumed, "remember that you are no longer in the States. England is the most hypocritical country in Europe. America is the most hypocritical country in the world. That is what we call progress. But France being old-fashioned and behind the times is not censorious. I admit, I used to be. But I am not censorious any longer. I am not because any such état d'âme while advanced is not becoming.

"I am an old married woman," added the lady who was not twenty-two. "But if I were not, if for instance I were like you, free, independent and not a fright, and I had to choose between love and matrimony, it would not take me a moment to decide. Not one."

Leilah put down her cup. "Of course it would not. If you had it to do again you would marry Silverstairs and you would marry for love. That is over for me, over forever."

Narrowly, out of a corner of an eye, Violet considered her. "He was such a brute, was he?"

"Who? Gulian, do you mean?"

"I suppose so. There has been no other, has there?"

"Violet!"

It was at this juncture, for the fiftieth time, that Lady Silverstairs exclaimed:

"It is downright mean of you to keep me in the dark. What was it that happened? Make a soiled breast of it. Do!"

For the fiftieth time Leilah protested:

"Don't ask me. Don't. He knows and that is enough. As for me I am trying to forget."

"And you think Barouffski will help you. But has it ever occurred to you that if you were not very rich he might lack the incentive?"

To this Leilah assented. "He said he is poor."

"At least he does not exaggerate. I told Silverstairs that he was after you for your money and he said that was what he married me for. So he did and I married him for his title. It was a fair bargain. Now if we had it to do over I would say—I would say—well, I would say that it is better to have loved your husband than never to have loved at all. But six months hence, if you had it to do over, do you think you could say as much—or as little?"

"At least I could say that I did not marry for a title."

"Well, hardly, particularly a Polish one, though I daresay even that might be useful in the servants' hall. But what could you say you married for? It isn't love?"

"No."

"Nor position?"

"No."

"Then what on earth——"

"Violet, how hard you make it for me. Can't you see that if I do, it will be for protection?"

"For protection! Merciful fathers! You talk like a chorus girl! Protection against what? Against whom? Verplank?"

"No." Leilah choking down something in her throat, replied: "Against myself."

"I don't understand you," said Violet slowly. But she did or thought she did, and that night told Silverstairs that Leilah was still in love with her ex.

It was in these circumstances that Leilah listened to the Count Kasimiérz Barouffski, who, in telling her that he was poor, omitted to add that he had resources. These were women and cards. It is a business like another. But even to his nearest friends, to Tyszkiewicz, a compatriot, and Palencia, a Corsican, he did not boast of it. He had therefore some sense of shame, but not of honour, though with humour he was supplied. A man with some sense of humour and no sense of honour may go far. Barouffski intended to. After his volcanic introduction to Leilah, he beheld in her not the woman but the opportunity which chance had sent his way. To grasp that he displayed every art of which the Slav is capable. He did more. He impressed her not with the nobility of his name but of his nature. He was a good actor and though at first unsuccessful he was not discouraged. It was an axiom of his that among the dice of destiny there is always a golden six. It was axiomatic with him also that it is not tossed at once. To deserve it, one must wait. Barouffski waited. Presently fate shook the box before him. The golden six was his.

But not the box.

To Leilah the mere idea of matrimony was abhorrent. Yet she could not stop indefinitely with the Silverstairs. She had no relatives with whom she could reside. She felt that it would be awkward and perhaps equivocal for her to have an establishment of her own. But these considerations were minor beside another—a sense, haunting and constant, that the excursion to Nevada had been inadequate, that the past needed a surer barricade.

It was not a husband that she wanted. Peace and security were the flesh-pots that she craved. These Barouffski offered or seemed to—and it was these finally and these only that she agreed to accept.

To the implied stipulation Barouffski consented with an air of high chivalry but also with an ambiguous smile. Given the golden six of her income, the box was a detail to him, and it was in these circumstances that over the perhaps insecurely locked door of her past, this mask mounted guard.

The news of the engagement, filtering through the press, was cabled to the States, together with the fact that Leilah was then stopping in the rue François Premier with Lady Silverstairs, whose portrait, in addition to bogus presentments of the engaged couple, were printed in the minor sheets that circulate from New York to San Francisco.

On arriving from Australia at the latter city, Verplank happened on a belated copy. Since he had gone from Coronado, this, the first news of his wife, was her engagement to another man.

In his amazement his thoughts stuttered. Into his mind entered stretches of night. He looked at the sheet without seeing it. But the paragraph and the purport of it, already photographed on the films of the brain, were prompting him unconsciously, and it was without really knowing what he was saying that he exclaimed:

"Leilah! My wife! In Paris! Engaged to another man!"

The names, the words, the meaning of them all, beat on his brain like blows of a hammer.

"Leilah! My wife! In Paris! Engaged!"

Again he looked at the sheet. "What a damned lie!" he ragingly cried, and, rumpling the paper, threw it from him.

But now, the names, the words, the meaning of them all, well beaten into him, readjusted themselves, presenting a picture perfectly defined and possibly real.

He stooped, gathered the paper, smoothed it, read the account again.

After all, he reflected, it might be that she was in Paris and, if there, it was natural that she would be with Violet Silverstairs. These two items were, therefore, not improbably correct. That view reached, the deduction followed: If they are correct, the other may be. Yet, in that case, he argued, obviously she must think me dead. On the heels of this second deduction an impression trod—the ease and dispatch with which she had become consoled.

Enraged at once, angered already by what he had taken for a lie and then infuriated by what he took for truth, the anterior incidents that had this supreme outrage for climax, leaped at him. At the onslaught the primitive passions flared, and it was with the impulse of the homicide that he determined to seek and overwhelm this woman who accepted men and matters with such entire sans-gêne.

On the morrow he left for New York. Before going he sent a cablegram to the address which the paper had supplied:

Am just apprised of the studied insult of your engagement to some foreign cad. Leaving for Paris at once.

As he signed it, deeply, beneath the breath, he swore. "That will show her," he added.

It so happened that it showed her nothing. Leilah was not then in the rue François Premier, but in the rue de la Pompe, where the message followed, but only to be received by Barouffski, who read it with a curious smile.

Already he hated Verplank, who had not yet acquired a hatred for him. But though that hatred had not been acquired, it developed tumultuously when, on arriving in New York, he learned that not merely the report of the engagement was true, but that the engagement had since resulted in a marriage, which itself had been preceded by a Nevada divorce.

In comparison to all that had occurred, the divorce seemed at the time almost negligible. It was the crowning infamy of this marriage which, in renewing the primitive passions, aroused in Verplank a determination not merely to seek and overwhelm the woman, but to seek and destroy the man. The marriage, he decided could be but the result of an anterior affair, there was no other explanation of it. The idea that had come to him at Coronado, the possibility that she might have left him because informed of some affair of his own and which since then he had examined again and again, fell utterly away. It was not because of errors of his that she had gone, but for turpitudes of her own. Then to his anger at her was added a hatred of Barouffski, whom he had never seen, and who, without having seen Verplank, hated him also, hated him retrospectively and prospectively, hated him because clearly Leilah had been his and—where women are concerned, all things being possible —might be again.

But though Barouffski hated Verplank actively, he hated him vaguely, as one must when one hates the unknown. It was the cablegram which, in supplying the personal element, made the hate concrete.

"Foreign cad, eh?" he repeated, with a curious smile. "Eh bien, nous verrons, we shall see."

Presently the opportunity occurred. For it was in these circumstances, a fortnight after the receipt of the cablegram, that, directed by the young Baronne de Fresnoy, he turned and saw Verplank entering the room where he stood.

IV

With the unerring instinct of the man of the world, Verplank, on entering the crowded salon, divined immediately, among all the women present, the hostess whom he had never seen.

As he bent over her hand, the duchess, who had not an idea how he came there, said in her fluted voice:

"This is really so nice of you. I did not know you were in Paris."

"Nor did I—until this moment," answered Verplank, looking as he spoke into the eyes of his hostess who, after the one imperceptible glance with which the mondaine judges and classifies, was wondering in what manner, this man, with his virile face and impeccable presence, had forced Leilah Barouffska to leave him.

"But," he added, "Monsieur de Joyeuse whom I saw this afternoon told me that you would be at home, and assured me that I might venture to present my homages."

The duchess displayed her tireless smile. "I am only sorry not to have had them sooner."

She paused. Between her smile, the edges of her teeth showed, false but beautiful. "There is Lady Silverstairs trying to get you to look at her, and very well worth looking at she is."

Camille de Joyeuse turned for a moment to the reticent young prince who in his diffident way still lingered at her side.

Beyond, at the farther end of the room, notes rippled. Standing near a grand piano, the Roumanian with the flowing hair was preluding a fantasy of his own.

In the hush that succeeded, Verplank moved to where Violet sat.

Smilingly, without speaking, she gave him her hand and indicated a seat beside her. Then, raising a fan, she whispered:

"Demon! What have you done? Where do you spring from? How long have you been in Paris?"

Verplank, seating himself, answered:

"I got here this morning. Why am I a demon?"

From behind the fan, Violet asked:

"What did you do to Leilah? Why did she leave you?"

Verplank folded his gloved hands. "That is what I am here to find out."

"Do you mean to tell me that you don't know!"

"I have not an idea—unless it was because of this Count Thingumagig."

Violet Silverstairs furled her fan, looked at him, looked away, looked about the room. At one end her husband, accompanied by de Joyeuse, Tempest, de Fresnoy, and the others, had entered. At the further end the Roumanian dominated. Supported en sourdine by an accompanist, he massed sounds and dispersed them, concentrating fulgurations of notes from which echoing showers fell. Presently, resuming an abandoned measure, he caressed a largo, infinitely sweet, that swooned in the languors of the finale. At once to a murmur of bravos, the applause of gloved hands and a cry of "Bis!" raising violin and bow above his head, he bent double to the duchess, his flowing hair falling like a veil before him.

"He may play again," said Violet. "I want to talk to you. Let us go into the next room."

As Verplank rose at her bidding, others who had been seated, rose also. Interrupted conversations were more animatedly resumed. A servant announced additional names. The first salon now was thronged. The second was filled. Verplank and Violet passed on.

Beyond was a gallery. At the entrance stood a woman, her face averted, talking to a man. As the others approached, she turned.

At sight of her and of the man, Violet would have turned also. It was too late.

"Leilah!" Verplank exclaimed.

For a second, in tragic silence, two beings whom love had joined and fate had separated, stood, staring into each other's eyes.

For a second only. At once the man interposed himself between them.

"Monsieur!" he insolently threw out. "My name is Barouffski."

With superior tact Lady Silverstairs intervened. "Good evening, Count. It never occurred to us that we were interrupting a tête-à-tête."

She paused. Hostilely the two men were measuring each other. In Verplank's face there was a threat, in Barouffski's there was a jeer, in Leilah's there was an expression of absolute terror. Of the little group Violet alone appeared at ease.

"Leilah," she added, "don't forget that you are to have luncheon with me tomorrow. Good night, my dear. Silverstairs and I will be going soon. Good night, Barouffski."

She smiled, nodded, took Verplank's arm, took him away. But the arm beneath her hand was shaking and she realised that it shook with rage.

Sympathetically she looked up at him. "I thought they were in the other room and it was just to avoid a thing of this sort that I got you out of it. You won't do anything, will you?"

Verplank now had got control of himself, his arm no longer shook, and it was the smile of a man of the world, the smile of one to whom nothing is important and much absurd, that he answered:

"Why, yes; it was very civil of this chap to introduce himself. I shall leave a card on him. Hello! Here's Silverstairs! I wonder if he will introduce himself, too."

The young earl was advancing, his hand outstretched. "I say! I saw a man marching off with the missis, but I had no idea it was you. Where are you stopping? Will you dine with us Tuesday?"

"Yes, do." Violet threw in. "Rue François Premier at eight."

"I shall be very glad to," Verplank answered. He turned to Silverstairs. "I am at the Ritz. Stop by there to-morrow noon, won't you, and let me take you somewhere for luncheon?"

Lady Silverstairs laughed and employing a darkyism, said: "You don't say turkey to me. There!" she exclaimed as Verplank was about to protest. "I could not anyway."

From the salon beyond came a woman's voice, clear and rich, rendering, in a lascive contralto, a song of love and passion.

The Silverstairs and Verplank approached. Meanwhile, from the diva's mouth, notes darted like serpents on fire. In mounting fervour the aria developed, trailing, as it climbed, words such as amore, speranza, morir. A breath of brutality passed. The atmosphere became charged with emanations in which the perfume of women mingled with the desires of men. Still the aria mounted, it coloured the air, projecting, like a magic lantern, visions of delight, imperial and archaic, that ascended in glittering scales.

Verplank, detaching himself from the Silverstairs, felt his dumb rage renewed. At the moment he conceived an insane idea of going below, waiting without until Barouffski and Leilah appeared and he saw himself, confronting the man, tearing the woman from him, carrying her off and making her his own.

The impulse fell from him. The rage that he felt at the man deflected into rage at this woman who had made his life a vacant house and for what, good God! And why?

In a cascade of flowers and flames the song was ending. There was new applause, the discreet approbation of worldly people, easily pleased, as easily bored and with but one sure creed: Not too much of anything.

Verplank must also have had enough. When presently the Silverstairs looked about for him he had gone.

Already Violet had summarised the situation to her lord. Now, perplexed at Verplank's abrupt disappearance, she said:

"You don't suppose that anything will happen, do you?"

Silverstairs, bored by the entertainment, anxious only to get away where he could have a quiet drink, tugged at his moustache and with unconscious reminiscence answered:

"I don't know and I don't care. I don't care what happens as long as it doesn't happen to me."

V

"There are too many of us," Verplank, the day following, found himself saying to Silverstairs.

The two men were lunching at Voisin's.

The charming resort which, since the passing of Véry, of Véfour and the Maison Dorée, has become the ultimate refuge of the high gastronomic muse of Savarin and of Brisse was, on this forenoon, filled with its usual clientèle:—old men with pink cheeks, young women with ravishing hats, cosmopolitan sportsmen, ladies of both worlds, assortments of what Paris calls High Life and pronounces Hig Leaf.

Without, a fog draped the windows, blurred the movement of the street, transforming it into a cinematograph of misty silhouettes. But within, the brilliant damask, the glittering service, the studied excellence of everything, produced an atmosphere of wealth and ease.

Silverstairs, after swallowing a glass of Chablis, meditatively lit a cigar. But meditation was not his forte. The twentieth of his name, he was tall and robust. He had straw-coloured hair, blue eyes, a skin of brick, and an appearance of simple placidity. At the moment he was mentally fondling certain reminiscences of the Isis and certain bouts with bargees there.

"You know," he said at last, "if I were you I would just march up to him and knock him down."

Verplank nodded. "I dare say. But not if he had taken your wife."

The suggestion, penetrating the earl's placidity, punctured it. He threw back his head. "By George! If he had, I'd kill him."

"There, you see!"

Silverstairs puffed at his cigar. His placidity now was reforming itself.

"Yes," he answered. "But then in taking yours, he did it after she was divorced. You can't have him out for that."

"All the same there are one too many of us."

Silverstairs filled his mouth with smoke. Longly, with an air of considering the situation he expelled it. Then he said:

"It is what I call damned awkward. But what the deuce can you do?"

"What can I do?" Verplank with an uplift of the chin repeated. "Why, if only for the manner in which he acted last night—"

"I know," Silverstairs interrupted. "The missis told me. He behaved like a fidgety Frenchman. I grant you that. But there were no words, nothing that you could put a finger on."

Through an adjacent door a man strolled in. He had his hat on and in one gloved hand he held a thin umbrella of which the handle was studded with gold nails. With the other hand he smoothed a black moustache. Through a monocle he was surveying the room. He looked careless and cynical.

Deferentially a maître d'hôtel addressed him. Ignoring the man he waved his umbrella at Silverstairs.

Silverstairs waved his hand. He turned to Verplank. "Here's de Fresnoy. He can put us straight. Let's ask him to join us."

Rising, he greeted the Parisian, invited him to the table, introduced Verplank, speaking as he did so in French, with an accent frankly barbarous which de Fresnoy seemed to enjoy.

The latter raised his hat to Verplank, confided it to the maître d'hôtel, gave him the umbrella also, while another waiter drew up for him a chair.

"Thanks," he said in an interval of these operations. "I see you have breakfasted. If you don't mind my eating while you smoke—"

Seating himself he turned to the waiter, a man short and stout, completely bald, with large dyed whiskers and an air of repressed satisfaction.

"Listen, Léopold, and note well what I say. To begin with do not attempt to tell me what you wish me to eat. You have heard? Good! Listen again. A dozen Ostendes, an omelette, a pear. Nothing else. Not a crumb. Yes, some Eau de Vals. Allez!"

Léopold bowed. "Perfectly, monsieur le baron. I shall have the honour of serving monsieur le baron with what he has been good enough to be willing to desire."

Again the waiter bowed. But behind the oleaginousness of his speech a severity had entered, one which intimated that in this preserve of gastronomics such an order was unworthy.

"These gentlemen?" he added, his eyes moving from Verplank to Silverstairs. "Some coffee? A liqueur?"

But now, in fluent French, Verplank was addressing de Fresnoy. "Silverstairs and I have been having an argument. In your quality of Parisian, will you tell us whether a man can have another out for looking impertinently at him?"

De Fresnoy adjusted his collar, patted his neck-cloth. "But certainly, most assuredly. To look impertinently at a man constitutes an attack on his self esteem, which in itself is an integral part of his moral wealth. To omit to return a man's bow, to neglect to take his proffered hand, to regard him in an offensive manner, are one and all so many assaults on his dignity."

Verplank, pleased with this view of things, smiled. "Thanks. Mine has been assailed and I was in doubt how to rebuke the aggressor."

"It is simple as Good day. You have only to select two representatives and get them to put themselves in communication with him. If then he refuses to have friends of his meet yours, or if, afterward, he will neither apologise or fight, he is outlawed."

De Fresnoy, as he spoke, made a gesture, a wide movement of the arm which indicated, or was intended to indicate, the uttermost limits of the world.

"It is Barouffski," Silverstairs, with some idea that de Fresnoy might be aware of the anterior complication, threw out.

"Barouffski!" de Fresnoy repeated, his head held appreciatively a little to one side. "In a bout he is very clever. Barring d'Arcy, Helley-Quetgen"—and myself he was about to add, but throwing the veil he desisted—"I don't know his equal. How he is on the field, personally I cannot say. But there, the absence of buttons, the absence of masks, the inevitable emotion, the sight of the other man, the consciousness of an injury to be maintained or avenged, the consciousness too of the definite character of any thrust you may give and particularly of any thrust you may receive, these things have such an effect that often the cleverest acts like a fool. On the boards, fencing is an exercise, it is an amusement. On the field, it is another man's blood—or yours. Though, after all, one is rarely killed except by one's seconds."

He turned to Verplank. "You fence? Or is it that you shoot?"

Verplank leaned back in his chair. "Oh, I suppose I can fire a gun."

Silverstairs laughed. "I say now! You are too modest by half." He looked at de Fresnoy. "Verplank is one of the crack shots of America."

De Fresnoy turned again to Verplank. "You should demand pistols then. Barouffski draws well, but at twenty paces he is less sure of himself. Have you selected your seconds?"

"I suppose I may count on Silverstairs for one——"

The young earl nodded. "That's of course, and perhaps you, de Fresnoy, will act with me."

The Parisian smoothed his moustache. "I shall be much honoured. In that case, however, as necessary preliminary, I shall have to ask to be made acquainted with all the circumstances."

But now Léopold, bearing a dish on which were oysters green as stagnant scum, approached and with an air of infinite tenderness, much as though it were a baby, placed it before de Fresnoy.

Leisurely he began to eat.

Verplank, who had been looking out of the window, leaned forward. "The circumstances are evangelical in their simplicity. Last evening I was about to speak to Madame Barouffska when he put himself between us and eyed me in the manner which I have described."

De Fresnoy, considering him over an oyster, said:

"You were at the Joyeuses then?"

Verplank nodded.

"And there Barouffski objected to your speaking to his wife?"

"Yes."

De Fresnoy swallowed the oyster. "In that case he was guilty not only of a grave offense to you, but to Madame de Joyeuse as well. The duke would be the first to resent it."

With an idea of making it all very clear, Silverstairs put an oar in: "Madame Barouffska, you know, was formerly Madame Verplank."

De Fresnoy bent a little. It may be that because of Silverstairs' ultra English accent he had not understood. "Pardon?"

But here Verplank intervened. "This lady had been divorced from me before she married Barouffski."

De Fresnoy, over another oyster, turned to him again. Yet any surprise he may have experienced he was too civil to display.

"Ah, indeed!" he replied. He looked as though he were about to add something, but refraining, he paused.

Verplank helped him out. "You are thinking perhaps that there may have been circumstances that rendered further acquaintance between us inadmissible. I may assure you that there are none and, without wishing to intrude my private affairs, I may assure you also that to this hour I am unaware why the divorce was obtained. This lady had no grievance of any kind against me and I had none whatever against her."

Pontifically, in his deepest note, Silverstairs threw out: "In the States they give you a divorce for a Yes or a No."

"For married people," de Fresnoy remarked, yet so pleasantly that the sarcasm was lost, "America is the coming country."

As he spoke, the fat waiter, after supervising the removal of the first dish, produced, with the air of a conjurer, another. It was an omelette, golden without, frothy within.

De Fresnoy glanced up. "Countermand the pear. Instead, bring me paper and ink."

"Perfectly, monsieur le baron."

Slowly de Fresnoy attacked the food. After a mouthful he said to Silverstairs:

"When the writing materials come we can get off a note to Barouffski. If he has any explanation he can advance it. Otherwise—on guard!"

After another mouthful he said to Verplank:

"You have fought before?"

"I have not had the occasion."

"Nor I," interjected Silverstairs. "It is against the law in England."

Gravely, as though he were receiving valuable information de Fresnoy bowed. "So it is here. But with us it is custom that rules, not law. No jury would convict an honourable man for fighting a fair fight. Besides, dueling is in our blood. It will not disappear as chivalry has. It will last as long as there are French men—and French women. And yet, in saying that chivalry has disappeared, I am in error. Not later than the week before last a cousin of mine, a young man truly charming, married a monster."

He pushed aside his plate. "Well, then, Léopold, am I to sit here the entire day?"

Serviceably, a buvard in his hand, the waiter approached. "I have subventioned a new pen for the use of monsieur le baron."

"There, Léopold, your sins are remitted. See at once if the chasseur is free."

De Fresnoy looked at Silverstairs. "With your permission, in our joint names, I write."

He looked at Verplank. "Will you pardon me if I ask how your name is spelled?"

Verplank, getting at his case, extracted a card.

De Fresnoy glanced at it. Then, taking that new pen, he read, as he wrote, aloud.

M. le Comte Barouffski.

Monsieur: M. Verplank has requested the Earl of Silverstairs and myself to arrive at an understanding with two of your friends concerning an incident which occurred last evening in the Avenue Cours la Reine.

Lord Silverstairs and I will be obliged if, as soon as possible, you will ask one of your friends to appoint a meeting at which we may deliberate.

Receive, Monsieur, the expression of my distinguished sentiments.

Baron de Fresnoy

He looked over at Silverstairs. "Is that to your liking? Good! We will send it to the Little Club where the answer is to be left and we will have a reply today. En attendant, there are matters that claim me."

With a movement of the chin he summoned the waiter.

A little byplay followed; the presentation of the bill, the click of gold on porcelain, the carelessly gathered change, the meagre tip, the reappearance of the hat, the bowing waiters, the craning necks, and the departure of de Fresnoy, an umbrella under his arm, a cigar between his teeth.

Verplank, emptying a glass of Chablis, looked out of the window. A panorama was forming. He saw the room at Coronado, Leilah as she told him of her love, his brief absence, his harrowing return, the hunt for her that had extended over half the globe, a hunt that divorce had not terminated, which her re-marriage had not stopped and which, had he not at last discovered her, nothing could have stayed save his death or hers or the reason of the implacable Why. An obstacle to the Why or, it might be, the incarnation of it, was Barouffski, and Verplank saw himself standing somewhere with Barouffski before him. There was a command, the call of numbers, a detonation and the sight of Barouffski turning, swaying, falling down.

The panorama faded. A picture had appeared. Before the window, arrested by a congestion of traffic, a motor was stopping. In it and the mist was Leilah.

Verplank sprang to his feet. With the idea of going out to her there and forcing an explanation, he looked about for his hat.

Silverstairs also got up. He had not seen. He too was looking for his hat. Placidly he remarked:

"I have an appointment with a chap named Tempest. Will you come with me?"

But now, the congestion relieved, the motor shot on. Verplank had the spectacle of a face fading instantly in the fog and the future.

"Will you?" Silverstairs repeated.

"Will I what?"

"I have to see a man about a horse. He lives just off the Bois de Boulogne, in the rue de la Pompe. Will you come up there with me?"

"Yes, if you will go on foot. In that case

I'll leave you there and walk back. I need the exercise. I feel like what you described as a fidgety Frenchman."

Silverstairs pulled at his moustache. "It's no end of a walk. But no matter, I'll go you."

VI

That morning Leilah had two appointments, one with a modiste, the other with Violet Silverstairs. She did not feel equal to either. The episode of the previous evening had been to her like the supreme torture which medieval legislation devised. It was all she could bear —and more!

When, abruptly, she found herself face to face with Verplank, it was as though she were confronted by the dead. The sense of it numbed her, and the numbness was heightened by a horror that has no name. Into the seats of thought there entered the realisation that, in spite of all, she still loved him, that in spite of all he still loved her. In the core of these convictions fear entered, fear of him, fear of herself, a sensation of common peril and mutual perdition so blinding that Barouffski's rudeness she barely noticed, and it was with a look the damned may have that she saw Verplank turn with Violet Silverstairs, and go.

As they passed, Barouffski, with the air of one commenting on a triviality, remarked:

"How odd it is that the Joyeuses should care to hobnob with demi-castors. Shall we go?"

That demi-castors meant bounders generally, and, in this instance, specifically, she would, ordinarily, have been insufficiently familiar with the slang of the boulevards to know. But she did not hear. Moreover, the remark required no reply. Even otherwise she was unable to speak, and it was not until Barouffski reiterated his suggestion that mechanically she acceded to it with a movement of the head.

Her demeanor then in traversing the salons, her leave-taking of the duchess, her bearing in descending the stairs, were as mechanical as her reply to Barouffski, and it was not until after the motor had dropped him, as he had asked that it should, at the door of the Little Club, that, at last alone, the mental anchylosis fell by.

At once in a sort of retrograde vision, she relived the past. There had been the flight from Coronado, the halt at Salt Lake, the descent into Nevada, the divorce, the journey abroad, the platonic marriage to Barouffski. These—the succeeding episodes in the drama of her life—were so many hostages to joy, barricades thrown one after another between Verplank and herself, and unavailingly thrown, since, with but a look, they were almost destroyed.

They had seemed wholly impregnable, but she knew then that unless reinforced by surer bars, they would one and all collapse. At the foreknowledge of that she appreciated what the heroines in the old tragedies endured, when circled by the seven-times-twisted coil of fate. Yet, though they had yielded, she would not yield, and it was with this determination that she alighted in the rue de la Pompe.

The house there had a church for neighbour, and stood between a court and a garden. Before the court was a high, white wall. The garden extended back to the parallel street, where, also, was a wall. The entrance to the court was a double doorway, the entrance to the garden was an iron gate. Between the gate and the house were large urns, a marble bench, a marble chair, most noticeably the kennels of two mastiffs, pets of Barouffski who, at whatever hour he returned at night, had them loosed. They were, he declared, a great protection, as indeed they were—for him. Apart from the occasional barking of these dogs, barring also occasional music from the church, usually the garden was quiet. But that was in the order of things. It lacked both stable and garage. These had been secured elsewhere.

Except for that detail, the arrangements generally were satisfactory. The house was commodious, agreeably furnished. On the ground floor were the usual offices, beneath which the servants slept. On the floor above were the salons and dining hall. Above these were the bedrooms. On this upper floor the apartment which Barouffski occupied gave on the street, while Leilah's overlooked the garden.

Adjacent to her suite was a stairway designed for servants, but which, because of its convenience, she occasionally used. It led directly to the dining hall, and from there she could descend into the garden.

It had a superior advantage. It enabled her to avoid the hazards of the main stairway, which was used by Barouffski, whom nearer acquaintance had discovered to her without the mask—without one mask, that is—for histrion that he was, he had many, but the best, the feigned nobility of noble pride, the assumed parage, had gone.

In its place was a smile, constant, equivocal, ambiguous, a smile such as the consciously damned may display. It gave Leilah little creeps. She dreaded it, dreaded him, dreaded both, what is worse she dreaded instinctively, without knowing why. The man was amiable, serviceable, gallant. He wore his domino not faultlessly perhaps but with the fine air of a bravo who, when the time comes, will knife you, yes, but who in so doing will rather require that you admire the chasing on the handle of the blade. As yet the knife was concealed. But Leilah felt that it was there. He knew it was. Occasionally he fingered the point.

Hitherto he had lived by expedients. A golden six had been tossed him. He had pocketed it. For him the economic problem of life was solved. He asked little else, merely that the solution should endure and that his dignity, of which he had a humorous conception, be outwardly preserved. In addition to his dignity, or to his idea of it, he had another attribute. He was not exacting. It is a great charm in any one. But with him it did not extend to money. Freely he demanded it, freely she gave and it was precisely when he demanded it that she felt, and he felt, too, the point of the knife.

On this evening when, after the usual din at the doors, the motor entered the court and she alighted at the perron, two footmen busied themselves in aiding her.

Leilah passed through the dining room to the garden where for a while she walked along the path that led from the house to the gate.

The garden was cloistered, the night serene. The influences of both affected her. The darkness put her thoughts into relief, the solitude relaxed the tension of her nerves.

Another thing was helpful, the determination which she had reached, though for that determination to be maintained there must, she saw, be further hostages, new barricades. But what further hostages could she give she wondered, what firmer barricades was it possible to erect? Barring flight or an appeal to Verplank, some message begging him to leave Paris, she could not imagine any. Flight she had already tried, but not flight to some one of the world's far away places where any one may be lost forever. It was a miserably dismal thing to do, she reflected, a thing so dismal and so miserable that she doubted her ability to do it.

As she thought it over she wondered if in some former existence she could have injured Verplank and whether it were by way of retribution that he had the power to tempt and torture her now. Tenets of this character the Vidyâ advanced and as she had told Tempest, she had come to believe in that Scripture as many do in the Bible, though as many also do without being able to accept it entirely, without being able to accept for instance stories such as that of Jonah and the whale which none the less all would accept were it known how profound is the symbolism behind them. With like reservations, Leilah accepted the Vidyâ. She was very ignorant as women in her station generally are and the reservations were due to that ignorance and also to the demand which the doctrine made on her imagination. But though she was ignorant she was conscious of it and consciousness of ignorance is usually the condition precedent to enlightenment.

Now, in considering the episode of the evening, she asked herself whether she was warranted in accepting this creed of past lives. At the Joyeuses, during the announcements of resonant names, Tempest had said that unless we swallow the ridiculous dogma of a soul specially created at every birth and unless too we are indecent enough to fancy the Deity waiting for that purpose on the passions and caprices of man, we have to accept it, have to accept with it the corollary of past actions and their consequences, have to accept, too, the deduction that, in accordance with our past actions, it is we who reward or punish ourselves, we who become avenging furies or angels of light.

Leilah wished that she could have discussed the matter more fully with Tempest yet she felt that what he had said was logical, but if it were true, then the parallel doctrine that all misdeeds and with them all misfortunes spring from desire must be true also, in which case, before their consequences can be effaced, all misdeeds must be atoned. But how can they be atoned? she asked herself. Presently she remembered. According to the Vidyâ, any desire no matter what, desire for pleasure, for gain, for attainments, for honours, even the desire for spiritual perfection, even the desire for the lack of desire, must be extinguished before old scores are paid. That was the way she saw, the only way. The debtor must sacrifice himself to himself.

But, uncertain still, she went over the matter again, putting to it little tests, passably naïf yet serviceable to her. She had ardently desired to marry Verplank, then, desiring as ardently a barricade against him, she had married Barouffski. In the one case the result had been catastrophic; in the other, calamitous. Doubtless she had sinned in the past and these disasters, brought about by her own desires, were her punishment. There were other things that she had desired. She had wanted to be loved, she had wanted to be thought a beauty, and not only her love had shamed her but soon she might be ashamed to show her face. At the thought of these things she realised anew and more profoundly than ever that selfish desire is the root of evil and that only in its extirpation may peace be had. But coincidently she realised also that any such extirpation was beyond her. Heredity, environment, the circumstances of her life, had given an impetus to desire which she could not arrest. She liked wealth, ease, pretty clothes, becoming hats, the society of agreeable people. She liked the world and in liking it she feared that she liked also the flesh, it might be even that she liked, too, the devil. Yet, she must not, she knew.

In telling herself that, she thought of the Church. The Church was so much more comfortable. There you were not asked impossibilities, the one requirement was to throw yourself in her arms and repent. As the facile process occurred to her she recalled George Moore's story of Evelyn Innes. That masterwork seemed to tell her to do as the heroine had done and go in a convent.

Perhaps she might, she thought. Perhaps she must.

Several times already she had crossed and recrossed the garden. Now she found herself at the farther end facing the iron gate.

Leilah opened it, walked to the corner and returned.

The little tentative evasion had been successful. At any time, unseen even by a servant, she could leave the house, disappear utterly, be forever ingulfed. But the knowledge that she could escape into darkness and be lost there, offered little more than a choice between tears. It presented a form of suicide which was superior only to actual death. She hoped she might be spared it. She hoped an appeal to Verplank would suffice, though in what manner it could best reach him, or, for that matter, reach him at all, she found it difficult to decide. To make it personally was impossible. To attempt it through Violet Silverstairs would involve an explanation and that was impossible also. The idea of employing one of her women occurred to her. There were manifest objections to such a course, though the particular woman whom she had in view she trusted entirely.

Slowly she returned to the house and went to her room. There, when at last the servants had gone and she was alone, she knelt on a prie-dieu and, to the Watchers of the Seven Spheres, prayed for the earthly peace of her soul and of his. She knew that no prayer could affect them, she knew that they are not to be propitiated or coerced, but it soothed her as prayer, in raising the vibrations, does soothe the distressed. The prayer concluded she began another. She prayed that sometime she might be somewhere, on some plane, where all things broken are made complete and found again things vanished.

Then, the solace of it still upon her, suddenly she saw by what the prayer had been induced. The consciousness confused and presently, in the melancholy sotto-voce of thought, she told herself that to extinguish that desire, she would have to be in Dharmakaya—the mystic state where there is oblivion of all things here.

"Here!" she caught herself repeating. For, at once, a passage from the Upanishads prompting, she remembered that here means Myalba, which is hell, the greatest of all hells and, for those of this evolution, the only hell there is.

VII

It was on the morning succeeding these incidents that Leilah felt unequal for the appointments she had made. But however she felt, she always did what she had planned. In this instance nature punished her. On the way to the first appointment, a malaise overtook her, enveloped her, beat at her and although, gradually, it fell by, she was still conscious of it when, in the rue Cambon, the motor stopped at the modiste's door.

"The fitting of madame la comtesse Barouffska!" a fair young girl in black immediately and authoritatively announced.

Before landscapes of silk, in the delight of new modes, customers were sunning themselves At the announcement they turned, while Leilah, conducted by another girl who had advanced to meet her, crossed the laboratory of enchantments and entered an adjoining room.

But, for the moment, the fitting was delayed. The première was elsewhere occupied. When presently she appeared she excitedly exclaimed:

"I hope I have not detained madame. I am desolated if I have. But! But! If madame knew! One is literally torn to pieces! All day long it is nothing but Ernestine that dress! Ernestine, that robe! Ernestine, that costume! Ernestine this! Ernestine that! Truly madame, there are moments when I say I die! I go crazy!"

Abruptly dropping her voice, she added: "But pardon, I monologue."

At once, indicating a gown which an assistant had brought, she exclaimed again:

"It will ravishingly become madame."

The gown, a work of the best Parisian art, suggested something of the immateriality of a moonbeam, and as the assistant, a girl with a tired face and circled eyes, held it for inspection, it gleamed.

Leilah looked at it, wondering the while where she would wear it, whether indeed she would wear it at all. Then, before a sheet that had been placed on the floor and on which the assistant arranged the gown in a circle she proceeded to undress.

To the amateur in feminine beauty, there are few spectacles more attractive than that of an attractive woman clothed in lingerie and a hat. This spectacle Leilah presented.

The première exclaimed at it. "Madame la comtesse has a figure truly divine. But! But! Who could have laced her?"

"I was not very well this morning," Leilah replied. "I told my women not to make me too tight. But you can take me in I think about an inch."

"Marguerite," said the première, "draw the stays a little closer."

The girl with the tired face undid the corset and pulled at the strings. But she pulled awkwardly, perhaps too suddenly.

Leilah gasped, turned, sat down and fell forward. The première hurried to her. She had fainted.

"The smelling salts!" the première cried. "The smelling salts! Cognac! Get some cognac!"

With one hand she was supporting Leilah, with the other she gesticulated at Marguerite who, hurriedly from the mantel, fetched a vinaigrette which Ernestine then took and sniffed at.

"She's coming to," said the assistant.

Ernestine waved the vinaigrette. "The gods be praised!"

For Leilah now had opened her eyes. Wearily she looked about, straightened herself and sighed.

"I must have fainted."

"It is nothing madame," Ernestine anxiously protested. "Truly nothing and yet so modish. Yesterday the Princesse de Solférino fainted. The day before it was the turn of the young Duchesse de Malakoff. Such a good augury for these ladies! Like them madame is perhaps——"

But Leilah now was making an effort to rise.

Abandoning the vinaigrette Ernestine aided her.

"Madame will perhaps wish the fitting postponed. Yes, is it not? It might further fatigue madame. To-morrow—no, to-morrow I regret but in the afternoon I have three appointments and in the morning there is the trousseau of Miss Smith of New York who is to marry an English lord. Marguerite!" she interrupted herself to exclaim. "The costume of madame!"

Then, as the assistant also assisted Leilah, reflectively the première resumed:

"I hear that every New York young lady loves a lord. But——"

She hesitated. Visibly the vision evoked, confused. Yet, after a second's pause, rallying, she continued.

"Perhaps it is not every New York young lady who has a lord to love. Perhaps many of them love the same lord."

Discreetly she smiled. "And that must be so nice for him!"

Considering Leilah, she concluded:

"But another day——"

Of it all, Leilah heard but that. "Yes," she answered, "another day."

Then, presently, after more attentions, the première accompanied her to the door.

"Rue François Premier," Leilah told the groom.

The machine shot ahead. Arrested shortly by a congestion of traffic, it halted before a window behind which Verplank and Silverstairs sat.

Leilah, unconscious of their presence, gazed at the murky cinematograph of the street, filled at this hour with faces sordid, petulant, indifferent, or frankly gay; with the passing forms of workmen, idlers, shopgirls, vagabonds; the swarming Parisian crowd which did not, she believed, contain one soul as miserable as her own.

The congestion relieved, the motor shot on. Leilah leaned back. It was not so long ago that she was on her way from New York to Coronado. She was happy then, happy with a happiness so perfect that it lifted her into the ultimate ecstasies which love and life comport. It was not so long ago, only six short months, only that brief eternity of sorrow which, unended yet, had been the damning penalty of that joy.

"In this life ye shall have tribulation," the Christ had said, and truly said, and as she rememorated the significant menace, she wondered whether for such as she, tribulation ended here. But her creed assured her. From the Vidyâ she had acquired faith in fate, the belief rather that we make our own destiny, that it is by our own hands that our lives are cast in places pleasant or the reverse, that our conduct in one life creates the conditions of our existence in another, that anything experienced now is the effect of a cause set going in the past, that happiness is the recompense of beneficence, deformity the result of cruelty, melancholy the penalty of evil thoughts. But whether retribution pursued its victim into future planes or abandoned them when they died, depended, she also believed, on how they faced it here, and it was in this idea that, during the unended sorrow, she had found the strength to bear its coils.

The motor stopped. She told the groom to wait. Presently she was among the subdued tints and harmonised furnishings of the drawing room of her friend.

At once, clearly in her limpid voice, considering her with brilliant eyes, Violet Silverstairs aimed and fired.

"You're a liar!"

At the shot Leilah attempted to smile, and though she failed, it was not because she fancied there could be any reproach in the term, but because latterly she had been unable to smile at all.

"You're a liar," Violet repeated. "Also, you are late."

"I know I am late and I am sorry," Leilah withdrawing her gloves, replied. "But how am I a liar?"

"Come to luncheon and you will precious soon find out. I had some eggs for you, eggs à l'Aurore Boréale. I had a sweetbread. I had—I have forgotten what else. Now I have nothing. Everything is spoiled."

Violet Silverstairs was perhaps imaginative. There were eggs, very good eggs too, though whether prepared in the Aurora Borealis fashion is perhaps beside the issue. Moreover there was a sweetbread, one that had been germinated on salt meadows and which was not spoiled in the least. In addition there were the other things which she had forgotten and all of them appetising in the extreme. It was an excellent luncheon, perfectly served in a beautiful room. But it was a luncheon for Sybarites, not for the suffering. After the first morsel Leilah was unable to eat.

"Where is Silverstairs?" she asked when that morsel had been consumed.

"With your ex."

Leilah put down her fork. "With Gulian?"

Violet laughed. "Have you more than one? But it was just through him that your lie cropped out. Last night he swore by bell, book and candle that you had never told him why you cut and ran."

It was at this juncture that Leilah found herself unable to eat. Instantly her mind shot back. She was at Coronado again, in the sunshine and frippery of her sitting room. She could see Verplank as he left it, see the letters that had been brought, see herself as she opened one of them, that one which with its enclosures she had redirected and left for him. The possibility never before conjectured, that he had not received it girdled her with a zone of ice. For a moment she looked fixedly at one of the windows through which the pale daylight fell. In the beautiful room, companioned by her nearest friend, she felt that sense of utter loneliness which in the great crises of life is experienced by all. Yet was it true?

"Violet!" she cried. "You are jesting."

But the lady, determined then or never to learn the truth, cocked an eye at her. "I am not, nor was he."

At that, Leilah felt the girdle of ice sending its shivers through her. The plan she had made must, she saw, be foregone. If Verplank did not know why she had separated from him, never would he leave Paris until he did. But what must he have thought, she agonisedly reflected, and what must he think!

Violet, who had been watching her, said: "Why don't you tell me?"

Leilah taking up her fork again, tried for countenance sake, to affect to eat. The effort was beyond her. She put it down.

"I can't," she at last replied.

Violet, her brilliant eye still cocked, almost winked.

"Yes, you said that before. But you see, don't you know, that whether you can or cannot tell me, you will have to tell him and, in the circumstances, would it not be best to have me do it for you? To be sure, if you had taken my advice and omitted to marry Barouffski, I would say, have it out with him yourself. But your marriage does not seem to have simplified matters, which, so far as I can make out, are now pretty thoroughly mixed."

The lady spoke better than she knew. Matters were complicated though how profoundly she had no idea, nor was Leilah aware that the situation, already tortuous, was to become even more intricately labyrinthine.

"Of course," Violet, in her bell-like voice, threw out, "after running away, getting a divorce and marrying another man, I can fancy that you don't much want to see him. But, really, you owe it to yourself to give the reason, particularly as it is he who is to blame."

At this, Leilah, who had been looking down into her prison, looked up. "I never said so."

"No, but was it necessary? Even nowadays, even in the States, a woman does not cut and run because butter won't melt in her husband's mouth. She does so because she has, or thinks she has, a grievance and the man, if he is a man, ought to be given an opportunity to apologise, however imaginary the grievance may be."

Leilah shook her head. "There can be no apology here."

Violet laughed. "That is just what I would say if I had gone and done it. Then it would be for Silverstairs to try on his knees to get me to listen to one—provided, of course, that in the interim I had not taken over another man, for in that case I verily believe he would wring my neck. But you need fear nothing of the sort from Verplank. He seemed anxious only to wring Barouffski's."

Leilah made another futile effort with her fork. Absently she answered:

"I don't believe he knew who he was."

"You don't! After his telling him! But, apropos, what became of d'Arçy? I thought you and he were safely tucked away in a corner, otherwise never in the world would I have marched your Number One up to your Number Two."

"D'Arcy!" Leilah repeated. She had barely heard. She scarcely knew what she was saying, still less what was being said.

"Yes, le beau d'Arcy. Marie de Fresnoy told me that the other day at the races he was about to pay a ragamuffin of a girl for a flower, when she said: "I'd rather you kissed me." Fancy that! She told me too that a man who had a husband's reasons for wanting to kill him, was afraid to say a word. It appears he is a dead shot. But it appears also that your lovely Barouffski is one of the best swordsmen here. Verplank had better look out. To return though to our Chablis Moutonne. What will you do?"

Leilah, her thoughts afar, made no reply.

"What will you do?" Violet repeated.

From afar the question floated, descended, trod among the tender places of Leilah's soul. At the pain of it she winced. "God help me, I do not know."

Violet, cocking an eye again, insinuated: "Let me take a hand." She paused, then, for clincher, threw out: "He dines here to-morrow."

"Here!" Leilah exclaimed, half rising, fearful now that at any moment he might appear. "Here! With you?"

Violet nodded. "Why yes. Why not? If I can't confess you, perhaps I can him. At any rate I can try. You can't blame me for wanting to, either. You abandoned him on your honeymoon. You won't tell me why and he says he don't know. But he must suspect. He must have concluded that you left him for this, that or the other. I want to find out what his this, that and the other are and then make my own selection. It is true he did say that it was because of Barouffski. But that's all gammon. You never saw Barouffski until you got here. There is something else and what that is I want to find out. No, you can't blame me. It is the instinct of self-preservation. If I don't get at the bottom of it soon, I shall simply go mad."

A laugh, clear and musical, wound up the lady's chatter. She had no more idea of going mad than she had of jumping out of the window. But she wanted to know and that was only human.

But now, Leilah, who a moment before had half risen, stood up. "Violet, I am not well, you must let me go. Yes," she added as the lady remarked that on the morrow she might appear in the rue de la Pompe. "Yes, yes."

She would have said yes to anything. Hurriedly she got away.

Without the motor waited.

"Home," she told the groom.

A little before she had thought herself the most miserable of beings. But however deep the hell, there is always a deeper one. Add uncertainty to distress and the sum of it is sorrow multiplied by the infinite. That hell, that sorrow was or seemed to be, hers. She did not know where to go, what to do, to whom to turn.

The pitiable plan of flight returned to her. Again she put it aside. She could not adopt it now. Besides, though she owed a duty to herself, she owed another to Verplank. In what manner he had failed to receive the letter, it was impossible for her to imagine, but the fact that he had not received it, hurt her doubly, hurt her for herself, hurt her for him. Had it reached him, both would have been spared this pass. But it had not reached him and since then what must he have thought of her? What!

The query, which kept repeating itself, tortured her and on that torture was superposed the precarious problem of his enlightenment. See him she could not. To write was beyond her ability. For there are things no pen should write as there are others no tongue should tell. None the less the truth she knew must reach him and would do so best, she thought, through some channel similar to that from which the letter had proceeded, from a source either indifferent or inimical to them both.

At the auto-suggestion, her thoughts fluttered, scattered, grouped, then suddenly regrouping, produced a name. Beneath her breath she uttered it.

"Barouffski!"

It was not in provision of this that she had married him. At the time no such possibility had even impossibly loomed. But she had married him precisely as she had obtained a divorce, in order to barricade the future from the past; in order also for the fleshpots which she craved—peace and security. She had not had much of either. None the less, the primary object which she had sought had, in its accomplishment, persisted. He was a barricade. He was her official and paid protector.

For the task therefore which she could not perform, he seemed naturally indicated. What alone gave her pause was the certainty that he would enjoy it. She could see him, see his ambiguous smile, see his green eyes aglow, his cruel and sensual mouth distended.

From the picture she turned. Beyond was a church, the frontal draped with black. The motor had stopped. It had reached the house in the rue de la Pompe and pending the opening of the doors, whirred as it blocked the sidewalk.

It was then that she turned. Beside her, arrested by the car, stood Verplank.

After walking up from Voisin's with Silverstairs he had left him a moment earlier at Tempest's.

But the great doors had opened. Before Verplank could speak, the machine slid in. As it entered the court, the doors closed noisily.

VIII

On alighting at the perron, Leilah had as always to endure the ceremonial of two footmen assiduously assisting her.

"Emmanuel," she said to one of them. "Is Monsieur Barouffski at home?"

"No, madame la comtesse."

Leilah passed on and up. For a moment, in the hall above, she hesitated. Then, pushing a portière aside, she entered a salon, went to the window, and looked out. Crossing the court was Verplank.

Fear and the fear of it, the throttling sensation which children know when pursued, enveloped her. With an idea of telling the servants that she was out, that she was ill, that she could see no one, she turned. On a table near the entrance was a service of Sevrès. Its tender hues were repeated on the ceiling. Beneath was the mirror of a waxed and polished floor. On the glistening wood work her foot slipped. She staggered, recovered herself, got to the door.

Already Verplank had entered. She could hear him. He was not asking, he was demanding to see her. The form of the order mounted violently.

"Tell your mistress that I am here."

Even then, with the idea that she might still deny herself, Leilah drew back into the room. Mentally she was framing a phrase when Emmanuel entered.

With that air domestics have when tidying something objectionable, the footman reconstructed Verplank's command:

"There is a monsieur who inquires whether madame la comtesse receives?"

"Tell him——"

But the injunction, as yet not wholly formed, was never completed. Verplank, brushing the man aside, strode in.

Leilah, retreating before him, motioned at Emmanuel, and the servant, with an affronted air of personal grievance, vacated this room that was charged now with the vibrations of hostilities begun.

Retreating yet farther, her eyes on the foe, Leilah stared at him, and, as she retreated, Verplank, staring, too, advanced. In his stare were threats so voluble that she thought: "He will kill me." At the thought, there appeared before her Death's liberating face, the mysteriously consoling visage which it reveals to those alone who have reached the depth of human woe.

Beyond, from the church, came the music of an organ. A requiem was being held. Leilah felt as though it were her own.

Verplank, his hands clenched, the look of an executioner about him, threw at her:

"For six months I have been looking for you. I am come to have you tell me why I have had to look at all."

"Dies irae, dies illa," admirably, in a clear contralto, a woman's voice rang out.

Neither heard it. At the menace of the man, Leilah shrank, and in an effort at defense cried pitiably:

"Gulian! I left a letter for you."

Angrily he tossed his head.

"I received none, nor did I need any to tell me that there are women on the street, others in jail, that are less vile than you."

"Teste David cum Sibylla," clearly and beautifully the voice resumed.

"Gulian!" Leilah cried again.

With whips in his words, he added:

"No harlot could have acted more infamously than you."

At the lash of the outrage, Leilah, joining her hands, held them to him. "Gulian! You are killing me!"

"It is what you deserve. There are no penalties now for such turpitudes as yours. But, when there were, women like you were beaten with rods, they were lapidated, stoned to death, and death was too good for them; they should have been made to go about, as they afterward were, as you should be, in a yellow wig, in a yellow gown, that even children might point and cry: 'Shame!' "

The words, which he tore from his mouth, he hurled at her. She cowered before them. On a chair near by she had put her bag. Her wrap had fallen from her. In the church now the hymn had ceased. The ringing of the Elevation was beginning.

"Gulian! As if shame had not cried at me! Gulian, I have been scourged, I have been stoned. If I live, it is to implore of you mercy."

Her hands, still joined, were still extended, and in her face was an expression of absolute despair. But this martyr attitude seemed to him the most abominable of hypocrisies, and it was with anger refreshed that he lashed her again.

"Mercy? Yes, you want mercy, you, who were merciless in your treachery to me. A sweep would have had more decency, a scullion more heart. I put in your hands my trust, my love, my honour, and you who want mercy dragged them in dirt."

"Gulian!" Within her now was that invincible need of justice which impels the weakest to protest against the savagery of wrong. "Gulian! When you know!"

"I do know. I know you and your lies, and the infamy of them too well. At Coronado——"

"Gulian! You are not killing me merely, you torture my very soul."

He sneered.

"Do I? Do I, indeed! No, you compliment yourself. It is what I want to do, but you cheat me even there. No woman with a soul could have done this soulless thing."

The brutality of the arraignment shook her. She leaned against the chair for support. She felt hopeless, helpless, defenseless, and it was because the need for justice still impelled her, that she protested anew.

"Gulian, if only you knew! If only you had had that letter! Had it reached you, you would know that there was no deceit, that I left you for your sake as well as my own. Gulian, if I had not gone you would have seen and made me tell you, and then it may be you would have taken me and thrown me with you from the yacht."

There were tears in her words. With one hand she held to the chair, the other she raised to her head. It pained her. She felt bruised and looked it.

"Ecce panis Angelorum Factus cibus viatorum——"

Beyond, sustained by the arpeggios of the organ, the voice of a singer mounted sheerly like a thread of gold. It lowered and heightened. Presently, on a note, as if abruptly snapped, it ceased. The organ continued. It renewed the canticle. It projected a scale that ascended slowly, as though upward and onward, over the limitless steps of eternity, it were lifting the soul of the dead.

Leilah wished it were her own. Sadly she added:

"God knows it would have been better. Anything would be better than that you should speak to me as you do."

There is an innocence that appeals, a sincerity that disarms, a candour that outfaces every proof, and Verplank, who had been bent on overwhelming this woman with a contempt which he felt wholly deserved, was impressed, in spite of himself, by the evident ingenuousness, by the evident wretchedness, too, of her words.

He moved back.

"You say I would have made you tell me?"

"Yes. Yes. You would have."

"But made you tell me what?"

Leilah, still holding one hand to her head, raised the other from the chair, and with it made a gesture slight, yet desolate.

"What was it?" he asked.

Before replying, she looked away.

"What I hid from you rather than repeat."

"But repeat what?"

Her face still turned from him, she answered:

"Something, my—something Mr. Ogston sent me."

"Mr. Ogston!" Verplank exclaimed. The formality of the statement astounded him. "Do you mean your father? What did he send you?"

But Leilah would not or could not speak. Her mouth contracted as though she were choking, and she put a hand to her throat.

"Tell me," he insisted.

She turned, and beseechingly she looked at him.

"Gulian, I cannot."

At that Verplank moved nearer, and so dominatingly that again she extended her hands.

"Gulian, I will get some one else to tell you. I had intended to. Believe me, it is better so."

"It concerns me?"

"Yes, you."

"And you?"

"Yes, both of us."

"Then you shall tell me, and tell me now. Do you hear?"

"Gulian!" she cried. She raised her clasped hands to him. "Gulian!"

But Verplank, his jaw ominously square, confronted her.

"I say you shall."

"Don't look at me then," she pleaded. "Bend your head, bend it lower. One second, then I will. One second—one. Ah, God! I cannot."

Verplank, who at her bidding had stooped, straightened himself, and caught at her.

"I say you shall."

"Gulian, a moment. Give me a moment. Now bend your head again. One moment, Gulian; your father, your father—— My mother loved him."

"Your mother loved my father!"

"Gulian, I am his daughter."

"You are what?"

"I am your sister."

As she whispered it, she covered her face. Verplank started, straightened again, raised his arm, and, with a gesture wide, elemental, absurd, and human, struck at the empty air.

Savagely he turned to her.

"And you believe this?"

Leilah, her head bowed, her face covered, shook with sobs.

"You believe it?" he repeated.

"There were letters," she stammered. "Three letters. No one could read them and not—and not——"

"And it was for this you left me?"

A fresh access seized her. He could not see her tears, he heard them.

"And it was for this you got a divorce?"

On the chair beside her was her bag. She felt in it, and got out a handkerchief.

"And it was for this you took that cad?"

Slowly, with infinite hesitations, the bit of cambric held to a face that was wet and white, she turned to him.

"I thought you would forget. I thought you would marry. I though you would be happy. I hoped so that you would. But my leaving you, the divorce, the marriage, these things were done with no idea of happiness. They were to serve as barriers between us."

Impotently he stamped a foot. He was furious still. But his anger had deflected. He was enraged less at her than at circumstances.

"Rubbish! That's what your barriers are."

Leilah, wiping her eyes, turned from him. The barriers, however fragile, were not rubbish to her.

Violently he continued:

"As for Barouffski——"

But Leilah, turning to him again, interrupted:

"Gulian, let me tell you. Last night I planned to have some one ask you, for my sake, to go away. Gulian, I thought you would, but I determined if you would not that I would go."

Verplank moved back.

"Go! Go where?"

"Ah! God knows! Anywhere. Wherever I could hide myself. Wherever I could hide my love for you."

Her eyes had been raised to his. At the confession they lowered of themselves. Then again she looked him in the face.

"Gulian, it is that which cried shame at me. It is that which scourged me with rods bitterer than those of which you spoke. You say the barriers are nothing. Gulian, you are wrong. To me they are eternal."

"Yes," he angrily retorted. "Yes, if your story were true. But it isn't. It's arrant nonsense."

In miserable protest, she half raised a hand.

"Gulian, when I read those letters my youth died in me. Never since they reached me have I had the heart to smile. If you had seen them you would have felt the truth in every line."

"I would have felt nothing of the kind; the fact that you still care for me ought to show you that they are false."

"Gulian, I tried to think that, too; but even in trying I felt that I was pleading for myself."

"Then, for the love of God, stop pleading and act! Look at yourself, look at me! We could not be more unlike if we came from different planets."

She was making an effort to answer. He stopped her.

"Listen to this. If you can't act, I shall. My mother is in London. To-morrow she is to be here. Probably she can tell me the truth. If not, I will go to the States. There I will see your father. When I return it will be with proofs. I will bring them if I have to drag that old scoundrel with me."

He paused. Though angry still, her story had pacified him. He felt it to be false, nonetheless she had believed it and the fact that she had, absolved her of much that she had done. However she had erred, she had at least tried to do right. He closed and opened a hand, looked at it and from it looked at her.

"But first I will see my mother. In any case I will be here to-morrow. Yes, that's what I'll do. Why shouldn't I come. Why not?"

Leilah did not answer. She did not believe he would come, except to cause fresh agony to them both there was no reason why he should do so. The horror which she had told him and to which incredulously he had listened was gospel to her, an evil gospel, yes, but nonetheless a true one. Besides if he did come as, in any case, he said he would, he might meet Barouffski, and affrightedly she foresaw blows, afterwards a duel—one which she was unaware was then impending.

"Why not?" Verplank repeated, fumbling her as he spoke with suspicious eyes and appearing to divine and to resent her forecast.

She caught at a straw. Usually, between four and seven, Barouffski was tabled at baccarat, gambling with her money. That straw she produced.

"Come at five."

Verplank, appeased, nodded. "Very good, at five then."

But at once she realised that other safeguards were needful. She hesitated, looked about her, looked at Verplank, gave him his hat, motioned to him. Then, preceding him, she passed into an adjoining salon, entered the dining room and moved from it to the garden below.

Passably mystified, he followed.

The air, freighted with fragrance, stirred by music from the church, the dogs, at sight of him, charged suddenly with menaces. Straining at their chains, viciously they clamoured.

Indifferently Verplank glanced from them to the gate beyond, to which Leilah was leading him.

When both reached it, she opened it and said: "Come this way to-morrow, will you?"

For a second he considered her. Her face was as a book in which he could read the reason. In view of many things, particularly of the duel, it seemed to him all very puerile.

But, replacing his hat, grimly he nodded. "Before then I have rather an idea that there may be a deficit among us."

This expression, in itself perhaps over precise, was too much for her and the fact that it was showed itself in her eyes.

Without heeding their inquiry he nodded again. "I will come this way but only that together we may leave by the other."

Again he nodded. In a moment he had gone.

Leilah, closing the gate behind him watched him go. It was, she felt, her last earthly sight of him. There would be no going away together. He would never come back. Never. His mother, if she knew the truth, could only substantiate it. If she did not, another would. Helplessly she held at the gate. A vagrant passed, she did not see. A hawker called, she did not hear. She was not only helpless, she was hopeless. She wished that death really were, that it could beneficently come, take her, shroud her in blankness, in endless oblivion of what was and of what might have been. Long since the dogs, mollified by Verplank's exit, had ceased to bark. Shrilly now from the church came boys' fresh voices. The music of them stirred her a little and she turned.

Before her, framed in a window of the dining room, Barouffski stood. At sight of him she started. Amiably he smiled. When she looked again he had vanished.

But, in a moment, in the doorway beneath, smiling still, he reappeared.

"What a beautiful day, is it not?" Oilily he rubbed his hands. "You have been having visitors, cara mia?"

As he spoke he moved toward her. Urbanely he continued! "And what did they have to say?"

He was quite near her now and, with his head held a trifle to one side he was regarding her with affectionate indulgence, much as one would regard a child.

"They told you nothing new, cara mia?"

Without looking at him, Leilah shook her head. "Nothing. Nothing at least that I did not know."

Smiling still, indulgent as before, Barouffski plucked at his pointed beard. "And what is that, cara mia?"

Remotely, in a voice without colour, as though speaking not to him at all but only to herself, she answered:

"That I am the most miserable woman in the world."

Barouffski's smile broadened. "Bah! They exaggerated, cara mia. It is the way of the world. Mon Dieu, à qui se fier? You are not at all what they said. You are—how shall I put it—perhaps a bit indiscreet. That is it, a bit indiscreet." He pointed to the bench. "Will you not seat yourself?"

He was still smiling, but the smile wholly muscular, was one in which the eyes have no part. The "visitors" whom he affected to ridicule, alarmed him. They were, he knew, quite capable of taking Leilah away. Her presence or absence was quite one to him. Only if she departed, so would her purse.

"Will you not?" he repeated.

"I am going in."

"Certainly, cara mia. It is as it pleases you. But——"

At this Leilah, who had passed him, turned.

"Well, what?"

"You see, cara mia, supposing I had visitors. Supposing rather I had a visitor. We are only supposing, are we not? Bon! Supposing this visitor happened to be what we call an ancienne, an old flame, an inamorata of mine. Supposing that were so. Do you know what you could do?"

"No," Leilah from over her shoulder answered. "Nor do I care."

"Forgive me, cara mia. You mean that you do not care to be informed. Yet you should know, for you could if you wished have me fined. Yes, that is what you could do. You could have me fined.

"But I," he resumed. "Do you know in similar circumstances what I could do? Do you know rather what the law says I may do?

Do you, cara mia? Do you? For really you ought to."

But Leilah now was approaching the entrance.

"What!" Barouffski exclaimed. "You are not interested? You are really going?"

As he spoke, he bowed. "Bon, à ce soir, cara mia. And a last word. If I may advise, do not be led into indiscretions."

"Do not," he repeated, while shrilly from the adjacent church came the voices of boys chanting the final phrase of the Pater Noster:

"Sed libera nos a malo."

"That is it," he called at Leilah's retreating back. "Pray rather to be delivered of them. Otherwise——"

But Leilah now had entered the house.

"Otherwise," he continued to himself and moving to the kennels, patted the dogs, "otherwise a sojourn in Poland may improve you."

IX

"The strawberries were delicious," Violet, the following day, remarked to Leilah.

The two women were seated in the garden of the house in the rue de la Pompe. It was just after luncheon and between them was a table on which coffee had been served. From without came the whirr of passing motors, the cries of those hawkers who are never still. But the garden itself was quiet, scented too and the day superb.

Violet, patting a yawn, resumed: "One never really gets strawberries except in Paris. They are so big! And so expensive, aren't they? I know that in a restaurant a man gave one to the waiter for a tip."

She looked about her. "But, mercy! What can have become of Aurelia? She was to have stopped for me."

"Don't you think it unwise to let her go on the stage?" Leilah, with an air of talking for talk's sake, inquired.

"Let her! But she's got her head. I can't prevent her. She'll never come to any harm though. She isn't the kind to want to do anything she thought was wrong. No indeed. She would never think anything wrong that she wanted to do. But tell me. I could not very well ask before the servants. What are you going to do?"

For a moment Leilah did not answer. Then, a bit resignedly, she folded her hands.

"I do not see that I have the ability to do anything."

The pause, the gesture, the reply, angered Violet. She bristled.

"Don't be so modest, you make me nervous!"

For a moment she also paused. Then, ruminantly, as though in self communion, the lady uttered these cryptic words:

"But perhaps——"

Leilah, who had turned away, turned to her. "Perhaps what?"

But Violet, compressing her lips, assumed the appearance which a very worldly, exquisitely gowned and beautiful Sphinx might present.

"Perhaps what?" Leilah, puzzled by the attitude, repeated.

"Oh, nothing. That is, nothing in particular. I was merely thinking from battle, murder and sudden death, Good Lord deliver us! And yet——"

"Well?"

Violet looked her over. "I know I ought not to tell and for that very reason I will. Your two husbands are to fight to-day. They may be at it now——"

Abruptly she made a face, dropped her voice and threw out:

"No such luck."

In the doorway Barouffski stood.

Leilah had not seen. Inwardly she had shrivelled. To the sudden knowledge that the two men were to fight, fear, as suddenly, superposed the conviction that Verplank would be killed. It stirred in her a wholly animal longing to get away from herself; to be rid, however transiently, of that sense of horror and helplessness which only the tortured know. In an effort to shut out the pain of it, she closed her eyes.

When she opened them, Barouffski was before her. Affably he was addressing her friend.

"Beautiful day, Lady Silverstairs. In London you do not often have such weather. I hope Lord Silverstairs is planning to keep you here a very long time."

"What? What?" Violet in a crescendo of surprise, exclaimed.

Affably, smilingly, unperturbably, Barouffski reiterated the expression of his hope.

Icily Violet cut him short. "With us it is the woman who makes and unmakes plans."

Barouffski, unabashed and smiling, plucked at his beard. "A most excellent custom. Yes. For when has reason governed the world? It is only by the heartstrings that men can be led and women alone can lead them."

But now Violet with the air of an empress had risen. "Leilah, my motor is at the door. Let me take you for a turn in the Bois."

"Do," Barouffski exclaimed, looking as he spoke at Leilah. "You are a trifle pale, cara mia. A turn or two now in the Bois——"

With a gesture he signified, that is what you need.

Turning to Violet he added: "So thoughtful of you, Lady Silverstairs."

In speaking he bowed for Violet now was vacating the garden and Leilah who had risen was following her.

Barouffski bowed again. "Cara mia, a pleasant drive to you."

But, when both women had entered the house, he sighed, sighed with relief, looked about him, consulted his watch, looked again about him, moved to the entrance, touched a bell which presently a footman answered.

Barouffski indicated the table and chairs. "Get all that out of here."

"Perfectly, monsieur le comte," the man, with marked deference, answered and started to do as bidden.

Barouffski checked him. "In five or ten minutes some gentlemen will come by the main entrance. Show them in the reception room. About the same time others will come by the gate. When they do, see that I am notified at once."

"Perfectly, monsieur le comte."

"Afterward, when they are gone, come back here and tidy up."

"Perfectly, monsieur le comte."

But now Barouffski had turned, he was entering the house. The man stuck his tongue out at him. "Canaille, va!" he muttered. Raising his arms, he added: "Tidy up, eh? Tidy up what? The remains of your conversation, no doubt. Bah! That won't be much." He laughed, took first the table, then the chairs, vanished with them and reappeared.

A bell at the gate had sounded, he hurried there and bowing, admitted Aurelia and that young person's young man.

The girl made straight for the kennels. "Parsnips!" she delightedly exclaimed. "Aren't those two big brutes simply dear?"

Swiftly Emmanuel intervened. "Pardon, they are very savage." Then, as the girl hesitated he added: "Will mademoiselle give herself the trouble to pass into the salon?"

Aurelia tossed her pretty head. "No, I like it here. Besides I hate suggestions. Tell Madame Barouffska that I have come on a most unimportant matter which will probably detain me a very long time."

"Yes," her companion rejoined as the footman retreated. "Yes, I often think that it is only unimportant matters that are really momentous." In his hand was a stick which negligently he twirled. "What is this one, if I may ask?"

"I have forgotten."

"Perhaps then it was really important."

Aurelia, who, with her delicious face and delicate garments, looked like a wayward angel, lifted a finger.

"So it was! So it was! I remember now I wanted to ask her how she likes matrimony."

"Cæsar!" the youth exclaimed. "You are not collecting data on the subject, are you?"

Meekly, with a treacherously innocent air, the girl surveyed him. "You wouldn't wish me to take leaps in the dark, would you?"

"Certainly I would. Certainly I do—since you are to take them with me."

With the same wicked look, Aurelia moistened her lips. "What a beautiful nature you have!"

Pleased at this, the little lord nodded.

"I'll tell you what matrimony is, two souls with but a single thought——"

"Yes," Aurelia interrupted. "Two souls with half a thought apiece." Rapturously she sighed. "There is real bliss!"

Buttercups snarled. "Oh come, now! If you turn everything into ridicule——"

Dreamily Aurelia continued. "I asked the duchess, and she said——"

"The old harridan!"

"You know her manner"—a manner which Aurelia instantly made her own. "My dear, matrimony is three months of adoration, three months of introspection, thirty years of toleration—with the children to begin it all over."

Buttercups frowned. "A rather voluminous definition."

"Rather luminous, I should call it."

Frowning still, Buttercups threw out.

"While you were at it, it's a pity you did not ask her what love is."

But the sarcasm, if sarcasm it were, convulsed Aurelia. "Parsnips!" she delightedly exclaimed. "You'll never believe it! She asked me!"

"Mistook you for an expert," Buttercups, glowering at the beautiful, laughing girl snapped back. "What did you say?"

Aurelia, her eyes sparkling, her little white teeth visible, her little pink tongue also, looked about her, turned, went to the bench, got up on it and there, solemnly now as though on a platform, coughed.

"I said, that while from studies and statistics I was inclined to believe that, theoretically, love is a fermentation of the molecules of the imagination, actually it is the affection of somebody else."

Blankly Buttercups stared. "I don't understand that."

Aurelia coughed again. "I added that from the same studies and statistics I was also inclined to believe that love is the tragedy of those who lack it, the boredom of those who don't."

"Eh?" Buttercups whined. "I don't understand that either."

"I further stated that love is a specific emotion, more or less exclusive in selection, more —or less—permanent in duration and due to a mental disturbance, in itself caused by a law of attraction which somebody or other said was the myth of happiness, invented by the devil for man's despair."

Helplessly Buttercups groaned. "I don't understand that at all."

With birdlike ease Aurelia hopped from the bench and with consoling delicacy nodded:

"Violet said she didn't either."

Buttercups brightened. "Now there's a woman of sense."

Very sweetly Aurelia nodded again. "Leilah Barouffska said she did understand, so I may suppose that she is stupid."

At the shot—which missed him—Buttercups tormented the tip of his nose.

"No doubt, she does seem to have made a mess of things. Why now did she leave her first husband?"

Aurelia looked down and away.

"It is not a thing I could mention."

Buttercups gave a little jump. "What?"

Perversely, her lovely eyes still lowered, Aurelia added:

"She caught him in the act."

Buttercups jumped again.

Aurelia blushed or rather appeared to do so. "With her own eyes she saw him eating fish with his knife."

But Buttercups had rallied. "Now, Aurelia," he protested, "I have heard too many lies about myself, too many confounded lies, to believe any such story."

Superciliously, her delicate nose in the air, Aurelia looked him over. "Ah, indeed! But then you see sensible people never object to the lies that are told about them. What we do object to is the truth. Now when we are married—if we ever are——"

"Aurelia," the poor devil pathetically interrupted, "you never say when we are married without adding if we ever are!"

"That's to teach you not to take things for granted. I have been engaged before—and may be again."

"B-before!" the flustered Buttercups stuttered. "A-again!"

Frostily this ingénue considered the youth. "Parsnips, don't look at me in that fashion, you inflame me."

She cocked an ear. "What's that?"

At the gate the bell was ringing and unperceived by either Emmanuel had reappeared. The footman was descending the garden. Midway he stopped.

"I have the honour to inform mademoiselle that madame la comtesse is momentarily awaited."

He bowed, moved on, opened the gate through which then a brief procession passed: —Silverstairs, a green bag under his arm; de

Fresnoy, a stick under his; an old man with a small valise; finally Verplank.

Verplank, raising his hat, approach Aurelia. De Fresnoy, after saluting the young woman, addressed the old man.

But Silverstairs, sidling up to Buttercups and indicating Aurelia, whispered:

"Get her away, there's to be a fight."

"The deuce there is!" Buttercups exclaimed.

For a moment he looked helplessly about and made a little futile gesture. "If I ask her to go she'll stay."

Silverstairs pulled at his moustache. "Then tell her to stay and she'll go."

But such strategy was needless. Aurelia had no intention of loitering among these men, not one of whom interested her remotely. With a glimpse of her pretty teeth to Verplank and a nod at the others, she passed, followed by Buttercups, through the gate which the footman held open.

Meanwhile the dogs were barking and, from the house beyond, Barouffski appeared. With him were friends of his, Palencia, Tyszkiewicz; also a young man with a serious face who, like the old man, had with him a case which gingerly he put on the ground.

Verplank glanced at them, went to the bench and began removing his coat.

The night before he had dreamed pleasurably, as the great beasts of the jungles dream, of blood and the joy of killing. He had dreamed also and less agreeably that Leilah's story was true. However he had denied it, he did not know but that it might be. Nonetheless he doubted. He doubted it for the most human of reasons, because he wanted to. He doubted it for another and a better reason, because his intuitions so prompted. He had yet another reason, one less valid perhaps but cogent, the dissimilarity between Leilah and himself. The contrast was so marked that they might have come of alien races, from different zones.

On leaving her house other differences had occurred to him, differences not physical but moral. It is ridiculous, he had told himself. Nonetheless he dreamed that the story was true.

Meanwhile the parliamentaries had not been entirely successful. The note dispatched from Voisins had resulted that evening in a conference between Verplank's seconds and Barouffski's. These latter, Tyszkiewicz and Palencia, had begun by insisting that it was their principal who was aggrieved, that Verplank, in attempting to address a lady whom he knew did not wish to speak to him, had been wholly at fault and was deprived in consequence of the choice of weapons.

To this de Fresnoy had objected that Verplank knew nothing of the kind, that in addressing or in attempting to address the lady, he had acted in accordance with the usages of the world: moreover assuming him to have been in error in thinking that the lady did not object to being addressed, her slightest indication to the contrary would have been supersufficient to make him desist, the result being that Barouffski's intervention reflected on his good-breeding and was therefore an insult.

This view of the matter Barouffski's seconds refused to accept. They represented that it were difficult for the lady to have more punctiliously informed Verplank of her disinclination to be addressed by him than she had already done in obtaining a divorce.

At the easy logic de Fresnoy laughed. According to him, all that was beside the issue. He declared that many divorced couples were better friends afterward than they had found it possible to be before. In support of the statement he cited history: he cited the case of Henri IV and the Reine Margot. He did more than cite, he quoted the chronicles of Pierre l'Estoile, and he insisted that if his view were not accepted the conference must dissolve and an arbiter be convened.

In face of these arguments advanced to provincials by a Parisian, advanced too with that tone of authority which only a man sure of his ground or of his assurance may maintain and advanced, moreover, to men not over sure of their own, the latter hesitated.

Then, as though to demonstrate the truth of the parodox of which de Fresnoy had delivered himself at Voisins, the quip that a man is rarely killed except by his seconds, Silverstairs who, thus far throughout the conference, had smoked in placid silence, suddenly stuck his oar in.

"Why not toss for it?"

Tyszkiewicz and Palencia, hesitating still, agreed. A coin was flipped, heads for Verplank, tails for Barouffski. Tails it was. Barouffski was accorded the choice of arms, foils were designated by his seconds and the meeting was arranged to be held in his garden, at two the next day.

Verplank would have preferred pistols. But, informed of the result, he dreamed pleasurably. The encounter was the main thing. Presently sleep sank him deeper. Life and death ceased to be. He became part of the inchoate and primordial. Then, from the voids in which he lay, lightly, delicately, imperceptibly, an artery reached and drew him. But his scattered selves, the objective, subjective, superjective, satisfied with their temporary decentralisation, resisted. In the subtle struggle a memory, catalogued Leilah, was aroused. The syllables of the name resounded remotely, like a damp drum beaten obscurely behind the shelves of thought. They conveyed no meaning and, before they could suggest any, they passed, drifted by the currents of unconsciousness. But at once, those currents, barred by assembling ideas broke to the murmur of the vocables—Leilah! Leilah! Other memories, incidents, possibilities eddied among them and the sleeper, awakening, found himself confronted by the tragic mystery which the name revived.

Immediately the picture that had formed itself before him at Voisins returned. From it the Why had gone but the obstacle remained, and, as he got from the bed, he promised himself to demolish it.

Now, in the hostile enclosure, as the dogs barked and Barouffski appeared, Verplank removed his coat, undid his collar, rolled up his sleeves.

Beside him, bending over a case, the old man mumbled. He was a surgeon. The hour was not to his liking. He believed in duels, they were a source of revenue to him, but he believed in fighting on an empty stomach and, in the afternoon, who had that?

He looked up at Verplank. "Monsieur, you are young, you are brave, I doubt not you are also adroit. But had I been you, when your seconds asked, as I may suppose they asked: 'Which shall it be, the pistol at twenty paces or the sword?' I would have said to them: 'Give me the sword at twenty paces.' Yes; that is what I would have said."

Verplank ignored him utterly. In the center of the garden the seconds grouped together, were concluding details. Beyond, near the house, Barouffski stood. He also was now bare-armed. Near him, emptying a case, was the young man with the serious face. Beside him, placed upright against a wall, were two long green bags. From the street came the usual rumble, the noise of motors, the cries of hawkers, the snorting of stallions, the clatter of hoofs.

Silverstairs, abandoning the others went over to Verplank.

"De Fresnoy has been chosen director."

Verplank, from his trowsers pocket, had taken a pair of gloves. The palm of one of them, previously moistened, had been dusted with rosin. Now, as he put it on, he looked across at Barouffski who was looking at him. The man's bare arms were hairy and the sight of them was repugnant to Verplank. At once all the jealousy, all the hate of the male, mounted like wine to his head. He coloured, his hand shook. Then, resolutely, he reacted. In a moment he had again control of himself and it was idly, with an air of indifference, as he finished with his glove, that, in reference to the dinner that evening, he said:

"Are you to have many people to-night?"

Silverstairs, delighted that Verplank, showing up in such form, should be so sure of the result, laughed. "No, it is to be small and early. Afterward we go on to a play. The missis has a box for something, the Gymnase I think."

Verplank bent over and turned up the ends of his trowsers. A moment before he had been considering methods of attack, in particular a direct riposte after a certain parade and it was springingly, as though delivering it, that he straightened.

But now de Fresnoy approached. Silverstairs moved to one side where he was joined by Tyszkiewicz, a thin, tall man with a prominent nose and an air vaguely pedagogic, and by Palencia who, with great black eyebrows that met and a full black beard, looked like Fra Diavolo disguised as a clubman.

From one of the long green bags de Fresnoy had taken a pair of foils. These he offered, hilt foremost, to Verplank who grasped one and then to gauge its temper, or his own, lashed the air with it. The movement revealed a suppleness of arm, a muscular ease, the swelling biceps which training alone provides.

Save Barouffski, no one noticed. For a moment his eyes shifted absently. It was as though he too had meditated a coup and now was meditating another. Meanwhile he also had received a foil.

"Messieurs!" de Fresnoy called. He spoke in a loud, clear voice. He had moved back and stood at an angle to Barouffski and Verplank. Opposite, at an equal angle were the seconds and surgeons. All now were so stationed that they formed a sort of cross.

"Messieurs, I do not need to remind you of the common loyalty to be observed. What I have to say is that the encounter will proceed in engagements of three minutes, followed each by three minutes of repose, until one of you is incapacitated."

De Fresnoy looked from Barouffski to Verplank. At once in his loud, clear voice he called:

"On guard!"

The two men fell into position. De Fresnoy moved forward, took in either hand the foils at the points, drew them together until they met, left them so and moved back.

"Allez, messieurs!"

At the word Allez, or, in English, go, and without waiting for the term Messieurs that followed, instantly Barouffski lunged. His foil pierced Verplank in the cheek and touched the upper jaw.

Verplank had a vision of a footman peering from a window, a taste of something hot and acrid in his mouth, a sense of pain, the sensation of vulperine fury.

De Fresnoy's face had grown red as his neckcloth. He branished his stick.

"Monsieur!" he cried at Barouffski. "Your conduct is odious. You shall answer to me for it."

Barouffski bowed. "For the expression which it has pleased you to employ, you shall answer to me."

"Permit me! Permit me!" Tyszkiewicz interjected. "To what do you object?"

Angrily de Fresnoy turned at him. "Your principal drew before the order. He——"

"Permit me! Permit me!" Tyszkiewicz interrupted. "The word Allez is an order. The moment it is uttered hostilities begin. The term Messieurs is but a polite accessory, a term which may or may not be employed."

Insolently de Fresnoy considered him. "I have no lessons to receive from you."

"Permit me! Permit me——"

But de Fresnoy had turned on his heel. Before him Verplank stood, Silverstairs on one side, the old surgeon on the other. The young surgeon had joined them. Beyond, Barouffski was examining the point of his foil.

From Verplank's mouth and face blood was running. The wound had not improved his appearance. The old surgeon, on tiptoes, was staunching it.

"What I like," he confided, speaking the while very unctuously as though what he was saying would be a comfort to Verplank; "what I like is to attend to gentlemen whose wives have deceived them. Outraged husbands, monsieur, that is my specialty!"

Verplank brushed him aside, shook his foil, and called at de Fresnoy.

"Are the three minutes up?"

"Monsieur!" the old surgeon protested.

The young surgeon intervened.

"But, monsieur——"

De Fresnoy motioned at them.

"Is he in a condition to continue?"

"Why not?" Verplank scornfully replied.

He raised his left hand, and, with a gesture of excuse, turned and spat. He looked up. His mouth was on fire, his jaw burned, the wound in his cheek was a flame. Yet these things but added to the intensity of his eyes. They blazed. There was blood on his face, on his chin, on his shirt, on his feet. He was hideous. But he was a man, and a mad one.

"He ought to be horsewhipped," muttered Silverstairs, glaring as he spoke at Barouffski, who was talking to his seconds.

"On guard, then!" called de Fresnoy.

"Permit me, permit me," cried Tyszkiewicz. "The point of my principal's sword is broken."

"Give him another then," de Fresnoy roughly threw out. Insolently he added: "And teach him how to use it." In a moment, when from the other bag, a foil had been got and measured, "On guard," he repeated.

Again he united the foils. Again he gave the command.

For a moment the weapons clashed.

Suddenly and excitedly Palencia cried: "My principal is touched."

"Halt," de Fresnoy, intervening with raised stick, commanded.

Verplank moved back. “Damn him,” he muttered, “I haven’t done with him yet.”

About Barouffski now, Palencia and the young man with the serious face had come. The latter was examining Barouffski’s right arm. On it a thin red line was visible. Very gravely the young man looked up.

“My client is disabled. Profound incision in the region of the flexor digitorum sublimis accompanied by a notable effusion of blood.”

The old surgeon chuckled. Confidentially as before he addressed Verplank. “I know that term. It means a scratch. Those ladies there, it must amuse even them.”

As he spoke he indicated a window at which Violet and Leilah had appeared, but from which now Leilah was retreating.

Verplank did not hear, did not see. The young surgeon, resuming, had announced himself as opposed to a continuation of the encounter. It was this that preoccupied Verplank.

Loudly and angrily he cried: “Let’s have pistols then. That man can use his left hand and I’ll do the same.

“Cristi! La jolie dame!” the old surgeon muttered to himself.

In the doorway Leilah had come. Hurriedly she moved to Verplank. As she did so Barouffski tried to prevent her.

"Cara mia, I must beg of you——"

He had got in her way but she eluded him, while the other men looked curiously at this woman who now agitatedly was addressing Verplank.

"Don't fight any more, don't!"

Roughly Verplank answered: "I haven't begun."

"Sir," cried Barouffski. "I can permit no conversation with this lady."

Verplank ignoring Barouffski as utterly as he had ignored the surgeon, looked at Leilah.

"That story of yours is——"

But whatever he may have intended to say, Barouffski interrupted. He was shouting at Verplank, calling, too, at Leilah whom he had got by the arm and whom he would have drawn away, but this Verplank prevented. Shifting his foil to his left hand, with his right he seized Barouffski and with a twist which separated him from Leilah, shoved him aside.

"To your shambles!" he called at him.

But already the others were intervening. Tyszkiewicz with his eternal "Permit me," got between the two men. Palencia held Barouffski by the shoulder. Silverstairs drew Verplank away, while de Fresnoy, viewing the situation as hopeless, declared the duel at an end.

The actions of all were practically so simultaneous that they were as one to Leilah who, bewildered by the confusion which she herself had caused, horrified by Verplank's appearance and tortured by the riddle of his interrupted words, now, over the heads of the others, again called to him:

"You say that the story is——"

"At five!" Verplank threw back.

Barouffski, bursting with rage and impotence, shouted:

"I say this conversation must cease."

The old surgeon, nudging his colleague, laughed:

"There is my specialty!"

Both surgeons then were occupied with their bags. De Fresnoy, overhearing the remark, could not but smile. To conceal it he turned to the gate where he was joined by Silverstairs and where at once, Palencia and Tyszkiewicz followed, leaving in the center of the garden Leilah and her two husbands, one of whom with a shrug which for an American was perhaps rather French, went to the bench where his coat lay.

In this instance again the actions of all so closely coincided that barely an instant intervened before Leilah was throwing after Verplank the two syllables he had thrown at her.

"At five!"

Later she was unconscious of having done so. But Barouffski heard and presently, when the others had gone and in this garden those two were alone, with angry suspicion he confronted her.

"Five! What is that? What does it mean?"

Leilah had turned to go. A bit unsteadily she moved on, reached the entrance, leaned there for support.

But Barouffski was at her heels.

"Five," he repeated. "He said it, you said it, what does it mean?"

"It means that God willing some day I may have peace."

She had half-turned. She turned again. In a moment she had gone.

Menacingly Barouffski's eyes followed her. "That's what five means, does it?"

Then he too turned. Nearby, on the marble chair, were his coat and waistcoat. Slowly, thoughtfully, he put them on. As he did so he noticed the dogs. It may have seemed to him then that they were his only friends. Longly he looked their way.

Suddenly, as though illumination had come, he touched a bell and looked up at Leilah's window.

After a brief delay, Emmanuel appeared.

"Shut the gate," Barouffski ordered.

"Perfectly, monsieur le comte," the footman very deferentially replied and started to do as bidden.

Barouffski checked him. Indicating the lower window, he added:

"At five or thereabouts be in there. I will tell you then what to do. You hear me?"

"Perfectly, monsieur le comte."

Again Barouffski glanced at the upper window. As he glanced he smiled.

"Cara mia, five may mean more things than you say, more even than you think."

He was still smiling but it was not a pleasant smile to see.

Beneath his breath, Emmanuel, who was looking at him, muttered:

"Quelle gueule de maquereau!"

"Gracious!" Violet exclaimed. She had been smoking and now in putting a cigarette in a cendrier she had succeeded in overturning it. Undismayed she looked at a clock. "Gracious!" she repeated. "Since that stupid duel, I have sat here an hour."

Leisurely the lady arose. She was a glowing object in this room which, filled with costly futilities and furnished in canary and black, otherwise was Empire and brilliant. The main entrance, hung with heavy portières of yellow damask had, opposite it, across the room, a tapestry panel which masked a spiral stairway that led below. To one side, at an elaborate table, which now the overturned cendrier had strewn with ashes, Leilah was seated. Behind her, through an open window, shone the eager sun. Before her, rising from a sofa was her friend.

Leilah wished that she would go, wished too that she would stay, wished rather—as at times we all wish of those who are near us—that she were different, less mondaine perhaps, more simple. To Violet, the spectacle in the garden had been tedious. To Leilah it was horrible. Moreover the atmosphere of blood and hate, the enigma of Verplank's words, the menaces of Barouffski's eyes, these things frightened her, inducing a dread which seemed to brood not in the mind but in the body. She could have put a hand to her girdle and have said: "It is here." In addition she felt—as in every spiritual crisis we all do—alone. Of this she could not tell Violet. She felt that she lacked the power to express it and that Violet lacked the ability to understand. Pain has accents which only its graduates know. Violet, in all her brilliant life, had never shed a poignant tear.

"What do you propose to do now?" the lady was asking.

Cheerlessly Leilah replied: "My duty."

Here was something which Violet did understand. Brightly she nodded.

"Yes, and I may tell you that it is your duty to preserve your looks and avoid a scandal. I did not at all like your fantasia in the garden. A gentlewoman never does anything important and that was an important thing. In no time it will be all over the place. You can believe that, can't you?"

"I don't know what to believe."

Violet laughed. "I always believe what I like. That I find so satisfactory. Apropos. What was that story about which Verplank was shouting? Mercy! I could have heard him a mile away."

In weary protest Leilah shook her head. "You know I can't tell you."

"The same old thing, was it? But how antiquated you are! Really it is piteous. There are no secrets any more. All that sort of thing went out with hoopskirts. Private life which used to be a sealed book has become an open newspaper. It is plain for instance, plain to everybody, plain as a pikestaff that you are still in love with Verplank. What you left him for the Lord in his infinite wisdom and mercy only knows. That is a secret certainly but only because you choose to make it one. It is no secret to me though that you are dying to go back to him. But don't you know you can't? Don't you know it? Don't you know that you can't budge an inch until you have shipped Barouffski? Now how are you going to do that? Tell me."

Leilah made a pass with a hand. It was as though, in some rite known but to her, she were consulting the lap of the invisible gods and, in it, the equally invisible future.

"Then I will tell you. You have got to buy him off. Listen to this. I will pack Silverstairs straight to the Embassy. There he will get all the law and most of the prophets. Meanwhile promise that you'll keep your head."

"I will try," Leilah, mechanically, her thoughts afar, replied.

"There!" Violet exclaimed. "That's right. When there is a divorce in the air it's so much better to try than to be tried."

At the inane jest she laughed, embraced her friend. In a moment she had gone, distributing as she went a faint, sweet smell of orris.

Leilah who had risen moved to the window and looked out at the gate through which Verplank would come. It was as she had said: She did not know what to believe and mutely for a moment she prayed for guidance.

"O, Lords of Karma, Watchers of the Seven Spheres, grant me so to live that, hereafter, I may say, I have harmed no heart, I have made no one weep. Out of your infinite bounty grant that somewhere, sometime, there may be peace to Gulian's soul and mine."

The prayer concluded she felt securer. Momentarily the cancer of anxiety had ceased to gnaw, the fascination of fear had departed. In the respite she turned to the clock. It was nearly five and she rang for one of her women.

"Parker," she began, when the servant appeared.

"Yes, my lady."

"Presently, in a few minutes, a gentleman will come by the gate. Be there and bring him here. Bring him through the dining room and up the back way. If possible, I prefer that no one should see him."

"Yes, my lady. Thank your ladyship."

At once, with that air which those acquire who attended to delicate matters, the woman drew aside the tapestry that masked the stair, which then discreetly, almost atiptoe, she descended.

As the tapestry fell again, instantly there returned to Leilah the sense of evil and impending ill. The brilliant room seemed full of terrors. In each bright corner a danger lurked. So strong was the impression that she felt it must be she was being warned, that she was being visited by those obscure phenomena which occultists call impacts from the astral, and that these were urging her to go, to meet Verplank without, in the garden, in the street, anywhere except in this fastidiousness.

Coerced by the impression, she entered an adjoining room, got there a fichu which she put on her head, a light wrap which she drew about her. Excited as she was, unaided as well, it took several minutes before she could find these accouterments. When, at last equipped, she re-entered the sitting room, she started.

Before her, his hat on, one side of his face medallioned with courtplaster, stood Verplank.

At sight of Leilah, he removed his hat which he tossed on the sofa and said at once and simply enough:

"That story of yours is false as Judas."

"Gulian!" At the moment it was all she found, but then fancy a blind man dazzled.

Verplank nodded. "Yes. The letters you received at Coronado—there were three of them, were there not? three written on gray paper each signed Effingham Verplank?—well, my father wrote them, that's true enough, but he wrote them to your aunt, your mother's sister, Hilda Hemingway. Did you never hear that the governor had an affair with her? Did you?"

Leilah's face spoke for her. From the bewilderment there, it was obvious that of it all she was ignorant.

With an uplift of the chin Verplank considered her.

"That's odd, girls generally only hear what they ought not to. However, Hemingway became suspicious—for very good reasons, no doubt, or, if you prefer, for very bad ones—the result being that his wife turned the letters over for safe keeping to your mother. When she died your father found them. He did not stop there, he showed them to my mother. My mother knew the facts, but she said your father was so convinced of your mother's infidelity that it seemed a pity to disabuse him. Those were her very words to me to-day."

"Gulian!" Still Leilah found but that. Visibly the light was there. As yet she could not credit it.

Again, but now appreciatively, Verplank nodded. "Yes. I know. It does seem queer. But then my mother is not the ordinary woman. She thought the governor so created to conquer that it no more occurred to her to sit in judgment on his victims than it occurred to her to sit on him. In the true spirit of Christian charity she overlooked it all."

Verplank paused, opened and closed a hand. "It was not matrimony perhaps, but it was magnificent," he obliging resumed, forgetting wholly that it was not in him to do likewise.

"Come," he added. From the start, Leilah's apparel, the fichu and wrap, had made him fancy that she was as ready to go as he was to take her and it all seemed very simple. "Come. Let's be off. I have a cab for you."

But at the suggestion which was a command she undid the lace, loosened the cloak.

"Gulian, I cannot."

"Cannot!" he angrily repeated. "Why can't you? Have you not heard what I said. You are not my sister, you are my wife. Come."

"Gulian! You do not know what you ask!"

"I know perfectly well. If you hesitate it is because you do not believe me. But would I urge you if that malignity were true? Would I?"

"Gulian, no, you would not."

"There! You see! You have to believe me."

"It is not that."

"It is the divorce then! But you are no more married to that dismal cad than I am to one of your maids. Except in Nevada the decree has no effect whatever. But without bothering to have it set aside, come with me and let this saurian get another."

"Gulian, yes, but for the moment surely you can see that this is impossible."

"Impossible! There is nothing impossible. Why do you say so? Why do you make so many objections? You should not make any.

You hear a cock-and-bull story, take it for gospel, run away, get a divorce, marry a damned scoundrel and, when you find the story is a brutal lie, stick like a leech to him."

"Gulian, if you but knew. My position is horrible——"

She wanted to tell him that she was in a prison replete with tortures, one from which she was as eager to go as he was to take her, yet one from which she could not escape through the open door of sinning.

He gave her no time. Instantly he interrupted her.

"I know your position, it is all of your own making, too. By God, you can make up your mind to one thing. You'll come, if I have to take you."

As he spoke he looked so brutal that she shrank.

"Gulian, you will kill me. I thought so before. I know it now."

"It is only what you deserve."

"Gulian! And you said you loved me!"

"Yes, but you make me doubt it."

The wrap which previously she had loosened she let fall on a chair beside her and put the fichu on the table.

"Gulian, you must give me time."

The words were simple, plaintively uttered, but her action with the cloak and lace, gave them an emphasis which added to his irritation.

"Nonsense," he retorted. "You have had time enough. Now you must act." Roughly he considered her. "Anyone else might think you cared for that——"

"Gulian, in all the world you know I love but you."

Verplank raised the cloak, reached for the fichu.

"Put these on, then, and come."

But Leilah, with a gesture that was less of resistance than of appeal, motioned them from her. The gesture infuriated him. He threw the cloak about her.

"By God! You shall put them on. What's more, you will come whether or not you want to."

As he spoke he seized her, lifted her.

To Leilah it seemed as though she were about to be carried off violently, like a prey. Unresistingly she raised her face to his.

"Gulian, kill me. It will be better; it will end it all."

Something, the words, the tone in which they were uttered, the helplessness of them and of her; but, more than anything else perhaps, the fact that as he held her he felt her tremble, stayed him. He put her down. His arms fell from her.

Catching again at the chair she steadied herself, and added:

"But if I am to live and love you, be patient. Gulian, if you would stop to think, to realise, you would be patient, you——"

He started from her. "You don't mean——"

At the question and its insinuation, hotly she flushed. Verplank saw but the flush. The day previous she had told him that she had taken Barouffski to serve as a barricade between them. Since then he had cajoled his imagination with the idea that the creature stood to her as husbands do on the stage, show entities who, the rôle performed, cease otherwise to be husbands. Now the idea seemed to him hideously naïf. The flush refuted it. It did more. It revealed not only other relations but the result of them. Instantly he divined that it was for this that she refused to go. At once within him waked the primitive, the aboriginal self that lurks always and, save in the high crises of the emotions, sleeps always within us all. He was in that condition in which men slay with bare hands and afterward consider them marvelingly, wondering at whose command they could have worked. Perspiration came to his forehead, started about his nose and mouth. With the fichu which he held he wiped them, but on the table from which he had taken it was a layer of dust and ashes, the refuse of the cendrier which Violet had overturned. It streaked his face, griming him with a mask comic and sinister.

With that mask, he called at her,

"Then may you be forever damned."

The malediction passed from him, reached her, shook her. She held to the chair for support. Then indignantly she protested.

"Gulian!"

He did not hear. An idea had come to him, one that had visited him in Melbourne, again in New York, to desist from further effort, to leave her where she was, behind the barriers she had raised. At the moment he believed he desired her no longer, loved her no more, had never loved her at all. Occupied with the idea he looked at this woman who had ruined her life, ruined his own.

She had been saying something, what he did not know nor, self-centered in his anger, did he care.

In his pocket was a revolver. He felt of it and infuriatedly cried:

"You ought to be shot."

"Gulian!"

"You are on a par with the beast you took up with."

"I took his name, Gulian, his name alone."

It was her turn to be angry. The flush had gone, she was pale again and she had abandoned the chair's support. She stood upright, confronting him with that purity which was hers.

"I have no more been his wife than I was yours."

"What!"

This time he heard. But her words, conflicting with his thoughts, rolled over together. In this mental confusion he stared.

"What!"

"It is as I tell you."

"You swear it?"

"Do I need to?"

Still he stared. Truth which acts on us and in us like a chemical precipitate was disclosing to him her whiteness and its own.

"Do I?" she repeated.

"No, by God, you don't. I believe you. I can't help myself. It is in your eyes."

He paused and awkwardly added:

"Forgive me."

Faintly and sadly she smiled.

"Will you?" he asked.

"Kiss me."

In the unique syllables of the words, which in a woman's mouth are so fluid, there was a forgiveness so entire and a love so great that in passionate contrition he drew her to him. Longly their lips met. She closed her eyes, opened them, disengaged herself, moved back a step and looked at him. For the first time she noticed the grime on his face. It did not astonish. It seemed natural after what they had both been through and it occurred to her that her own appearance might be equally bizarre.

Briefly then, in this lull in the storm, she told him what Violet had suggested—the buying and divorce of Barouffski.

"That will take time," he objected. "The shortest way 'round is the quickest way out. If you had not interfered in the garden——"

A gesture completed the sentence.

"No matter," he grimly added. "I haven't done with him yet."

In speaking he had crossed the room, now he recrossed it.

Imploringly Leilah approached him.

"Gulian, not that, not that! Don't fight with him again. Don't, I beseech you. It is not alone that anything of the kind is so horrible but he is one of the trickiest swordsmen here.

Think what that means! Think what would become of me if—if——"

From the pocket of his coat Verplank had taken the revolver. He looked at it, looked at her, replaced it.

"I am a trifle interested in the matter myself. Besides, there are other weapons than the foil. If I can shoot pigeons—and I believe I can—I ought to be able to land a buzzard."

At sight of the revolver Leilah had winced. Now she cried:

"Give it to me!"

Verplank, amused at her simplicity, smiled.

"That isn't a dueling pistol."

"But you never carried one before."

"In the States I did not need to. Here, in Paris, particularly at night, the streets are seldom sure. I have this thing for protection."

"Promise me then——"

Verplank looked her over.

"Don't be a fool."

But as he looked, suddenly she started and he saw that she was trembling.

"What the deuce is the matter?"

Trembling still, peeringly now she had turned to the portières.

"What is it?" he repeated.

"I am so frightened."

"Frightened? What at?"

Uncertainly, her head drawn back as a deer's is when surprised, she glanced about her. Slowly then her eyes returned to his.

"I am so frightened!"

"Yes, but at what?"

She motioned at the room. "Before you came there seemed to be something here, something around me and just now——"

"Well?"

"I heard something."

"Your maid probably."

With an intake of the breath she raised a finger and for a moment both were silent.

"There is no one," he presently told her. "And what if there were!"

At the idea, he laughed.

The laugh, succeeding the silence, while intended to reassure her, did not wholly succeed. She turned to him anew and in a low voice, said:

"You must go. To-morrow come to Violet's."

"I dine there to-night."

"Yes, I know. Tell her that to-morrow, say at three, we will both be with her. Then she can tell us——"

But Verplank had drawn her to him. Again her eyes closed.

"Go," she said at last.

On the sofa was his hat. He reached for it. While he did so, she moved to the tapestry, raised it, disclosing the stair up which he had come.

"To-morrow, then," he said, as he entered there.

She nodded at him. "At three!"

Dropping the tapestry she turned, but very quickly, for again she heard or thought she heard a noise.

Across the room the portières were parting. Through them Barouffski appeared.

"I might have known it," she told herself, and realising that he had been listening, she realised also that the opportunity was as good as another for making an offer which she had in mind.

These ideas, instantaneous at sight of him, were for the moment stayed. On turning she had seen but the man. Now hastening toward her was a creature with an expression so venomous that instinctively, in search of help, with the idea of calling to Verplank, she turned to the tapestry again.

Quicker than she, he caught and tossed her spinning on the sofa. Then, running to the open window, he shouted from it:

"Emmanuel! The dogs!"

Leilah, falling backward on the lounge, was too stunned to hear. But she steadied herself, recovered, got to her feet and making again for the stair, called at Barouffski:

"Free me from you and you shall have half of what I have."

"Half!" he repeated. At once he was upon her. "All," he cried. "I want it all, all of yours and all of his."

As he spoke he struck her, shoved her aside, raised the tapestry and vanished. For a second she heard him hastening down, while at once from without came the barking of dogs, the jar of oaths, the sound of cries.

What it meant she did not know. Her head was whirling. The fall, the blow, the indignity of both clouded and confused her. From without the uproar mounted and suddenly, the uproar prompting, into the turmoil that was her mind, a gleam of understanding shot. At the apperception of it she shrieked, ran to the window where she shrieked again. The loosened dogs had sprung at Verplank, who, overwhelmed' had fallen.

Again she shrieked. Answering the shriek, mingling with it, were snarls, the gnashing of fangs, the din of great hounds ferociously struggling for blood, tearing vehemently at flesh, at a flesh, though, that rebelled.

Verplank rose up between them. With a kick he sent one of them sprawling. But, in the recoil, torn at by the other hound, he stumbled. The dog was at his throat. In protection he held his left arm against it. With his right hand he got at the revolver in his pocket, and, through the pocket, fired twice into the brute. Gnashing still, it rolled away.

But now, from the other side, the second hound was on him. He saw its eyes, felt its breath, felt its fangs. Again he fired. As he did so, his hand relaxed. He heard a woman shrieking, the sound of hurrying feet. The wall before him mounted. His senses scattered into night.

Suddenly the garden was filled with people. Through the gate, two sergents de ville had come. These, forms furtive and uncertain followed. From the house, led by Barouffski, the footmen ran. Above, from the window, still there issued a woman's shrieks.

Barouffski stopped, and turned. He looked up at the window. He smiled. With one hand he tapped his breast, with the other he pointed at Verplank. Then, in French, reassuringly, he called:

"My dear! See! You may be tranquil. I, I am unharmed. It is the robber."

At the ignominy of that flouting jeer, Leilah, impelled by the impulse to do something, though it were but to beat her head against a wall, rushed from the window, and, strangling with spasms, fled out of the room and down the stair, where horror so suffocatingly enveloped her that in it her brain tipped, and she fell.

XI

In the golden half light of the Opéra, a chorus, soprano voices on one side of the stage alternating with contralto on the other, vaporised the subtle sensuality of the scene.

Violet Silverstairs, turning to her husband, who was seated behind her, remarked:

"How much better the Italian school is than the French."

Silverstairs, ignorant of either, and indifferent to both, promenaded his glass about the house.

"I wonder why Tempest doesn't show up? There is Marie de Fresnoy! I saw de Fresnoy to-day for the first time since his duel with Barouffski. What a ridiculous affair that was! I suppose one of these days he will have another with d'Arcy."

Violet turned to him again.

"Because of Marie? How absurd you are! D'Arcy doesn't interest her. No man could unless he drove at her with a four-in-hand, and d'Arcy has nothing."

Silverstairs, still promenading his glass, exclaimed:

"There he is now!"

"Who? D'Arcy?"

"Yes, with the Helley-Quetgens, in that box between the columns. Isn't that your friend Leilah whom he is talking to? By Jove, it is, and Barouffski is there, also."

Violet, who had also been promenading her glass, put it down.

"Well, he ought to be. I do think she has acted scandalously. What is said at the club?"

"About Verplank? It is forgotten already. Barouffski, you know, claimed that it was a mistake, and as it appears that Verplank agreed with him, as from neither the one nor the other any charge was forthcoming, the police could do nothing but get Verplank back to the Ritz."

Impatiently Violet unfurled her fan.

"Yes, where she has been every day; every day, that is, when she has not been with d'Arcy."

The statement was inexact. Leilah had indeed been at the Ritz but d'Arcy she had seen but once, momentarily, by accident—if there be such a thing, in any event through one of those seeming hazards which, however fortuitous at first, afterward appear to have been designed. It was a little, though, before Leilah took that view of things. Meanwhile, when, on recovering from her swoon, she learned that Verplank had also recovered she realised with thanksgiving that Destiny which has its tyrannies has its mercies as well. So soon then as she could get from the bed into which the horrors of the midspring nightmare had thrown her, she went to the Ritz where she found Verplank amply attended, abundantly bandaged, severely but not dangerously hurt.

"One of the brutes nearly chewed my arm off," he told her. "If the other omitted to eat me entirely, it was not because he did not try. I did for them, though," he added, and smiled as he said it. After the manner of man, he took comfort in the feat.

"But not for the worst brute," Leilah answered wishing in spite of herself, wishing instinctively and even ungrammatically that some good fate might.

From beneath a bandage, Verplank laughed:

"Bah! I'll do for him, too."

But Leilah did not hear. She was speaking to the surgeon, whom—with a bravery which in itself was a little defiant, and which in any event might have been more discreet—thereafter, daily and openly, she supplied with that which every surgeon wants, a nurse obedient, attentive, skilful, alert, and who, in addition ministers for love.

Presently, Verplank was able to be up. The surgeon said that in a day he would be able to be out. Verplank, who knew as much without being told, asked Leilah to go with him on the morrow.

Leilah refused. Verplank, for an invalid, became then surprisingly demoniac. The demonism of him affected her less than a conception, feminine perhaps but erroneous, of her own selfishness. If she went, she knew beforehand that irremissibly she would be dishonoured. But she knew also that any sense of dishonour must, if it is to ashame, come not from without but from within. If she went, her conscience, she thought, would acquit her. She thought that she would not feel dishonoured, though she knew that she would be disgraced. To refuse on that account seemed to her selfish. As a result finally she consented. Yet in consenting she made one stipulation. Characteristic in itself, it was that there must be nothing clandestine, that he must come for her in the rue de la Pompe, and that from there, her boxes put on whatever vehicle he brought, they would leave for darkness by daylight.

The plan pleased Verplank. He agreed at once. He told her that he would come the next day.

When he had, she added: "To-night I go to the Opéra; the Helley-Quetgens have asked me. It is my last look at this world."

Then, shortly, the arrangements for the evasion completed, she left the hotel.

Without, her motor waited. She told the groom to have it follow her. The air tempted, though the sky was dirty. She thought of the California glare, the eager glitter of New York. She wondered would they go back there. Perhaps, she told herself, we shall at last see Bora-Bora.

Her walk took her through the arcades of the rue de Rivoli to the fountains of the Place de la Concorde. From there she was about to enter the Champs Elysées when she became conscious of being accosted.

"Chère madame," some one was saying, "I precipitate myself to renew the expression of my homage."

D'Arcy, hat in hand, was before her. At once, with a view to what the French agreeably describe as the placing of landmarks—pour poser des jalons—he asked to be permitted to accompany her.

Leilah smiled.

"Not for the world!"

She motioned at the motor. Then, with that graciousness which is natural to the mondaine, with perhaps the desire also to attenuate whatever there were of brusqueness in her reply, she added, as she got in the car:

"I shall be at the Opéra with the Helley-Quetgens to-night. Could you not look in?"

D'Arcy, habituated to the abruptest victories, accustomed to inflame, with but a glance, by the mere exhibition of his Olympian good looks, and, therefore, indifferent when not bored by the celerity of his successes, but piqued by the tranquil air with which this woman had always regarded him, thanked her, assured her that he would not fail to be there, and replaced his hat.

Immediately he raised it again, straight from the head, high in the air. Looking with brilliant eyes from a brilliant brougham, Violet Silverstairs was dashing by.

Coincidentally, unobserved but observant, Barouffski was also passing that way.

Leilah's motor flew off and she sank back, wondering at herself, wondering rather what influence, malign and unhallowed, could possibly have prompted her to ask this man, whom she disliked as—in spite of a theory to the contrary—honest women do dislike a man of his type. But though, at the time, she could not understand what impelled her, later it seemed to her that it must have been fate.

Barouffski had a different interpretation. At the Joyeuses he had seen Leilah and d'Arcy together. Now, here they were again. The circumstance, of which the fortuitousness was unknown to him, irritated him for that very cause. But he could imagine and did. At once it was clear to him that the brute was after the blue eyes of her bankbook. The deduction, however erroneous, was easy. He was viewing the matter, not, as he fancied, from d'Arcy's standpoint, but from his own. In spite of which, or rather precisely on that account, he told himself that d'Arcy was a damned scoundrel. The humour of this quite escaped him. But that perhaps was in the order of things.

Since the night at the Joyeuses, he had been measuring himself solely against Verplank. Twice he had failed with him, but he knew that soon they would be at each other again and for the next bout he had in view a coup which, he felt, would do for him definitely. Meanwhile, if in regard to Leilah he had been led into certain vivacities, he felt that with time, which is the great emollient, her memory of these vivacities would pass. Even otherwise, the law was with him. He proposed to see to it that she was also—she and with her her purse. The one menace to both had been Verplank. Here, now, apparently, was another. Here was d'Arcy with his pseudo-Pheidian air, that famous yet false appearance of a young and dissolute Olympian which made imbeciles turn and stare. Ragingly Barouffski reflected that canaille though d'Arcy were, he carried a great many guns, almost as many as Verplank, who, worse luck, had, in addition, the signal advantage of being Leilah's first love—that love to which it is said one always returns.

But even as he sounded the stupidity of that aphorism, vaguely, for a dim second, he intercepted a gleam refracted from truth. The danger with which he had to contend, Verplank did not personify or d'Arcy either, it was himself. When the golden six was tossed him, had he but then known how to secure the box, there would now be no danger at all. But truth, when it does not console, confounds. Barouffski put it from him. It was too exasperating. "Bah!" he told himself, "if her attitude does not change, a sojourn in the solitudes of Lithuania may alter it." Angrily he nodded. Things more surprising have occurred there.

On this day it was Leilah who surprised him.

Since he had called to her from the garden, she had encountered him only in the hazards of entrances and halls. On such occasions she had passed with an air of being unaware that there were anything save chairs and tables about.

In part, it was this attitude which he thought certain solitudes might change. Oddly enough, Leilah herself wished it altered. But to want to do one thing and to do something else, happens to all of us, even to the best. She despised Barouffski and yet in despising him knew that the one contemptible thing is contempt. For what he had done, she felt that no punishment could be too severe, yet in so feeling she knew that he was only the embodiment of past misdeeds of her own. Physically he had struck her. Spiritually, it was her own hand that had dealt the blow. He had loosed the dogs on Verplank and she had judged and condemned him for it, though she knew that not only she should not judge at all, but that never perhaps do useless events occur. Clearly these events were evil, but were not those which she planned evil too?

In this dilemma there was some slight consolation for her in the knowledge that it was not her fault, at least not her present fault, that she had been born with a nature so problematic. But the Vidyâ, in teaching her that whatever we suffer is derived from our past; that the people who wrong us—or seem to—are mere puppets come to claim karmic debts which we owe; the Vidyâ, in teaching her that taught her also that every life we lead here is but a day in school. Her schooling, she felt, had as yet been insufficient. No doubt she would know better when she came here again.

The thin gilt hope of that fortified her a little on this day when, to Barouffski's surprise, she sent for him and then, her head raised, said distantly:

"The Helley-Quetgens have asked us to the Opéra. I am going. You are free to do as you like."

Here, obviously, was something new. At it and at her Barouffski looked with shifting eyes. Uncertainly he rubbed his hands.

"But how then! I am at your orders It is a festival to be where you are."

But as he did nothing without an object, he wondered what hers was. Obviously, there was a reason. Yet, what? Could it be an olive branch? He was too adroit to ask. Even otherwise, he lacked the opportunity. Leilah had gone from the room.

It was in these circumstances that, on this night, she appeared at the Opéra where Violet was complaining at having seen her with d'Arcy.

At the complaint, Silverstairs pulled at his moustache.

"I did not know that she had taken up with him."

"I don't know that she has either. But she was with him to-day in the Champs Elysées."

"Oh, come now! Things haven't got to such a pass that a woman can't be seen with a man——"

"No, but no honest woman can be seen alone with d'Arcy. Leilah ought to know better. She ought to know better too than to go to the Ritz. As she does not appear to, I propose to tell her."

"Do as you like," replied Silverstairs who would have said the same thing no matter what his wife had suggested. The lady had not entirely Americanised this Englishman but she had at least made him realise the futility of argument.

"Do as you like," he repeated. "There are the Orlonnas. There are the Zubaroffs."

At once to the quick click of an ouvreuse's key, the door opened and Tempest appeared, a foulard showing above his coat.

While he removed these things Violet called at him:

"You're late."

Silverstairs laughed. "He always is. At Christ Church he was known as the late Lord Howard."

Tempest moved forward and sat down between them.

But now, to the volatile sweetmeats of the score, the curtain was falling. In the stalls there was a movement. Men stood up, put their hats on, turned their back to the stage or set forth for a chat with the vestals in the green room.

Silverstairs also stood up.

Violet turned to him:

"I do wish you would look in on the Helley-Quetgens, and ask Leilah to come to luncheon to-morrow. Say I have a bone to pick with her. That may fetch her, if nothing else will."

Tempest ran a hand through his vivid hair.

"A bone over what, if I may ask? You may not know it, but I greatly admire Madame Barouffska."

Violet smiled.

"She's a dear. But I saw her to-day with d'Arcy, and I propose to scold her for it."

Tempest showed his teeth.

"D'Arcy is not a man's man, though he certainly is a woman's. Yet, when you come to that, not such a woman as Madame Barouffska. What an odd thing that was about her first husband!"

"You mean about the dogs?"

"Yes. I never got the rights of it. What was he doing there? Is she living in the past?"

Violet raised her opera-glass.

"She would be very lucky if she could be; living in the present is so expensive, don't you think?"

Again there was a quick click. The door opened. Silverstairs, filling the entrance with his tall stature, reappeared.

"Violet," he began, "the Helley-Quetgens are going on to some dance in the Faubourg, and Leilah wants the three of us to sup with her at Paillard's. What do you say?"

Violet laughed. "I say it will be just my chance." She turned to Tempest. "You will come?"

"Thanks, yes. Isn't that de Fresnoy with the Zubaroffs?"

Silverstairs, without sitting down, raised his glass.

"Yes, and I was just saying, this is the first time since his duel that I have seen him. But what an asinine affair that was! He lunged at Barouffski's neck, Barouffski knocked the foil up and pricked himself on the chin with it. Then Barouffski's surgeon stopped the fight on the ground that it might interfere with his breathing. Fancy that! Afterward, in the account given to the press, the surgeon described the prick as an incisive wound in the hyoïdian region, accompanied by a notable flow of blood. Anyone who did not know would have thought that Barouffski had been nearly done for. But that's a French duel for you—a funeral at which everybody giggles."

Tempest looked gravely up at his friend. "What did you have for dinner?"

Suspiciously, Silverstairs considered him.

"Why do you ask?"

"You are so expansive and brilliant."

On the stage, the drama continued, poignantly, beatifically, in a unison of violins and voices that was interrupted at last by the usual stir in the stalls and boxes, by the haste to be going, to be elsewhere, and a defile began; a procession of silken robes, gorgeous cloaks, jeweled headgear, black coats, white ties; a procession that presently filled the subscribers' rotunda, from which, at sight of it, grooms fled, then hurried back, touching their hats, eager and zealous.

Between the columns groups loitered, regarding each other with indulgence, with indifference, at times with a loftiness that put isolating zones about them; and women assumed that attitude which women alone can assume, that attitude of being not only apart from the crowd, but of being unaware of the crowd's existence.

In the centre, Mme. Orlonna, an Italian princess, with a slight moustache and an ancestry that extended to the super-Neronian days of Heliogabalus, stood, laughing and talking, lisping Bonthoirs to everybody.

Another princess, a Russian, Mme. Zubaroff, with a young girl at her side, and an escort of blond giants, passed, inclining her head to the left, to the right, bowing with a grace mechanical, but sovereign.

Beyond, Leilah appeared, d'Arcy on one side, Barouffski on the other. Her face, ordinarily pale, was flushed, and her manner, usually subdued, was animated. She was laughing, not loudly, but noticeably.

Violet, accompanied by Tempest and Silverstairs, approached. As the men, after saluting the women, greeted each other, Violet tapped Leilah with her fan.

"My dear, I have a bone to pick with you."

Leilah, with a levity that was rare with her, interrupted:

"It is just for that we are going to supper. How will you have it, grilled or deviled?"

"Her ladyship's carriage is at the door," a groom announced, in English.

Another added, in French: "The motor of madame la comtesse is advanced."

"Yes," Violet retorted. "But my bone belongs to a different kettle of fish. Now, you come with me." With a smile, she turned to the others. "We will go in the brougham, and you take the motor."

Stooping, she lifted her train, and the two women, accompanied by the men, followed the groom to the carriage.

There, after seeing them in, Barouffski called:

"To Paillard's, Chaussée d'Antin."

XII

At the glass door, which a chausseur opened, Barouffski stopped, spoke to the man, gave him an order. As the others, conducted by a maître d'hôtel, approached a table, a fat woman in a pulpit charged them, before they were seated, with the use of the silver and the cloth.

Beyond, a band of Bohemians, costumed in crimson, were loosing, with nervous and dirty fingers, whirlwinds of notes. The atmosphere, filled with vibrations, fevered by the fury of the violins, dripped with the scent of flowers, with the bouquet of burgundies, the smell of champagne, the odour of tobacco and food.

At adjacent tables were demi-reps and foreigners, mondaines and clubmen, a sprinkle of the cream of the venal, the exotic and the ultra-chic, whom omnibuses and waiters, marshaled by maîtres d'hôtel, served with the same deference and zeal.

For the Barouffski party, these latter had turned two tables into one, at which Violet Silverstairs occupied one end, Leilah the other. Violet had Barouffski at her right, Tempest at her left, while Leilah had Silverstairs at her left and d'Arcy at her right, a disposition natural enough and otherwise fortuitous which placed Tempest next to d'Arcy, with Barouffski and Silverstairs opposite.

In the rising storm of the music, Leilah turned to d'Arcy. What she was saying the others could not hear and all, save Silverstairs, who was munching a hors d'œuvre, addressed themselves to Violet.

Presently, in a lull of the gale, Tempest would have tried to talk to this woman who, in abandoning her Madonna air had now the merit of suggesting both the Chimera and the Sphinx, but something in her attitude to d'Arcy prevented. It was not, to employ a vulgarism, that she was making eyes at the man, but she was obviously permitting him to make eyes at her.

D'Arcy was seated, his arms on the table, talking in her face. His plate was empty. A chaudfroid had been served. He had refused it. A mousse had followed. He had refused that also. Over the glasses at his side he had put a hand, It seemed a pose of his not to eat or to drink that he might do nothing but talk.

Leilah herself had not eaten. But as soon as champagne was served she had drunk of it, she had drunk since and in her manner, in the way she held herself, in the inflection of her voice, there had entered a trace of the excessive which the mondaine avoids. It was this that had deterred Tempest. Moreover she had been laughing and that surprised Violet who, except a little earlier in the rotunda, never, since Leilah reached Paris, had seen her laugh before.

Now, her head drawn back, her eyes half closed, she was gratifying d'Arcy with that look with which a woman can appear not to listen merely but to drink the words, the appearance even, of the man by whom she is addressed. While perhaps flattering to him, it was too marked for good taste. The others noticed it, but, as is usual in such circumstances, they acted as though they had not.

Barouffski conscious of the impression produced, conscious also of the impressions of the afternoon, leaned forward and said in French:

"But, my dear! You eat nothing!"

Silverstairs, tugging at his moustache, laughed inanely and addressing himself to both Leilah and d'Arcy, threw in:

"If this is a private conversation——"

"What nonsense!" Leilah threw back.

"I was about to say," Silverstairs resumed, "that if it is a private conversation, I'd like to hear it. If it is not, never mind."

"I pray you take a bit of the chaudfroid."

With a movement of impatience, yet otherwise ignoring him completely, Leilah turned again to d'Arcy.

Barouffski was not in a mood to be ignored. The sight of d'Arcy in the afternoon, the man's unawaited advent at the Opéra, his demeanour to Leilah, her attitude to him, the hazards which both seemed to suggest; yet chiefly the precariousness of his own position, the constant effort to appear other than what he was, the consciousness of danger ever present, the obligation to cover irritation with calm, anxiety with banter, these things and the tension of them, fevered and enraged. At the moment he felt like a fiend and looked it. A moment only. Reacting at once, he compressed his lips, parted them and summoning his ambiguous smile, called out:

"If the chaudfroid says nothing to you, will you not try the mousse?"

Leilah was raising a glass to her lips. She looked over it at him and, much as though he were a servant, said:

"Do me the favour to attend to your own affairs."

Barouffski's smile evaporated. A man with no sense of honour and some sense of humour may go far, provided that he keep his temper. Barouffski knew it but forgot it. With a tone of authority which in the rue de la Pompe he would have ordinarily avoided, angrily he replied:

"Then do me the favour not to drink any more."

Leilah, the glass at her lips, paused, looked over it again, and very gently, almost sweetly, with the pretty air of a spoiled child, nodded at him.

"Only one sip."

She touched the glass with her lips, for a moment held it there, then, offering it to d'Arcy, rather languorously she said:

"Beau sire, will you drink the rest?"

Instantly Violet intervened. "Leilah! Behave yourself!"

"But with delight," d'Arcy was saying.

From Leilah's extended hand he took the glass, raised it, drained it, put it down, looked at her.

Barouffski was looking at him. Quietly, without emphasis, he asked:

"Will you drink mine, too?"

Half rising as he spoke, he had taken his own glass in his hand and with a gesture which, even as he made it, he regretted, a gesture incited by vibrations which he was unable to resist, he flung the contents at him.

"Barouffski!" Violet indignantly exclaimed.

She glanced about her. At her elbow an omnibus, a lad undersized but stout, stood gaping. Beyond, the Bohemians were storming. At the adjacent table were demi-reps and South Americans. They had not noticed. At this table, Tempest, his teeth visible, was contemplating his host. Silverstairs, tugging at his moustache, was considering Leilah. The latter was looking—and with what a look!—at Barouffski. But no one spoke. A spell seemed to have settled on all. With the idea of doing or of saying something that would break it, Violet turned to d'Arcy.

Delicately, with a coroneted handkerchief, he had wiped his face and was then mopping at his shirt.

Interrupting the operation, he looked up and laughed. "Oh, la, la! The dangers that may be avoided in remaining at home! These are the accidents of restaurant life!"

He laughed again. The laugh humanised and deformed the Pheidian beauty of his face. He bowed to Leilah, bowed to Violet and collectively added:

"Mesdames, I have ceased to be presentable. A thousand pardons. You will permit me?"

In a moment, after another bow, circular this time, a bow which while managing to omit Barouffski, included the rest of the table, he had gone.

"He looks like Keats," said Silverstairs animated by an unconscious desire to second his wife and break the spell which still persisted. Ordinarily he would have taken her and gone. The assault had been as much of an affront to her as it had been to d'Arcy. But to have left the table would have been a reproof to Leilah, whom, in the ridiculous way in which society is organized, he was unable to disassociate from Barouffski.

"Keats!" Tempest, coming to his aid, exclaimed. "I'll lay a guinea you would not know his picture if you saw it."

Amiably Silverstairs tugged at his moustache. "Well, perhaps not. What I meant was that he looks like a poet."

"I don't agree with you," Tempest retorted. "To begin with, there are not any. Besides, latterly there have been but two—Hugo, who looked like a green-grocer, and Swinburne who looked like a bookseller's assistant. Moreover I hate poets, though, as someone said somewhere, an inability to write in verse can hardly be regarded as constituting a special talent. No, d'Arcy does not look like a poet, he looks like a poet's creation."

"Excuse me," Silverstairs with affected meekness threw out. "And thanks for the lecture."

Tempest nodded. "You're entirely welcome."

He turned to Violet. She was looking at Leilah who was looking at Barouffski. The latter was looking at the fingers of his right hand against which his thumb passed and repassed mechanically. But now, aroused from his reflections by the entire cessation of talk, he glanced about him, summoned a waiter, settled the score. The Bohemians who momentarily had been silent, abruptly striped the air with spangles from their bows.

Violet and Leilah stood up, resumed their wraps, passed on. The men, buttoning their coats, putting their gloves on, followed.

At the door were the eager grooms. As one of them touched his hat to Leilah, Violet turned to her.

"My dear, I cannot thank you for a very pleasant evening. But I will look in on you to-morrow. That bone isn't picked and what's more, now I've got sauce for it."

With Silverstairs and Tempest at her heels, she went to her brougham. Leilah entered the motor.

At the door of the latter Barouffski stood. He raised his hat. Leilah looked at him. She had had, she thought, her last glimpse of the world and this was her last glimpse of him. The sight was so repugnant that she almost sickened and the nausea which she felt, her face expressed.

Barouffski tried to smile but the unconcealed candour of her abhorrence made his lips twitch. Now, though, the motor was starting. As it whirred away, he drew his coat closely about him, turned up the collar and stuck his hands deep in the pockets. There had come to him that odd sensation which homely fancy attributes to someone walking on your grave.

XIII

The next day, Violet, entering the brilliant room, gazed first about it and then at Leilah.

"Aurelia is not here? That's odd. She is simply horrid but so reliable. You don't mind my having told her to meet me?"

Leilah sighed. "I am getting so that soon I shan't mind anything."

Violet, seating herself, nodded vivaciously.

"I call that very fine. But there is something finer. Never mind anybody. Silverstairs now——" and as the lady spoke she summoned a smile feline and Cheshire—"he fancied I would be a good, obedient little wife. Instead of which he is a good, obedient big husband." In entire self-appreciation she exhibited the tip of her tongue and moistened her lips with it. "It takes us, doesn't it? But forgive me, dear, us is perhaps an exaggeration. I am afraid you have made rather a mess of things. Now what are you going to do?"

Without replying, Leilah looked away. During the night she had barely slept. The incident in the restaurant, events that had preceded it, anterior complications, subsequent developments, these things, like the Bohemians at Paillard's, had stormed at her, attacked her fibres, wrenched her nerves, striating the darkness of her room with variations on the tragedy of her life.

In what manner the affair in the restaurant had terminated, she had no one to inform her but she could readily fancy that shortly d'Arcy and Barouffski would go somewhere and fight, or pretend to, and then return, none the worse and none the better, but with honour satisfied and their names in print.

The entire episode was shameful. But though provoked by her she had not premeditated it. In offering d'Arcy her glass, she had wished solely to display her independence. Subsequently, in going over the matter, she had realised that the wish, while human, had not been nice. Then, a bit conscience-stricken, she had wondered how she could have behaved as she had.

"I did it without thinking," was her immediate excuse. But that, she told herself was untrue. Ever since the duel and the blow and the nightmare that followed, some such wish had been fermenting in her. The wish, reasonable in itself, though in her case unreasoned, persisted, as in certain natures a wish will persist, until, after the fashion of a constantly recurring idea, the individual becomes so saturated with it that, given the impulse, given less than that, given a vibration, some effect, perhaps wholly atmospheric, and suddenly the idea has solidified into an act, an act noble, degrading or merely banal, according to the influence that produced it, but an act which, whatever its character, has then become inevitable, even involuntary, its constant mental recurrence having exhausted the ability to choose between it and another.

Leilah had thought of this and, in search of comfort, had groped for another excuse. As an Oriental will say: "My body is tired." "My body is hungry," so Leilah decided: "It was my nerves that did it."

But the sophistry displeased her. She knew that she had judged and condemned Barouffski and she knew also that she had no right to do either. The man was clearly a cad, a scoundrel and a brute, yet even though he were these things and worse and more besides, he so became in her eyes merely because her consciousness had evolved to a point higher than his own. Seen from a different angle, she might appear only a shade less reprehensible, and it might be, even equally vile. Moreover, according to the Upanishads, this consciousness of hers and that consciousness of his were fundamentally one. Both had come from the same source. To that source both would ultimately return. They would be fused there, as originally there they had been merged.

At the apperception of that, the curious lines which occur in the Book of Dzyan suggested themselves:

"Said the Flame to the Spark: 'I have clothed myself in thee, thou art my image, my body, until that day when thou shalt rebecome myself and others, thyself and me.'"

In the penetrating beauty of the allegory Leilah told herself that she, Barouffski, Verplank, the Silverstairs, the Helley-Quetgens, everybody whom she knew, everyone whom she did not know, all the fillers of space, were sparks of one Flame, the Flame from which they had been formerly emitted and into which they would finally return. That, she felt she must believe, if she were to believe anything. But she felt too that though she did believe it, she believed also that for the present there were sparks better parted than united, as there were also others better united than apart.

On the table before her was a treatise on the Paramitas—which are The Blessed Things.

She looked at it, knowing that what she had done was wrong and what she was about to do was evil. But she felt also that she could not help herself. Whatever the penalty, it was impossible for her to live with Barouffski. Whatever the punishment, it was impossible for her not to live with Verplank. At the moment it seemed to her as though the high fates had set her in a circle from which she could not escape except by the door of death or that of further sinning. At this idea she wondered about Barouffski as, after Verplank's eruption at the Joyeuses, she had wondered about him. She wondered whether in some former existence she had injured Barouffski and whether it were for that reason that she had been led into giving him the power to injure her now. It might be so, she told herself, in which case she ought to bear it. But how could she know that it was so? Yet even though it were and the fact were made clear to her, even then, even too if the certainty of a punishment more poignant than any were shaken in her eyes, still she could not bear it.

"But I ought to," she found herself saying.

These reflections Violet's advent had interrupted.

"What are you going to do?" the lady was asking.

Leilah, unfit at the moment for battle, felt unable to tell. She looked away.

"Nothing, I suppose."

Violet, cocking a belligerent eye, threw out:

"You carry moderation to excess."

Leilah looked up. "What would you have me do?"

"Divorce Barouffski."

"Because he threw champagne about? I hardly fancy I could get a divorce for that."

Militantly Violet whipped off a glove. "Frankly that creature is a criminal. Never, in all my life, have I seen such an exhibition of bad taste. But then, as they say here, bad taste leads to crime—to such vulgar forms of it at that."

"Even so, I don't see how it helps me."

"But he struck you," Violet, more bellicose than ever, exclaimed. "You told me so. What more would you have. But aren't you difficile to-day!" Suspiciously she considered her friend. "You've got something up your sleeve."

"If I have," Leilah, in an effort to parry the thrust, replied, "at least it is not witnesses."

Cogently Violet nodded. "Come to me then. Divorce is the mother-in-law of invention. If you haven't any witnesses, I'll find something else. I make a specialty of finding things before they are lost."

This programme hardly suited Leilah's book. Again she parried. "Last night—and what a night!—I dreamed I was feasting with the dead. It was so peaceful. It is that that I want. It is peace the very fibres of my being crave."

Here were heights—or depths—where Violet could not follow. With a smile she tacked.

"Before you dreamed your dream I noticed that you wore a very ducky frock."

"It is stained. So am I. The champagne Barouffski threw stained me within and without."

Here were other heights. Readily Violet skirted them.

"I believe I got a drop or two myself. But then I don't mind. It is true I am not a theosophist."

At this, in indignation at herself, Leilah protested.

"Theosophy is primarily a school of good manners. In giving d'Arcy my glass, mine were detestable."

Now they were on surer ground. Wickedly Violet winked.

"Nobody has any manners any more or, when they do, they have them in plenty and all of them bad."

"If I have an excuse," Leilah continued, "it is that Gulian drove me nearly demented."

Now, Violet felt, they were getting at it. Mentally she girded herself and with an engaging appearance of sympathy, exclaimed:

"A man never does that unless he loves a woman to distraction."

The sympathy, however feigned, did its work. After all, Leilah reflected, why should she not tell what she was about to do? On the impulse she turned.

"Violet, I offered Barouffski half my fortune to free me. His reply was a blow. Apart from that I have no grounds for a divorce, none at least which I can show. Previously there was something between Gulian and me. It has gone. He cares for me still and I care for him. Shortly he is to be here. For a long time I hesitated. But after last night—after the nights and days that preceded it!—it does not seem to me that I need hesitate any more."

Pausing, she drew breath. "Violet, when he comes I am to go with him. Is there a reason why I should not?"

Violet, who had long suspected as much, now at last had nailed it. Cautiously she buckled to.

"No. Not one. On the contrary. There is every reason why you should. Every reason. Particularly as to greet you there will be the disdainful eyes, the lifted skirts, the averted heads, every one of the very slight and very fiendish tortures that are visited on the woman who has gone and done it."

For a second she too paused, then with a war whoop added:

"But you can't do anything of the kind. I won't let you."

"Would you turn from me also?"

"I! Merciful fathers! But I am not the world. No matter what is done in private, the world does not care. The world is very well bred. It never sees anything that was not intended for it. But on the open scandal of scandalous conduct instantly it turns its well bred back. It will turn it on you."

Indifferently Leilah assented. She had examined this phase of the matter. It had not seemed very important.

"No doubt," she replied. "Yet then destiny seldom closes a door without opening another. I told you of my dream. It was a dream of peace. Here there can be none. It may be my karma perhaps. But this," she continued, motioning at the brilliant room, "this is my prison."

She hesitated and a bit lamely concluded:

"It is horrible to be in such a place."

"And worse to be nowhere at all," Violet shot at her. In firing she had sat up. Now, lolling back on the cushions, she enigmatically resumed: "You may be right though. I daresay it is dreadful to be in prison. I daresay it is even worse than you think."

Enigmatic still, she smiled. With another shot, with two at most, Leilah, she told herself, would be routed.

"It is as though I were in a vortex," the latter was saying. "It is as though I were being torn from places where I do not wish to be to others I may not like. But can one argue with a vortex? It is idle even to struggle. Whether you will or you won't, you have to let yourself go."

Lightly, in her most worldly manner, Violet laughed.

"Never in the world! A woman should never let herself go—except in an aeroplane. At a pinch a four-in-hand might do, but——"

At the moment the lady was thoroughly en veine and, sure of victory, might have bantered on, but this, Aurelia, ushered by Parker, prevented.

Sharply Violet threw at her: "Where have you been?"

Ignoring Violet, Aurelia nodded at Leilah. "I was here the other day, did they tell you?"

She turned and with blithe impertinence looked her sister up and down.

"Don't be so ordinary as to ask a girl where she has been. If you are inquisitive, ask where she is going, and, if you ask me, I'll tell you. I am going to become——"

"Yes, yes." Violet impatiently interrupted. "We've heard all that. You're going to become a star. I know what kind too—a fallen star."

A fresher smile bubbled about Aurelia's delicious mouth.

"It pleases your ladyship to jest. I am to become the Princess Farnese!"

"Merciful heavens!" Violet exclaimed, turning as she spoke to Leilah. "She'll go in to dinner before me!"

But Leilah who, after a word of greeting to Aurelia, had, from the table before her, taken and reopened the Paramitas, perhaps did not hear.

Violet turned again to her sister. "When did he propose?"

With an air of amused contempt, again Aurelia looked her up and down.

"How antiquated you are! Don't you know that all that sort of thing has gone out?"

"Do you mean that he didn't propose?"

"Of course not. I proposed to him."

"What?"

"He was so coy about it, too," Aurelia, quite as though she were eating sweetmeats, resumed. "He asked me all about my finances, what settlements I would make and whether I would object if he kept a separate establishment. You can't really fancy how coy he was. He quite blushed and stammered, the poor thing."

"I should think he might."

"Yes, indeed. He asked me if I had spoken to his mamma, and I told him that while it was perhaps incorrect of me to speak to him in the first instance, yet that there could be no real love without a mutual misunderstanding, and now that we had one I would make a formal demand of the old lady to-day."

Aurelia, executing a little pas, added: "I have just seen her."

"Well?"

"She said: 'And so you want my little boy for your husband.' Partly that I told her, but partly also I want you for mother-in-law. You should have seen her lick her chops over that. Then she asked me about my affections.

I told her they were just like the fashions. They came and went."

"She must have been delighted."

"She hugged me. Then, of course, I asked about him. She told me that he has just been named as co-respondent in the Kincardine divorce suit, and I said that that was perfectly satisfactory."

"What!"

"Perfectly satisfactory. It appears that the poor boy can't remember whether the charge is true or false and that I think is so dear of him."

Violet, rising, extended her arms. "Aurelia, I have been wrong, I have misjudged you. Come to me."

But Aurelia, moving back, waved her away. "You'll only muss me. Now I must run. I must break the news to Parsnips. Will you come, Vi?"

"In a moment." Violet answered. "Wait for me in the brougham. There is something I want to say to Leilah."

Endearingly the ingénue smiled. "Something I ought not to hear, I suppose." In speaking she made for the door. "The amount of things I ought not to hear and do hear is simply amazing."

As the portières fell on her gracile back, Violet, with a gesture which, for so warlike a lady, resembled defeat, reseating herself, exclaimed:

"Frankly, she is impossible."

At once though, buckling anew for the fray, she aimed at Leilah and fired.

"So are you."

Leilah, who had been considering the Paramitas, started at the attack which instantly was followed up by another.

"Do you know anything about the code here, the law code, I mean. Do you?"

Leilah, a bit bewildered, shook her head. "No, that is, very little."

Violet's eyes fairly snapped. "I congratulate you. A little is sometimes a great deal. I also know a little and that little is, well, immense, so enormous even that because of it I am in a position to tell you that if you go with Verplank, Barouffski can, if he catches you, have you jailed."

Gravely, with curious calm, Leilah looked at her.

Annoyed that the shot had fallen short, Violet aimed again.

"Didn't you hear me? I said jailed. J-a-i-l-e-d! Now I may add for two years. That is what I meant when you spoke of your prison. I agreed with you that it must be dreadful to be in one. I said I daresay it is even worse than you think."

Leilah half raised a hand. "But——"

Unheedingly Violet continued. "Now, as for Verplank, if Barouffski were to surprise him here with you he could kill you both, yes, and be acquitted. But you—I have told you what he can do. Moreover, if he so much as suspects you, he can call the police. But excuse me. You were saying?"

"Nothing of any moment."

But Violet persisted. "What was it?"

"Merely that during the Terror a woman went to the guillotine smelling a rose."

At this flank movement Violet winced, but she rallied.

"Yes and rehearsed the act beforehand. They all did. The great ladies of the period rehearsed for the guillotine that they might die, as they had lived, with grace. Those were the good old days. These are the bad new ones. Anything of the kind would be ridiculous now."

To this, gravely as before, Leilah assented. "No doubt. But aren't you rather rambling about the grounds? It seems to me that you also have something up your sleeve."

Violet rose to the challenge. "Something! I have the entire pharmacopœia. In it is a remedy heroic but sovereign. If you'll take it, it may maim but it will cure."

Leilah, well entrenched, braved her. "I may not need it."

With a rush, then, the attack began.

"That's because you don't know. You think you are sane and sound. Don't you now? Yes, and you are neither. You have a high temperature complicated with nausea. The temperature is due to exposure, the nausea to indigestion. You have been exposed to Verplank and you have supped on Barouffski. You fancy you can't be rid of the incubus. That is an hallucination which the fever has caused. You can be rid of it. You can throw it up. I have an emetic that will do the trick. It may not be tasty but I'll warrant it will make him gag far more than you."

At the ferocity of the assault, Leilah quailed. "Really, Violet, your language——"

But the lady was not be denied. "Aha! You want me to be butter-fingered, don't you? Not a bit of it. You shall have the dose whether you like it or not and here it is for you. You called this place a prison. Now who runs it? You do. And on what? Your money. Supposing you hadn't any? Would Barouffski supply it? He would pack in a jiffy. Couldn't you then sue for divorce? Of course you could. Then there is the emetic. Verplank has enough for you both, enough for an army. All you have to do is to hold your nose, open your mouth, give your money away and vomit Barouffski. Will you?"

It was Violet's last shot. With it she had expected to bowl Leilah completely over. Anxiously she looked to see the result.

"Will you?" she repeated.

With manifest exaltation Leilah answered: "I had thought of it."

Surprisedly Violet stared, wondering could all her ammunition have gone for nothing, wondering too at the almost rapt expression that had come into Leilah's face.

"What?"

"Yes, Violet, I had thought of it—and of other things also. While Aurelia was here, I was reading a little book. It told me what I once knew and had since forgotten. It told me that if we have ideals we should live for them, that it is only by living for them and suffering for them that we can lift ourselves above the brutes. Violet, it was sinful of me to think of going with Gulian."

Dispassionately the now mollified lady toned that phrase.

"It was not perhaps quite nice."

"But I had not seen," Leilah continued. "No, not that," she interrupted herself to explain, "I had forgotten that this prison, all I have endured, all I shall endure, these are my debts to the Lords of Karma."

But that was a bit too strong. Violet laughed.

"You mean the Lords of Gammon."

"I mean," Leilah, with heightening fervour, replied, "that I have looked upon my prison as a cross. It is not a cross, it is a boon—one of which I have not been worthy. For I forgot that any sorrow should be welcomed. I forgot that it has been sent to make us nobler than we are. But my sorrows I have not welcomed. I have rebelled against them. I shall rebel no more. They were my masters. They shall be my servants now."

At these fine sentiments Violet sniffed.

"If that is theosophy I will believe in it when I am old, fat and a German. But I am glad it enabled you to reach a decision. Otherwise——"

But what the lady may have intended to say was never expressed or at least not then. Through the yellow portières, the delicate oval of Aurelia's face appeared.

"Aren't you ever coming?" she called. "What have you two been talking about?"

As the ingénue spoke, she entered, strolled to the mirror, considered herself.

"We have been discussing your engagement," Violet, in a very matter of fact way, replied.

Aurelia adjusted her hat, patted her hair, and addressed the mirror.

"I fancied it must be something important. Did I tell you what happened before I took Farnese?"

Violet yawned. "I have forgotten."

Aurelia, still pluming herself, smiled.

"Then I didn't. Besides, it is so shocking."

Violet motioned at her. "Don't be tiresome! I may have lost the ability to be shocked but not the ability to be bored."

With an air of great satisfaction Aurelia turned.

"Well, this morning, d'Arcy called. He told me about the gayeties last evening and it seemed to me that he must have looked so sweet with the champagne all over him that I could hardly resist accepting him, too."

"Accepting him, three!" Violet exclaimed. She raised her eyes as though calling heaven to witness. "There's constancy for you!"

Aurelia gave another glance at her enticing self.

"Do you know, I have always thought that constancy must be due either to a lack of imagination or else of opportunity. That is what you would call a moral standpoint, isn't it? Though what morality itself is you never deigned to explain. Personally I am inclined to think that it must be a preference in a choice of experiences."

Violet stood up. "One might suppose you thought it consisted in being engaged to half a dozen men at the same time."

Enthusiastically the girl regarded her. "There! That's it! You've struck it! There is safety in numbers and what a moral young person I am!"

Violet nodded. "I never suspected it before."

"Nor I," Aurelia contentedly replied. She looked at Leilah. "By-by."

"Good-by," Violet added.

In a moment both had gone and Leilah, again alone, reopened the little treatise on the Paramitas.

The way was now clear and to that way the pamphlet had pointed. It had done more. It had brought the exaltation which such beatitudes do bring to those in great distress. But though it had exalted, suddenly the fervour fell from her, for at once she foresaw the scene which she would have with Verplank, when now, at the last moment, she had to tell him that she could not go. The terror of it daunted her. She could see him, demanding that she tell him why—that faltering why of hers which would be gibberish to him and yet which summarised her ideals.

For the moment she felt that she lacked the strength for this, that it would be better to write him and she was thinking what she would say and how she would say it, when something external, a noise from without, distracted her.

She stood up and went to the window, from which, since the day of the ambuscade, she had had no heart to look.

Below, a footman in a canary coat and black knee-breeches was walking, bareheaded, straight on. At the gate he stopped, fumbled with the latch, drew back the door, held it open.

A man entered. Tall and broad-shouldered, he had a rigid face, calm eyes, the air of a judge. His beard, intensely black, the beard of a Saracen, was close cut and pointed. He was dressed in black.

Another man followed. Shorter, fairer, distinctly fat, he had a box under his arm. About the box were broad bands, sealed with red wax.

A third man appeared. Older than the others, he had gray hair, glasses rimmed with tortoise-shell, and a bag.

All three were in black, all were grave, all were silent, and as they stood before the gate they partially concealed a fourth man, who, in black also, wore white gloves.

What they had come for Leilah could not imagine. Then, at once, she recalled what Violet had said: the rigors of French justice, a husband's ability to cage an erring wife, to put her away, indefinitely, among the demented and the depraved, and at the sight of these men, at the thought of the Byzantine abysses of Barouffski's nature, abysses perhaps unsounded yet, dread shook her. She shuddered.

But now another procession appeared, one that issued not from the gate, but from the house, a procession also composed of four men, also grave, also silent. One of them she vaguely recalled, and her stumbling memory tried to put a name on him, Dal, Mal, Pal-Palencia! Another, too, she remembered, Tyszkiewicz. A third also, and, to her cost, she knew. It was Barouffski.

In the first procession there was now a fourth acquaintance. The man with white gloves was raising his hat. As he did so she recognised d'Arcy. Then at last she understood, and, lest they should see her, drew back.

Meanwhile the footman had disappeared. From the first procession the man with the umbrella and the man with the box detached themselves. From the second, Palencia and Tyszkiewicz advanced.

For a little, grouped together, they conversed inaudibly, but amply with gestures and movements that included the tossing of a coin.

A pantomime followed. Tyszkiewicz, Palencia and the fat man moved to one side. The man with the umbrella drew with the ferule of it a line on the ground. Then, his head bent, one foot put directly in front of the other, he walked slowly until he had covered a space equal apparently to about fifteen yards. There he drew a second line, straightened himself, turned to Barouffski, who went to that line, while d'Arcy stationed himself at the other.

Immediately the fat man handed his box to Palencia. Palencia looked at the seals, broke them, opened the box, and, going to where d'Arcy stood, presented it. D'Arcy removed a glove, removed his hat, which he put brim upward beside him, and taking a pistol from the box, pointed it at the ground.

Palencia went back, restored the box to the fat man, who presented it to Barouffski. Another pistol was extracted. The fat man moved to one side. The man with the umbrella placed himself at an angle to d'Arcy and Barouffski. In front of him, at an equal angle, Palencia, Tyszkiewicz and the fat man stood. These the old man with the bag and the fourth member of the Barouffski party joined. The man with the umbrella took out a watch, and held it open in his hand.

"Attention!"

The pantomime had ended. Leilah leaned forward. Of Barouffski she could see now but the back of his head, the back of his tight-fitting coat. But d'Arcy, who stood sideways, his heels drawn together, might have been posing for a photograph.

The sky was leaden. The shrubbery resembled it. From behind an urn a cat appeared. It meowed and vanished. For a moment more there was silence.

The man with the umbrella looked from d'Arcy to Barouffski.

"Messieurs, after I give the command Fire, I will count from one to ten, leaving between each number an interval of ten seconds. It is unnecessary, but it is my duty to add, that to fire before I have given the word, or after I have counted ten, constitutes attempted assassination and, should death ensue, murder."

He paused, looked at his watch, looked at d'Arcy, again at Barouffski.

"Fire!"

Simultaneously the two men raised and extended their right arms, d'Arcy in such a manner that the forearm and butt of the pistol masked the abnormal beauty of his face. The hand was bare, but the left, which hung at his side, was gloved.

"One! Two! Three!"

With the ridiculous noise of a firecracker a pistol went off. D'Arcy, lowering his right hand, raised and shook the left. The delicate material of the glove had reddened, and on the ground specks of crimson dropped.

"Four! Five!"

"Six! Seven! Eight!"

Measuredly, monotonously, but more loudly than before, the final numbers were being called. Infinitesimally the point of d'Arcy's pistol moved. His heels were no longer drawn together. His right hand was held less high. His left hand burned. Otherwise he was entirely at his ease.

He had withstood Barouffski's fire. It was Barouffski's turn to withstand his. He had time and to spare. Slowly, coolly, deliberately, he was taking aim.

It was very agreeable. He was smiling. He was enjoying himself. He was enjoying Barouffski's presumable suspense. He was savouring his equally presumable agitations. The man's face had turned ashen. The fact that it had, that he could see it had, delighted him. He felt sure of himself, and his thoughts were pleasant.

He was thinking: "That glass of wine of yours was the last you will ever ask me or any one else to drink."

He had become aware of Leilah's presence. That, too, delighted him. If he had a regret, it was that Tempest, the Silverstairs, all the demi-mondaines and exotics of the night before, the Bohemians to boot, the waiters as well, were not present also. Though in appearance divine, at heart he was human.

Again, imperceptibly, the point of his pistol moved.

"Nine!"

The trigger had been pulled. There was a fresh detonation. D'Arcy handed his pistol to the fat man, bent over, took up his hat, put it on, took it off, raised it straight upward, and for a moment, before replacing it, held it high in the air.

Leilah, without noticing the salute which was intended for her, saw Barouffski turn completely around, sink on his knees, press his hands to his side, and pitch forward.

It was a feint, she thought, histrionics for the gallery, perhaps for her. But now the old man and his colleague were bending over him. Behind them, Palencia, Tyszkiewicz and the man with the umbrella leaned. Barouffski's coat and waistcoat were opened, his shirt was torn apart.

Leilah heard what to her was the meaninglessness of technical terms. She saw the men who had been bending arise. She saw the others remove their hats. At the significant action she saw that the garden had been again invaded, this time by Death.

She turned, clutching for support at the velvet of a curtain, overwhelmed at the knowledge that her prison had crumbled, that the jailer was gone.

It had been her destiny to have sorrow spring into her life, fell her, make her its own, and to what end? Tearfully she had put that query to walls as callous as fate. Tearfully she had come to believe that she was damned in this existence for sins committed in another. It is this life that is hell she had told herself. But now, abruptly, the malediction was lifted. Still in hell, she was at the portals, the gates were open, she was free!

Yet was she? At the moment it seemed to her that it was all a hallucination; that, if she looked again into the accursed garden, she would see Barouffski tapping his breast with one hand, pointing to some prostrate form with the other, and, with his ambiguous smile, calling to her:

"See, my dear, I, I am unharmed."

So poignant was the impression that she did look. A litter had been improvised, and on it Barouffski, an arm pendent, his head fallen back, his face a gray green, was being put.

On the door behind her sounded the muffled tap of fingers furtive and discreet. She turned. At the threshold was Parker.

"If you please, my lady. Will your ladyship receive——"

"No," Leilah answered. She was about to add that she was at home to no one. But she caught herself. "Who is it?"

With that air which those acquire who attend to delicate matters, the woman answered: "Mr. Verplank."

Leilah drew a long breath. She went to the mirror. The curtain had disarranged her hair. She readjusted it, and passed out and down into the slippery salon.

Verplank was leaning against the piano. His left arm was in a sling, and the left side of his face from the nose to the ear was bandaged.

Before either could speak there came from the hall a murmur of voices, the sound of lumbering feet, the noise of people labouring upward.

Verplank looked at Leilah, and from her to the door.

"What is that?"

On and upward moved the steps, the noise decreasing as they passed, the sound subsiding with them.

"What is it?" Verplank asked again.

Leilah's under lip trembled. The deliverance from the vortex, the after-shudder that comes when some great peril has been barely escaped, the sensation of strength overtaxed, these things fusing with the consciousness that the last barricade had been taken, that there were now no more hostages to joy, induced in her one of the most curious of physical phenomena.

With tears running down her cheeks, she smiled. Then, sobbing and smiling still, she answered him:

"The key of the prison."

Verplank nodded. He did not in the least understand. But the singularity of her appearance, joined to the singularity of her reply, aroused in him a great pity for this woman who had ruined her life, ruined his own, and who then seemed to him demented.

"Pardon, madame la comtesse. Monsieur Palencia and Monsieur Tyszkiewicz ask if madame la comtesse will receive them?"

At the door, behind her, was Emmanuel.

At once another phenomenon occurred. Galvanised by that instinct of form which, when requisite, enables women of the world to banish instantly any trace of emotion, Leilah turned to the footman a face in which the tears had been reabsorbed, and from which the smile had gone.

"Say to these gentlemen that I appreciate and thank them, but that I can see no one."

Emmanuel compressed his lips. He wondered how she knew. There was a great deal occurring in this house that perplexed him. Moreover, Verplank's bandage and sling interested him very much. But, trained to his calling, he bowed and withdrew.

"What do they want?" Verplank asked, memories of his own duel surging at mention of their names before him.

In Leilah's face the tears and smiles reappearing, mingled.

"Barouffski is dead," she answered.

Verplank closed and opened a hand. His mouth opened also. He was sure now that she was crazy.

"Dead! How? What do you mean?"

Leilah made a gesture.

"There, a moment ago, in the garden. D'Arcy shot him."

Verplank started. The definiteness of her reply divested him of his idea concerning her, but it produced another which was also, though differently, disturbing. His eyes blazed. The old scar, the scar on the right side of his face, reddened.

"Who the devil is d'Arcy?"

For a moment he stared. Then, angrily snapping two fingers, he cried:

"In taking you from this damned house today, I had intended to leave a card for him, not a p. p. c. either, one with our address on it and the hours when I would be at home. If there was any shooting going on, I intended to be in it. Now some duffer must interfere."

With a rapid intake of the breath, he considered her. At the moment, he doubted it could be true. Yet her face, with its hysterical blending of joy and sorrow, seemed to certify that it was so. After all, he reflected, however the odour may occur, always the smell of an enemy's corpse is sweet. But, uncertain still, he threw out for clincher:

"Is that what you meant by the key of the prison?"

She moved to him.

"Gulian, yes, and never can I be thankful enough that it was not your hand that turned it."

Verplank tossed his bandaged head.

"So this is the end!"

Leilah looked up at him.

"Gulian, no, not that. The end of the beginning, if you like. Hereafter we will be beginning anew. Hereafter——"

She paused. The word had been evocative. Its repetition showed her that which she had not yet had time to consider; the decencies of life, the decencies, too, of death, the funeral, the widow's weeds, the delay which the world exacts; new hostages to joy, real though impermanent.

She told him of them.

From the church next door the organ pealed, and as they then remade their plans—those plans which mortals think they make, and which always are unmade unless intended for them—a ray of sunshine entered; the organ pealed louder, the beauty of the melody hushed their voices, and for a moment, to the appoggiatura of Stradella, on that shaft of light, Leilah's thoughts, ascending, mounted into realms where all things broken are made complete, and where are found again things vanished.

I.

"I told my father that you expected to make a hundred thousand this year. He said he didn't believe in miracles."

It was Mrs. Carol Nevius who, from the head of the dinner-table, addressed her husband.

"Did he though! That's odd, seeing that it has taken a succession of them to keep him out of Sing-Sing."

Mrs. Nevius laughed. She was a pretty little woman, very well dressed, with a noticeably good manner. And as she laughed it was evident that her father was not one who inspired respect.

"But if you do," she insisted, "if you make a lot, you will let me entertain, won't you?"

Nevius shook his head. No, not though it were millions. In the now remote bachelor days he had his fill of society, and while it is colloquial to maintain that those who do not care for society are those for whom society does not care, in his case the argument was invalid. He was too busy to fatigue himself further with futilities and late hours.

His wife was not. She was essentially social, schemingly so, with a dream unfulfilled, yet, perhaps still fulfillable of leadership in the upper four, and so exasperating did her husband's disinclination for any form of entertainment seem to her, that had you confessed her privately and apart she would have declared illicit commerce as nothing in comparison.

But this was natural. Not until her engagement was announced did society become aware of her existence. Born a Snaith, her people were believed to be rich and known to be common. Her father was an old person of both sexes—possessed of all the vices of woman and none of the virtues of man—a Wall street rat who told untellable stories and insisted on morning prayers. His wife, it was rumored, was of better stock, and in reviewing the documents, it seems difficult for her not to have been. But she had little to boast of. She was a bloodless creature, with a deprecatory manner and a total inability to look you in the face.

To these people two children had been born, both girls. The elder, Frances, became in time the wife of young Montrion who promptly landed her in a set which, while not censorious, has a curious habit of closing its doors on women who leave their own wide open. In what manner and through what circumstances

Mrs. Montrion became negligent in regard to her vestibule is not a matter with which the telling of the accompanying episode need be delayed. Suffice it to say that after being urged from one end of the avenue to the other the sufficiency of that urging ceased.

This occurred at the hour when her sister, Hilda, was about to make some form of début. That the latter was thereby materially handicapped goes without phrases. Apart from a handful of school friends, their brothers and lovers, the girl knew no one. It was Mrs. Montrion on whose offices she relied to join the since defunct F. C. D. C., and to tread Assembly floors. It was through her she was to be smiled upon by the Bleeckers, Rewicks and Wainwarings. It was through her she was to grasp those two potential fingers with which Mrs. Amsterdam sealed the advent of the debutante, and just when the frocks were ordered, presto! up and down Fifth avenue one door after another was closing on Mrs. Montrion's back.

It was hard on the girl, very. But she held her tongue, and the frocks which were to have been worn at routs she wore quite graciously at home. Now and again when her father could be induced to secrete himself, the handful of friends, their brothers and lovers, were asked to break bread at the house; and in return now and again her friends asked her to their own abodes. It was on one of these occasions that she met Carol Nevius.

Nevius was then in his twenty-fourth year. As men go his appearance was not distressing, he was neither effeminate nor beefy, his chin may not have been one which Lavater would have praised, but his features were good, he held himself well, and he dressed as those do who put themselves in West-End hands, and then dismiss the subject. A little before he had taken honors at the Law School, and had been welcomed to the bar by judges to whom his name was evocative of old New York and the early history of Manhattan. Of immediate relatives he had none. His income, derived from a small bundle of bonds and the rental of the Nevius house in Tenth street, was sufficient to enable him to live without toil though not without debts. An existence of that kind not being to his liking he had fought for spurs and won them, so notably even that the cigars he smoked while digesting the Code were paid for from the emoluments of his profession.

His initial encounter with Miss Snaith occurred at a dinner. As the conversation expanded he found himself taking pleasure in the sound of her voice, and presently he discovered that her eyes were so blue they dazzled; that her mouth was perfect, the poise of her head delightful; that though slight of figure, she was adorably constructed; that her wit was nimble and her manner subdued. She seemed to exhale all that is good in woman—simplicity, sympathy, sweetness and strength; manifestly she was pure of mind, of eye and tongue, and before the dinner was done he told himself that her beauty was the least of her charms.

These impressions he kept to himself, but on learning that at her house a cup of tea was to be had any afternoon for the asking, he thanked her with much gratitude and took her at her word the next day.

But was it tea she gave him? Surely there was a philter in that samovar. It was February then, but by the time Lent had come and gone and the spring's bold emissaries were in the air, such was the potency of that brew that only her people and his poverty prevented him from praying her to become his wife. Try as he might, he could not reconcile himself to her family, and try too as he was able, he could discern none of the cohorts of advancing wealth. And yet the girl was so radiantly fair, so graceful in speech, so gracious in bearing and apparently so unexpectant either of love or betrothal, that he saw no reason why he should cease to quaff that cup. Nor did he cease till spring had gone and summer jumped upon the town.

At the first monition of impending heat the Snaiths were accustomed to desert Fifth avenue for a red chalet at Bronx, a roomy structure standing on grounds that leaned to the water's edge. Sometimes a poor connection could be lured that way, and sometimes a friend of the girl's would come unwarned and then take flight, abashed by the speech of that coarse old man, unnerved by the stealthy air and cattish smile of the mother. But as a rule guests were infrequent.

By what means Mr. Snaith was induced that year to try the waters of Sharon is not a part of history, but try them he did, and during his absence Nevius was asked to Bronx. Over that invitation he hesitated, and continued to hesitate until after a minute review of recent events he was able to affirm that not once had the girl even alluded to engagement rings. Then he went, and as Mrs. Snaith kept herself aloof, very pleasant he found it.

Of a morning there would be a skurry on horseback through bye-lanes and hedges; when the sun was oppressive there were the poets—Meredith, Bailey, Rosetti, Blunt and Swinburne too; in the late afternoons there were decorous drives over dusty roads, but in the evening there was the moon, the gurgle of waters, the caresses of a midsummer night. There were strains too from that duo in which we have all taken part, and there were monologues, spaced with silence. The moon, the waters, the hush of locusts, the sorceries of the poets, these things are sworn accomplices to adventurous desires, and one morning Nevius awoke, wondering at fate, appalled by it, overcome by a remorse into which a sweetness filtered and declined to go.

When he sought the girl she was not immediately discoverable. It was not until he set out through the grounds that he discerned the white and buttercup of muslin beyond. As he approached she rose from a bed of flowers, and, as he took her hand, her lips parted and she smiled. Never had she looked more fair. Beneath the blue splendors of her eyes were the faintest of circles, but in the gay sunlight she was as fragrant as the flowers she held.

"Wish me good morning," she admonished. And that office performed she led him to another parterre, where she gathered more flowers and joined them with the first.

"They will do for the table, don't you think?"

"Hilda, will you marry me?"

She turned to him, a quick, glad look on her face.

"You know that I love you," he added. "You must know that, or—or—"

Lamely he hesitated. But the girl must have divined his meaning; she made a gesture that dispensed with needless explanations; a little color came to her cheeks, yet her eyes rested bravely in his own.

"Yes, I know, and you too must know how I love you. Carol, I have always loved you; that line in Festus was made for me: 'My love was perfect from the first, it did not grow as meaner things mature.'"

There was no riding that day. Later the girl made avowals sweeter still. To all intents and purposes her life had been but a waiting for him, the preparation and prelude of his coming. There were many things over which she had wondered, but now they were all made clear. She understood music and its meaning. She understood the witcheries of spring, the ripple of the rain, the breath of brooks. She understood at last why the stars had filled her with unrest. She understood when they first met why a bird in her heart had burst into song. It was love, always love; her love appealing to his.

This was very pretty, and of such avowals Nevius became thoroughly avaricious. He, too, was in the festival of youth, and apart from the three or four episodes which inevitably occur to one who moves in certain circles and whose appearance is not distressing, he might have repeated to her everything she said to him. His heart at least was as virginal as her own. If he had taught her the meaning of love, she had shown him the meaning of life. Heretofore he had been ambitious to make a name for himself. Now at once he was ambitious to make a name for her. And with a little perplexity, a little embarrassment, he told her of himself. There was the house, the meager income and his professional hopes.

In view of the fact that the Snaith household was kept on a footing of perhaps fifty thousand a year, and by no means lavishly at that, the girl might readily have dismissed so indigent a suitor. Then, too, in spite of the sweetness and simplicity which she exhaled, she was not one to contemplate with enjoyment such pleasures as are said to reside in surburban flats. But she had faith, less in her lover's success perhaps than in the possibilities of her father's money. At the moment, however, she seemed quite content, and a day or two later informed him that her father had arrived and had been approached.

"You are to speak to him after dinner," she said. "If you were a broker he would love you." At that period brokers made money. "But you are a lawyer, and he says lawyers are tricky. Come."

Nevius looked down and away. In regard to trickiness Mr. Snaith's reputation was indeed above reproach, but in this respect, it surpassed it. Yet, after all, it was not the father he was to marry, nor yet the mother, it was the girl he loved. The entire catalogue of distasteful things which her family represented, faded at thought of her. He looked up and followed her from the verandah to where her people were.

At the entrance of the lovers Mr. Snaith grunted and made for the dining-room beyond. His wife stroked a bloodless hand and asked did it look like rain.

"When I am with Hilda," Nevius answered, "the sky is always fair."

"Ah!" exclaimed the lady, by whom that phenomenon had evidently passed unobserved. "Ah! indeed!"

Nevius turned to the girl, she was smiling, the red tip of her tongue just visible, and so adorable was her expression that it was only a proper appreciation of form which prevented him from catching her and smothering her with kisses in his arms.

But in the dining-room the enthusiasm of the moment was forgot. Mr. Snaith broke a raw egg into his soup and refreshed himself with whisky and lithia, a beverage that he declared was tip-top for gout, which statement passing unchallenged he entered into a long tirade against physicians in general and professional men in particular. They were either idiots or scoundrels. "Yes, sir, every damn one of them." To all of which Mrs. Snaith assented. Then he relapsed into a domineering silence, and some attempt was made at more amiable forms of talk but without sufficient success to cause any needless prolongation of the repast.

When the bowls were brought and the women had gone, Nevius turned to his host. All over him was written the fact that he had seen worse days and never intended to see them again. He was short and obese, with a face like a brandied cherry, and as terrible as vulgarity and ready-made clothes could make him. He looked exactly what he was and nothing worse could be said of him.

"I believe you are aware that I have asked your daughter to be my wife."

"She has made her bed and she can lie in it," Mr. Snaith replied.

"Am I to infer that I have your consent?"

"Infer? I don't know what you infer. She's got a good home, I don't see what she wants to leave it for."

"Doubtless," answered Nevius, "for the same reason that Mrs. Snaith left her own."

"That's nothing to do with it. She's not fit to be married, I've told her mother so. But let's cut it short. What's your income?"

"Forty-six hundred."

"I'll give her the same as long as I can afford it and not a damn cent more.'

"Perhaps in a year or two it won't be necessary for you to give anything."

"So much the better for me then."

And with that Mr. Snaith left the table and hobbled from the room.

Had Nevius been other than himself, he too would have left the room, Bronx as well. Even the law had not brought him into contact with a boor such as that. For a second it seemed to him that in spite of Hilda and the irreparable he must wash his hands of the whole affair, but in that second Hilda was at his side and led him out to where the red moon was, the gurgling waters, the locust's hush.

Before the red moon waned white he was reconciled. A girl such as she possesses enchantments which dull regret. And during the pre-nuptial honeymoon which ensued the only regret he could maintain was that which concerned his position toward her. But for what was the marriage service invented? In the autumn their loves were consecrated by a diligent bishop, and for a while they loitered among the quick of Paris and the ghosts of Rome. When they returned, the house in Tenth street was made habitable, and Nevius threw himself into work as another plunges into dissipation.

A year passed, another, a third, six in all, yet on this particular evening, as Mrs. Nevius from the head of the table questioned him in regard to the possibilities of future income, she was, if not a bounder, as the word is used, still as far from the inner sanctuaries of upper fourdom as when the doors were closing on her sister's back.

At the time being she had no opportunity of expatiating on this wrong. A servant appeared and announced that Mr. Ablaut was in the drawing-room.

Mrs. Nevius rose from her seat, and her husband, punishing a yawn with a tap of the finger, made for the library.

"If it were Jenny now," his wife called after him, her eyes half-closed. her chin upraised, "you wouldn't be in such a hurry. would you?"

II.

"I WOULD rather have written Salammbô than have built the Brooklyn Bridge. It was more difficult, and besides it will last longer."

Mr. "Alphabet" Jones, the novelist, a thimbleful of champagne in his throat, was discoursing to the guests whom Mrs. Nevius had assembled.

"Yes, of course," interjected Mrs. Anderson, a young woman with the face and manner of a cocotte. "Ah, yes," and she smiled with an air entendu; " but does literature pay?"

With elaborate manifestations of bewilderment, Jones threw himself back in his chair:

"Pay, Mrs. Anderson? Pay, did I understand you to say? Why, look at Bradshaw. Year in, year out, he clears ten thousand pounds sterling."

"Bradshaw? Bradshaw?" Mrs. Anderson shook her head vaguely. "Oh, yes, the author of Ben Hur."

"Ce qu'elle est idiote," muttered Nevius to Miss Jenny Adulam, who sat at his side.

"Ce qu'elle m'ennuie," responded that young woman. But her eyes said more than the words conveyed; they complimented Mrs. Anderson with a look of absolute abhorrence.

"What is it?" Nevius asked, who had seen but not understood. "What has she done?"

"I can't tell you."

"But you must, Jenny."

"I can't; I told Hilda and that's enough."

"No, dear Mrs. Anderson," Jones was saying. "Not Ben Hur; you are thinking of Mr. Gunter. Bradshaw is the author of Rabelais, Tristram Shandy and the Bride of Lammermoor."

"Yes, yes of course, but then you see I thought he was dead."

"Not dead, dear Mrs. Anderson, and that is just the point I was seeking to convey. Dead he is not, but departed, for the artist never dies. But how well Scalchi sang last night. Don't you think her voice must have been changed in the cradle?"

From across the dinner-table Clayton Anderson, a fat man with a beard that concealed the total absence of chin, labored to the rescue of his wife.

"By the way, Jones, that was a nasty criticism the Saturday Review had of your book. Stupid sheet, isn't it?"

"Stupid? not a bit. Only the year before last it had a most excellent article on manure. It is admirably edited, I assure you."

"By gad," snorted Anderson, an appreciative smile on his sodden, good-natured face. "If I had the editor's address I'd drop him a line and tell him what you say."

"Drop it in the sewer, it will get to him in time," Jones answered, and began anew at Anderson's wife.

Ablaut, who sat at Mrs. Nevius' left—James Ablaut, Jr., a large red-headed man, who dripped platitude and exhaled stupidity from every pore, yet the son of a Patriarch and as such supposed to be possessed of social power—grinned contentedly at his truffles.

Mrs. Nevius turned to the novelist: "Tell me," she said, in reference to an episode which was then occupying not only society but the newspapers of two worlds as well—a husband who, surprising his wife with her lover, had killed the latter almost in the woman's arms. "Tell me, what do you think of the Ex affair. Is it not terrible?"

"Terrible in its selfishness, yes," Jones answered. "And still more terrible in its bad taste."

"We men of the world—" Ablaut, anxious to get an oar in, began, but Jones was too quick for him.

"There's a plural that is singular. Now, Mrs. Carol, since you do me the honor to ask my opinion, I think it was Ex's duty to have made himself more attractive to his wife than any one else could, but having failed, having seen that he failed, the dog-in-the-manger act which he committed was abominable. If any shooting was necessary it was himself he should have shot. But all that sort of thing is out of date and bad form too. A man of the world never sees or hears anything that was not intended for him.

"You think he ought not to have made a fuss then? Well, perhaps; but when a man surprises his wife in that way——"

"He should apologize for the intrusion."

"And do nothing?"

"Oh, if he really feels the need of satisfaction, he might express some astonishment and say to the lover, 'Is it possible, sir, that you are embracing that lady without being obliged to?' A little remark of that kind can be as effective as a bullet and has the advantage of not raising the roof."

"Stuff and nonsense," objected Anderson pompously. "This man was a snake in the grass. He was Ex's friend and under cover of that friendship he led his wife astray. In Ex's place I should have done the same thing."

From where Mrs. Anderson sat came a ripple of laughter which silenced her husband strangely. Jones turned to him with serious mien:

"No, dear boy, permit me. A woman is never led astray. She trots, or gallops or bolts astray, but never is she led. Lovelace, Faust, Don Juan, rolled into one, are helpless where virtue is. Besides, in these days a man never makes the first advances, he hasn't time. It is the woman, always the woman, who—"

"Dear me!" Mrs. Nevius was making a fine show of indignation. "Dear me, are all women as bad as those in your books? Haven't you ever met any with a conscience?"

"Plenty, Mrs. Carol. Plenty. Some even with two."

And as the novelist through his shrewd, tortoise-rimmed glasses gazed at his hostess, that lady lowered her eyes.

At the other end of the table Nevius was chatting inaudibly with Miss Adulam, a girl less pretty than fetching, small of feature, with the flush of youth still in her face and about her that intangible something discernible only in the end-of-the-century virgin of higher New York life, that air which, while indicating total incapacity for wrong-doing, indicates also a perfect comprehension that wrong-doing exists; in short, a girl to whom a man may talk without the disheartening dread of seeming to say more than he means. Nevius had known her when she was in short frocks, and a few years previous, encountering her haphazard in Paris, had made her acquainted with his wife. Since then the two had been much together, Mrs. Nevius, who understood perfectly the advantages which a married woman possesses in the companionship of a decorative young woman that can be relied upon to hold her tongue, having grappled her to her heart with hooks of steel.

"So you are not going to Tuxedo," the girl was saying, though less for information perhaps than for conversation's sake.

"No, why should I?"

"Hilda goes to-morrow with the Andersons and Ablaut."

"Ah! I knew nothing of it. I did not even know they were to be here to-night. You either, for that matter. Hilda only told me when I got up-town. But what is this about Tuxedo?"

The girl shrugged a shoulder. "Some party they have made up. You don't mind?"

"It wouldn't matter much if I did, I fancy. Though if I seem to, it is only because of Mrs. Anderson, who is common as—as, well, let us say Narragansett Pier."

"She is your guest," Miss Adulam murmured.

"Very true." And for the moment Nevius subsided.

Presently there was a general move to the adjoining room. There Nevius sat with the girl, Jones occupying himself for literary purposes in drawing Mrs. Anderson out, the other men dividing their hostess' attention. But by eleven, husband and wife were alone.

As the front door closed for the last time, Nevius went over to where his wife was seated.

"I have been having a chat with Jenny."

"So I saw."

"What is it that Mrs. Anderson has been doing to her?"

Mrs. Nevius opened her great blue eyes in wonder.

"Doing to her? I am sure I don't know. What do you mean?"

"Jenny said she had told you."

"Oh, what nonsense. Dulcibella happened to be a little friendly with her and she went to work and imagined all sorts of things."

Nevius stared at his wife very blankly.

"I don't understand. What did she imagine?"

"How do I know? She's probably got her head farcie with the Deux Amies or some similar twaddle and is capable of imagining anything. Give me a cigarette will you? It's not worth talking about."

Nevius went back to the dining-room, but when he returned his face was grave.

"Do you know, Hilda, I wish you would drop that woman. What you tell me is not reassuring, but, independent of that, she has neither manners, breeding nor brains. And how should she! Her grandfather was a Tweedringer, her father the receiver of stolen goods, and yet in the List she has got her maiden name down as Wainwaring; why she is no more a Wainwaring than you are."

"That is one of her middle names, I think," Mrs. Nevius answered remotely. "But even otherwise, what does it matter? How can you be so old-fashioned? Nowadays people don't expect a patent of nobility in everyone they meet; what they do expect is money. Bella has a hundred thousand a year and no one would object if she called herself a Knickerbocker. Besides, is it her fault about her grandfather? I dare say if we got down to bottom facts the original Nevius was no better."

"The original Nevius was a Latin poet, but that's neither here nor there. I won't have her at dinner. She's a woman with preferences for everybody and attractions for none."

"She is nothing of the sort, she is very pretty, and anyway there is no use in your picking up Alphabet Jones' cigarette stumps. He never means a word he says; he talks and talks just for effect. I am tired and sick of him. Did you notice the way he spoke to Ablaut to-night? He doesn't seem to be aware of the difference in their positions."

Nevius smiled helplessly and tugged at his moustache. "I think he is, but I am quite sure he would not try to wound Ablaut by referring to it. Here, Michette!"

A black monster, amber of eye, the neck furred like a ruff, the tail fluttering like a banner, gazed through the portière. Leisurely it promenaded a haughty stare, interrogating the escritoire, the pedestalled lamps, the yellow shaded candles, the grave hangings, capacious chairs, cushioned lounges, plants, flowers and knicknacks with which the high-ceiled room was provided. Then, assured that all intruders had gone, it stepped gingerly and circuitously to where Nevius sat and with a sudden purr bounded to his side.

"There Michette, I know all about it. You don't like strangers any more than I do. Do you, you lobster?"

Michette opened and closed his eyes and purred profusely.

"And you have not the remotest desire to go to Tuxedo, have you?"

A thin smile came and vanished in the corners of Mrs. Nevius' mouth.

"Did Jenny tell you that, too?"

"That Michette—"

"Don't be absurd."

"Yes, she said you were all off to-morrow. do hope you won't be gone long."

"But, Carol, when I am here you see nothing of me. You come in just in time for dinner, and after that you are either talking business or writing letters. Oh, I know what you are going to say—that you are trying to make a fortune—but what good does that do me? I want to go out. I want to entertain and be entertained. I want to lead the life that my friends do; and, instead of that, I might just as well be at Bronx. You won't go to the opera, you won't go to the assemblies; last winter you would not even take me to Mrs. Bleecker's. If once in a century I ask people to dinner, unless you have Jenny on one side of you and Jones within call, you don't speak. And if it were my friends alone that you snubbed! But you won't even speak to my own family. There was a time when my mother used to beg me to bring you there. Now she never mentions your name. My father says you cut him in the street. But don't you know that you are making yourself very well hated? The lecture you have read me about Bella Anderson is all very well, but it would be the same thing in regard to any one else; it always has been. You objected to Viola Raritan, to the Yardes, to the Jerolomons, to this woman, that man and the other. Do you know what I think?"

And Mrs. Nevius, in spite of her manifest indignation, smiled frostily.

"Do you know what I think? You want a wife simply for domestic purposes; to pay the bills, talk to tradesmen, see that the machinery runs smooth; to be your housekeeper by day and your mistress at night."

"At least I want no other wife than you. It may be selfish of me to act as I do; no doubt it is, but since I have got into these companies I haven't a moment."

Mrs. Nevius, whose cigarette had gone out, relighted it, and for a while puffed meditatively. Presently the cigarette was put aside, her features relaxed, and she looked up at her husband with great amiability.

"There, Carol, forgive me. I am out of sorts. I know you work hard; say the word, and I wont go to Tuxedo."

"But Hilda, I am delighted to have you go if it amuses you. The only thing is—"

"Well, what?"

"Your companions."

"What a goose you are. The Andersons are received. Whatever you may say, Belle is perfectly presentable.

"Oh I don't mean to imply that she eats sweets with a spoon; nor was it so much of her I was thinking. Ablaut is all very well in his way, but don't you think he is too much in yours? Don't you think if he is tagging after you down there that people will gossip?"

Mrs. Nevius gave a twist to her skirt and laughed for sheer joy.

"You dear thing, are you jealous? Tell me, Carol, are you?"

Nevius tormented the tip of his nose reflectively and glanced at his wife. She looked the embodiment of merriment, of coquetry too, of grace as well, and prettier even, more tantalizing and tentative than in the old prenuptial days. No, he was not jealous and said so.

"Now see," she continued, straightening herself and distributing wide breezes from an enormous fan. "See how little jealous I am. Every evening while I am away, Jenny is to dine with you."

"You don't mean that you asked her!"

"I did then, and she said she would like nothing better."

"But won't the servants think it odd?"

Mrs. Nevius gave him a curious, investigating look.

"What are the servants' thoughts to you?"

"Nothing. It was Jenny I was considering."

"She cares as little as you do. If I ask her, who is to object?"

"Not I, certainly. Jenny is very sweet, I am very fond of her, and if she comes I shall take it as very kind of her, but she is not you. It is you I want."

He leaned forward; there was a light in his eyes which she saw and recognized, but before he could reach her she was on her feet.

"There, Carol, behave. I am tired, and besides, anyone would think we were on our honeymoon still."

III.

"This is really delightful of you. I had hardly ventured to hope—"

"If you are going to be formal, Carol, I won't stay."

Miss Adulam, preceded by Michette, was entering the drawing-room. Such outer wraps as she may have worn had been laid aside, but her frock, cut sufficiently low in the neck to be suitable for evening wear, had none of the insignia of festival.

And now, as she stood holding a hand to him, there was about her a little simple air of dignity which a princess might seek and get not.

"I won't be called formal. I am not formal." And Nevius, raising the hand, touched the wrist with his lips.

From between the curtains at the end of the room a servant appeared, annunciant of dinner.

"But it is good of you," he continued. "It is worth while to be a bachelor to have such compensation as this."

Miss Adulam withdrew the hand.

"If Hilda had not insisted I should not be here," she said; "but she has been so good to me that it seemed stupid to refuse, particularly as it appeared, sir, that if I had, you would not have let her go."

"Aha! I'm a tyrant now, am I? All the same, Miss, I wish you would try to imply that you are here just a little for me."

"But I am," the girl exclaimed. "Really I am. If I were not very fond of you do you suppose I should be here at all?"

"There, that's something like, that's my dear old Jenny. Now let's go in and see what we are to have to eat. But afterward you must play. When I was younger, oh! ever so much younger, I swore a great oath that I would never marry a girl that did not. And Hilda, who did play at the time, has not touched a piano since. Her hand is no longer big enough for the octaves, if you please. That's the way we men get cheated. There!"

Nevius had seated his guest and taken the seat at her side.

"Put my things here," he called to the servant, for his place had been arranged at the other end. "And what is there to drink? Champagne and claret? No, I want moselle and seltzer. Serve the champagne to Miss Adulam. You won't have claret, will you? By George, I believe these are Mumford coves. I take that as being very thoughtful of Hilda. Maintenant," he added with just a glance to where the servant stood. "Causons. Et nos amours?"

"That's hardly the expression, is it?" The girl answered in French. "But after all he is so nice that call it what you like."

"He's a deuced lucky fellow, that's all I have got to say about him."

"Not so lucky, Carol. Not a penny, not one."

"And what of it? When I married I hadn't a penny either. But it's idiocy of him to stick in Texas. He won't make anything in cattle. That day has gone. This is the era of syndicates and New York is their home. Make him come back, Jenny. I can put him up to any number of things. Nevius and Tredegar! How does that sound?"

"Beautifully, Carol. But Jack won't do it. You know how obstinate he is; once an idea in his head and only a surgical operation could get it out."

"And his heart?"

Miss Adulam smiled demurely.

"Anyway," Nevius persisted, "you have something of your own."

"Eventually I shall have something; a hundred thousand, perhaps, but not more."

"But that's very neat. You could live comfortably on it in Paris and luxuriously in Florence. Of course it's not much here, and nothing at all in London. And you wouldn't care to live anywhere else, would you? After all, New York would be a mighty nice place, if it were not for the New Yorkers. Don't you think so?"

"Here," he called in English to the servant. "Give Miss Adulam some more champagne, and I want some more seltzer. What is there after this? Quails? I hate quails. Never have them again."

He turned to the girl.

"Does he write often?"

"Who? Jack? Every day."

"And what does he say?"

"Mais, Monsieur, vous me demandez des choses !"

"I didn't mean that." And Nevius shook with laughter. "Though I can fancy, of course," he added after a pause, which he purposely made significant.

'You are very impertinent, sir, and I am going home."

"Yes, of course. And that is just the odd thing; it is always an impertinence to divine a woman's thoughts. Her wishes passe encore."

"Why, aren't you ashamed of yourself?" and the girl turned on him a look which was meant to be quite severe yet was not. "I am afraid Alphabet Jones is corrupting your good manners."

"Do you know, Hilda said something of the sort last night. By the way, she intimated the other evening that Ablaut was in love with you."

"Carol!"

"She said something to the effect that he came here more to see you than anyone else. I shall tell Jack, Miss Jenny, mind that."

With an inappositeness which afterward was to occur to Nevius as curious in the extreme, the girl became abruptly barometric.

"Wasn't it nice this afternoon, so cold and brisk!"

"Cold? yes, it was certainly that, but I don't know what your idea of niceness is. It rained pitchforks down town, didn't it rain here? Why, Jenny, you are crying!"

But not a bit. The phantoms of twin tears had come and gone. Miss Adulam was mistress of herself at once."

"Poor Jack," she murmured.

"Why, you foolish thing," expostulated Nevius with much noise and indignation. "Damn Jack. No, forgive me, I didn't mean that. I don't know what I meant. I was only jesting anyway.

"What's all this," he cried furiously at the servant. "Carry it all away and serve the coffee in the other room."

"Come, Jenny," he added in another tongue and milder tone. "Let's have a cigarette in English."

Michette, who lay, a ball of fur, before the fire, stared indolently at their approach, then, his back arched, his tail full as a bludgeon, made crab-like zigzags across a rug.

"I know what you want, you lobster, you want some music to dance to."

And presently, the coffee disposed of, Nevius and Miss Adulam took seats at the piano and played a succession of resounding duets.

Whether Michette accompanied them with pirouettes and entrechats is not a part of history. The duets continued until, during a wonderful series of resounding accords, there came a ring, and Miss Adulam stood up.

"Thank you, Jenny. That went off very well, didn't it? And you will come to-morrow? You are sure it doesn't bore you?"

In a brotherly fashion he drew the girl to him and kissed her pure brow.

"Miss Adulam's maid."

A portière had been drawn. The servant entered and disappeared.

"Yes, certainly, I will come."

Nevius followed her to the hall, aided her with her cloak, accompanied her to the cab, and, as he re-entered the house, told himself that it would not be a bad idea at all to see what effect a letter from him might have on the obstinacy of Miss Adulam's lover.

IV.

A WEEK passed. Once Nevius read of his wife's presence at the country club to which she had gone, and once she wrote. But the letter was brief, relating mainly to household affairs and conveying but meager details as to the writer's occupation and environments.

Meanwhile Miss Adulam had been almost as good as her word. She had dined at Tenth street twice and on the intervening Sunday had lunched there as well.

On that evening Nevius dined with Michette. The cat was loquacious, but its loquacity was not of the interruptive order, and as it monologued interminably on what seemed to be the same subject, Nevius felt bored. As a relief, the cloth removed, he wrote to his wife.

That pleasure at an end, the boredom returned, loneliness as well, and for companionship's sake he looked in at the Athenæum club where he ran into Alphabet Jones and managed to kill an hour.

"I hear you are making money," the novelist between two whiffs remarked. "I hear you have enough to burn."

"I wish I had. No, I may have to go to Chicago in a day or two, I am afraid even that I may have to go abroad."

"It wouldn't frighten me a bit if I had to. Will your princess go too?"

"Oh, of course." And Nevius nodded with an air of assured conviction. "But how is the Muse? What are you writing now?

"Cheques, dear boy," Jones answered negligently. "Cheques, that's all."

"I thought you had something on the stocks."

"Stocks is the word. The pillory comes later."

"Your books are too confounded cynical, Alphabet. The public don't like it."

"But did I invent human nature?" And the novelist looked at his friend with an air ruminant and bovine in its innocence.

"I don't believe," retorted Nevius, "I don't believe at all that it is human nature for women to act as they do in your books. Anyone might think that New York was peopled with demireps."

"Perhaps. But then you see every one isn't blessed as you are."

"No, that's a fact, I admit. But even so, what is the use in choosing such subjects?"

"I choose a subject! Why, dear boy, a writer, if he happens to be worth his syndicate, never chooses a subject. The subject chooses him. He writes what he must, not what he might. That's a thing that the public can't understand. The secret of any work of value lies in the harmony existing between the subject and the author. And even then his one chance of success consists not only in yielding to the subject but in caressing it. Every artist knows that. Flaubert has rung his changes on it a thousand times.

"Oh, well, if you bring up your heavy artillery I surrender. After all I don't mean to abuse you."

"But I love to have you. The next time you have a moment skim over a history, and then come and tell me the name of one man of ability who has not been abused. And the greater the ability, the greater the abuse. It is the tribute that failure pays to success. Mediocrity is never discussed, and, being unforgiving, resents it. As for my books, if they please no one, doubtless they are poor, but if they pleased everybody I should consider them rot. Vox populi, vox stulti. The majority is always wrong. What would a Scotch and soda say to you?"

"That I am vile and vicious I suppose. No thanks. I think I will be getting home."

"By the way, if you and Madame go abroad, will Ablaut and Miss Adulam join you?"

"No, why should they?"

Jones lit a match and fumbled for a cigarette. "Are you sure you won't have anything? Where is that devilish case gone now! Ah, yes, here it is."

"Why did you ask?" Nevius repeated.

Jones glanced about the room. "For no reason, dear boy," he murmured apologetically. "For no reason. I had got to look upon you all as a family party, don't you see, and it occurred to me that—that—it occurred to me—"

Irritated by this mummery and hesitation. Nevius got from his seat. "I don't know what can have occurred to you, but if you fancy for one instant that anything, even platonism, exists between Ablaut and Jenny Adulam, I may just as well tell you that you are off, 'way off.'"

"I should think so;" and Jones smiled in his beard. "No, indeed. Wait a second, dear boy. No, indeed, I never gave the matter a thought. But that subject of platonism now is really very interesting. Speaking in the abstract of course, I believe in it, but not as you do. I think that the affection a nice girl may have for a man who is neither her brother nor her lover, a man I mean with whom she is constantly thrown in contact, is often of that order. But it is different with the man. It seems to me that however pure at heart he may be, however honest in intention, nature is apt to resent that negation of sex. And it is for that reason that platonic affection, or, more exactly, reciprocal platonism, is discoverable only among married people. Nature having had her way, has no slights to resent, and occupies herself, if at all, in directing the attention of the parties to the possibility of other enterprises. In such circumstances there are women who, noting in their husbands a decreasing desire for the pleasures of the tête-à-tête, appeal to the courts. There are others astute enough to understand that it is not in the nature of man to subsist on a single dish, and sufficiently refined not to give that bit of information to the newspapers. But there are also women whose fastidiousness is such that they are the first to desire a change in the menu. When this occurs there are husbands that return to the animal state and shriek for blood; there are others of finer breed who collaborate with their wives in an effort to observe the courtesies and amenities of civilized life while agreeing that individual tastes shall suffer no interference. Now there you have true platonism, the ideal state in which the ancients instructed us, the—"

"Ideal state of pigsty," Nevius gruffly interrupted. 'What's all this rubbish you are rehearsing on me?"

Amused and vatic, Jones set about polishing an eye-glass.

"Rubbish, is it, dear boy? Well, perhaps; but then we have been merely exchanging ideas. Do have a liquor."

"No. I'm off. Good-night."

Jones watched him go and nodded confidentially to himself. "Le menage à trois, c'est encore joli. Mais à quatre! Non, c'est d'un pur!"

V.

Mrs. Carol's return was unheralded. One evening after a dinner at the Down-Town Club, Nevius found her entrancing as an angel, but far better garbed, outstretched in the drawing-room. From beneath the hem of the skirt the gold clock-work of a stocking glistened, the blue eyes that met his own were languid and sultry, and as he bent over to kiss her there rose to greet him the fresh odors of iris and of health.

"There, don't muss me up."

Unabashed Nevius drew a chair to where she lay, and taking her hand held it in his own.

"I can never tell you how glad I am. And I have wanted you so. You enjoyed yourself, I hope. Tell me all about it. Are you glad to be back?"

Mrs. Nevius withdrew the hand he held, and with two fingers patted a yawn.

"Of course I am glad to be back. Carol, do be careful," she admonished, for he had bent toward her again. "There's some one there. Of course I am glad to be back. I hate living in a trunk. What is it, Rebecca?"

The servant had entered; a note on a tray.

"A letter for you, mem. And there's an answer, mem."

Nevius moved his chair. His wife stood up and went forward to a lamp. There she turned.

"You are not going out, are you?"

And as Nevius shook his head, she made a motion to the servant."

"I will ring."

The woman left the room, and Mrs. Nevius, seating herself at the escritoire, busied herself with pen and paper.

"Whom is it from, Hilda?"

The question must have entangled her thoughts. She took the sheet on which she was writing, tore it up and tossed it aside.

"How can I write if you keep talking to me?" she asked almost piteously. "It's from Frances."

Frances was her sister, Mrs. Montrion, and as Nevius gathered up the Post and tried to lose himself in the advertisements, the name evoked a series of incidents that were not at all to his taste. There was the liaison with a dyspeptic boor, which, however, had interested him remotely, if at all, until Mrs. Montrion took it into her head to have herself and the cavaliere servente chaperoned by Hilda during a trip abroad. At that he had rebelled, and his rebellion had not been lessened on learning the object, which was to enable the Snaiths, during Mrs. Montrion's absence, to secure evidence against that lady's husband, whereby she might obtain a divorce and marry her lover. But the plot had fallen through. Montrion was not a man to be trifled with, and his wife grew timorous of results. Then, too, the cavaliere servente, after the fashion of his kind, had bestowed his services elsewhere. The subject was not agreeable, and to dismiss it Nevius tried to lose himself in the columns of the Post. Before he succeeded, the answer was written, dispatched as well, and Hilda returned to the sofa.

Nevius threw the paper aside. "If you are glad to be back," he began with a bad attempt at banter, "at least you are not enthusiastic."

"But what do you expect? Here I am tired out, and besides after what you wrote I thought you would be on your way to Chicago."

"Yes, I remember. But I found it was not necessary and I am glad now it was not. I only wish you had wired. If I dined down town it was only because it is less appalling than the house when you are gone."

Mrs. Nevius smiled with bright frostiness.

"But you have had Jenny all the time. Dear me, Carol, what do you want? A seraglio?"

And as though in challenge, she raised a fan and unfurled it with a sudden click.

Nevius shook his head.

"It is not nice of you to speak that way. It's not like you either. You know that I want no one but yourself." As he spoke he bent toward her, but before he could touch her, Mrs. Nevius moved, and shoving him gently enough aside, sat upright, smiling still.

"Listen to me, Carol, how long have we been married? Nearly seven years. Now, tell me, don't you think that in seven years a woman may get just a little tired of that sort of thing." In her great blue eyes interrogations floated, and in the corners of her mouth was a candor which would have delighted Greuze. "For I am. And if you are not," she added with a gesture so wide that it took in all New York, "there are so many other women who would like nothing better."

Nevius was on his feet. Into his face had come a look which his wife had seen before, and at which, mentally, she retreated. But before he could speak, she was at his side, her arms about his neck, her lips on his.

"Dear," she murmured. "Couldn't you see that I was jesting. Don't you know it, Carol? Don't you know that if I thought you could look at another woman it would break my heart?"

With both hands on his shoulders she held him a little from her, and with a pathos that seemed charged with love and grief eternal, gazed into his face.

"Tell me?"

"I suppose so," he answered, though with a thoroughly masculine sigh. "But then, whatever I may do or leave undone, you come always first."

Mrs. Nevius' eyes lighted visibly. She led him back to where they had sat and for a while very sweetly discussed with him matters of common interest. At last she stood up again, declaring that it was late.

"I am going," she announced. "Are you coming presently?"

Nevius led her to the door and drew the portière that she might pass.

"And Carol, when you come don't forget the gas."

The portière fell again. Nevius returned to the Post. There was an editorial which he read unheedingly. From a cablegram he learned of an epidemic in the Orient. From another that an English duke had died without an heir. A paragraph in the financial column interested him. There was a statement which concerned his own interests. He got out a note book and studied some figures; an idea in connection with them occurred to him, and at the desk he jotted down some memoranda which he re-copied and tearing up the draft put the copy in his pocket. He looked at the clock, the half hour which he had given himself had gone and he went upstairs, the gas forgot.

The following afternoon, on returning to the house, he went directly to his own room. At the office he had found that the memoranda were not in his pocket. In ordinary circumstances he would have recalled the substance of any such paper unaided, but in this instance subsequent episodes had driven the purport from his mind. Not in his bed-room, however, nor in his dressing-room, was the paper to be found. He questioned the housemaid; she had no information to impart. Where is the housemaid that ever had? After all, he reflected, it was not a matter of life or death, and if it were lost, was it not as Hilda had often said, because he was fiendish in his carelessness? And he was about to give the matter up when he remembered that he had first made a draft which he had torn and thrown aside. There was a chance that the housemaid had left the scrap-basket undisturbed and, presently, after getting into evening dress, he went to the drawing-room below.

The lights were lit, on the table was the Post; there, against the wall, was the escritoire of lacquer work and brass on which he had written, and beside it a basket of beribboned velvet.

One glance was sufficient, the contents had not been touched, and, emptying them, he began to arrange them on the desk. Yes, they were all there. In a moment he had them not only in proper position, but with three pieces of paper to spare. These he would have brushed away, but something on one of them caught his eye —Dearest J—, written in his wife's hand. But what preceded the adjective, or what had followed the J, there was nothing to tell. The second scrap was larger, and on it was written he has not go—; on the third were two words and a fraction that must have come from the middle of a sentence—can't see y—.

Nevius stared at these little papers and, as he stared, all interest in his own memoranda evaporated.

He looked again in the basket. It was quite empty. Whether the other bits of that letter had fallen, not in the basket, but on the floor, and had then been swept away, he did not try to determine. Enough remained. The J, of course, was Ablaut—Jimmy, as he was familiarly called. As for the rest, a child could have supplied the missing words—He has not gone to Chicago; I can't see you to-night.

And this was Hilda! For a while he sat, staring at the scraps, conscious only that he was suffering, endeavoring even to delude himself into a belief that some explanation might set this horrible thing aright. But little by little, as the impossible merged into the actual, the understanding came to him that the worst that could be done had been done, and he ceased to suffer. It was time to act.

From the stair came a rustle of silk, the sound of a footfall that he knew. As yet he had no plan. But as he became aware that Mrs. Montrion's sister was entering the room he stood up. His lips may have been a trifle compressed, but otherwise he had his everyday air; he looked well groomed, sedate, anxious, if at all, merely that dinner should not be too long delayed.

Mrs. Nevius passed through the curtains, the light shuttling her hair, illuminating the rose of her mouth. In her blue eyes were evocations of summer, and beneath them, on her cheeks, on the lobes of her ears, health had placed its token in pink. She was adorably dressed, adorably constructed, and dressed and constructed to be adored. In one hand was a fan, in the other a fold of her gown. At sight of her husband she smiled.

Nevius stayed her with a question.

"What was it that Frances had to say that was so important last night?"

With that motion which a swan has, Mrs. Nevius turned her head and for a moment seemed lost in the query. But at once she must have recollected.

"Nothing. The address of a milliner. How are things in the Street?"

"And you gave her the address, did you?"

"Of course, I did. Why? But what do you mean by asking all these questions?"

"And you found it necessary to add that I had not gone to Chicago, and that you couldn't see her, didn't you?"

Mrs. Nevius' big blue eyes seemed to grow bigger and bluer, but to her face came a flush with which health had nothing to do.

"You found it necessary to add that, didn't you?"

The fan she held, she opened and closed.

"I am sure," she said at last, "I don't understand—"

"Look."

At the invitation, at the gesture which accompanied it, she crossed the room, peered down at the scraps, at the basket from which they had come, at the rug and floor. When she raised her head she turned on her husband a look of absolute scorn and, straightening herself, confronted him.

"You, you, Carol Nevius, condescend to fumble through waste papers! A scullery-maid might do such a thing, a gentleman—never."

"Ah? Perhaps. But it was not for sociological information that I asked you to look at these things. It is because they are addressed to Ablaut, who, I see, is your lover."

Mrs. Nevius stepped back. In her face had come an expression which a princess might assume to a lackey who had dared to question her. Then at once, as in a storm, a sky of buttercups and forget-me-nots will suddenly appear, the indignation vanished and she laughed outright.

"Why, you great goose, that was written to your Jenny."

And as Nevius contented himself with staring at her. "But how," she cried, "how is it possible for any one to be such an idiot as you are!"

"I don't see—"

"Then you shall. On our way to town Mrs. Manhattan offered me a box for next Friday. I thought I could get you to take both Jenny and myself. Last night before you came in I sat down to write to her. I told her of the offer, and referring to you I said, "If he has not got anything on hand I can't see yet but that we may persuade him." Then I heard you at the door, and determined I would ask you first. But did you give me time? Did you? Was ever a woman mauled as I was? Aren't you ashamed of yourself? No, but aren't you?"

"Will you forgive me?"

He was very penitent, very meek, very happy, and as his wife pretended to look as though she were not quite sure whether forgiveness could be granted to such a sinner, he caught her in his arms.

"Oh Carol!" muttered that aggrieved little woman, freeing herself as best she might. "How can you be so dreadful! Some one's there."

Between the curtains Rebecca stood in silent announcement of dinner.

VI.

For several days Nevius saw little of his wife. At no time had she been visible when he left the house, and now when he returned there seemed to be always some one at dinner. The cloth removed, he sought the library, a room on the second floor which separated his apartment from hers. By day it was gloomy, for light reached it from above but at night it was pleasant and very still. Lined on three sides with books, it was furnished with a wide table, easy chairs, a hanging lamp, and a sofa large as a bed. Here Nevius passed his evenings. Time was valuable to him just then; he had more documents to examine than he could handle at his office, and many a letter to read and write. Later, the work at an end, he would go in search of his wife, but in those days she must have been over-fatigued; her door was locked.

This regimen made him morose. That the effect was noticed is presumable. One evening he was gratified with the intelligence that he was to dine alone with Hilda, and incidentally that there was a surprise in store. What was it? Ah, voila! If she told, where would the surprise be?

In his delight at recovered companionship Nevius promptly forgot all about that surprise; during the service of the courses he talked of his plans and projects as he had not had the chance to talk for ages before, and when the meal was done and they had gone to the other room there was a caress in his manner which Mrs. Nevius understood.

"Now, Carol," she admonished, as he took a seat at her side. "Do behave, it's immoral, there's no other word for it."

"Immoral!"

"If it is not immoral then, it's worse. It is bourgeois."

From the past there floated to him memories of the old pre-nuptial days, when there had been no question of ethics, no question of customs, nothing in fact save a frank abandonment to love and life. But to those days he was incapable even of an allusion.

"It is not nice of you to talk like that," he answered. "You accused me some time ago of picking up Jones' cigarette stumps; a speech such as yours smacks of Mrs. Anderson a mile away. I have begged you so to drop her.

"Oho! I'm not nice, eh?" And Mrs. Carol nodded and smiled seductively. "Wait till you see. Now tell me, how have you been passing your evenings?"

"Very badly."

"But how, I mean. What have you been doing?"

"Writing letters."

"And how long has it taken you?"

"Two or three hours."

"Precisely. Now if by any combination of circumstances I were able to shorten those two or three hours into one, and mind I only say If, but if I were, would I be nice or would I not?"

To these propositions Nevius assented.

"Very good, will you come with me for a moment."

Mrs. Nevius led him to the floor above and threw open the library door. Seated at the table was a young woman of that type of blonde beauty which only a sight of creates in the average man a desire to jump straight down the possessor's throat. As the door opened she rose from her seat, and with a gesture, perhaps of embarrassment, her hand went to the side of her head and busied itself with a curl.

Mrs. Nevius looked at the girl, and in a little voice, which was used only on particular occasions, affably, from the tips of the lips, she murmured:

"This is Mr. Nevius, Miss Vührer." Then with a glance that stripped Miss Vührer from neck to heel, she turned to her husband.

"Miss Vührer is a stenographer. Oh, quite an expert, I believe. Miss Vührer thinks she can be of great assistance to you. If you have any letters to-night, why not let Miss Vührer show you her abilities?"

Whether or not this projection of peaches and cream into the privacy of the library caused Nevius pleasure or displeasure, not even a lady who was eying him could decide.

"Certainly," he answered, but he spoke in the matter-of-fact way which he brought into all business transactions. "Certainly, I make no doubt that Miss Vührer is competent, and I shall be glad of her assistance. Let me see. Yes, I have several letters. Perhaps—"

"I will leave you then."

With a sweet little bow to the young woman, Mrs. Nevius backed from the room and closed the door.

"Perhaps you will sit down, Miss Vührer. Yes, you might sit there, please. You have everything you require?"

Miss Vührer, a pad in her hand, a row of sharpened pencils before her, resumed her seat. Nevius dropped on the sofa, and after a glance at some papers, which he had taken from his pocket, began:

"Waters and Rivers, Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Illinois, Dear Sirs:—In reply to yours of the 18th I have to inform you that—"

And so on and so forth. For an hour the dictation continued uninterrupted, save by pauses of thought, and the tick of the clock on the mantel. Once Nevius heard the door bell ring, and once he found himself scrutinizing this blonde young creature, who rarely turned her eyes to him. The letters done, he stood up.

"Thank you, Miss Vührer, that will do. If you will copy out what you have, I can sign later on."

He left the room and went down the stairs. On the way he caught the sound of a voice, which, musical as the squawk of a bicycle he recognized at once, and on reaching the hall, picked up his hat and coat. But his step had been heard, his movements perhaps divined, there was a jostle of portière rings, and before he had got his arms well into the coat, Mrs. Carol was at his side.

"You are not going out, are you? Do come in. It's only Ablaut, you don't mind him."

"Not in the least, but I do mind his carrying off my best umbrella every time it rains, and I wish you would tell him so too."

"Oh, pooh! Who's afraid of you? Tell me," and Mrs. Carol came closer to her husband. "What do you think of her?"

"Miss Vühren? She is very pretty."

"Is she really!"

The air of surprise which Mrs. Nevius assumed could not have been dissimilar to that which the Duchess of Burgundy exhibited, when she learned that other women had five fingers like herself.

"Is she really! I didn't notice. How queer men are! But do come in."

"No, not just now. I have an odd feeling in my head, a walk will do me good."

And bending toward his wife he received from that lady a rapid and noiseless peck.

When Nevius returned Miss Vühren was about to leave. The drawing-room was dark and untenanted. He opened the door for the girl, wished her good night, and went in search of his wife. But Mrs. Nevius must have already retired. There was no answer to his knock.

VII.

Meanwhile nothing further had been said about Mrs. Manhattan's box. Mrs. Carol may have abandoned the project, and as for Nevius, the matter had passed from his mind. He had other things to think of. One evening he returned to the house later than usual; he was tired and looked cross. On entering the drawing room he found his wife already there. At the moment he said nothing, contenting himself with staring at her. Her gown was an artful combination of silk and tulle, colorless yet silvery, and in it, with a large fan and a low bodice, very delightful she was to behold. About her were the incendiary and not altogether definable emanations which the well sent-out of her sex not infrequently exhale, but of which she had made a study. There are women, few indeed, but there are women who merely in raising their arms define the reason of love, and Mrs. Nevius was one of them. The costume, however, and its attendant charms were not, Nevius understood, intended solely for his own delectation. A festival of some kind was imminent.

"Aren't you going to dress?"

As Mrs. Nevius spoke, the tips of her lips just moving, her chin a trifle advanced, her eyebrows arched, the blue splendors of her eyes dilating, she might have sat for Spring pouting at Winter.

With the sans-gêne of a married man, Nevius dropped in a chair.

"Anyone would think I had shot you," she added, after a pause which she made populous with interrogations.

Nevius straightened himself.

"How long will it take you to pack?"

"Two months."

"Hilda! do be serious."

"Two months I tell you. Not a minute less. But what has happened? I give you my word you look as though you had been studying the extradition treaty. What's gone wrong?"

"I go to Paris to-morrow and I want you to go too."

To this Mrs. Nevius made no reply unless the click of a fan may be so accounted.

"The Board of the Interocean Canal met to-day and they want me to go. In fact I have to. The stockholders, in spite of De Lesseps, are all there, and the Board needs more money. How much God only knows, and when I say God only I exaggerate—"

"Don't be coarse," Mrs. Carol interjected, but she spoke mechanically, her thoughts afar.

"I have the ticket, a cabine de luxe; it is big enough for three. Rebecca could get such things as you need in shape in no time. And it would be so sweet," he added.

This conclusion was allowed to pass unnoticed. With a gesture which was habitual to Mrs. Carol when called upon to think quickly, she raised a hand to her forehead. On one finger a great jewel glistened, but not more so than the finger-tip. When she lowered it her face was almost apathetic.

"It would be so sweet of you, Hilda."

Mrs. Nevius dropped her fan, patted a fold of the skirt, and, as though reflecting still, crossed to where he sat.

He was on his feet at once.

"I knew you would!" he cried, and caught her to him.

"How long are you to be gone?"

"Oh," he answered eagerly, "the time to get there and turn around."

Mrs. Carol freed herself.

"Dinner has been announced. Let us go in."

"Yes, and let's have some champagne. Do you remember the St. Marceau we used to get? Do you remember the little restaurant we went to one night on the other side of the Seine? Do you remember—"

The memories of other days returned, too abundant, too fragrant, too sacred even, for enumeration while the servant was there. But during the progress of the meal there was plenty of animation in that room, many a jest and many a laugh. The jests, however, came from him. Mrs. Carol smiled and nodded, and nodded and smiled, but otherwise her contributions to the gaiety were slight. At last they moved again to the adjoining room. There, when they had got seated, she took his hand in hers.

"Carol, I can't go."

Surprise, annoyance too, lifted him from the seat.

"Now wait." With but a gesture she had him back again. "If you insist I will obey you, but—"

"Obey me, why—"

"But it will be very selfish of you. I am not a bagman's wife, Carol. I can't leave New York at a moment's notice. In spite of your attitude I have some small position in society. I have engagements to keep, duties to which I must attend. I have my friends, my family. What would they all say? But supposing I were to go. Who would look after the house? When I got back it would be in rack and ruin. You're to be gone but a few weeks. Surely after nearly seven years you can do without me for that space of time. And I would only be in your way. But look at it from a different point. Supposing, as many a woman has, I not only refused to go, but refused to let you. Whereas I am going to do everything to get you off comfortably, and not only that, but I shall be on the dock to welcome you home. Only on one condition though—"

And as he manifested no earthly interest in the condition, as he looked sulky and very cross, she twisted about in such a manner that he was obliged to notice her, and repeated tentatively and seductively:

"Only on one condition though—"

"Well, what condition then?" he finally snarled.

But Mrs. Carol was very patient that evening; very tender. She stroked him much as she might a big baby.

"That you promise, no, but faithfully and honestly promise to be back in six weeks."

By way of answer Nevius bit his lip.

"And see," she continued, "I was going to Mrs. Usselex' to-night. I was going to make you take me too. Yes, whether you liked it or not. But Mrs. Usselex will have to do without me. Why, Carol, I wouldn't leave you to-night, no not to sup with the queen."

She touched a bell.

"Rebecca," she ordered when the servant appeared. "There was a cab to be here at eleven. Countermand it, and tell Miss Vühres not to wait."

These commands distributed she turned again to her husband.

A glance was enough to tell her that his annoyance had gone, that presently he would accept the situation, its logic as well, and with some inward approbation of her own prowess she stood manfully to the guns.

"You can do so many little things for me, too, Carol. I want corsets of that woman in the Rue de la Paix. I want gloves from the Louvre and lingerie from Doucet. If you tell the corset woman I want six more like the last she will understand. And you must order them as soon as you get there. Corsets take forever. And the gloves—but I had best make a list. You won't lose it, will you? Oh, if it were April now how I would jump at the chance. In the winter Paris gives me the horrors. You must be good, though; no flirtations, rien des horizontales. Do you hear?"

Yes, he had heard; he gave the required promise, but absently, his eyes on the rug.

"And you must take good care of yourself, too. You mustn't tire yourself out, and catch one of those horrid Paris fevers. If you did, though," she added after a moment, "how I would fly to you!"

The words were nothing. But in the intonation, in the expression of anxiety her face took on, there was a tenderness, a solicitude, an affection so sincere and abiding that Nevius felt ashamed.

It was selfishness, he reflected, to wish her to accompany him on a disagreeable trip, and it was surly of him now that he saw the selfishness of the wish to sit staring at the intricacies of the rug. But still, though he said nothing, his face spoke for him and presently when he put his arm about her Mrs. Nevius felt that the battle was won.

VIII.

Save in New York, and in the antipodes, the early winter is rarely pleasant. But when Nevius reached Paris the sky was white as tin and in the air that sparkle which Fifth avenue knows in March.

He descended, to use an idiom of the land, at a small hotel in the Rue Castiglione, where he was greeted as only those are who are magnificent with small coin.

"Seigneur! I who dreamed of Monsieur the night of the day before yesterday. No, it does good to the eyes to again see Monsieur. And Madame? She carries herself always well? Ah, how I am content! God of gods, to say that I of it have dreamed!"

It was the janitress, obese and fulsome, welcoming him in the excesses of her tongue.

"And Baptiste? It is there he is. The trunks of Monsieur to the number 12, and let it not loiter. And hey!" she cried with much haughtiness to an interloper who had opened the cab-door and was now officious in the transfer of the luggage, "And hey, species of calf's head marined in mud, go, I pray you, a little that way and see if I there am."

Number 12, in which Nevius presently found himself, was a yellow suite, where he had brought his wife on each of their visits to Paris. Though two years had passed since the last trip, apparently nothing had happened to it, it was as ornate and trivial as before. He had but to close his eyes and fancy her calling to him, as she was wont to do from the room beyond, and, for a while, in an absurd, canary-covered armchair he sat reminiscent.

The journey over had been uneventful, as such journeys ever are. There was the usual number of merry commercial gentlemen in the smoking-room, and on deck, blanketed in sedan-chairs, the usual quota of unalluring dames. Apart from a man whom he remembered but whose name he could not recall, he had barely exchanged a word with anyone. But then, he had not been well. On the second day out the curious sensation of a lancinating burn had come and gone, leaving him perplexed as to the cause, yet mindful of an anterior, though less acute attack. On the morrow there was nothing, a heavy feeling merely, which he attributed to the effects of the sea, and which remained with him until the voyage was done.

And now, as he sat in the little sitting-room, he felt he was ill, yet after the fashion of men to whom illness exists only through hearsay, he refused to admit it. He would dine, he told himself, and look in at the Comedie. For though he objected to theatres in New York, there was no weariness to him in that home of perfect acting and perfect French.

Contrary to precedent, the prescription did him good. On the morrow he awoke, if not alert, at least refreshed, and after a breakfast of coffee and the Figaro—in which he learned that Mr. Cleveland had the Constitution of the United States tatooed on his back—he went to the corset woman, across the way to Doucet, afterward in search of gloves to the Louvre, and it was only these matters attended to, that he bethought him of the duties which had brought him to France.

Business in that country is not transacted with the same dash which has made the success of our own. The agents whom Nevius visited were not to be hurried. There was a preliminary plenitude of form to be observed, punctuated, it is true, with abundant promises. But the Canal Company, albeit in its quality of corporation, without a soul, had, nevertheless, a stomach, and Nevius was fully aware that that stomach was not to be fed and be filled on the faith of to-morrow's baked meats. Yet beautifully clear was it made to him that it was precisely on food of that kind that the company would have to subsist until a general meeting could be called and terms arranged. Meanwhile, the agents would be only too glad to have him breakfast with them, dine with them and sup, as well.

Under the diligent supervision of friends encountered and recovered, a week was helped away without any abuse of these offers. The corset woman, he found, was not as dilatory as she had been represented; already a package of her wares had come, another from Doucet, too. As for the gloves, long since they had been in his keeping. The machinery in the agent's office was at last at work, and in a fortnight, so far as he was then capable of determining, there would be nothing to prevent his return.

On the morning of the ninth day after his arrival there came to him, with the coffee and the Figaro, a batch of letters postmarked New York. Among them was one of blue paper, stamped with the Nevius crest, directed in his wife's familiar hand. Oh, he had been awaiting it, calculating when it would arrive, devoured by impatience, hoping even that tide and weather favoring, it might reach him the day before. But now it had come, and letting the other letters lay where they were, he opened it, his eyes glad and eager.

"Dear Carol:

"I have bad news for you, or, at least what seems bad to me. Your whole affair with that woman has come out. My father has been told, and he says that if I do not come to him at once he will disinherit me. Precisely what course he will pursue I do not know; indeed since I first learned of your conduct I have been so dumb and crushed that the family have seen that I am incapable of acting for myself, and have taken the matter entirely out of my hands. But, independent of them, I know that you will agree with me, that it is best that we should part. For years we have led different lives; you never would take me anywhere; your pleasures were your own, not mine. But I will not reproach you. I know your nature, and how you resent interference. Hereafter there will be no one to bother you. A bachelor's life, without ties or duties, is what you prefer. As for myself, I may tell you that a more wretched, broken-hearted woman does not exist. In separating myself from you, I say good-bye to so much—to my wasted years, to my ruined youth, to love, to happiness and to life. But it must be said, and in such grief as you would pity could you see, I say it. So soon as I am able I leave this empty and dishonored house; there are other women that will come to you in it, be truer to them than you have been to me. I can write no more, my eyes are blinded with my tears.

"HILDA."

When Nevius finished this curious communication he neither changed color nor fainted away. But he did rumple it a little and then smoothed it out and read it again. It is a trick, he told himself, a forgery, a practical joke. But where was the trickster capable of perpetrating a jest such as that? "She must be mad," he reflected. "What affair of mine has come out? Why must she go to her father. Why is she dumb and crushed? Why—why—why—?"

But ask questions of canary-colored furniture in a Paris hotel and see how communicative it is. Yet to the soul that is sinking Hope throws a straw. With the idea that something in the other letters might convey a clue to the mystery he ran them over. One was from the Canal Company. He threw it down. Another was from his broker; he tossed it aside. A third was from Chicago; he let it lie unopened. But the fourth was more promising; in one corner it bore the neat imprint of the Athenæum Club and it was covered with the oblique scrawl with which Alphabet Jones was accustomed to distress his publishers and confuse his friends.

"Dear Reprobate:

"It is the way of this envious world to hate an adulterer. The brute has had such a confounded good time that the rest of us are jealous—an apothegm which you won't have to read twice to understand that I have been interviewed by Mrs. Carol. Yesterday I was sent for and I at once precipitated myself to renew the expression of my homage. Your princess was looking remarkably well, but of you and of one who shall be nameless she did not speak as she looked, in fact, it would be hyperbole to say that she was complimentary. Of course I reasoned with her as best I could. I told her that accidents increased the best of families; that woman proposes and a poor devil accepts; that matrimony is paved with improper attentions. But my arguments were treated like cob-webs. I was told that you had gone abroad to avoid trouble, and though I intimated that I should do the same thing, and moreover that disappearances were deceptive, I was warmly urged to advise you to remain where you are. As a consequence I advise you to do nothing of the sort, though, between ourselves, it is always stupid to come back and explain things which need no explanation, and as for exoneration only sinners feel the need of that. Perhaps then your best course is to study the maxims of that Hindu philosopher whose name is I Dhont Kare; try not to be any more particular than you have been in the observance of the XIth commandment; and, in any event, Tace et Memento. Divorces, as you may be aware, are quite modish this year. They are of all shades of green, cut low and behold, with or without frills as personal taste dictates, and are worn en train, sans pudeur et avec reproche.

"N. B.—Your wife would rather be dead than out of the fashion.

"With this for carte du pays, choose your own route. But which ever way you go, don't talk back, it is middle-class to begin with, and besides an insult ignored insults the insulter more than the insulted.

"Yours in the bonds of Christian fellowship,

"A. B. FENWICK CHISHOLM-JONES."

In a crescendo of bewilderment Nevius turned to the furniture again. "Am I asleep?" he asked. "Is this real, or a nightmare? Is it actual or am I insane? Who is it that shall be nameless? What is this rubbish about divorce? What is this obesity of the mind which Jones mistakes for wit? What does he mean by suggesting that I should remain where I am? Remain where I am! The steamer isn't built that can carry me fast enough. One word with Hilda, only one, and this farce will end?"

Yet would it? Presently, with a remorse that was childish in its poignancy, one by one he recalled the numberless instances in which he had refused to take her to this function and to that, the embargo he had placed on certain of her associates, the mortification which she must have felt because of his attitude to her family, his surliness to her friends, the utter perversity with which he had thwarted the one poor little wish she had ever expressed, the natural, feminine desire to entertain and be entertained in turn.

Ah, indeed, if it were because of these things she was to leave him, he had no defence, not one. He could only raise his hat and speed her on her way. No doubt she would be happier, oh, much happier without him.

But was such a thing possible? Could it be that the one being in all the world whom he loved, whom he had loved for seven years with a seven times seven increasing love, whom he loved now with a prodigality of affection of which he had been previously unaware, could it be possible that she was to leave him because of this?

The accusation in regard to the woman perplexed, he knew it to be a delusion, one which he could rout with a word. That which presently affected him was the suffering Hilda must endure because of her belief in it. In similar circumstances what would his sufferings be! Why they would drive him mad. But apart from that the thing which moved him most was the fact that she could condemn him unheard, that she could go to others for her knowledge of him. It was not a thing he could have done to her. Of that he was quite sure. But on what, after all, had the condemnation been based? He was not a saint, far from it. In spite of his present perplexity, there had been moments when his deportment to others had not been licit. But never, as the phrase is used, had there been an affair, fancies merely which at best, or at worst, had not outlasted a week. What was it then that had come out? Why was she dumb and crushed?

And then, suddenly as intuitions visit us unaided by anything more tangible than that intangible operation which has been christened unconscious cerebration, a clew appeared and vanished.

"By the living God! I believe it is some nastiness of that Mrs. Anderson. If it is—"

He had sprung to his feet; his hand clenched menaced the gilding of the cornice, the filmy yellow of the curtains, the world that lay beyond.

But the sound of his voice must have startled him; he crossed the room, ashamed of the outburst, and presently, aided by the understanding that if ever calm were required of him it was then, he sat down again and strove to think.

This was Monday. There would be no ship from Havre till the end of the week, but on Wednesday there was a choice of boats that sailed from Southampton and Liverpool. It was now high noon. At three the Club-train left for London. By midnight he could be there. On the morrow he could engage passage. The day after he could sail. A week later he would be in New York, and one hour after he put foot on shore this nightmare would be dissipated and Hilda in his arms. Was he not sure of her, and how few the words that would serve to make her sure of him?

Closing his eyes he saw her again, as he had seen her the morning of his departure, her dark hair falling about the sweetness of her face, and in a voice that seemed tremulous with emotion, imploring him to remember his promise to return to her soon.

Yes surely, that promise he would keep, and with a lunge at a tasseled cord, presently he had Baptiste attending to his traps.

"Not the trouble to come to take oneself off so swift, is it not, my sir? But my sir will re-come, very sure. The America, it is far however. Beautiful land, eno says, and rich! Ah, how I wish my sir me would lead with him!"

Baptiste pottered away, mumbling to himself. But Nevius had gone. There was a trinket at the jeweler's opposite which would look well on Hilda's throat. Then, too, there was a telegram to be sent to the Canal Company. These things accomplished, he was able to eat an omelette, and get to the remote Gare du Nord in time to catch the train.

The next morning he awoke bewildered. What had happened to the Rue Castiglione? Why was it so hushed? Where were the bird-like trills of the hawkers? What had been done to the roar and rumble of Paris? And that sky of glittering tin, a pall had been stretched across it.

The Rue Castiglione no doubt was as noisy and as bright as ever. It was in Jermyn street that he had awaked, in a room which overlooked the ghostliness of mews that lay dumb and hidden beneath a fog of leprous brown.

It was by candle that he dressed, and when at last he was able to set out for the steamship office his teeth chattered with the rawness of the air. Hell is supposed to be hot, but fancy it cold, and there can not be a pin to choose between it and London in December.

The steamship office was in Cockspur street, the throw of a stone beyond, but Nevius felt too numb and depressed to get there unfortified. He went back to the hotel, ordered some drink, and in the gloom of the coffee-room sat a while, a copy of the Times before him. But since when had that serious sheet appeared in pink?

Before he could account for such levity, the paper disappeared, the room as well, and when, long after, he issued from a terrible struggle with rushing waters he was lying on a bed; at his side was a little man with white whiskers.

Nevius opened his eyes wider:

"I must have fainted, didn't I?"

The little man nodded confidentially, with an air of approval.

"And a dom fine one it was altogether. Be easy a bit now, you're not to get up this day."

"But I've got to," Nevius answered. "I've got to get my ticket." Then he lost sight of the little man, and when the white whiskers again appeared it was after another combat with thunderclaps and torrential streams.

The little man was prophetic as a ballad. Nevius did not get up that day, nor on the morrow, either, though for a while he was permitted to look out at the dinginess of the empty mews. But he looked with little pleasure; he was weak and confused, and on his forehead above the left eye, a hot iron seemed to be searing the bone.

"What is it?" he asked.

"We've been kicking over the traces, haven't we?" the little man asserted with the same confidential approving air.

"Not a bit."

"And dom stupid it would be if we couldn't."

"But I haven't. I have been good as gold. I don't know what fiend of a microbe has battened on me. I don't know what can be the matter with my head."

"And we've been angry, too. Anger is a poison. We didn't know that, did we? Strychnine congests the brain, anger congests the liver."

"I don't see why you say that."

"When we go gunning for a lady in our sleep, we know what has happened when we were awake, don't we? We've got our system upset, we've got something on our mind, and as for that pain in our head, it's a taste of neuralgia that will leave us with a bit of quinine."

Nevius took the quinine, and to the burn in his forehead was added a roar in his ears. The night was white; barely did he close his eyes; to the agony of his temples was joined the agony of his thoughts. He tried to sleep, but the dual agony banished that benison, until at last he remembered the porter and through his aid succeeded in drugging himself with drink.

On the morrow, the little man changed the medicine; he ordered exalgine, and the burn in the forehead went. But not on that day was Nevius able to take ship, nor on the morrow, either. A week went by before he could go. Yet, meanwhile he had cabled to Hilda, telling her of his illness, imploring her from across the sea to remain where she was until he could reach her and show her that it was she he loved and none other.

This despatched he secured a prescription for a solution of opium, chloral and chloroform which did away with any further need of arousing the porter, and of which, when sleepless and in pain, he was to take one-half of one ounce.

It was on Thursday that he sailed. Eight days later, at six in the evening, he landed at Hoboken and drove to his house.

IX.

The house was empty as a vacant bier, barred and bolted, unlighted, and to his repeated summons dumb. None the less, through that curious optimism which will visit even the condemned, Nevius told himself that he was but the victim of some accident, presently to be explained. He was disheartened indeed during the trip across he had done little but prefigure the almost instant reunion, which must occur when he stood once again face to face with his wife, yet in spite of the agony of the disappointment, as he descended the steps he affected, through that duality common to certain natures, to make light of the whole thing, and wondered what had become of Michette.

"Drive to the Brevoort," he ordered.

But before the cab reached the avenue, the current of his thought had veered, and countermanding the first order, told the man to drive to the Snaiths. For it was there she must be. And, a cigarette between his lips, he threw himself back and resolutely dispossessed his mind of thought.

The cigarette done, he began on another. Before he had finished it, the carriage stopped at that corner of Madison avenue where, years before, he had sipped the brew whose effect was potent still. Through the glass above the door came a light from the hall beyond. The windows of the drawing-room, too, were lighted, and from the rooms on either side of the entrance there came also a filter of gas. Yes, she was there. And he rang the bell, not violently, but with a certain energy of his own.

"Where is Mrs. Nevius?"

The woman who had opened the door, started as at a malefactor, but immediately she recovered herself.

"I don't know, sir. Would you wish to see Mrs. Snaith?"

Nevius nodded. For the life of him he could not question the servant further. He entered a reception room and stalked to and fro, though whether for one minute or fifty, he afterward forgot. The intermediate was submerged and forever lost when Mrs. Snaith appeared. But the cabman remembered, and for the purpose of these pages that may suffice.

"Where is Hilda?" he asked, and, prompted by the teachings of an earlier education, he raised her hand to his lips.

Mrs. Snaith withdrew the hand and for a moment eyed him strabismally, then in the deprecatory manner which was peculiar to her, addressed the floor.

"We thought—that is, we heard—Hilda said that—you were to remain abroad."

"Where is she? I must see her."

Mrs. Snaith fluttered her pallid hands.

"She is not well. She is not well at all. In fact, she is too ill to see you."

"To ill to see me. What nonsense. I shall see her. Is she upstairs?"

As he spoke he turned. Mrs. Snaith made no attempt to detain him.

"Hilda is away," she remarked. "Mr. Snaith is upstairs if you care to see him, but won't the lawyers do?"

"Lawyers! What lawyers?"

Through sheer surprise Mrs. Snaith for the first time in her life looked him in the face.

"When did you get here?"

"An hour ago."

"And don't you know that the suit has been begun?"

Nevius had been standing, but at this statement he dropped into a chair and covered his eyes.

In a musing, contemplative way the lady gazed at him, and presently, with a sort of inquiring defiance, she added—

"Of course you won't contest it."

Nevius looked up. There was such bewilderment in his expression that the lady grew bolder.

"The lawyers say that it is a clear case," she announced a little loftily.

"A clear case of what? Do tell me what you mean."

"Hilda wrote to you I am sure."

"Hilda wrote nothing. She told me that an affair of mine had come out. That she was a broken-hearted woman because of it. The instant I got her letter I started to come here. If I have not got here sooner, it's through no fault of mine. But I cabled her; didn't she get it?"

Mrs. Snaith shrugged her shoulders.

"It's all very well to send cablegrams from London. What you ought to have done was to have behaved yourself in New York. And it's all very well for you to look at me that way. You know better than anyone. It took Hilda a long time before she could believe such a thing possible of either of you. But I knew what kind of a creature she was the first time I set eyes on her."

"But can't you tell me," Nevius cried, "can't you tell me whom you mean? '

Mrs. Snaith's thin lips filled with abundant scorn.

"Why, your mistress, of course, that Adulam girl—"

Nevius was on his feet by this time, the expression in his face was not pleasant to behold, he was quite white beside; and when he confronted the lady, as he instantly did, his voice was not wholly assured.

"I have never contradicted a woman in my life, never to my knowledge have I been uncivil to one, but—"

He hesitated, and with a gasp which must have been the escape of rage compressed, abruptly he mastered himself.

"Nor will I begin with you."

There was a bell on the table, he turned and touched it.

"But it is my duty to Miss Adulam to say—"

A servant appeared, and interrupting himself, he addressed her.

"Tell Mr. Snaith I wish to see him."

And as the servant disappeared he added:

"It is my duty to her to say that your accusation would be monstrous were it not absurd."

The lady smiled stealthily. Such a remark could be treated with disdain. And, smiling, left the room.

Nevius neither saw nor heeded. He stood, his head bowed, his hands behind his back, till there came a shuffle of feet in the hall, and an obese dwarf with an erysipeliptic skin halted in the doorway.

"Well? What do you want? I'll teach you to cut me in the street.

Nevius reached for his hat and put it on.

"Your wife has charged Miss Adulam—"

"My wife? My wife isn't in the habit of making charges—"

"Permit me, you are wrong, she is. It is not so long ago she hired a parcel of detectives to manufacture evidence against Montrion, and if Mrs. Montrion didn't use it, it was only because, as she told me herself, she was afraid Montrion would shoot her."

"It's a lie."

"What your wife says in regard to Miss Adulam may be so described. She knows it and so do you. What Hilda thinks I have yet to learn."

"If you don't know already, more fool you. If you have come here with any intention of contesting this suit, you might as well go back. The lawyers have daughters of their own and they say they'll make an example of you."

"Ah! you may tell them from me that I will contest it until the last armed court of appeals expires—which I suppose is just what they want."

"By God then, if you do, I'll ruin you."

"And you may say, too, that I shall be at the Brevoort until I can get into my own house, and meanwhile whenever they take a fancy to serve the summons—"

"You've been served," the dwarf shouted. "You've been served by publication. When I employ lawyers I get my money's worth. The papers are full of it."

Nevius ripped a glove in two.

"Do you mean that you have got Miss Adulam's name in connection with mine?"

In his voice were such angers, in his bearing such threats, that the dwarf wheeled like a rat surprised.

"Then you ought to be trampled under foot," Nevius gnashed, and striding after him cried, "In Hebrew there are four words for reptile, in my vocabulary there is but one—Snaith."

The old man squirmed to the stairs, shrieking obscenities, fearful of attack.

But the front door opened and closed. Nevius had gone.

X.

"Carol, this is the saddest thing that ever happened to me."

On reaching the hotel, Nevius, after securing rooms, had sent for the papers. On the first page of the one he first examined was his name in leaded type, and beneath it, written in that reporter spirit which stops not even at a column, was an account of the last sensation, the petition of Mrs. Carol Nevius for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery with Janet Adulam and Gertrude Vührer. Though he had eaten nothing since noon, he sickened as he read, and was obliged to put the page down. The remainder of the article declared that after a painful scene at his house he had confessed his misconduct and fled abroad. The other papers contained articles of similar tenour, though one, more enterprising perhaps, stated that the correspondents were the housemaid and the cook.

An hour passed before Nevius could hold a pen, then he had sent a message to Jones, and now, as the novelist, cloaked in an Inverness, the white of his neckcloth just visible, entered the room, there was no cynicism in his voice, a sympathy merely, abiding and sincere.

"The saddest," he repeated with just a glance at where the papers lay. "If there are words of consolation I do not know them."

"It is hideous," Nevius muttered. "I don't wonder you advised me to remain where I was—"

"Did I suppose—could any one suppose such a thing possible? When I read that drivel I was in a rage beside which the anger of Achilles was a fleeting annoyance. Your wife ought to be tarred and feathered."

Nevius raised a hand in protest.

"It is not her fault. It's that father-in-law of mine."

"Father-at-law you mean. But that's neither here nor there. The thing is done, and a more abominable iniquity never was committed. That your wife should wish a divorce, passe encore. But that in her effort to get it she should put a young girl into leaded type, a girl who was her intimate friend; a girl whose people were governors of New York at a time when the Snaiths, if they existed, were cleaning the streets; no, in the entire history of civilized life there is no parallel for it. And who is this other correspondent? Why didn't she stick to her and let Miss Adulam out?"

"Hilda had nothing to do with it!" Nevius answered dejectedly. "Don't say anything against her. I can't and won't permit it."

"Bosh."

But the novelist spoke in an undertone. From a box on the table he took a gold-tipped cigarette, at which article of London luxury he sniffed, and for a while there was silence in that room.

But presently Nevius, who had sat, his face in his hands, looked wearily up at his friend.

"What do they say?"

"Who? People in general? Every one seems to be very well pleased. Some of the men are indignant at the publicity, knowing how, in similar circumstances, they would feel themselves. Others are indignant, too, but their indignation is partly envy, partly disgust, at having no such chances themselves. As for the women, that is a different guitar. You have got one of their sacred sex into trouble, and as a body they won't forgive. Though individually, were you not rather compromising at present, you might toss monogrammed cambrics as before. On the whole, then, I may say that people in general are rather pleased than otherwise. There is a land where there is much joy over the sinner that repents. In the world we live in the joy is at his detection."

Nevius leaned across the table.

"Do you mean to say that it is believed?"

"Well, you know —" And for a second the unembarrassable Jones actually hesitated. "You see, Carol, to be frank with you, more or less, don't you know, for some time past people have connected Miss Adulam's name with yours. And they say, you know, that there were times when she—well, when she came to see you."

Nevius sank back.

"But even so," he queried. "Even so—"

"Oh, if you put it in that light, in any light for that matter, I am with you. Of course it was sufficient for me to see it stated that you had made a confession, to know that you had done nothing of the sort. It is what we don't do that gets into the papers, never what we have done, which after all," the novelist added to himself, "is sufficient for most of us. The point is here, however, people had doubts, now they have none. Naturally you will declare Miss Adulam innocent, and the world will treat her as though you had never opened your head. But tell me, what sort of evidence have they?"

"Evidence! As God is my witness that girl is as straight as your sister."

The reply came so abruptly, in a voice so indignant, and yet so earnest, that the novelist stared. Not for a moment had he doubted but that the facts were as Mrs. Nevius stated them.

His anger, his sympathy, too, were due to the knowledge that people of ordinary refinement do not permit certain forms of publicity. That Miss Adulam had taken a step aside, that Nevius had aided and abetted in the taking of that step, were matters which concerned him not in the least. To his thinking the wantonness of the whole affair consisted in the fact that Mrs. Nevius, in her desire for a divorce, had not gone about it in such a way that no one, not even the attorneys, could suspect that there was so much as a shred of linen which needed the services of a laundress. Men and women of decent breeding sunk their private grievances and separated with mutual delight, no doubt, but also with common courtesy. The act which Mrs. Nevius had committed was the act of a scullion, at best of a young person in Harlem. No matter how outraged she had felt, refinement should have inhibited her from disgracing a girl before the eyes of the multitude. It was that which had aroused his wrath, not once had the suspicion come to him that the charge might not be true.

But now as he stared at Nevius he saw that it was false. He was far too old a bird to be caught with chaff. He was far too good a critic of private theatricals not to know the true ring when he heard it, and as he saw in Nevius' face, in his bearing and attitude, that transfiguring innocence which only the guiltless can display, he pounded the table with his fist.

"By George then, if that's the case this whole matter is more damnable than it was before. Why, Carol, Bernhardt isn't in it with your wife."

"It isn't my wife, I tell you, it's her people. You know how they acted in regard to Montrion. They have done the same thing to me, with this difference, Fanny Mortrion was behind the scenes, and Hilda knew nothing until they got their trumped charges in shape. It must have nearly killed her, though, puzzle as I may, I don't see how they ever got her to believe them, and what's more, I don't believe they have. When I see her to-morrow it will take me just one minute to disabuse her mind. Her mother says she is ill, and God knows I am too."

"You've seen the mother, have you?

"Yes, she wouldn't tell me where Hilda was, she kept repeating that she was too ill to see any one."

"She was at the opera to night"; said Jones very quietly.

"Impossible!"

"You may well say that, but I saw her. She was with the Andersons in their box. I asked Anderson how she could show herself when the papers were dripping with the scandal she had made—"

"Well?"

"He laughed. 'She has come to enjoy her revenge!' he told me."

Nevius got up, went to the sideboard and pouring out a glass of whisky drank it off.

Jones watched him. When he turned the novelist added:

"In the circumstances I wouldn't try to see her. She has left you, it should be beneath your dignity to approach her in any way."

Nevius shook his head helplessly.

"How dense you are! You don't or wont understand. She is a woman after all, and no matter how she may suffer she has too much pride to show it. I think she ought not to have gone to the opera to-night, whether she believed this thing or whether she didn't, and I think too the Andersons alone could have had the bad taste to invite her. But none the less I make every excuse for her. Supposing our position reversed, what is there that I might not do?"

"He has the faith of a little child," the novelist mused, "it's pathetic."

"But tell me, what did she say when you saw her?"

"Nothing very pleasant. To be candid, she doesn't seem to have the same good opinion of you that you have of her."

And Jones, knocking the ashes from his cigarette, added meditatively:

"But then you may be both in error."

This little conclusion may not have reached Nevius; he was pacing the floor.

"I know I have been selfish," he muttered. "Damn selfish. But I can't understand—"

"See here, dear boy. I will go to her to-morrow. If she is to be argued with, I think I can handle her. But do you get to bed; it's after two, and you look like the devil. Leave the matter in my hands."

Nevius stopped short in his walk and gazed at his friend.

"Do you know I don't realize it? I can't realize it. But if by any chance I were convinced that she was not to return to me—"

A gesture completed the sentence.

"Bah!" And the novelist smiled complacently. "Suicide is out of fashion, dear boy, and vulgar too. Now listen to me. To-morrow the Snaiths will probably let you into your house. From what you said in your note I suppose you will want servants. I will attend to that. Now get to bed. I told you you looked like the devil, I should have said—you did. The devil is a very fascinating person, Carol, and unless you take some care of yourself you will entirely cease to resemble him."

Oh, no doubt; and the novelist gone, the care which Nevius proceeded to take of himself consisted in more whisky, and on top of it a draught of the London drug.

XI.

The morrow was charming, half spring, half autumn, with just that touch of frostiness which makes the blood beat fast. Nevius shivered, his eyes were heavy, his mind dull, his face yellow and blotched, the mouth drawn. He had looked at a mirror and had not looked again. Whisky bloats and opium disfigures. The ice water of a bath had brought a glow, but that had gone; he was trembling; it was a stimulant he needed, no doubt, and he called for absinthe.

With the drink a hall-boy came. There was a gentleman below with some keys and a message. Should he come up?

Nevius, his hand uncertain and vacillant, swallowed the absinthe before he spoke.

"Yes, he may come. And—what was it I wanted?—oh, fetch the morning papers."

But the drink did him good. And presently, at a knock, he opened the door.

Before him stood a stout, young Jew, revolting as uncleanliness and vulgarity could make him. Yet, who vaguely, despite his nose and his youth resembled Mr. Snaith.

"Is your name C. Nevius? Well, here's some keys and a summons."

Nevius closed the door, the keys and summons in his hand. By whom could he be summoned now? But the mandate was perfectly legible. The complainant was Hilda Nevius, and did he not in twenty days appear or answer, judgment for relief demanded would be taken by default. Signed, Tooth and Tooth.

Tooth and Tooth? Ah, yes, the divorce sharks. Service by publication was not sufficient then. Apparently these gentlemen were in haste. And to think that Hilda could be capable—

The boy had come with the papers, but his coming and going passed unmarked. For an hour, that seemed a minute, Nevius sat wondering at his wife. A man who suffers is never bored.

But what did the hall-boy want now? Mr. Harding, of the Chronicle, was below, was he? And Mr. Robinson, of the Despatch, and Mr. McGrath, of the Evening Star? Well, below, deeper down even, for all of him they might remain. And yet, had he only Hilda to consider? Was there not Jenny, too?

"Show them up," he ordered, and passing into the bed-room changed his dressing suit for morning garb. When he returned, the representatives of the press were there. Mr. Harding, who was sharpening a pencil, took the matter on himself.

"Mr. Nevius, I believe? Mr. Nevius, I have come to ask what you have to say in reply to the charges in yesterday's papers? You have seen them, I suppose?"

"Yes, I have seen it stated that I made a confession, and then, to escape the consequences, fled abroad. I had no confession to make; I made none, and the fact that I am here should, I think, be evidence that consequences do not intimidate me. To this I have nothing to add, except that the charges brought against the young women named in the complaint are absolutely without foundation."

"Shall you contest the suit?" inquired Mr. Robinson.

"If it is not withdrawn, as I am convinced it must be, I certainly shall."

"What have you to say in regard to Mrs. Nevius?"

"Mrs. Nevius does not enter into the matter.

There is no need for any mention of her name."

"You think then," began the representative of the Star, "that the suit was instigated by third parties?"

"I think nothing about it. I know. But this gentleman—" and Nevius indicated Mr. Harding "—asked if I had any statement to make. I have made one. If you will publish that and nothing else you will oblige me."

"But—"

"At this moment, I regret, I am occupied I must ask you to excuse me."

The door behind him was open, and through it he retreated, angry with himself, angry with fate, angry with the world.

When he returned, there was the hall-boy again. This time with a note from Jones to the effect that he had secured servants and would look in later on.

"I send you the keys." Nevius scribbled in reply. "Tell the servants to meet me at the house, and do come before midnight."

The answer despatched, he sat down and tried to think, to forget rather and not to remember.

XII.

Already the afternoon had taken itself off. A sun, red as ceiling-wax burned and subsided, leaving a sky of dead rose and water-green. Then shadows came, lapping the walls, devouring the furniture, creating abysses into which objects disappeared, mysteriously, one by one.

When night was wholly there, Nevius groped for his hat and gloves. Presently he was in the street, in a few minutes at his house. Yes. Jones had been as good as his word. There were lights in the windows and the outer door of the vestibule was open. With a latch-key he let himself in. The hall was chill, bleak too, sonorous beneath his tread. But where were the hangings and tapestries, where were the plants, the pedestalled lamps, the silken cushions, the candles with their yellow shades, all the attributes of ease that six weeks before had filled the drawing-room? Surely this was not his house, or else had the sheriffs passed that way. But it was his house, and why was it dismantelled? Where had the scent of the iris gone? Ah, yes; he remembered. These things were Hilda's, all of them, even to the scent of the iris, and in leaving him, necessarily she had taken her chattels too.

And the floor above! Truly were it not for the chill he might have thought it summer time and Hilda off to the sea-shore, so properly had little familiar things been put away. But what was that on her bureau from which everything else had gone? Nothing, a picture of himself merely, overlooked, no doubt, and forgotten. Yet was it a picture of himself? At least if he had ever had the youth and alertness with which the picture credited him, never would he have them again.

The library which so long and well had separated her room from his had, out of gratitude, perhaps, been left untouched. There were the yellow shelves of law, the darker tomes of history, and here, in smooth maroon, stamped with the Nevius crest, were the classics of Greece and Rome. Beyond were the caryatides of literary France, Corneille, Racine, Moliére, dusty and undisturbed. But this empty space beneath? Surely Hilda never could have taken away the little gifts she had made him before she bestowed that great gift which was herself. The Owen Meredith from which in the gardens of Bronx she had repeated to him:

> Since we parted yester eve,
> I do love thee, love, believe,
> Twelve times dearer, twelve times longer,
> One dream deeper, one night stronger,
> One sun surer, thus much more
> Than I loved thee, love, before.

The Aldrich from which he had read to her:

> But there will come a time, my love,
> When if I read our stars aright

I shall not linger at your side
With my adieux. Till then, good-night.
You wish that time were now? And I!
You do not blush to wish it so?
You would have blushed yourself to death
To own as much a year ago.

And the Sonnets of Proteus:

What shall it matter, when our heads are gray,
Whether we loved, or did not love to-day?

And the Swinburne:

A little while and we die: shall life not thrive as it may?
For no man under the sky lives twice, outliving his day.

But though the rhymes returned unprompted, where were the books? Where was the Festus, the Rosetti, the Tennyson? Surely she could not have taken these gifts away. But then, what had she done with herself? And why did the gas burn so dimly? Or was it a mist that had got to his eyes?

"I beg pardon, sir—"

Nevius started. At the door a man stood, coatless, looking at him. I am Patrick, sir; my wife is in the kitchen, would you—"

"Yes, of course. I know. Let me see—suppose you go to the Brevoort and get my things. Tell them to send the bill to my office. And what time is it? No, I can't eat anything, but if there is any whisky lying about, you might bring it up."

"Yes, sir; thank you, sir. Mr. Jones is in the parlor. Shall I ask him here?"

But before the novelist entered the room, Nevius lit a cigarette and hid his face in smoke.

"Well?"

"Well, I have seen your princess, and so far as I am concerned I can dispense with the honor of seeing her again. Calumny is to her what venom is to the adder, a sole defence. A harder, an unjuster woman I have never met, no not even in the masquerades of my own fiction. Her entire accusation has no other foundation than the tattle of the servants' hall."

"She is annoyed, Alphabet. So would I be. Don't say anything against her. You don't know her as I do. You don't know the letter she wrote me. Her heart is breaking. But when I see her to-morrow—"

"See her! You'll never see her till you meet in court. She is furious, not at all because of this thing, but because you have returned. Her attorney told her they would get a divorce in short order and here you are declaring you will contest it. You have upset her calculations. She fancied she could be free at once."

"Yes, but then she didn't understand. I assure you she will be very sorry when she learns the truth, very sorry indeed—"

"H'm," the novelist sniffed and smiled. "When she is, I send my resignation to psychology. She knows the truth, she has always known it. Never for a second has she believed the charge she has made."

"It is not Hilda; I have told you that. She wrote me that she was so dumb and crushed that her people took the matter entirely out of her hands."

On the table at which Jones had seated himself, was a pile of bills and letters. On the topmost was the imprint of the District Messenger Service. Leisurely the novelist reached for it. In the envelope were the vouchers of the month before. Jones drew out one, then another.

"Tell me," he presently asked, "when did you sail for Europe?"

"The second of December."

"Your wife's attorneys are Tooth and Tooth, are they not? So I thought. Will you look at this? It is dated 2d of December and addressed to Tooth and Tooth, who you will see detained the messenger one hour and sent an answer which seems to have been received by somebody who signed herself H. Nevius. Is it your wife's writing?"

The ticket he tossed across the table.

"Here is another, same date, same address. Here is another dated the 4th. Here is another dated the 5th. For a lady who was dumb and crushed, whose affairs had been taken entirely out of her hands, it seems to me that not only she was very agile with the pen but—"

Nevius sprang at him fiercely.

"But what? It is on evidence of that kind she has condemned me. Poor child, she knew no better. But you, who have accused her of listening to the tattle of the servants' hall, do you expect me to descend the back stairs, too? Give me those tickets."

Seizing and mutilating them he flung them at his feet, and in the same hot wrath blurted:

"If you have anything else to say against my wife, say it, but do you say it to me."

Reflectively the novelist contemplated his finger-tips, joined them, separated them, and joined them again.

"There is a little operation I must perform on you, Carol. One which will pain, but which is necessary and charitable."

Mystified by this preamble, Nevius stared.

Jones stood up, closed the door, and whispered to his friend.

The latter shrank, his eyes dilated, his mouth agape.

"No, no, tell me; she never said that!"

"She has then, not to me alone, but to everyone. That sweet little friend of hers, Mrs. Anderson, with whom she is stopping, fairly revels in it. There isn't a man in town, nor a woman either, that won't hear it to-morrow."

When Jones got the scalpel in his hand he knew where and how to cut. But then in this instance he was a trifle annoyed at the slur on his friend.

"When I heard it," he continued, "I did not see the object. I have since. Mrs. Carol understands what a mess she has made of it all, and she is trying to exculpate herself at any cost. If there is a single thing believable or unbelievable that she and Mrs. Anderson are capable of inventing to your discredit, invent it they will, and proclaim it too."

Nevius bowed his head. The hot wrath must have gone.

"How sorry she will be," he muttered. "How sorry, how sorry, how sorry she will be."

What was there in that for Jones to laugh at? Yet laugh he did.

"My little Hilda!" Covering his face, Nevius leaned down and rested his arms on the table. When he again looked up his eyes may have been red, but they were steadfast still.

"Wait. Wait until I see her. For she must see me, or—"

"Yes, I told her your ultimatum of last night. Would you like to know what she said? It is not pleasant, but if it removes this cataract of yours I don't mind. She said, and very affably, mind you, in that little voice which I have heard her affect when she wishes to impress: 'Tell that man that nothing he might do could cause me greater pleasure, except to send him the pistol with which to do it.'"

As in pain which is acute, Nevius dug his nails into the palms of his hands, and for a while his face, tortured with the retroacting currents of conflicting thought, expressed only a suffering, sentient and visible. But gradually the hands relaxed, the expression modified, and you would have said that the cure which Jones had attempted was without effect.

"From what you say," he ventured at last, "I must believe that Hilda's condemnation of me is complete. But then I have been horribly selfish—"

"Her condemnation is so complete," the novelist interrupted "that it absolves you from condemning her. In the total lack not only of justice but of decency which she displays, comfort yourself as you seem disposed to do, by being charitable to her and unjust to yourself. It is not nineteenth century, no, but by gad, its red-heel. Carol, I want you for a book."

"—So selfish," Nevius repeated, "that some day when you see her I want you to tell her that I regret it from the bottom of my heart."

For a moment he looked down and away, but almost immediately, with a smile that was its own apology, he added:

"It's best to take people as they find us, isn't it, Alphabet? You have been very good to me, very considerate, and you have borne magnificently with my ill temper. I want to thank you, but I can't. I am a trifle tired, perhaps—"

"Yes, you had better get to bed. But I want to thank you, and I can, for teaching me that phrase. It is best to take people as they find us. E vero ed é ben trovato. Trovato? E ben Trovatore!"

"What is that saying of Ingall's?" he mused as he passed down the stair. "'It is just as well to let dynamite alone, particularly when it happens to be intelligent and has a grievance.' When Nevius understands what I do, he will kill that woman, and by George, when he does, for the first time in my life I shall want to be on the jury."

"Patrick, is that you?" he interrupted himself to ask. "Patrick, do you keep an eye on Mr. Nevius, he is not at all well. Should he be ill during the night send for me at once, don't call a messenger, ring up a cab, and tell the driver it's a fiver if he gets me here in no time."

With that, this serviceable writer of immoral fiction buttoned his Inverness and left the house.

"Patrick," said Nevius a little later, "here is a prescription, take it to Asquith's on the corner, get it filled and tell the druggist I want to speak to him. You found some whisky, did you? Very good, put it there."

Pouring a little of the liquor out, he drank it off. Under its influence the stupor fell from him. He began a letter, which must have been difficult however; the right words would not always come and there was a blur in his eyes besides. But he got it done, and addressing it to his wife, immediately be began another to Miss Adulam, a third to Tredegar. In writing these also his pen often stopped, hesitant and perplexed, but when at last they were all finished, and on a fresh sheet he began the "Know all men by these presents;" his pen went rapidly enough, as he devised his property, real and personal, of whatever kind, nature and description, to Hilda Nevius, her heirs, executors and assigns forever.

"The druggist is below, sir." At the door stood Patrick. "Shall I leave the prescription with you?"

"Yes, put it there. Ask him up. And, Patrick, do you wait."

A moment, and Nevius rose in greeting of a meager man in a frock coat

"Mr. Asquith, this is very kind of you. Here is my will. Will you witness it for me?"

"Certainly, anything to oblige."

"I sign it then in your presence. Put your signature here, please, and your address. Patrick, I want you to witness it too. Thank you both very much."

"Nothing else, Mr. Nevius, is there?"

No, there was nothing, and presently when he was alone again he repeated that word a little sadly to himself.

"What was that I once heard Jones say?" he queried. "We should prolong life, not death? That is it; and this is death. Well, let me not prolong it."

Before him was the prescription; opening it he filled a goblet to the brim and tossed it off. How good it was! A little hot to the throat, a little cloying to the palate, but clean to the tongue, fragrant, too.

On the mantel lay his hat, he took it up and seating himself, his head covered, he drew on a glove and buttoned it. But why were the books, the yellow shelves of law, the darker tomes of history, retreating through that little space which he had noticed earlier in the night? Before he could account for anything so strange, the walls, too, had retreated, joy and fear, love and anguish, all had gone and in their stead was oblivion and rest for memory.

XIII.

"IMBECILE that you are! Don't you know, haven't I told you, haven't I arch-told you that nothing could cause her greater joy?"

"But what a reason! Am I to live merely because my death might gratify another?"

With an expression that was both furious and indulgent, Jones glowered in amicable rage.

"And truly," Nevius added, "I don't thank any of you."

Long before he had awaked, conscious, if at all, only that people were leaving the room. Presently he had recognized Patrick; at once the episode of the previous night returned, and with it the perception of failure. Later he learned that Patrick, attracted by his breathing, alarmed at his attitude, had sent for a physician, for Jones as well. The physician had been the first to arrive, and after hours of labor, had gone, threatening to prosecute the druggist.

But now, three days later, clothed and in his right mind the resurrected sat talking with his friend.

"No," Jones answered. "That would be mediæval. I mean nothing so Hugoesque. But, dear boy, you have no right to leave the planet until yon have shown this accusation to be as false as you and I know it to be. The bare bodkin may be simpler, but it is not at all chivalrous to leave Miss Adulam in the plight she is. Can't you understand that if this effort had succeeded even her own mother would have believed that the story was true? No, you must live for the reporters, you must live for your wife, and meanwhile get a verdict. When you have got that kill yourself as often as you like. Yet there is just the eccentricity of the whole thing. A man never commits suicide twice. If he recovers he has no desire to repeat the experiment, and if he doesn't that is the end of that. But don't you have anything to drink in this house?"

Oh, yes. Though little else had been discoverable drink there was in plenty, and presently, comforted by a Scotch and soda, the garrulous novelist ran on:

"But whatever possessed you to do a thing of that sort with your hat on? Do you know, that is what we call a document. I shall have a suicide in my next novel merely for that hat. I would give the whole story, for that matter, were it not so bald. It would not do for New York. Here the reporter can be as pornograph as the Marquess of Sade, if he knows how, and he usually does, but the novelist must be like Marguerite's home, chaste and pure. We are willing enough to applaud Tristan and Isolde, when it is put to music and sung in a language which is not a court-tongue. But beyond that we won't go. The unbribable Comstock won't let us. But even apart from that, I couldn't handle the thing. No one would think it probable, and to my reputation for realism a long farewell."

The novelist looked into his glass. "It's a good subject though. A deuced good subject. I might call it, let me see—I might call it Bagatelles, yes, Bagatelles or One of the Ten Commandments.

"Why not several of them while you are about it?"

"Several of the Ten Commandments?" Why, that would be a tip-top title. Take in all classes of readers. Dear boy, if you don't object I think I will."

Nevius jumped from his seat.

"If you say one word," he cried hotly, "one word that a microscopist could detect as referring to my wife, by the Lord Harry I'll put daylight through you.'

"Dear me!" mumbled Jones, "how was I to suppose that you were in love with her still?"

At that you should have heard Nevius bluster. How he ranted, how he raved! In love with her? The idea! No indeed, not he. And when at last for sheer lack of breath he stopped, of the entire diatribe Jones believed actually not one word.

But, false friend that he was, he nodded as though he did.

"That's right, that's the way to talk, that's the way you must talk to O'Donnell. We went over the whole matter to-day. He'll be here now at any moment."

And, vatic as usual, Mr. Jabez O'Donnell, a member of the bar, still young, yet already famous, a man with the face of a cherub and the guile of a fox, was promptly announced.

"This," said Jones, as the lawyer entered, "this, my dear O'Donnell, is my friend and brother in Christ, Mr. Carol Nevius. His retainer will be large, his refreshers abundant. Let me earnestly commend him to your care."

"Devil a bit of a retainer will I take;" the gentleman answered with great cordiality and a little brogue, "I am out for gore, not for coin."

"Bravely said," cried Jones, glass in hand, toasting the occasion, toasting everything, toasting illicit commerce. "You are pleased to meet Nevius, I know; and as for him, he radiates with delight."

And at the way Nevius smiled, any one might have thought that really he was enjoying himself. Yet, how curious it was that the moment the smile visited his lips, a verse of Byron's fluttered there too:

> "And if I laugh at any mortal thing
> 'Tis that I may not weep: and if I weep
> 'Tis that our nature can not always bring > Itself to apathy."

"Poseur!" sneered Jones, in an indignant aside.

Mr. O'Donnell seemed to appreciate. "I understand you, Mr. Nevius, I understand perfectly. It is a dreadful thing to have one's name in the papers."

"And still more dreadful not to."

This interruption came, of course, from the novelist. No one paid any attention to him. The lawyer continued:

"The outrage in this instance is heightened by the fact that there need have been no publicity at all. Professional etiquette, if nothing else, should have prevented Tooth and Tooth from serving you by publication. They tell me that they did not know you were a member of the bar, and as their acquaintance is limited to those who practice in the General Sessions, that is a thing which I can believe. They also tell me that Mrs. Nevius represented that you would not return to this country. They pretend to be vexed at the mistake, but I have reasons for thinking that they regard the whole business as an excellent advertisement. Now permit me to ask a question. What sort of a man is your father-in-law? They seemed to have been employed by him before. One would hardly think such a thing possible, but is he at all of their class of life?"

"Between the man who pays to have a young girl defamed and the men who take the money and do the job," Nevius promptly and grimly replied, "honors are easy."

"That they are, Mr. Nevius, that goes without saying. But if I ask, it is because from what Tooth and Tooth tell me he is not so dogmatic as he was before you returned. It appears that the night you landed he nearly gave up the ghost."

"He could have had no interest in doing so, however."

"No, precisely not, and perhaps for that reason he didn't. But understand me; Jones says that the plaintiff is not to be argued with, and is determined to push the thing to the end. If such be the case, there is no use losing time with her. But if her father were properly approached, might not something be done?"

"Beyond asking him to play pendulum I see nothing."

The lawyer laughed. "He hasn't inspired you with much regard, has he?"

"Yes," Nevius answered. "Yes, to such an extent even that I have put him in my will. Mr. Snaith is a member of the Society for the Protection of Animals, and in recognition of his affection for beasts, I have left him a mirror."

Jones rolled over in spasms of delight. "Oh! Carol! how I wish I had said that!"

In unconscious rememoration of the famous retort which in similar circumstances was fired point blank at another man of letters, Nevius turned to him and consolingly answered: "There, never mind, Alphabet. You will."

Then with a deprecatory glance at the lawyer, who was laughing still, he prepared to return to facts.

"Forgive me, Mr. O'Donnell. My levity is out of place, in poor taste as well. This is tragedy, not farce. You will believe me when I say that nothing is further from my mind than a desire to jest."

"I follow you there. I know quite how you feel. Years ago a man called on a physician; 'I am terribly depressed,' he said. 'I want something to stir me up.' 'Go and see Grimaldi,' the physician answered. 'He will make you laugh.' 'I am Grimaldi,' the patient replied. But to get down to business again. Tooth and Tooth have made a proposition, one however which they declare is made entirely on their own responsibility. It is this. They claim to have all the evidence they require against Miss Adulam, but the evidence against Miss Vührer, while equally plentiful, is not, to use their expression, so convenient. Now they offer to withdraw the charge against Miss Adulam, providing that you will supply them, through a third party of course, with a few additional facts concerning your acquaintance with Miss Vührer. This proposition, they wish me to assure you, is made solely out of deference to you. What shall I tell them?"

"What shall you tell them?" repeated Nevius wearily. "There is naturally no use in telling them that I am incapable of deserting the helpless, for they would not understand. But tell them I say they are shysters, that the suit may be withdrawn, that I have nothing to gain at their hands, and they will understand the message thoroughly."

"Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes," the uncrushable Jones threw in. "And by the way, Carol, Dona Ferentes! What a tip-top name for the plaintiff!"

The lawyer nodded to his client. "I might have expected such an answer. But look at it in this light, wouldn't it be better—"

"There can be no better," Nevius interrupted. "And no worse. Miss Adulam is a young gentlewoman whom I have known all my life. Could I in any way sacrifice myself for her I would do so, but I can not sacrifice an innocent girl, nor, pre-supposing I could, would Miss Adulam permit me. Of Miss Adulam's justification there is no manner of doubt. If Tooth and Tooth, in saying that they have all the evidence against her which they require, speak truthfully, they have been imposed upon, precisely as Mrs. Nevius has been. There can be no evidence. Not a charge can they substantiate. They may have perjury at command, no doubt they have, in which case we shall know how to act when we get it in court. As for Miss Vührer, I did not know her first name, nor how her last was written until I saw it in the complaint. I have seen her but four times in my life. I never knew that she existed until Mrs. Nevius brought her into this room. Were I to act as Tooth and Tooth suggest, what would you think of me? And what should I think of myself?"

The lawyer took a long breath before he spoke.

"They have got something, make up your mind to that, though whether it be perjury or not I can't say. But they intimate they are in a position to prove a confession made by you to Mrs. Nevius previous to your departure."

For a moment Nevius fumbled in a drawer of the table.

"Yes, I know," he answered. "I read something of the kind in the papers. But just look at this. When I sailed Mrs. Nevius gave me a list of things which she wanted me to get for her in Paris. This morning I sent them to her. Here is an acknowledgment from her mother. It is hardly supposable, is it, if I left Mrs. Nevius in the manner which Tooth and Tooth describe, that she should ask me the morning I sailed, to purchase corsets, gloves and lingerie?"

"The morning you sailed?'

"Certainly."

"And this list is in her handwriting?"

"It is."

"Why, then," exclaimed the lawyer, "they can trot out all the perjury they like. That bit of paper stumps them. The alleged offences were condoned."

To this Nevius assented absently. "There must be no such plea though. The denial of the allegations is all that is required. They can never prove one."

"No doubt, no doubt." And the lawyer rose to go. "But I do not need to tell you that the greatest mistake a man can make is to underrate his adversary's abilities."

"Unless it be," laughed Jones, "to overrate his own."

XIV.

Like a lethargic snake disturbed, winter dragged itself away. April came, and with it an eager glitter, the surprise of violets, skies of silk, wadded with films of white cotton, all the caresses and surrenders of spring.

Upper Fifth avenue was well in the movement, alive with smart traps, Piccadilly accents, gems of bonnets, and grooms, the arms folded, impassible, correct. In all the world prettier women there are not than in that parade which circles through the Park, and descends again just in time to intercept the dusk. No, nor daintier either.

And pretty and dainty as the prettiest and daintiest, Mrs. Carol Nevius looked that spring. On her lips was the pink of the sea-shell, and in the depths of her sultry blue eyes the faintest petition for that sympathy which imaginary wrongs deserve. Ah, it was a pleasure to see her.

That pleasure was not enjoyed by her husband. But in those days his pleasures were few. Women, whom he had known all his life, forgot to remember him. Men, with whom he had lived on terms of off-hand familiarity, had become punctiliously polite.

These things were nothing in comparison to others. The letter which he had sent rather blurred to his wife had been returned through Tooth and Tooth, with the intimation that he was persecuting her. The letter which he had sent to Miss Adulam had been answered by her mother; the girl was lying at the house of her uncle, Erastus Wilberforce, too ill to hold a pen. From Tredegar no answer came, a rumor merely that the boy was drinking himself to death.

Then, too, the divorce required in such haste that service by publication was necessary, languished, moribund and mute. And not at all because of the calendar. On motion it could have gone before a referee at once. But the Snaiths had other matters to attend to, though a girl was dying because of them, and a lad was throwing his life away.

Nevius ceased to be seen. His office was closed. The Canal Company, with perfect civility, dispensed with his services; other corporations for whom he had acted withdrew their business from his hands. That Mr. Snaith had been at work he understood, but it was long before he understood that that gentleman's object was to attack the sinews of war, and thereby, the law's delays continuing, to force him to capitulate. When the understanding did come to him, he reflected with some satisfaction that while skies were still fair he had cut that gentleman in the street.

Meanwhile, he stalked, uncompanioned, through the untellable loneliness of that ghastly house, seeking a clue to the mystery that was devastating three lives.

That Hilda had cared for him he had to believe, or else to regard her as an actress more consummate even than Rachel. For where was the actress who could assume a rôle and hold it, impeccably, not for a season alone, not so many nights a week, but every minute of seven years? That she knew her accusations to be false he was now convinced. With these for premises what conclusion could he draw? It could not be that after years of tenderness she had left him, because there were moments when he was irritable and perverse. No, surely that was not the cause. Nor could it be that she had left him because her father had threatened disinheritance. Judas, indeed, had been bribed, yet, while in the present instance the bribe was greater, still, though times had changed and living become more expensive, Nevius was unable to accept any solution such as that. Beside, not being a bit more heroic than the rest of us, a conclusion of that kind diminished him in his own esteem.

In the night of his perplexity a single ray had come. Jones had enjoyed a second conversation with this lady, in which Mrs. Nevius, after stating that the man whose name she had taken, was heedless beyond the power of words, that he had constantly borrowed her buttonhook, added, by way of summing up, that she had married him uniquely to go into society, and as he had refused to take her, he should bear the consequences without complaint.

That was the ray of light, tremulous and thin no doubt, but which, by reason of the darkness in which he groped, led him ultimately to what he regarded as the day. As stepping-stones he had two facts, one pathological, the other psychological. The pathological fact was this: Women who at recurrent intervals suffer greatly, are afflicted not only physically, but mentally as well. Their minds become the haunt of vagaries, of illusions, sometimes of madness, too. For these sufferings, for these vagaries and illusions, there is but one cure, one to which nature prompts — motherhood. The psychological fact hung like a corollary to the first. When a woman has lived seven years with a man and borne him no child, unintentionally it may be, yet instinctively that man she hates.

At the intervals alluded to, Hilda, he was aware, had suffered for days with an intensity of agony which was pitiful to behold. Moreover, as the years accumulated, the union had remained unblessed. Such maternal affection as she possessed had been given to him, to the cat; but Nature, who is not to be balked, was there and watching, and this was the revenge.

Such was the solution to which at last he arrived. The accusations which she had made had been hatched in the distemper of her brain, and the venomous hatred which she had abruptly displayed was but the working of a natural law.

Logical as it was, this solution did not by any means come at once. Winter had gone, spring was going, and still he groped until, aided by the ray which Jones had intercepted, suddenly he divined the truth. She is insane, he decided, and told himself that of that insanity he would cure her yet.

Thenceforth he had that for an aim. What loyalty, what gentleness, what divine courtesy and affection had not an English gentleman just displayed to a woman who had forever disgraced him, who stood, the whole world looking on, a convicted felon at the dock? And should he, Carol Nevius, be other than loyal, courteous and gentle too? The malady which had prompted that fair English girl to steal was the same, no doubt, as that which had prompted his wife to libel. And when at last the prison door re-opened, was not that English gentleman there waiting to take his wife in his arms and carry her off to where health and sanity might be. And when this trial was at an end should not he, too, take his wife in his arms and carry her thence and nurse and guard her until reason returned and love as well? Ah, indeed he would. The cases were not parallel, but if it comforted him to think so, let that comfort be not begrudged.

In this wise months retreated, but with June, presto! a change. Enervated by the delay, possessed, perhaps, of a clearer understanding of resources and temperaments, Mrs. Nevius, in spite of her father and his policy, goaded her attorneys into asking that the matter be brought before a referee.

The day on which that motion was asked and granted, a curious episode occurred. Mr. O'Donnell was offered by an individual whom previously he had never seen, ten thousand dollars in current coin if he would agree to let the suit go against his client, ten thousand more if he carried out the agreement.

"It is not enough," was O'Donnell's reply.

On the morrow the offer was doubled, and on the morrow the reply was the same.

XV.

The day was hot and humid. In Upper Fifth avenue green blinds were down, and grey doors were up. In the Park there were still carriages, but latterly smartness had been confined to the traps of the cocottes, the others had livery stables without, the provinces within. Society had vanished to cool retreats, to country houses, and distant shores. In Wall street the chief change was the disappearance of the high hat, the frequency of straw. Men walked more leisurely, too, fanning themselves, choosing the shadows; some were unwaistcoated, and some wore handkerchiefs about the neck.

But that little lady with a waist that would fit in a garter, and who, merely in stepping from her carriage, pervaded the Nassau corner with aromas of the Rue de la Paix, she surely should be at Newport. And that obese little man with the look of one to whom Truth is always stranger than Fiction, what was he doing at her side? Surely he belonged on the box.

And who were these females in clothes not made for them who had just got from a cab? Surely they were detectives, and their duty to protect the little lady from the machinations of that unliveried lackey at her side.

And who, too, was this ponderous person that was now addressing them all. Why had he such a terrible twang? And why, as he spoke, did his words sound like wind escaping from a bladder inflated?

Mystery to all but one that passed that way. And he, though it was hot and humid, at sight of them grew cold. To the lady he raised his hat, and passing into the building before which this disparate group was assembled, had, himself, shot like a rocket five stories high and landed in the office of the Hon. John Metuchen, appointed by the court referee in the case of Nevius versus Nevius.

There was O'Donnell, and there, talking to him, was a white-haired gentleman with a patrician bearing to whom the intruder was introduced.

"Mr. Metuchen, permit me, this is my client, Mr. Nevius."

"Your most obedient servant, sir," murmured that courtly old man. Thereat lawyer and client passed into an inner room.

Nevius dropped in a chair. "They're below," he mumbled. "But what has she come for? She can't testify."

"To the fact of the marriage, she must, and that there has been no previous application. But that done, presumably she will go."

"I did not expect—"

The sentence was never finished. Mrs. Carol had entered, and at sight of her the defendant grew mute. But he rose from his seat, reseating himself only when that ponderous person who followed had found her a chair. Immediately, Mr. Metuchen appeared. Then a man with paper and pencils, then two females, escorted by Mr. Snaith.

The room was large, high-ceiled, yet to Nevius it seemed very small. O'Donnell and he were at the end of a long table, at the other end of which Mr. Metuchen sat down. On the inner side was the stenographer. And beyond, at the window, the others had taken seat, all, in fact, save the ponderous person, who seemed inclined to stand and domineer.

He was saying something, but what? Nevius neither knew nor cared; he was watching his wife who presently, with that air and manner he loved so well, advanced a little and began to tell about one or two things which no one questioned. Then the business of the hearing seemed about to begin.

"Just bring your chair a little nearer, Becky."

Becky? Who was Becky? But as one of the females tilted her seat, Nevius recognized the Rebecca of old. But to what was she to testify?

"Now Becky," twanged the ponderous person, "what is your name? Rebecca Hawes? Very good. And how old are you, Becky? Very good. Have you ever seen this lady before? Oho! you've lived with her, have you? In what capacity? As waitress, eh? And have you ever seen that gentleman? Aha! He is Mr. Nevius, is he? Now Becky, what were your duties as waitress? To wait at table? To serve at meals? Very good, very good. And what else? You answered the door, did you? Aha! You answered the door! Now, Becky, in answering the door, in waiting on the table, did you ever see any one by the name of Janet Adulam? Oh, you have, have you? Often? Very often, eh? Very good, Becky, very good. Ever heard Mrs. Nevius say anything about her?"

"Ject," snapped O'Donnell.

"Well, Counsellor," the ponderous man with great affability retorted, "we won't quarrel over a little thing like that; I'll get at it in another way."

"Now, Becky," he continued, "Mrs. Nevius, so far as you could see, treated this Adulam girl like a friend, didn't she—"

Nevius raised a hand.

"I submit, your Honor, that the attorney should not be permitted to refer to this young gentlewoman in the manner which he has done."

The referee looked up.

"I think, Mr. Tooth, that Mr. Nevius is perhaps right—"

"Oh! oh!" the man protested, "that's only my way."

"The way of a cad," muttered Nevius.

But the attorney, accustomed since boyhood to being so described, caught up the thread unruffled.

"Now, Becky, am I to understand that you regarded this Miss Adulam as a friend of Mrs. Nevius? I am, am I? And why am I? Because she was always coming there, eh? Well, coming where? Oho! to the Nevius house! I see, I see. But you say she was always coming there. You don't mean that she liked it so much that she used to come when Mrs. Nevius wasn't at home? Oho, you do, do you? Well, now, Becky, do you remember any particular occasion that she came when Mrs. Nevius was not at home? Lots of them? Why, what could she do there in Mrs. Nevius' absence? Be kissed by Mr. Nevius! Do you mean to say that you saw Mr. Nevius kissing her? What, you have seen them in each other's arms! You saw them? you positively swear that you saw them? Very good, Becky, very good. Now, what else did they do? Ate and drank, did they? Well, while they were eating and drinking what did they talk about? You don't know? Don't you remember? Oh, you didn't understand, eh? And why not? Did they talk in whispers so that you couldn't hear? Oho! They talked in Spanish, did they? Or in Italian! Anyway they talked in some lingo you didn't understand. Now, then, Becky, when Mrs. Nevius was at home, you have heard Mr. Nevius talking to her, haven't you? Well tell us then what language he talked to her in? In English did he? No Italian folderols to his wife, eh? Only to Miss Adulam, eh? Very good, Becky, very good indeed. Now, when Mrs. Nevius was at home where did she sit at table? At the head of it, eh? And where did Mr. Nevius sit? At the foot, did he? Well, when this carousing was going on, where did Miss Adulam sit? At the head of the table, too? Took the wife's place, eh? And where did Mr. Nevius sit? Right beside her! Why, I thought you said he sat at the foot of the table! Oho! he only sat at the foot of the table when his wife was there! I see. But when Miss Adulam came he moved his seat, eh? Sat close to her, I suppose. Well, how close? Close enough, you say. And while they were sitting as close as they could get, they talked in a language you couldn't understand, did they? Now, when you had finished clearing up in the dining-room where did you go? Down stairs, eh? And when did you come up again? Two or three hours later, eh? Now, what had Miss Adulam and Mr. Nevius been doing in the meantime? You don't know, you say, but when, at the end of two or three hours, you came up stairs again, you found them in each other's arms. Is that what I am to understand? Very good. Now when did this occur? On the 10th of November, eh? And was anything of the kind repeated? On the 11th, eh? And on the 12th, and on the 14th? Did you tell any one of these goings on? Oh, you told Mrs. Nevius! What did she do? She accused her husband, did she? And what did he do? He confessed, eh? Confessed what? Confessed that he had been untrue, eh? Then what? Mr. Nevius went abroad did he? And what did Mrs. Nevius do? Packed up and left Mr. Nevius' house, eh? Has she seen Mr. Nevius since? Hasn't, eh? Very good, Becky; that will do for to-day."

And with an air of satisfaction that would have been unpardonable in Napoleon at Marengo, Mr. Tooth caressed his chin with one hand and waved the other at O'Donnell.

"Brother O'D, if you have any questions—"

"I have," O'Donnell answered shortly. "Hawes, look this way. Where are you living now?"

"At Mr. Snaith's."

"In what capacity?"

"Er—er—" The woman turned helplessly about, and suddenly spat, "Seamstress."

"Mr. Referee," said O'Donnell, "I beg you to remind Mrs. Nevius that she is not permitted to prompt the witness. Hawes," he continued, "look at me. How do you remember the dates you have given?"

The witness made no answer.

"Come, out with it."

"I—I—I wrote them down each time Miss Adulam came."

"With what object?"

"Mrs. Snaith told me to."

"When did she tell you?"

"I don't remember."

"Then you have got to remember. Did Mrs. Snaith tell you to keep a memorandum before Miss Adulam began to come to the house or afterward?"

"Afterward, sir."

"Do you swear to that?"

"Yes, sir."

"I thought you said you wrote the dates down each time Miss Adulam came."

"So I did, sir."

"Why did you?"

"Because Mrs. Snaith told me."

"A moment ago you said that Mrs. Snaith did not tell you to do so until afterward. Now, look at me, which is it? Did she tell you before or after?"

"Before."

"Do you swear to that?"

"Yes, sir."

"Do you know what the penalty for perjury is?"

"I object," threw in Mr. Tooth airily.

O'Donnell turned to Metuchen: "Here's a witness, your Honor, who swears to two contradictory statements, and as they are material to--"

'They are not material," retorted Mr. Tooth. "Mrs. Snaith has nothing to do with this suit. I have shown that Miss Adulam called on the defendant in the plaintiff's absence. I have also shown what occurred. When Mrs. Snaith learned the facts is irrelevant—"

"But not obscure," answered O'Donnell;

"Mr. Stenographer, when does witness swear Mrs. Snaith instructed her to take notes. Before Miss Adulam called? Thank you."

"Now, Hawes," he continued. "Besides keeping a memorandum for Mrs. Snaith, to whom did you mention these incidents?"

"To Mrs. Nevius, sir."

"When?"

"When she returned home, sir."

"When was that?"

"A few days later."

"That must have been about the 16th or 17th of November, wasn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"When did Mr. Nevius go abroad?"

"Some time in December."

"Were you present when Mrs. Nevius accused her husband of being untrue?"

"No, but—"

"I want no buts. Answer yes or no. Did you hear him admit the accusation?"

"Well—he—"

"Answer my question. Did you or did not you?"

"No, sir, I didn't, I—"

"That's enough. Of what was the parlor floor composed?"

"Of the dining-room, parlor and butler's pantry."

"On the first occasion when Miss Adulam called do you know of her being in any other part of the house than on the parlor floor?"

"No, sir."

"Can you on any of the subsequent occasions swear that she was in any other part of the house?"

"No, sir."

"Very good, Becky, that will do for this afternoon."

Mr. O'Donnell turned to his client, and with the air of one commenting on the weather remarked audibly yet indifferently: "Chops and tomato sauce!"

XVI.

Day in, day out, the testimony continued. The cook testified. The waitress recalled, testified anew. The cook testified again, and a third time the waitress took the stand. By common consent objections ceased. Questions inane, idiotic, indecent, passed unchallenged, unrebuked.

Nevius ceased to attend. The coarseness was disgusting enough, but apart from that the presence of one who continued to come perplexed and tormented him. To those who have agreed to be bound by form, no law ever codified is rigider, and but for its shackles, at the first hearing he would have called to her, "Hilda, this is unworthy of you; let us go." But no remonstrance being possible, it was easier to avoid that chamber where she listened exultingly to each fresh batch of scurrilities concerning himself.

For the exultation was there, one not dissimilar to that which that vestal must have displayed when her lover the gladiator fell and her delicate thumb reversed. It was this that unnerved him. He had fathomed the cause, but the effect he was unable to endure. But soon the exultation, the scurrilities must end, and then in what gentle ways would he woo her back to sanity and herself.

O'Donnell was not so sanguine. "They have got something," he would insist, "or else Tooth is milking his client. He consumes hours over nothing. Yesterday we learned what you preferred for breakfast. The fact that you drank moselle for dinner was shown to the satisfaction of every one, the stenographer included. Metuchen went into the other room; I read a paper. No one listened except the plaintiff, and, by the way, did you tell me that she was pretty? Why, she is hideous; never in all my life have I seen a woman with an expression as malignant as hers."

"Souvent femme varie," Nevius inconsequently replied.

"You are well rid of her. And the way she bullies Tooth! Were she a client of mine—however, that's not the point. Tooth must have something else. Thus far the testimony of the servants has the value of a zero from which the periphery has been eliminated. But even otherwise the testimony of detectives is valueless unless corroborated. Tooth knows that, and he knows, too, that I can show the servants to have been in the pay of Mrs. Snaith. Now who is to corroborate them, for, mark my words, some corroboration there will be. Tooth is waiting for something, he is consuming time with no other object. Now what is it?"

"There is nothing. You have heard all you will ever hear."

But O'Donnell was skeptical as a rag-picker, and with cause. When he next appeared in Tenth street the I-told-you-so was in his eye.

"We are sailing very close to the wind," he announced. "What do you suppose happened to-day?"

Nevius was not good at conundrums and said so.

"Your friend Miss Vührer appeared," the lawyer, with a great assumption of indifference, remarked, and then stopped to enjoy his client's surprise.

"Did she?" that client answered, but with an apathy that was stagnant. "I had forgotten that she lived."

"I had not, then. Though I admit I was not prepared for what occurred. Yesterday Tooth began with the waitress about her, showed that you were closeted with her for hours and exhibited a hair-pin which was found on that sofa where you are sitting now. I had so little difficulty in putting that hair-pin straight back into Mrs. Nevius' hair that even Metuchen laughed."

"Well?"

"Well, that was merely the prelude. This morning she appeared, as Jones would say, in impropriâ personâ. No, Nevius, she is worse than Becky, though, after all, she must get higher pay. With her was counsel, if you please, retained, of course, by Tooth. Pennell his name is, B. F. Pennell. When I saw him I knew that the surprise was at hand. He is a bad egg, but rottener than I had believed. Do you know, the plaintiff is very clever. It was she, I will take my oath, who put Tooth up to it."

The apathy which Nevius had displayed was departing, he came nearer to O'Donnell and stood, looking at him, impatient of details and phrases. Was the diagnosis wrong, after all? Was there another explanation of this mystery? Only the day before he had asked himself that question. And now what was the cleverness over which O'Donnell seemed inclined to harp?"

"Tooth is fly enough," the lawyer was saying," but unaided he would never have thought of this. Pennell got the young woman on the stand, and in no time at all had her white as snow. He had her take off her bonnet and show that in those blonde curls of hers there was not a hair-pin to be found, he had her explain at some length that while her relations with you had been most friendly and pleasant, they had been also entirely innocent and that you had invariably treated her like what she called "a perfect gentleman." Then he turned her over to Tooth."

"Well?"

"Tooth began very greasily; he asked her a few gentle little questions which gave her an opportunity to repeat all she had said, and finally brought out that a few months ago you had met her in the street and had assured her you were doing everything to serve her interests. Very nice as far it goes, isn't it? Wait a bit. 'And what did you say to Mr. Nevius?' Tooth asked. 'I asked Mr. Nevius,' the little beast answered, 'whether the other young lady was as innocent as I was?' 'And what was Mr. Nevius' reply?' Tooth inquired. 'Mr. Nevius' reply was that unfortunately she was not."

"That she was not?" gnashed Nevius.

"That is what she swore."

"Then to the Tombs she goes."

"There, it's only your word against hers. You can do nothing."

"But something must be done."

"Precisely, and for that purpose I have got an adjournment. Now where is Miss Adulam? She must appear. There is no use in her standing on her dignity any longer. Where is she?"

"In Boston," Nevius answered. "And she is ill."

"Though she come on a shutter, come she must. Write her the facts, tell her the moment she arrives to communicate with me, but write to her at once." With that the lawyer left.

For an hour Nevius sat, uncertain how to act. He tried to write and did, page after page, but the point he was unable to reach. No matter what circumlocutions he attempted, no matter how delicate the shadings, the fact stood out, bald and repugnant, that the accusation must stand unless rebutted by herself. And there had been his pride, could pride there be where only shamelessness was, that this young gentlewomen had answered the accusation in the only manner which it deserved, by making no answer at all. How was he to tell her to unseal her unsullied lips? Though he used arguments that might lure a saint from Paradise, the abomination would still be there, he was asking her to be cross-questioned in regard to her honor by a man such as his wife had employed. No, he could not. Better a thousand times the divorce than that ineffaceable indignity to her. Something else there must be. But what? As a child who plays a game, he felt that something burning yet still withheld. And suddenly it was his.

The letter which he presently wrote was not, however, for Miss Adulam, it was addressed to her uncle, Erastus Wilberforce. And as it lay signed and sealed before him, he covered his face with his hands. When he stood up, an illusion had unmasked, he had looked in his heart, it was empty.

The morrow was blank. Another day went by, during which he wandered through that dismal house from which even a ghost had fled. At noon, on the third day, a wire came:

"Victory! Will be with you at nine.

"J. O'DONNELL."

The message left him strangely unmoved, though one may wonder whether spring is sweeter than summer to a flower once dead. Punctual as a comet, the lawyer appeared. "Look at that!" he exclaimed. "You told me that Miss Adulam was a thoroughbred, but you didn't tell me she was another Lady Flora Hastings too."

At the paper he extended Nevius glanced and shuddered. It was a certificate, attested by two physicians that Miss Janet Adulam was virgo intacta.

"Why, Nevius, it is the Hastings affair over again. It will turn Tooth inside out. Outwitted, foiled, cornered, undone is that unholy shyster. Farewell to the Nevius divorce! And I may tell you Metuchen will be tickled to death. So far as he could he intimated he was with us every trip. I think I will take a drink. But what the devil are you looking so glum for? Nevius, listen to me, it was your duty to deny everything, but till I got that certificate, I'll be shot if—

Nevius checked him as with a bit. "What will Tooth do?" he asked, and so seriously that O'Donnell's jubilance evaporated. "What will he do when you produce this thing?"

"Increase the charges on his bill, I suppose. What is there for him to do except to return to his Tombs practice?"

"Do you know," added Nevius absently, "I would prefer it not to go on record."

"Are you mad?" O'Donnell snarled. "This is the case. We have won it without calling a witness. Could I have foreseen it, do you suppose I would have bothered over those wenches your wife employed?"

Nevius shook his head, his eyes strange and weary.

"No, and could I have foreseen that my wife—O'Donnell, the point is here. If you show this privately to Tooth he will understand that he has lost. And yet he likes to win, does he not?

"Where is the attorney who don't? I myself—

"Yes, I know. You have been very kind, O'Donnell, but there is one thing more you can do. Show this to Tooth, tell him to withdraw the charge against Miss Adulam, to amend his complaint, and if he agrees, assure him that I will not further contest his efforts."

"I don't understand."

"After this Vührer business, he is not above a trick or two, is he? Tell him to invent a co-respondent, the servants he can coach to testify to what he wants, and—the divorce is his. I am tired of it all. O'Donnell, do this for me, won't you?"

Sweet to the profession is the smell of an enemy's corpse, and just as that fragrance was to be O'Donnell's why should he be taken afar? He was not at all pleased and said so, but to the loss of the odors for which he had hungered, at last he became reconciled. A fortnight later a report was handed up recommending that divorce be granted to Hilda Nevius, plaintiff, on the ground of her husband's illicit commerce with a woman unknown. Which report was promptly and properly confirmed.

A day or two and Nevius found his name again in leaded type. Beneath, augmented with new embroideries, was the old story retold. There was the initial accusation of the grief-stricken wife, his own admission of guilt and headlong flight. Then his return, denying everything but doing nothing to defend charges which had just been substantiated in full. According to the reporter the evidence was of such a character that it had to be heard in camera. Nevius had not even had the courage to appear. But every accusation had been proved, and now his poor, wounded wife, who had borne with his infidelities until forbearance had ceased to be a virtue, at last was free. In dissolving the miserable bands the court had granted her permission to assume her maiden name, a permission of which she would at once avail herself. She was the daughter of the wealthy banker, Thomas B. Snaith, and very prominent in society, as were also the co-respondents, one of whom was a dashing western widow, the other, one of Saratoga's reigning belles. And so on and so forth at the rate of eight dollars a column and a tenner for the "beat." "The Lord loveth a cheerful liar," Nevius reflected as he put the Chronicle down.

But O'Donnell had not been deprived of certain fragrances for nothing. He wrote a note, the substance of which—that Miss Adulam had been fully exonerated and her name withdrawn—appeared on the morrow in the Chronicle's obscurest corner and in the Chronicle's smallest type.

XVII.

The paths to happiness are not many, but they are well defined. The finger-posts of the easiest are those which point to health and indifference.

But there are others that have a value, and between them the wayfarer has halted and will halt and conjecture. One leads to religion, and the pilgrim, if he be sorely depressed and temperamentally disposed will find it an excellent route. It may be tortuous, the goal may be remote, there may be ghosts at the crossings, but at least the traveller has that greatest of consolations—the belief that he is still a child, watched over and protected.

Another leads to that pure realm of ideas where individual preoccupations may not enter, where only the mysteries of beauty and of life endure.

But this route, rarely chosen, is adapted but to the student to whom solitude can offer the dual advantage of being with himself and of not being with others.

Nevius selected it. Health had ceased to interest him, temperamentally he was too nervous to acquire and preserve that suspension of judgment of which indifference is the fruit, and mentally he was too agile to accept dogmas unquestioned. He indeed tried to fatigue the mind in the fatigue of the body, but when, after hours of that sponge for thought which the saddle alone supplies, there was a question-mark in waiting. The why and wherefore of the divorce haunted him still. And as law was no longer possible, and his career at an end, he had a choice between drink and study. In the former he tried to drown that interrogation mark. But the interrogation mark knew how to swim. Then he plunged into history.

Between Cæsar and Heliogabalus there was a moment when the gods no longer were, when Christ had not come, when man alone existed. In disgust of modernity it was to that epoch that he turned. The classics were at his elbow, and in the splendors which they evoked he reconstructed Rome. Presently the booksellers were at work and he had invoices of curious lore. Before the roses could fade he wreathed himself with them. He had adventures in the Subura, escapades with dazzling young empresses and re-lived the inimitable life. To the hum of harps he floated on a ship that had gardens, bowers, spangled sails and a jewelled prow. On painted elephants he quarried lions in their African fens. Throbbing through the rushes of the Nile there cam to him the grave music of archaic hymns. Serapis whispered to him. Isis visited him unveiled. He sailed the Ægean, scaled Parnassus, lounged in the Academe. He prayed in temples that never heard an atheist's voice, passed initiate into the mysteries of Eleusis, encountered divinities and monsters, curious superstitions and untellable creeds. He found grace and lust, deformity and magnificence, unimagined depravities, torturesome delights. He wandered from palace to lupanar, from prison to shrine, from forum to camp. There was not a sin nor an altar that he passed unexamined, not a secret that he left unprobed.

When antiquity was his, he rose from its study perplexed. Nowhere had he encountered hypocrisy. Therewith the Why returned.

XVIII.

"Yes, I am off for Europe. For centuries I have been travelling on the map, now I am to try another tack. Come with me, Carol. You don't know what a charming companion I am. No one does. I never open my head."

Jones, a leg over the arm of a chair, a cigarette in his fingers, a smile of protracted amiability fluttering in and out his tawny beard, was discounting the pleasures of a trip abroad.

"In the autumn we could visit that city from which you have just returned. Mention Egypt and you see a priest, Persia, and you see a king, Greece—a goddess, but Rome was Might Triumphant. And to think that I have never been there—in this existence I mean, for I can swear I have jolted in chariots over those wide white roads. I can swear that I have supped with Lalage and thrown dice with Faustine. When I read history, memories return in floods. Let us go together and see what remains of the temples in which we have lived."

He puffed at his cigarette. "And such good as it would do you. A change of scene and you would begin to forget. You need to forget. This accursed divorce is assuming the proportions of a pyramid. It is over a year since it ended, and still you brood. You will kill yourself as Tredegar has if you sit moping in this horror of a house. Not but what I appreciate the advantage of sorrow. Che non soffre, non vince,—non Leonardo da Vinci. The tragedy of my life is that there has been no tragedy at all. If I have not written a great novel, there is the cause. An artist's one value consists in his sorrows. They are all aspirations. The world is filled with people whose lives are so puerile, whose aims are so narrow that we should bless the misfortune which makes us nobler than they. Why, grief is a pleasure, it is a joy to weep. But—"

"Si je doute des larmes!" Nevius inconsequently objected. "C'est que je l'ai vu pleurer."

"Ah, we have been reading de Musset have we? Fort bien, Monseigneur, fort bien, mais écoute:

"N' es-tu pas jeune, heureux, partout le bien venu,
Et ces plaisirs légers qui font aimer la vie,
Si tu n' avais pleuré, quel cas en ferais-tu?
Lorsqu'au déclin du jour, assis sur la bruyère—
La bruyère c' est ton fauteuil—
Avec un vieil ami—le vieil ami, c'est moi—tu bois en liberté—
Oh, pour ca! Comme un Polonais même—
Dis moi, d' aussi bon cœur lèveras-tu ton verre
Si tu n' avais senti le prix de la gaieté?
Aimerais-tu les fleurs, les prés et la verdure
Les sonnets de Pétrarque et le chant des oiseaux,
Michel-Ange et les arts, Shakespeare et la nature
Si tu n' y retrouvais quelques anciens sanglots?

Comprendrais-tu des cieux l' ineffable harmonie,
Le silence des nuits, le murmure des flots
Si quelque part, làbas, la fiévre et l' insomnie
Ne t' avait fait sônger a l' éternel repos?
Plains la donc, plains la donc, cette belle infidèle—"

"Yes, had she been that," Nevius interrupted, moved in spite of himself by the beauty of lines which he, too, knew by heart. "Had she been infidéle, I could see my way clearer. But though a year has gone by since she got the decree, still I am unable to understand why she asked for it. There was a moment when I thought her insane, when I thought, God forgive me, that this affair at an end I could win her back, reason with her, plead with her, love her again. But there was no insanity in her eyes when we met in court, a malignant exultation merely. And why? That Why is the first thing I find in the morning, the last that leaves me at night. For a year I have been haunted by interrogation marks, they are everywhere, they are in the food I eat. I close my eyes and still I see them. Even in sleep they pursue me, they fill my dreams."

"It is of course supposable," Jones, with singular acquiescence, replied, "that in asking for a divorce this lady had a motive. The malignity was due to your effort to thwart her. The exultation came of the prospect of showing that her lies were true."

"But why drag herself through all that mud? I am a gentleman at least, am I not? If she wanted a divorce why in God's name didn't she tell me before I went to Paris. I am not a bit better than another, I have had my little écarts as well as anyone else, and I could have got it for her, without scandal, without disgrace, without the ruin of three lives—Well, Patrick, what is it?"

From the tray which the man held he took a pink card, gilt-edged.

"A lady, sir."

Jones laughed loud and long. "En avant les amourettes. Va donc, farceur."

"Blythe Sisseton," Nevius repeated. "Never heard of her. Patrick, ask her what she wants."

"That's Ablaut's Ex," said Jones, as Patrick turned, but he bit his tongue as he did so.

"Ablaut's Ex?"

"Oh, a little chorus girl whom he invited to dance the waltz in Faust. Man proposes you know, and chorus girls accept. But in accepting she meant Forever and he meant To-night."

"Well?"

"That's all. What do you expect? A three-volume novel? He wrote Finis on a cheque ages ago. In the circumstances it would be foolish of you to see her."

"Foolish of me? What in thunder do you mean? What have I got to do with her? Why should it be foolish of me to see her? But what are you staring at me for?"

"I'm not staring at you;" Jones snapped back. "I am merely giving you a little friendly advice. The girl is probably here out of curiosity, to have a look at the defendant in a cause célèbre. If you are going to make a freak of yourself, run right down and show yourself off. But in your place I would send word that I was out, that I was dead. Now here's Patrick—"

"She says she won't detain you but a moment, sir, she—"

Nevius stood up and made for the door. Before he could reach it Jones had him by the arm.

"Carol, let me go."

Without a word Nevius shook him off and left the room. But what was the meaning of that strange look he had?

'Does he suspect?" The novelist queried. "But when he knows!" He paused and looked about. "Anything would be better than to see the newspapers dripping again with his name. I must suggest something, but what?"

Ten minutes later the front door closed. When Nevius re-entered the library Jones was reading Spinoza.

"You knew this!" Nevius blurted. The strange look had gone from his face, but a stranger one had come. He was livid, and the corners of his mouth had widened. "Why have I been gulled on every side? Why could you not tell me?"

"Dear boy, what omniscience is it that you attribute to me?" And Jones tossed aside the book he held and smiled. "The announcement of your lady's engagement to Ablaut, if it is that to which you refer, was news to me until I read it in the Herald this morning."

"Bah! Why didn't you tell me she was his mistress? Why couldn't you have told me?

I committed suicide because of that woman. And look at these letters!"

But Jones had no need to look at those blue, iris-scented communications, each stamped with the Nevius crest, to divine what they contained.

"Look at them," Nevius repeated. "Months before she began that suit, she was writing to him things like these."

With a wrench he tore his collar apart.

"Why couldn't you have told me," he gasped, "why—why?"

"How could I, dear boy, I didn't know," the novelist with splendid mendacity replied. "But supposing, even that suspecting such a thing, I had so much as hinted at it, you would have held me up. 'Your evidence or your life,' you would have bawled. And I am not like you, Carol, alone in the world. I have my publishers to support. But now that the cat is out of the bag, the one thing for you to do is to say Schwamm darüber and pray that Ablaut may make an honest woman of her. Do sit down now and be quiet. Write to him, why don't you? Paper is a splendid conductor for steam. Send him your congratulations. Say that you have just learned of the engagement, and that if the fair betrothed makes him half as happy as she has made you, he is the man of all others to be envied."

"Yes," Jones continued with a twist to his beard, but an eye on his host. "A little eighteenth-century politesse of that kind is far better than big words and short phrases. Anything, Carol, anything but a row. I don't wonder though that you look as if a scrap would be a revel. Divorce is like matrimony, dear boy, a fellow has got to go through it three or four times before he knows how. By the time this lady gets done, what an expert she will be! It is true she is exceptionally gifted, facile principessa, as one might say, but—now give that to me, I am ashamed of you."

"It is not loaded," Nevius muttered from between his teeth.

"Even if it is not, it is capable of becoming so I suppose. Were Ablaut in this room and you shot him you would be acquitted—provided these letters were read. But would you permit them to go before a jury? I wouldn't let the villain in a novel defend himself at the expense of a woman's honor, and you, Carol, are a gentleman in flesh and blood. You remember that episode at Nice. There the lady showed even less foresight. The husband surprised the lover in her arms, but when he shot, civilization revolted at the mediævalism of the act. Legally he was justified, but law and good breeding are not the same."

Jones gave another twist to his beard and the douche of words continued.

"No, dear boy, you can't shoot Ablaut. On the contrary, you should be very nice to him. He is in trouble. He has been led astray, and these are the wages of sin. From the announcement of the engagement I suppose he considers that this lady is in honor bound to make reparation, and while I can understand that, I can not understand what induced him to commit the error which makes the reparation needful. No, he deserves your sympathy. A more venomous, soulless little catin than she who is to lead him to the halter—altar, I mean—doesn't exist, and never has, outside the walls of St. Lazare."

"H'm—"

Nevius muttered something, but whether in agreement or rebuke, Jones did not care. He drawled on uninterruptedly in the leisurely fashion in which he had begun:

"This morning, when I read the announcement, it took me a moment before I understood why she waited as long as she has. Knowing her, as several of us do, it was quite on the cards that she should bring Ablaut to book the day the decree was signed. But remember on what grounds it was granted. The woman in the amended complaint existed only in Tooth's imagination, and existed there only at your suggestion. It was the Frick case upside down. Tandems and tally-ho's could have been driven straight through it—which was the reason, I fancy, when the newspapers were jubilating over your defeat that you held your tongue. And, by the way, do you know who it was that inspired that jubilee? This lady, dear boy, no one else. She had the articles written to order, and she had marked copies sent to every one she knew. Actually she sent one to me. She did not think it worth while, though, to send O'Donnell's contradiction. Ah, mais non!" And Jones drew breath.

"But to return to the point, had she led Ablaut to the altar as precipitately as she led you to court, you, had you chosen, could have vitiated her decree, vitiated her marriage, and very neatly turned the tables by applying for a divorce from her. All that you could have done, dear boy, more too, had she been stupid enough to let you. But she wasn't. The dear little thing knew a trick worth two of that. You had one year in which to appeal, yesterday the year expired; to-day the engagement is announced. And you can do nothing. Not a thing, dear boy. You can't even shoot her; no, not any more than you can shoot Ablaut. Put any such idea as that out of your head. She has been malignant as syphilis, I admit; she has disgraced, corroded and destroyed; her conduct has been without parallel, without excuse; that she should be lapidated I admit also; I have nothing but contempt for her; she has unsexed herself, and if you struck her in the face with your glove, you would pay her an honor she does not deserve. But you can't shoot her. To defend any such act these letters would have to be read. And though you may say now that they could be read, and not only that but all the secrets of this divorce be ventilated, yet when the time came you would permit nothing of the sort, and you would be electrocuted, dear boy, because of this fallatrix for whose sake a skunk is too good to die."

The novelist paused and contemplated his finger-tips. Presently, with a glance that noted the effects of the douche, he began anew:

"No, you are too young, life holds too many possibilities yet, for you to jeopardize it for her or for her maquereau either. Could you kill her, as I have killed many a culprit in my novels, without a suspicion resting on the executioner, I am rather inclined to think I would approve. But the difficulty is that she is not under your roof and not being a cracksman you can't get under her's. Were she here in Tenth street, a bit of catgut tied across the head of the stairs, a slight shove, and there you are. The catgut vanishes and another accident in high life is recorded. Failing that, you could try a folding-bed; many a person has been smothered in them, you could imitate Incoul and turn on the gas when she was asleep, you could give her a vibrio in a mushroom, or squeeze a taste of cyanide of potassium into her champagne. Any one of these things, or of a hundred others, you could do if she were here, but luck is hers and she isn't.

"Now, in view of all the circumstances, were this one of my novels, I would have the injured hero experiment in what will be one of the fine arts of the next century—Execution at a Distance. There are bunglers who send explosives by express, which is well enough in its way when it happens to be successful, but even then the intention is manifest and the police are running right and left. The art of Execution at a Distance, as practiced by the adept, will consist in projecting an agent in such a manner that it kills and leaves no trace either of its purpose or of its advent.

"For instance—by the way, I think I will take a little of that whisky—for instance, a young man is enamoured of a young woman. Difficulties ensue. Correspondence there must be, but how? By invisible ink, let us say, which becomes visible when breathed upon. For a year and a day the young man writes to his Dulcinea with ink of this description. Suddenly she wearies or he does. What does he do, give her aconite pills? He gives a sheet of paper a bath of hydrocyanic, a coating of starch to protect it and drops it in a letter box. When the young woman receives it, she breathes on it to decipher what he has written, and falls dead, a piece of white paper in her hands. Coroner's verdict: heart disease.

"On the other hand, supposing he has had no time or no need to train her to the advantages of invisible ink. As a love-token he sends her a box of flowers saturated with a similar preparation. She opens the box, the hydrocyanic escapes and she is dead. Verdict: heart failure."

The novelist emptied his glass and looked at Nevius. But the latter had got his face in the shadow, a hand before it as well.

"All that," Jones added thoughtfully, "all that is for the Year of our Lord 2001. Nowadays people have such prejudices, and yet if stupidity hurt how many would yell!"

For a while neither spoke, and to amuse himself perhaps, Jones took a sheet of paper and began to scribble. Presently he looked up.

"But what a rattling good story the whole thing would make. And what a lot I could do with you. I could begin with you from the cradle, carry you right through everything, put your hat on and kill you. Suicide is always a good climax. And I could call it—let me see, I should have to find something comprehensive, a title both neat and terse, one that would convey an entire existence."

His eyes roamed to the ceiling, consulted the pencil, fell again on the paper on which he had written, and lighted sagaciously.

"I have it—From Womb to Tomb. Carol, dear boy, what do you say to that?"

As Nevius seemingly had nothing to say,

Jones nodded complacently to himself and rose from his seat.

"I have accomplished my object, beau ténébreux. I have bored you so that your anger is gone. Thank me now and let me go also, but remember I sail on Saturday and you must sail, too."

For a while longer Nevius sat, a hand before his face. But behind that hand were passing the incidents of the day; the coming of that little girl, the letters which she had found in her lover's rooms, letters with which she had threatened the lover until threats were idle and his engagement was announced. And these letters, brought to him with the intelligence of that engagement, were written by one who had pretended to love him, whom he had defended, lauded and worshipped, who called herself Mrs. Nevius still and who had wrecked three lives. Back to him crowded the memories of the past. The scraps of the letter found in the basket. That was to Jenny, was it? How clever she had been that day. How cleverly black had been turned to white. How clever, too, had been her tactics in regard to that poor girl. And with what neatness and despatch had she not brought Vührer to the house. Yes, she had been very clever, but the cleverest thing of all was in declaring herself broken-hearted. And this was the little Hilda whom he thought would be so sorry when she learned the truth. The truth indeed! It had been for him to learn it. And now that he had,—Madam Sapphira, be on your guard!

He repeated the menace; the echo perhaps aroused him. On the table were the letters, and near them a bit of paper embroidered with pencil-marks, the rough sketch of a tombstone. on which in neat characters was writ:

HERE LIES HILDA SNAITH,
AND THAT IS ALL SHE EVER DID.
Requies catin pace.

At this effort of the novelist's he barely glanced; his eyes were fumbling the shelves. There was a book on chemistry that he wanted, and having got it he opened it, questioned it, and sitting down again interrogated the future and roamed through the past.

XIX.

The Why had gone. He was no longer haunted, he knew. There are people to whom doubt is better than certainty and Nevius was one of them. The problem had occupied him; that gone he had nothing left—a duty merely—to which he presently turned his attention.

Of the incidents remote and dismissed which had suddenly returned was one he detained—the memory of a young girl examining her wedding gifts. Among these gifts were two vinaigrettes, and he could see her still, holding one, then the other to the mirror to judge which was the more becoming. The choice made, the rejected vinaigrette had been returned to Tiffany and some exchange effected.

It was the one incident of the old prenuptial days that had jarred, and it had particularly jarred in that the vinaigrette which had been exchanged, was the gift to his bride of one whose hand he had held and whose hand he had loved to hold. Apart, then, from any sentiment which he might have attached to the tribute, the commercial aspect with which it was regarded annoyed, and continued to annoy until, other incidents intervening, it was forgot.

But it had returned, and of an afternoon when the heat was such that man and beast fell dead in the streets he ventured out to shop. There was a scent-bottle, covered with gems, one which it would delight any woman to have and display, which, without any difficulty, he made his own. And there was also a phial of anhydrous prussic acid—but that he did not obtain until he had produced a jumble of Latin and hieroglyphics.

Later, in the quiet of the library, with mouth and nostrils bandaged, his eyes protected, his hands well gloved, he poured the contents of the phial into the jewelled toy, and re-stoppering both bottles,removed the bandage and breathed. It is not every neophite whose initial effort in laboratory work is attended with such success, and that fact he doubtless appreciated, for having breathed, he smiled. If all else failed, might he not turn chemist? The idea must have amused him, for, as he put the vinaigrette back in its case, the smile was still there, and as he wrapped up the case and directed it, he laughed. But then, chemistry is one of the most delightful pursuits imaginable, and he had been so long unoccupied that a possibility with even less perspective might have charmed.

Yet where, apart from Ceylon, is that prospect which always pleases? An hour had not passed before the vistas disclosed must have lost their allurement. The laughter, the smile had gone. In their place came a look perplexing and enervating, and through the quiet of the house pulsated a throbbing so loud, so loud, that to still it, perhaps, too, to rid his mind of chemistry and its charms, he drank.

It was the drink, no doubt, which on the morrow confined him to his room. But such a sedative is rest that on the succeeding day he was able to get to the floor below and breakfast too. Melon is not unpalatable at any hour, and when he had eaten a little he was quite in the humor to smoke a cigarette and learn the news of the day. It was the Times which he selected for the purpose, and after reading of the Homestead rebellion as he turned from the fourth page where the editorials are to the fifth where the advertisements such as death notices appear, the paper fell from him, the name

Nevius had jumped out and stabbed him in the eyes.

He got to the window, the court was deluged with sunshine, and on the fence a piebald cat was enjoying a promenade.

But could it be possible that that package had been sent? Had he not hid it somewhere?

With a sidelong suspicious glance the cat continued its gingerly way.

Could it be possible? he repeated. But what had he done with it? Why could he not collect his thoughts? He went up stairs, and down once more, and up again. Patrick appeared, he fled away. He could not go out, he could not sit still, he could neither write nor speak, nor act nor think, and in his bed-room where he hid at last, he locked the door.

If rest be a sedative, suspense is not. And do what he might, suspense urged him from sofa to armchair, from armchair to sofa, and finally to the library, that he might see for himself if the package were there.

On the table was a telegram. It was from Bronx he knew. But not a bit.

"Touraine sails at noon to-morrow. Your berth retained. Have wired congratulations to Mrs. A.

"A. B. FENWICK CHISHOLM-JONES."

Congratulations to Mrs. A! Who was Mrs. A? He put the telegram down and looked about. There was no one to reply. But who was Mrs. A? What had he to do with any Mrs. A?

Again he looked about. But still there was no one. Yet he must ask, he must speak, he must know. The bell was there, he rang it but could not wait and ran to the hall.

"Patrick," he called. "Patrick."

"Yes, sir, coming, sir."

"Patrick," he cried, while the man was yet below. "Patrick, what is there in the papers to-day?"

"In the papers, sir!"

"Tell me, can't you. Don't you see I am going mad. What was in the papers? Who is Mrs. A?"

Perplexed, astounded, the man halted midway on the stair.

"There's a Mrs. Nevius who has been and married a gentleman whose name I disremember, sir, but—"

"Then why the devil couldn't you say so before. Come up here. Don't you hear me? Come up I tell you. I am going to Europe to-morrow and I want you to pack. And Patrick—"

"Yes, sir."

"Here's a hundred or more that you may find serviceable." And as Nevius turned on his heel, gently if incorrectly, he repeated a verset from the Scriptures.

"Beautiful on the hill-slope are the feet of the bearer of glad news."

But what he meant by that absurdity who shall say?

Hypnotism.

By JULES CLARETIE.

A Most Remarkable Book.

The spell which is cast sometimes by hypnotism is forcibly described in an artistic manner by M. Jules Claretie, who is well known as one of the masters in the French school of realism. He clearly reveals the power of mind over matter. The present volume is the result of his observations and reflections, and it forcibly deals with certain social problems that modern life is giving rise to. M. Claretie is not only a clear, but also a brilliant, writer, and his ready flow of language greatly aids him in depicting a study and an interpretation of a problem of criminality which is the direct outgrowth of hypnotism.—Boston Herald, Jan. 2, 1893.

The science of hypnotism is by no means exact yet, but its phenomena are so well attested that they may eventually be reduced to a system. The domination of strong minds over weak ones may be observed every day, and hypnotism is the exercise of this power in the fullest measure. The subject hypnotized loses the last vistage of individual will and becomes perfectly obedient to the master mind. The terrible possibilities residing in such a power, when possessed by unscrupulous persons, have occurred to many investigators of hypnotism. This phase of the question has been made the subject of a story by Jules Claretie, called "Hypnotism." A young girl is hypnotized by her lover, and, obedient to his will, commits a theft which will enrich him. She is arrested, but does not divulge the source of the suggestion until she is thrown again into a hypnotized trance by a physician, who suspects that she was an agent for another. By this means the instigating criminal is discovered. The story is well told and well turned into English.—Buffalo Courier, Nov. 20, 1892.

This novel is written in the style of the latest French sensational school. Its main character, "Jean Mornas," a young doctor of a pessimistic turn of mind, and greedy for riches, becomes almost insanely eager for the wealth of his aged and invalid uncle. Too great a coward to commit a crime himself, he influences his sweetheart, "Lucie Lorin," while in the hypnotic state, and she, innocent, acts as his agent. In robbing the old man, she is, however found out, compelled to kill him, and is discovered. By an expert hypnotist, the truth of the matter is ascertained, and the girl is proven guiltless. "Mornas" flees from justice to Monaco, where he loses his ill-gotten gains and commits suicide, thus tragically closing the whole story.—Nassau Literary Magazine.

L'Evangeliste.

By ALPHONSE DAUDET.

. . . . . THIS AUTHOR'S MOST FAMOUS BOOK. . . . . .

It is needless to say that the story is worked out with artistic consistency to the end, without the least concession to the weak conventionalism that craves "a good ending." The book is a tremendous, blood-stirring philippic against certain phases of our modern civilization that have never before experienced just this kind of passionless, yet searching and remorseless, surgery.—Chicago Times.

Daudet is one of the foremost French novelists of the day, and this powerfully told story is of intense interest.—Boston Home Journal.

Mary Neal Sherwood has translated Alphonse Daudet's "L'Evangeliste," and inasmuch as Daudet is the author it goes without saying that it is a story most delicately and artistically told. It illustrates the evils of religious fanaticism in an incisive and almost terrible manner, and a serious sermon underlies the pathetic and sympathetic romance told by this master of French fiction.—The Boston Times.

The works of Alphonse Daudet always bear the stamp of his masterful style and graceful diction. In his work "L'Evangeliste," he has presented a terrible tragedy, but instead of being an illustration of vice and resulting disintegration, it is a portrayal of virtue in its garb of icy indifference to the human instincts of man. A tragedy of virtue! Can it be true that one may become possessed of too much virtue? Daudet is right. Either extreme becomes a horror. This book is worth careful perusal by the thoughtful and earnest.—Spectator.

It is beyond all question Daudet's most famous book. It is he of whom Henry James wrote: "We have no one, either in England or America, to oppose Alphonse Daudet." And Joaquin Miller said of him: "I had rather be Alphonse Daudet than any other living man now in literature, except two"—meaning Victor Hugo and Joaquin Miller. "L'Evangeliste" is profusely illustrated.—The Troy Daily Times.

Alphonse Daudet has been called "the poet of romance" and well so. He is the most delicate, the most sympathetic, and most charming of all our contemporary writers of romance. This, his latest, is by far his best.—Agitator.

Sweet Danger.

By ELLA WHEELER WILCOX,

Author of "Poems of Passion," "Poems of Pleasure," Etc.

From the evidence of dramatic power, literary skill, and felicitous style, furnished in her story of "Sweet Danger," Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox seems likely to distinguish herself as much as a writer of fiction as she has already done as a poet. Mrs. Wilcox has evidently been guided in the composition of this story by a strong moral purpose, but we finish its perusal with a sense of injury and injustice done to the hapless "Dolores." Her character was the result, to a great extent, of her early environment and training, and up to the last, faulty as her life had been, there was much that makes womanhood sacred, with which she had not parted. She had been led into and along the path of error by the man to whom she was passionately devoted, but she alone becomes the victim, while "Durand" escapes without so much as a reprimand. This is the world's way, but we think it the function of the artist to indicate that, in his case, as in hers, justice should be administered, and that man as well as woman should be made to pay in full the penalty of his sin.—Home Journal.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox's aim, or one of her aims, is to contrast two types of womanhood, as affected by contact with the "stronger" sex; the one type, independent, to her own risk; the other, thoroughly "feminine" and therefore certain to be safe. "Sweet Danger" is a thoughtful and purposeful story, lacking neither human nor intellectual interest. The author has treated a delicate subject with restraint and a measure of grace, and she does not forget to enforce truths, suggested by the relations of the sexes, which can not be too frequently asserted.—The Boston Times.

This novel is modern in type, and touches upon subjects which have excited the greatest discussion of late years. There are several poems of the passionate type; also the dramatic element is very prominent in parts of the work.—Nassau Literary Magazine.

Mrs. Wilcox has given us a very readable novel, the style of which is excellent and the plot fair. It is to be regretted that two of the leading characters emulate what was worst in the lives of "George Eliot" and Lewes, but sin brought its own reward. The book shows in many ways the strong talent of the author.—Public Opinion.

The Fallen Race.

By AUSTYN GRANVILLE.

THE LATEST LITERARY SENSATION.

HAS REACHED THREE EDITIONS IN SIX WEEKS.

H. RIDER HAGGARD OUTDONE.

The scene of the story is laid in Australia, among a newly discovered race of beings. It is a remarkably original novel, and will be read with great interest.—Chicago Herald.

The story is well conceived, and in the same popular strain as those written by the author's famous cousin, H. Rider Haggard.—Chicago Mail.

The style of this brilliant writer is closely allied to that of Rudyard Kipling, but he outranks his English contemporary in his profounder knowledge of affairs.—St. Paul Globe.

The scarcity of Australian novels makes this one doubly entertaining. It is certainly "novel" enough to richly merit its name.—Current Literature.

It shows imagination and creative genius, and gives great pleasure in its perusal. The illustrations deserve special mention. — The Detroit Tribune.

Those who enjoy intellectual flights of the imagination, cleverly recorded in fiction, will read this adventurous tale with interest.—Brooklyn (N. Y.) Times.

The brain of Cervantes, nor the fancy of Swift, nor even the weird tales from the Orient, for which Galliland is responsible, outrank this romance in the flights of fairy fiction.—Every Saturday.

Is an ingenious, highly original, interesting story, the plot of which is laid in Central Australia. It is written by Austyn Granville, the renowned traveler, who brings to this work a vast amount of technical knowledge, derived from a wide diversity of resources, and his observations on men and manners are thoroughly original.—Religious Telescope.

The scene is laid in Central Australia, and embraces in its daring outline the most extravagant improbabilities, which the author has invested with all the realism of every-day life. The author is a great traveler, and embodies facts in the story derived from actual knowledge and experience. People who like this kind of reading will be delighted with "The Fallen Race."—Ohio Farmer, January 19th.

The Adopted Daughter

By EDGAR FAWCETT.

A Story of New York Political and Social Life.

ONE OF THE AUTHOR'S BEST.

In this latest novel by Edgar Fawcett there is a singularly fresh and interesting plot, which enlists the attention of the reader at once. A wealthy and aristocratic woman adopts as her own, the infant child of her maid, and brings the girl up to believe herself the daughter of the house. "Marie" is beautiful and intelligent by nature, and the finest accomplishments and culture are given her. The life of the mother, and the (supposed) daughter are passed in Europe, until the girl is grown, and indeed, engaged to be married, when they return to New York, and her Irish parents come forward to claim her. The interest of the story must not be lessened for the reader by a further account of the plot, and its ingenious and most interesting denouement, but it is worked out in a most admirable manner, and one to embody the nobility of sentiment, the strength and purity of character, that characterize Mr. Fawcett's portrayals in fiction.—Boston Budget.

Those who have read Edgar Fawcett's "Fabian Dimitry" and "Social Silhouettes" with such delight, will seize with avidity the latest novel of "The Bayard of American Fiction."

In "The Adopted Daughter," Mr. Fawcett, by means of a highly romantic love story, shows cleverly the power of Tammany Hall and Ring Rule in New York City, and points in a true light the machinations and trickery of public officials in that city.

The entire story is withal so prettily told, that he who reads must be indeed hard to please, who can not find, at once, pleasure and profit in its perusal.—The Inlander.

The book holds up to the men in our cities the state of their municipal politics in a way that ought to do good.—Western Recorder.

"The Adopted Daughter," by Edgar Fawcett, is a remarkable bit of fiction, with no other discoverable object in view than that of being entertaining. In this the author has succeeded quite well, and many will find his work a source of pleasant diversion. A feature of the book to be commended is its freedom from all unclean and salacious thoughts that pervade so much of modern fiction.—Spectator.

LAUGH AND GROW FAT.

A collection of the best writings of this great author, most profusely illustrated, with over 500 pages. It is the funniest book ever published. Bill Nye needs no introduction. The mention of the book is enough.

BILL NYE'S REMARKS.

"I love to believe that true greatness is not accidental. To think and to say that greatness is a lottery is pernicious. Man may be wrong sometimes in his judgment of others, individually and in the aggregate, but he who gets ready to be a great man will surely find the opportunity."

"I should like to do anything that would advance the cause of science, but I should not want to form the habit of dissecting people, lest some day I might be called upon to dissect a friend for whom I had a great attachment, or some creditor who had an attachment for me."

"I have passed through an earthquake and an Indian outbreak, but I would rather ride an earthquake without saddle or bridle, than to bestride a successful broncho eruption.

"Age brings caution and a lot of shop-worn experience, purchased at the highest market price. Time brings vain regrets and wisdom teeth that can be left in a glass of water over night."

"Too much of our hotel food tastes like the second day of January, or the fifth day of July. That's the whole thing in a few words, and unless the good hotels are closer together, we shall have to multiply our cemetery facilities."

"Pride is all right if it is of the right kind, but the pride that induces a man to muss up the carpet with his brains because there is nothing left for him to do but to labor, is the kind that Lücifer had when he bolted the action of the convention and went over to the red-hot minority.

PRESS NOTICES.

"When Bill Nye turns himself loose for fun the laughing belt of readers should be tightened to prevent accidents."—Inter Ocean, Chicago.

"Bill Nye always interests and his genial, big hearted sunny nature shines through every line in his book."—Pittsburg Press.

"We believe that Bill Nye is the brightest humorist of the day. No change in the English language can ever do away with his fun. He is a public benefactor; one of the greatest men of his age. We shudder to think what will become of us when he is gone. May fate stay the day." Philadelphia Press.

An English Girl in America

By TALLULAH MATTESON POWELL.

A MOST CHARMING DESCRIPTIVE NOVEL.

"An English Girl in America," by Tallulah Matteson Powell, is more than usually bright and sparkling. A pleasing, gossipy story, which is told with excellent spirit. It gives evidence that the author can do much better in a wider field than that to which she limits herself in these pages.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

"An English Girl in America," by Tallulah Matteson Powell, is packed with well-stated results of an uncommonly acute observation and analysis of individual character, and especially of differences in social usages between this country and the older societies in Europe. It is keen, shrewd, observant, discriminative, and tersely and pungently written.—Chicago Times.

The impressions of American girls in England have been much exploited of late. Miss Tallulah Matteson Powell, in her "An English Girl in America," shows us the other side of the picture, and sets forth Miss Camelia Wellington Porter's surprise at various American details, from our oranges at breakfast to the lack of leisure in Chicago.—Chicago Evening Post.

THE PALISER CASE

I

THE murder of Monty Paliser, headlined that morning in the papers, shook the metropolis at breakfast, buttered the toast, improved the taste of the coffee.

Murdered! It seemed too bad to be false. Moreover, there was his picture, the portrait of a young man obviously high-bred and insolently good-looking. In addition to war news and the financial page, what more could you decently ask for a penny? Nothing, perhaps, except the address of the murderer. But that detail, which the morning papers omitted, extras shortly supplied. Meanwhile in the minds of imaginative New Yorkers, visions of the infernal feminine surged. The murdered man's name was evocative.

His father, Montagu Paliser, generally known as M. P., had lived in that extensive manner in which New York formerly took an indignant delight. Behind him, extending back to the remotest past when Bowling Green was the centre of fashion, always there had been a Paliser, precisely as there has always been a Livingston. These people and a dozen others formed the landed gentry—a gentry otherwise landed since. But not the Paliser clan. The original Paliser was very wealthy. All told he had a thousand dollars. Montagu Paliser, the murdered man's father, had stated casually, as though offering unimportant information, that, by Gad, sir, you can't live like a gentleman on less than a thousand dollars a day. That was years and years ago. Afterward he doubled his estimate. Subsequently, he quadrupled it. It made no hole in him either. In spite of his yacht, his racing stable, his town house, his country residences and formerly in the great days, or rather in the great nights, his ladies of the ballet, in spite of these incidentals his wealth increased. No end to it, is about the way in which he was currently quoted.

All New Yorkers knew him, at any rate by repute, precisely as the least among us knows Mr. Carnegie, though perhaps more intimately. The tales of his orgies, of his ladies, of that divorce case and of the yacht scandal which burst like a starball, tales Victorian and now legendary, have, in their mere recital, made many an old reprobate's mouth champagne. But latterly, during the present generation that is, the ineffable Paliser—M. P. for short—who, with claret liveries and a yard of brass behind him had tooled his four-in-hand, or else, in his superb white yacht, gave you something to talk about, well, from living very extensively he had renounced the romps and banalities of this life.

Old reprobates could chuckle all they liked over the uproar he had raised in the small and early family party that social New York used to be. But in club windows there were no new tales of him to tell. Like a potentate outwearied with the circumstance of State, he had chucked it, definitely for himself, and recently in favour of his son, Monty, who, in the month of March, 1917, arrived from Havana at the family residence, which in successive migrations had moved, as the heart of Manhattan has moved, from the neighbourhood of the Battery to that of the Plaza.

In these migrations the Palisers had not derogated from their high estate. Originally, one of the first families here, the centuries, few but plural, had increased what is happily known as their prestige. Monty Paliser was conscious of that, but not unwholesomely. The enamellings that his father had added gave him no concern whatever. On the contrary. He knew that trade would sack the Plaza, as long since it had razed the former citadels of fashion, and he foresaw the day when the family residence, ousted from upper Fifth Avenue, would be perched on a peak of Washington Heights, where the Palisers would still be among the first people in New York—to those coming in town that way.

That result it was for him to insure. Apart from second cousins, to whom he had never said a word and never proposed to address, apart from them, apart too from his father and himself, there was only his sister, Sally Balaguine, who, one night, had gone to bed in Petersburg and, on the morrow, had awakened in Petrograd. Though, in addition to this much surprised lady, before whose eyes Petrograd subsequently dissolved into Retrograd and afterward into delirium, there was her son, a boy of three. Mme. Balaguine's prince did not count, or rather had ceased to. As lieutenant of the guards he had gone to the front where a portion of him had been buried, the rest having been minutely dispersed.

To perpetuate the clan in its elder branch, there was therefore but this young man, a circumstance which, on his return from Havana, his father advanced.

They were then at luncheon. For the father there was biscuit and milk. For the son there was an egg cooked in a potato. Yet, in the kitchen, or, if not there, somewhere about, were three chefs. Moreover on the walls were Beauvais. The ceiling was the spoil of a Venetian palace. The luncheon however simple was not therefore disagreeable.

With an uplift of the chin, the elder man flicked a crumb and sat back. The action was a signal. Three servants filed out.

Formerly his manner had been cited and imitated. To many a woman it had been myrrh and cassia. It had been deadly nightshade as well. After a fashion of long ago, he wore a cavalry moustache which, once black, now was white. He was tall, bald, very thin. But that air of his, the air of one accustomed to immediate obedience, yet which could be very urbane and equally insolent, that air endured.

In sitting back he looked at his son for whom he had no affection. For no human being had he ever had any affection, except for himself, and latterly even that unique love had waned.

The chefs, originally retained on shifts of eight hours each, in order that this man might breakfast or sup whenever he so desired, that he might breakfast, as a gentleman may, at four in the afternoon, or sup at seven in the morning, these chefs were useless. His wife, who had died, not as one might suppose of a broken heart but of fatty degeneration, had succumbed to their delicately toxic surprises with groans but also with thanksgiving.

That is ancient history. At present her widower supped on powdered charcoal and breakfasted on bismuth. The cooks he still retained, not to prepare these triumphs, but for the benefit of his heir, for whom he had no affection but whom he respected as the next incumbent and treated accordingly, that is to say, as one gentleman treats another.

On this high noon, when the servants had gone, the father sat back and looked at his son, who, it then occurred to him, astonishingly resembled his mother. He had the same eyes, too big, too blue; the same lashes, too long, too dark; the same ears, too small and a trifle too far forward. In addition he had the same full upper-lip, the same cleft in the chin, the same features refined almost to the point of degeneracy. But the ensemble was charming—too charming, as was his voice, which he had acquired at Oxford where, at the House, he had studied, though what, except voice culture, one may surmise and never know. Men generally disliked him and accounted the way he spoke, or the way he looked, the reason. But what repelled them was probably his aura of which, though unaware, they were not perhaps unconscious.

His father motioned: "Thank God, you are here. At any moment now we may be in it and you will have to go. You are not a divinity student and you cannot be a slacker."

The old man paused and added: "Meanwhile you will have to marry. If anything should happen to you, there would be but Sally and the Balaguine brat and I shouldn't like that. God knows why I care, but I do. There has always been a Paliser here and it is your turn now—which reminds me. I have made over some property to you. You would have had it any way, but the transfer will put you on your feet, besides saving the inheritance tax."

"Thank you. What is it?"

"The Place, the Wall Street and lower Broadway property, that damned hotel and the opera-box. Jeroloman wrote you about it. Didn't you get his letter?"

"I may have. I don't know that I read it."

"When you have a moment look in on him. He will tell you where you are."

"And where is that?"

The old man summarised it. Even with the increased cost of matrimony, it was enough for a Mormon, for a tribe of them. But the young man omitted to say so. He said nothing.

His father nodded at him. "You think marriage a nuisance. So it is. So is everything. By Gad, sir, I wish I were well out of it. I go nowhere—not even to church. I have grown thin through the sheer nuisance of things. But if nothing happens over there and you don't make a mess of it, the next twenty years of your life ought not to be profoundly disagreeable. Now I dislike to be a nuisance myself, but in view of the war, it is necessary that there should be another Paliser, if not here, at least en route."

"I will think it over," said this charming young man, who had no intention of doing anything of the kind.

"The quicker the better then, and while you are at it select a girl with good health and no brains. They wear best. I did think of Margaret Austen for you, but she has become engaged. Lennox his name is. Her mother told me. Told me too she hated it. Said you must come to dinner and she'd have a girl or two for you to look at. Oblige me by going. Plenty of others though. Girls here are getting healthier and stupider and uglier every year. By Gad, sir, I remember——"

The old man rambled on. He was back in the days when social New York foamed with beauty, when it held more loveliness to the square inch than any other spot on earth. He was back in the days when Fifth Avenue was an avenue and not a ghetto.

With an air of interest the young man listened. The air was not feigned. Yet what interested him was not the outworn tale but the pathological fact that the reminiscences of the aged are symptomatic of hardening of the arteries.

Mentally he weighed his father, gave him a year, eighteen months, and that, not because he was anxious for his shoes, but out of sheer dilettantism.

The idea that his father would survive him, that it was he who was doomed, that already behind the curtains of life destiny was staging his death—and what a death!—he could no more foresee than he foresaw the Paliser Case, which, to the parties subsequently involved, was then unimaginable, yet which, at that very hour, a court of last resort was deciding.

He looked over at his father. "Palmerston asked everybody, particularly when he didn't know them from Adam, 'How's the old complaint?' How is yours?"

With that air that had won so many hearts, and broken them too, the old man smiled.

"When I don't eat anything and sit perfectly still, it is extraordinary how well I feel."

How he felt otherwise, he omitted to state. A gentleman never talks of disagreeable matters.

II

IN the shouted extras that succeeded the initial news of the murder, Margaret Austen was mentioned, not as the criminal, no one less criminal than the girl could be imagined, but as being associated with the parties involved.

That was her misfortune and a very grievous misfortune, though, however grievous, it was as nothing to other circumstances for which she subsequently blamed herself, after having previously attributed them to fate, or rather, as fate is more modernly known, to karma.

Any belief may console. A belief in karma not only consoles, it explains. As such it is not suited to those who accept things on faith, which is a very good way to accept to them. It may be credulous to believe that Jehovah dictated the ten commandments. But the commandments are sound. Moreover it is perhaps better to be wrong in one's belief's than not to have any.

Margaret Austen believed in karma and in many related and wonderful things. Her face showed it. It showed other things; appreciation, sympathy, unworldliness, good-breeding and that minor charm that beauty is. It showed a girl good to look at, good through and through; a girl tall, very fair, who smiled readily, rarely laughed and never complained.

It is true that at the time this drama begins it would have been captious of her to have complained of anything were it not that life is so ordered that it has sorrow for shadow. The shadow on this human rose was her mother.

Mrs. Austen had seen worse days and never proposed to see them again. Among the chief assets of her dear departed was a block of New Haven. The stock, before collapsing, shook. Then it tripped, fell and kept at it. Through what financial clairvoyance the dear departed's trustee got her out, just in time, and, quite illegally but profitably, landed her in Standard Oil is not a part of this drama. But meanwhile she had shuddered. Like many another widow, to whom New Haven was as good as Governments, she might have been in the street. Pointing at her had been that spectre—Want!

It was just that which she never proposed to see again. The spectre in pointing had put a mark on this woman who was arrogant, ambitious and horribly shrewd.

A tall woman with a quick tongue, a false front, an air of great affability and, when on parade, admirably sent out, she ruled her daughter, or thought she did, which is not quite the same thing.

Margaret Austen was ruled by her conscience and her beautiful beliefs. These were her masters. This human rose was their lovely slave. But latterly a god had enthralled her. It was with wonder and thanksgiving that she recognised the overlordship of that brat of a divinity, whom poets call Eros, and thinkers the Genius of the Species.

Mrs. Austen, who had danced many a time before his shrine, had no objection whatever to the godlet, except only when he neglected to appear Olympianly, as divinity should, with a nimbus of rentrolls and gold.

In view of the fact that he had come to Margaret in déshabille, that is to say without any discernible nimbus, he affronted Mrs. Austen's ambitious eyes.

Of that she said nothing to Margaret. But at dinner one evening she summarised it to Peter Verelst who sat at her right.

The room, which was furnished with tolerable taste, gave on Park Avenue where she resided. At her left was Monty Paliser. Farther down were Margaret, Lennox and Kate Schermerhorn. Coffee had been served. Paliser was talking to Miss Schermerhorn; Lennox to Margaret.

"I don't like it," Mrs. Austen said evenly to Peter Verelst. "But what can I do?"

Peter Verelst was an old New Yorker and an old beau. Mrs. Austen had known him when she was in shorter frocks than those then in vogue. Even as a child she had been ahead of the fashion.

"Do?" Verelst repeated. "Do nothing."

"I am a snob," she resumed, expecting him to contradict her. "I did hope that Margaret, with her looks, would marry brilliantly."

Peter Verelst bent over his coffee. "The young man next door?"

Out of the corner of an eye Mrs. Austen glanced at Paliser and then back at Verelst. "Well, something of the kind."

Verelst raised his cup. He had known Lennox' father. He knew and liked the son. For Margaret he had an affection that was almost—and which might have been—paternal. But, noting the barometer, he steered into the open.

"Have Lennox here morning, noon and night. See to it that Margaret has every opportunity to get sick to death of him. Whereas if you interfere——"

Mrs. Austen, as though invoking the saints, lifted her eyes. "Ah, I know! If I had not been interfered with I would not have taken Austen. Much good it did me!"

Verelst, his hand on the tiller, nodded. "There you are! That locksmith business is very sound. Love revels in it. But give him his head and good-bye. Sooner or later he is bound to take to his heels, but, the more he is welcomed, the sooner he goes. The history of love is a history of farewells."

Paliser, who had caught the last phrase, felt like laughing and consequently looked very serious. The spectacle of two antiques discussing love seemed to him as hilarious as two paupers discussing wealth. He patted his tie.

"Very interesting topic, Mrs. Austen."

The woman smiled at him. "Love? Yes. How would you define it?"

Paliser returned her smile. "A mutual misunderstanding."

Mrs. Austen's smile deepened. "Would you like to have one?"

"With your daughter, yes."

Et moi donc! thought this lady, who, like others of our aristocracy, occasionally lapsed into French. But she said: "Why not enter the lists?"

"I thought they were closed."

"Are they ever?"

But now Verelst addressed the too charming young man. "How is your father?"

"In his usual poor health, thank you."

"What does he say about the war?"

"Nothing very original—that the Kaiser ought to be sent to Devil's Island. But that I told him would be an insult to Dreyfus, who was insulted enough. The proper place for the beast is the zoo. At the same time, the fellow is only a pawn. The blame rests on Rome—rests on her seven hills."

Verelst drew back. In the great days, or more exactly in the great nights, he had been a pal of M. P. That palship he had no intention of extending to M. P.'s son, and it was indifferently that he asked: "In what way?"

Kate Schermerhorn, who had been talking to Margaret and to Lennox, turned. Lennox also had turned. Paliser had the floor, or rather the table. He made short work of it.

"It was Cæsar's policy to create a solitude and call it peace. That policy Rome abandoned. Otherwise, that is if she had continued to turn the barbarians into so many dead flies, their legs in the air, there would be no barbarian now on the throne of Prussia. There would be no Prussia, no throne, no war."

You ought to write for the comic papers, thought Verelst, who said: "Well, there is one comfort. It can't last forever."

With feigned sympathy Mrs. Austen took it up. "Ah, yes, but meanwhile there is that poor Belgium!"

"By the way," Paliser threw in. "I have a box or two for the Relief Fund at the Splendor to-night. Would anybody care to go?"

Kate Schermerhorn, who looked like a wayward angel, exclaimed at it: "Oh, do let's. There's to be a duck of a medium and I am just dying to have my fortune told."

Verelst showed his handsome false teeth. "No need of a medium for that, my dear. Your path is one of destruction. You will bowl men over as you go."

Kate laughed at him. "You seem very upright."

Mrs. Austen turned to Margaret. "If you care to go, we might get our wraps."

A moment later, when the women had left the room and the men were reseated, Verelst stretched a hand to Lennox. "Again I congratulate you and with all my heart."

Keith Lennox grasped that hand, shook it, smiled. The smile illuminated a face which, sombre in repose, then was radiant. Tall and straight, hard as nails, he had the romantic figure. In a costume other than evening clothes, he might have walked out of a tapestry.

With ambiguous amiability, Paliser smiled also. Already Margaret's beauty had stirred him. Already it had occurred to him that Lennox was very invitingly in the way.

III

THE ballrooms of the Splendor, peopled, as Mrs. Austen indulgently noted, with Goodness knows who from Heaven knows where, received her and her guests.

Not all of them, however. At the entrance, Verelst, pretexting a pretext, sagely dropped out. Within, a young man with ginger hair and laughing eyes, sprang from nowhere, pounced at Kate, floated her away.

Mrs. Austen, Margaret, Lennox and Paliser moved on.

In one room there was dancing; in another, a stage. It was in the first room that Kate was abducted. On the stage in the room beyond, a fat woman, dressed in green and gauze, was singing faded idiocies. Beyond, at the other end of the room was a booth above which was a sign—The Veiled Lady of Yucatan. Beneath the sign was a notice: All ye that enter here leave five dollars at the door.

The booth, hung with black velvet, was additionally supplied with hierograms in burnished steel. What they meant was not for the profane, or even for the initiate. Champollion could not have deciphered them. Fronting the door stood a young woman with a dark skin, a solemn look and a costume which, at a pinch, might have been Maya.

In those accents which the Plaza shares with Mayfair, she hailed Margaret. "Hello, dear! Your turn next."

For a moment, the dark skin, the solemn look, the costume puzzled Margaret. Then at once she exclaimed: "Why, Poppet!" She paused and added: "This is Mr. Paliser—Miss Bleecker. You know Mr. Lennox."

But now, from the booth, a large woman with high colour, grey hair and a jewelled lorgnette rushed out and fastened herself on the sultry girl.

"Gimme back my money. Your veiled lady is a horror! Said I'd marry again!"

She raised her glasses. "Mary Austen, as I'm a sinner! Go in and have your misfortunes told. How do do Margaret? Marry again indeed! Oughtn't I to have my money back?"

"Poppet ought to make you pay twice," Mrs. Austen heartlessly retorted at this woman, the relict of Nicholas Amsterdam, concerning whom a story had come out and who had died, his friends said, of exposure.

Mrs. Amsterdam turned on Paliser whom she had never seen before. "What do you say?"

"I am appalled," he answered.

She turned again. "There, Poppet, you hear that? Gimme back my money."

But Miss Bleecker occupied herself with Lennox, who was paying for Margaret.

Margaret entered the booth where a little old woman, very plainly dressed, sat at a small deal table. From above hung a light. Beside her was a vacant chair.

"Sit there, please," the medium, in a low voice, told the girl. "And now, if you please, your hand."

Margaret, seating herself, removed a glove. The hand in which she then put hers was soft and warm and she feared that it might perspire. She looked at the woman who looked at her, sighed, closed her eyes and appeared to go to sleep. Then, presently, her lips parted and in a voice totally different from that in which she had just spoken, a voice that was thin and shrill, words came leapingly.

"You are engaged to be married. Your engagement will be broken. You will be very unhappy. Later, you will be thankful. Later you will realise that sorrow is sent to make us nobler than we were."

With an intake of the breath, the medium started, straightened, opened her eyes.

At the shock of it Margaret had started also. "But——"

The medium, in her former voice, low and gentle, interrupted.

"I can tell you nothing else. I do not know what was said. But I am sorry if you have had bad news."

Margaret stood up, replacing her glove. She knew, as we all know, that certain gifted organisms hear combinations of sound to which the rest of us are deaf. She knew, as many of us also know, that there are other organisms that can foresee events to which the rest of us are blind. But she knew too that in the same measure that the auditions of composers are not always notable, the visions of clairvoyants are not always exact. The knowledge steadied and partially comforted, but partially only.

At the entrance, Lennox stood with Miss Bleecker. A little beyond were Paliser and her mother. Mrs. Amsterdam, minus her money, must have rushed away.

Poppet Bleecker laughed and questioned: "No horrors?"

Lennox questioned also, but with his eyes.

Margaret hesitated. Then she got it. Taking the girl's hand she patted it and to Lennox said, and lightly enough: "Do go in. I want to see if what the medium says to you conforms with what she said to me."

Yet, however lightly she spoke, behind her girdle was that sensation which only the tormented know.

Beyond on the stage, the fat woman, now at the piano, was accompanying a girl who was singing a brindisi. The girl was young, good-looking, unembarrassed, very much at home. Her dress, a black chiffon, became her.

Then, in a moment, as Lennox entered the booth, Margaret joined her mother and looked at the girl.

"What is she singing?"

Paliser covered her with his eyes. "Verdi's Segreto per esser felice—the secret of happiness. Such a simple secret too."

"Yes?" Margaret absently returned. She was looking now at the booth. Quite as vaguely she added: "In what does it consist?"

"In getting what we do not deserve."

There was nothing in that to offend. But the man's eyes, of which already she had been conscious, did offend. They seemed to disrobe her. Annoyedly she turned.

Paliser turned with her. "Verdi's bric-à-brac is very banal. Perhaps you prefer Strauss. His dissonances are more harmonic than they sound."

Now though there was applause. With a roulade the brindisi had ceased and the singer as though pleased, not with herself but with the audience, bowed. The fat woman twisting on her bench, was also smiling. She looked cheerful and evil.

"I do believe that's the Tamburini," Mrs. Austen remarked. "I heard her at the Academy, ages ago." The usual touch followed. "How she has gone off!"

The fat woman stood up, and, preceded by the girl, descended into the audience.

Margaret looked again at the booth. Lennox was coming out. He said a word to Miss Bleecker and glanced about the room.

Margaret motioned. He did not notice. The girl who had been singing was bearing down on him, a hand outstretched and, in her face, an expression which Margaret could not interpret. But she saw Lennox smile, take her hand and say—what? Margaret could not tell, but it was something to which the girl was volubly replying.

"Who's his little friend?" Mrs. Austen in her even voice inquired. "Mr. Paliser," she added. "Would you mind telling—er—my daughter's young man that we are waiting."

Margaret winced. She had turned from Paliser and she turned then from her mother.

Paliser, whom the phrase "my daughter's young man" amused, sauntered away. He strolled on to where Lennox stood with the girl. The fat woman joined them.

Lennox must have introduced Paliser, for Margaret could see them all talking at once. Then Lennox again looked about, saw Margaret and her mother, and came over.

"Who's your friend?" Mrs. Austen asked.

Lennox' eyes caressed Margaret. Then he turned to her mother. "She is a Miss Cara. Cassy Cara her name is. I know her father. He is a violinist."

And my daughter is second fiddle, thought Mrs. Austen, who said: "How interesting!"

With his sombre air, Lennox summarised it. "She is studying for the opera. The woman with her, Madame Tamburini, is her coach. You may have heard of her."

"A fallen star," Mrs. Austen very pleasantly remarked. Quite as pleasantly she added: "The proper companion for a soiled dove."

The charm of that was lost. Margaret, who had not previously seen this girl but who had heard of her from Lennox, was speaking to him.

"It was her father, was it?" Then, dismissing it, she asked anxiously: "But do tell me, Keith, what did the medium say?"

"That I would be up for murder."

Margaret's eyes widened. But, judging it ridiculous, she exclaimed: "Was that all?"

"All!" Lennox grimly repeated. "What more would you have?" Abruptly he laughed. "I don't wonder Mrs. Amsterdam wanted her money back."

On the stage, from jungles of underwear, legs were tossing. The orchestra had become frankly canaille. Moreover the crowd of Goodness know's who had increased. A person had the temerity to elbow Mrs. Austen and the audacity to smile at her. It was the finishing touch.

She poked at Margaret. "Come."

As they moved on, a man smiled at Lennox, who, without stopping, gave him a hand.

He was an inkbeast. But there was nothing commercial in his appearance. Ordinarily, he looked like a somnambulist. When he was talking, he resembled a comedian. In greeting Lennox he seemed to be in a pleasant dream. The crowd swallowed him.

"Who was that?" Mrs. Austen enquired.

"Ten Eyck Jones."

"The writer?" asked this lady, who liked novels, but who preferred to live them.

Meanwhile Paliser was talking to Cassy Cara and the Tamburini. The latter listened idly, with her evil smile. Yet Paliser's name was very evocative. The syllables had fallen richly on her ears.

Cassy Cara had not heard them and they would have conveyed nothing to her if she had. She was a slim girl, with a lot of auburn hair which was docked. The careless-minded thought her pretty. She was what is far rarer; she was handsome. Her features had the surety of an intaglio. Therewith was an air and a look that were not worldly or even superior, but which, when necessary as she sometimes found it, could reduce a man, and for that matter a woman, to proportions really imperceptible.

A little beauty and a little devil, thought Paliser, who was an expert. But leisurely, in his Oxford voice, he outlined for her a picture less defined. "You remind me of something."

With entire brevity and equal insolence, she returned it. "I dare say."

"Yes. Of supper."

"An ogre, are you?"

Paliser, ruminating the possibilities of her slim beauty served Régence, smiled at this girl who did not smile back. "Not Nebuchadnezzar at any rate. Vegetarianism is not my forte. Won't you and Madame Tamburini take potluck with me? There must be a restaurant somewhere."

The fallen star moistened her painted lips. "Yes, why not?"

Born in California, of foreign parents, she had neither morals or accent and spoke in a deep voice. She spoke American and English. She spoke the easy French of the boulevards, the easier Italian of the operatic stage. She never spoke of Tamburini. She left him to be imagined, which perhaps he had been.

From the room they went on into a wide, crowded hall, beyond which was another room, enclosed in glass, where there were tables and palms.

As they entered, a captain approached. There was a smell of pineapple, the odour of fruit and flowers. From a gallery came the tinkle of mandolins. Mainly the tables were occupied. But the captain, waving the way, piloted them to a corner, got them seated and stood, pad in hand.

Paliser looked at Cassy Cara. She was hungry as a wolf, but she said indifferently: "A swallow of anything."

"One swallow does not make a supper," Paliser retorted and looked at the Tamburini who appeared less indifferent.

"Ham and eggs."

Without a quiver, the captain booked it.

"Also," Paliser told him, "caviare, woodcock, Ruinart." From the man he turned to the girl. "It was very decent of Lennox to introduce me to you."

Cassy put her elbows on the table. "He could not be anything else than decent. Don't you know him well?"

Paliser shrugged. "Our intimacy is not oppressive."

"He saved her father's life," the Tamburini put in. "Her father is a musician—and authentically marquis," she added, as though that explained everything.

"We are Portuguese," said Cassy, "or at least my father is. He used to play at the Metro. But he threw it up and one night, when he was coming home from a private house where he had been giving a concert, he was attacked. There were two of them. They knocked him down——"

"Before he had time to draw his sword-cane," the fat woman interrupted.

"Yes," Cassy resumed, "and just then Mr. Lennox came along and knocked them down and saved his violin which was what they were after."

"It's a Cremona," said the Tamburini who liked details.

"But that is not all of it," the girl continued. "My father's arm was broken. He has not been able to play since. Mr. Lennox brought him home and sent for his own physician. He's a dear."

"Who is?" Paliser asked. "The physician?"

But now a waiter was upon them with a bottle which he produced with a pop! Dishes followed to which Cassy permitted the man to help her. Her swallow of anything became large spoonfuls of rich blackness and the tenderness of savorous flesh. She was not carnal, but she was hungry and at her home latterly the food had been vile.

The Tamburini, with enigmatic ideas in the back of her head, ate her horrible dish very delicately, her little finger crooked. But she drank nobly.

Paliser too had ideas which, however, were not enigmatic in the least and not in the back of his head either. They concerned two young women, one of whom was patently engaged to Lennox and the other probably in love with him. The situation appealed to this too charming young man to whom easy conquests were negligible.

He had been looking at Cassy. On the table was a vase in which there were flowers. He took two of them and looked again at the girl.

"Sunday is always hateful. Couldn't you both dine with me here?"

The former prima donna wiped her loose mouth. She could, she would, and she said so.

Paliser put the flowers before Cassy.

"Le parlate d'amor," the ex-diva began and, slightly for a moment, her deep voice mounted.

Cassy turned on her. "You're an imbecile."

With an uplift of the chin—a family habit—Paliser summoned the waiter. While he was paying him, Cassy protested. She had nothing to wear.

She had other objections which she kept to herself. If it had been Lennox she would have had none at all. But it was not Lennox. It was a man whom she had never seen before and who was entirely too free with his eyes.

"Come as you are," said the Tamburini, who massively stood up.

Paliser also was rising. "Let me put you in a cab and on Sunday——"

Cassy gave him a little unsugared look. "You take a great deal for granted."

Behind the girl's back the Tamburini gave him another look. Cheerful and evil and plainer than words it said: "Leave it to me."

Cassy, her perfect nose in the air, announced that she must get her things.

Through the emptying restaurant Paliser saw them to the entrance. There, as he waited, the captain hurried to him.

"Everything satisfactory, sir?"

"I want a private dining-room on Sunday."

"Yes, sir. For how many?"

"Two."

"Sorry, sir. It's against the rules."

Paliser surveyed him. "Whom does this hotel belong to? You?"

The captain smiled and caressed his chin. "No, sir, the hotel does not belong to me. It is owned by Mr. Paliser."

"Thank you. So I thought. I am Mr. Paliser. A private dining-room on Sunday for two."

But now Cassy and the Tamburini, hatted and cloaked, were returning. The chastened waiter moved aside. Through the still crowded halls, Paliser accompanied them to the street where, a doorkeeper assiduously assisting, he got them into a taxi, asked the addresses, paid the mechanician, saw them off.

Manfully, as the cab veered, the Tamburini swore.

"You damn fool, that man is rich as all outdoors."

IV

THE house in which Cassy lived was what is agreeably known as a walk-up. There was no lift, merely the stairs, flight after flight, which constituted the walk-up, one that ascended to the roof, where you had a fine view of your neighbours' laundry. Such things are not for everybody. Cassy hated them.

On this night when the taxi, after reaching Harlem, landed her there and, the walk-up achieved, she let herself into a flat on the fifth floor, a "You're late!" filtered out at her.

It was her father, who, other things being equal, you might have mistaken for Zuloaga's "Uncle." The lank hair, the sad eyes, the wan face, the dressing-gown, there he sat. Only the palette was absent. Instead was an arm in a sling. There was another difference. Beyond, in lieu of capricious manolas, was a piano and, above it, a portrait with which Zuloaga had nothing to do. The portrait represented a man who looked very fierce and who displayed a costume rich and unusual. Beneath the portrait was a violin. Beside the piano was a sword-cane. Otherwise, barring a rosewood table, the room contained nothing to boast of.

"You're late," he repeated.

His name was Angelo Cara. When too young to remember it, he had come to New York from Lisbon. With him had come the swashbuckler in oil. He grew up in New York, developed artistic tastes, lost the oil man, acquired a wife, lost her also, but not until she had given him a daughter who was named Bianca, a name which, after elongating into Casabianca, shortened itself into Cassy.

Meanwhile, on Madison Avenue, then unpolluted, there was a brown-stone front, a landau, other accessories, the flower of circumstances not opulent but easy, the rents and increments of the swashbuckler's estate, which by no means had come from Lisbon but which, the rich and unusual costume boxed in camphor, had been acquired in the import and sale of wine.

The fortune that the swashbuckler made descended to his son, who went to Wall Street with it. There the usual cropper wiped him out, affected his health, drove him, and not in a landau either, from Madison Avenue, left him the portrait, the violin, the table and nothing else.

But that is an exaggeration. To have debts is to have something. They stir you. They stirred him. Besides there was Cassy. To provide for both was the violin which in his hands played itself. For years it sufficed. Then, with extreme good sense, he fought with the Union, fought with Toscanini, disassociated himself from both. Now, latterly, with his arm in a sling, the wolf was not merely at the door, it was in the living-room of this Harlem flat which Cassy had just entered.

It was then that he repeated it. "You're late!"

For the past hour he had sat staring at things which the room did not contain—a great, glowing house; an orchestra demoniacally led by a conductor whom he strangely resembled; a stage on which, gracile in the violet and silver of doublet and hose, the last of the Caras bowed to the vivas.

Then abruptly the curtain had fallen, the lights had gone out, the vision faded, banished by the quick click of her key.

But not entirely. More or less the dream was always with him. When to-day is colourless, where can one live except in the future? To-day is packed with commonplaces which, could we see them correctly, are probably false for in the future only beautiful things are true. It is stupid not to live among them, particularly if you have the ability, and what artist lacks it? In the future, there is fame for the painter, there is posterity for the poet and much good may it do them. But for the musician, particularly for the song-bird, there is the vertigo of instant applause. In days like these, days that witness the fall of empires, the future holds for the donna, for the prima donna, for the prima donna assoluta, the grandest of earthly careers.

That career, Angelo Cara foresaw for his daughter, foresaw it at least in the hypnogogic visions which the artist always has within beck and call. In the falsifying commonplaces of broad daylight he was not so sure. Her upper register had in it a parterre of flowers, but elsewhere it lacked volume, lacked line, lacked colour, and occasionally he wondered whether her voice would not prove to be a voix de salon and not the royal organ that fills a house. Yet in the strawberry of her throat, the orifice was wide, the larynx properly abnormal. In addition the Tamburini was prophetically comforting.

But did the woman know her trade? He did not believe it. He believed though that she had no morals, never had had any, even as a child. It was the same way with Rachel and the fact left him cold. He was artistically indifferent to what the putana did or omitted, to what anybody omitted or did. But anybody by no means included his daughter. At the thought of anything amiss with her, presto! his sad eyes flamed. Very needlessly too. Cassy was as indifferent to other people's conceptions of decorum as he was himself. The matter did not touch her. Clear-eyed, clean-minded, she was straight as a string.

"How did it go?" he asked.

Cassy laughed. She had had a glass of champagne. She had too, what is far headier, the wine of youth.

"Well, I didn't see any showmen tumbling over each other. Mr. Lennox was there. He asked after you, and introduced a man who had us out to supper. It was very good. I did so wish for you, poor dear."

"What man? What is his name?"

"Paliser, I think. Something of the kind. Ma Tamby told me."

"Not old M. P.?"

"Perhaps, I don't know. He has hair like a looking-glass. He did not seem old; he seemed very impudent. Ma Tamby says he's rich as all outdoors."

"That's the son then. Don't have anything to do with him. They're a bad lot."

"As if I cared! Ma Tamby said he could get me an engagement."

"Ha! In vaudeville with acrobats and funny men and little suppers to follow."

"Why not big ones?"

"Big what?"

"Big goose!" replied Cassy, who removed her gloves, took off her hat, ran a pin through it, put it down.

Her father stared. Behind the girl stood a blonde brute whom the supper had evoked. He wore a scowl and a bloody apron. In his hand was a bill. Behind him was the baker, the candlestickmaker. Behind these was the agent, punctual and pertinacious, who had come for the rent. Though but visions, they were real. Moreover, though they evaporated at once, solidly they would return. He had been staring at her, and through her, at them. In staring his eyes filled. Immediately they leaked.

Cassy bit her lip. The tumbril and the guillotine would not have made her weep. Dry-eyed she would have gone from one to the other. Besides, what on earth was he wowing about? But immediately it occurred to her that he might be experiencing one of the attacks to which he was subject. She leaned over him. "You poor dear, is it your heart?"

He brushed his eyes. Dimly they lighted. With artistic mobility his face creased in a smile. "No, farther down."

Cassy moved back. "What in the world——"

But now his face clouded again. "I am glad you had supper. To-morrow we'll starve."

The exaggeration annoyed her, she exclaimed at it and then stopped short. Already she had envisaged the situation. But it was idle, she thought, to excite him additionally.

"Well?" he almost whinnied.

But as he would have to know, she out with it. "There's the portrait, there's the violin. Either would tide us over."

In speaking she had approached him again. He shoved her aside. With a jerk he got to his feet, struck an attitude, tapped himself on the breast.

"I, Marquis de Casa-Evora, sell my father's picture!

I, Angelo Cara, sell my violin! And you, my daughter, suggest such a thing! But are you my daughter? Are you—oh!"

It trailed away. The noble anger, real or assumed, fell from him. No longer the outraged father, he was but a human being in pain.

Cassy hurried to the mantel where, in provision of these attacks, were glass tubes with amyl in them. She took and broke one and had him inhale it.

Then, though presently the spasm passed, the wolf remained. But the beast had no terrors for Cassy. Buoyant, as youth ever is, his fangs amused her. They might close on her, but they would not hurt, at any rate very much, or, in any case, very long. Meanwhile she had had supper and for the morrow she had a plan. That night she dreamed of it. From the dream she passed into another. She dreamed she was going about giving money away. The dream of a dream, it was very beautiful, and sometimes, to exceptional beings, beautiful dreams come true, not in the future merely, but in a walk-up.

V

IN Park Avenue that night there was no dramatic father in waiting. There were no bills, no scenes, no thought of secret errands; merely a drawing-room in which a fire was burning and where, presently, Margaret and Lennox were alone.

"I have letters to write," Mrs. Austen told them.

She had no letters to write, but she did have a thing or two to consider. What the wolf was to Cassy's father, Lennox was to her.

At dinner, Peter Verelst's advice to do nothing had seemed strategic. At the Splendor, it had seemed stupid. The spectacle of that girl hobnobbing with Lennox had interested her enormously. If a spectacle can drip, that had dripped and with possibilities which, if dim as yet, were none the less providential, particularly when viewed spaciously, in the light of other possibilities which Paliser exhaled. Mrs. Austen was a woman of distinction. You had only to look at her to be aware of it. Yet, at the possible possibilities, she licked her chops.

Meanwhile, with the seriousness of those to whom love is not the sentiment that it once was, or the sensation that it has become, but the dense incarnate mystery that it ever should be, Margaret and Lennox were also occupied with the future.

In connection with it, Lennox asked: "Can you come to-morrow?"

As he spoke, Margaret released her hand. Her mother was entering and he stood up.

"Mrs. Austen," he resumed, "won't you and Margaret have tea at my apartment to-morrow?"

He would have reseated himself but the lady saw to it that he did not.

"You have such pleasant programmes, Mr. Lennox. You are not going though, are you? Well, if you must, good-night."

It was boreal, yet, however arctic, it was smiling, debonair. As such, Lennox had no recourse but to accept it. He bent over Margaret's hand, touched two of Mrs. Austen's fingers. In a moment, he had gone.

Mrs. Austen, smiling still, sat down.

"Nice young man. Very nice. Nice hats, nice ties, nice coats. Then also he is a theosophist, I suppose, or, if not, then by way of becoming one. What more could the heart desire? Would you mind putting out one of those lights? Not that one—the other."

Gowned in grey which in spite of its hue contrived to be brilliant, Mrs. Austen rustled ever so slightly. Always a handsome woman and well aware of it, she was of two minds about her daughter's looks. They far surpassed her own and she did not like that. On the other hand they were an asset on which she counted.

She rustled, quite as slightly again.

"And such a taking way with him! That little singing-girl whom we saw to-night, quite a pretty child, didn't you think? She seemed quite smitten. Then there are others, one may suppose. Yes, certainly, a very nice young man."

"Mother!"

"Well, what? Young men will be young men.

Only a theosophist could imagine that they would be young girls. I make every allowance from him—as doubtless he does for others. This is quite as it should be. I have no patience with model young men. Model young men delight their mothers' hearts and ruin their wives' temper. They remodel themselves after marriage. Whereas a young man who is not model at all, one who has had his fling beforehand, settles down and becomes quite fat. You have chosen very wisely, my dear. If you had waited you might have had Paliser and I should not have liked that. He is too good."

Margaret stretched a hand to the fire. She was not cold and the movement was mechanical. But she made no reply. In Matthew we are told that for every idle word we utter we shall answer at the day of judgment. That passage she had longly meditated. She did not believe that Matthew wrote it and she did not believe in a day of judgment. Matthew was a peasant who spoke Syro-Chaldaic. It was not supposable that he could write in Greek. It was not supposable that there can be a specific day of judgment, since every moment of our days is judged. But through Margaret had her tolerant doubts, she knew that the message itself was sound. It did not condemn evil and vulgar words, for they condemn themselves. What it condemned was idle words and she regretted that her mother employed them. But theosophy is, primarily, a school of good manners. The Gospel condemns idle words, theosophy forbids disagreeable ones.

To her mother's remarks, she made therefore no reply. Instead, she changed the subject.

"Will you care to go with me to his rooms to-morrow?"

With a mimic of surprise and of gentle remonstrance that was admirably assumed, Mrs. Austen lifted a hand.

"But, my dear! Were you thinking of going alone?"

The remonstrance, however gentle, was absurd and she knew it. Margaret could go where she liked. It would all be chaste as a piano-recital. But the flea that she had been trying to put in the girl's ear seemed very ineffective. She is just as I was at her age, thought this lady, who, in so thinking, flattered herself extraordinarily.

She shook her head. "For if you were, it would not do. Such things may pass in London, they don't here. But to-morrow is Saturday, isn't it? Yes, to-morrow is Saturday. At three I have an appointment with the dentist. I'll telephone though. That always pains them and, where a dentist is concerned, I do think turn about is fair play."

It was pleasantly said. To make it pleasanter, she stood up and added: "Are you to sit here and read? There is a French book lying around somewhere that belonged to your dear father. I don't remember who wrote it and I have forgotten the title, but you are sure to like it. There! I have it. It is called: 'L'art de tromper les femmes.' "

Mrs. Austen moved to the door and looked back.

"But if you don't find it readily, let it go for to-night. Your young man is sure to have a copy. No nice young man is without one."

VI

LENNOX was a broker, a vocation which he practised in Wall Street. Early on the following afternoon, while returning from there, he sat wedged between a gunman and a Hun. He was unconscious of either. The uncertain market; the slump, momentarily undiscernible, but mathematically inevitable; customers, credulous or sceptical, but always avid; the pulse of the feverish street which the ticker indifferently registered; the atmosphere of tobacco and greed; the trailing announcements; "Steel, three-fourths; Pennsy, a half," these things were forgotten. The train crashed on. Of that too he was unconscious.

Before him a panorama had unrolled—the day he first saw her, the hour he first loved her, the moment he first thought she might care for him—the usual panorama that unfolds before any one fortunate enough to love and to be loved in return.

"Grand Central!"

The gunman disappeared, the Hun had gone, the car emptied itself on a platform from which it was at once refilled. Lennox ascended the stair, reached the street, boarded a taxi, drove to his home.

The latter, situated on the ground floor of an apartment house a step from Park Avenue, was entirely commonplace, fitted with furniture large and ugly, yet minutely relieved by a photograph which showed the almost perfect oval of Margaret's almost perfect face.

The photograph stood on a table in the sitting-room beyond which extended other rooms that, in addition to being ugly, were dark. But Lennox had no degrading manias for comfort. Pending the great day he camped in these rooms, above which, on an upper storey was a duplex apartment which, if Margaret liked, he proposed to take.

It was for her opinion regarding it that he had asked her to come. In the forenoon she had telephoned that she and her mother would both be with him. He had instructed his servant accordingly and now a silver tea-service that had belonged to his grandmother and which, being Victorian, was hideous, gleamed at him as he entered the rooms.

Something else gleamed also. On a rug, a puddle of sunlight had spilled.

Above, on the embossed platter, were petits fours, watercress sandwiches, a sack of sweetmeats, a bunch of violets, a scatter of cups. Beneath was the puddle.

Lennox looked. It seemed all right.

Harris, his servant, a little man, thin as an umbrella, sidled silently by. The vestibule took him. From it came the sound of a voice, limpid, clear, which Lennox knew and knew too was not Margaret's.

"A lady to see you, sir," Harris, reappearing and effacing himself, announced.

The doorway framed her. There, with her shock of auburn hair, her cameo face, her slim figure and her costume which, though simple, was not the ruinous simplicity that Fifth Avenue achieves, Cassy presented a picture very different from that on the table, a picture otherwise differentiated by a bundle that was big as a baby.

Lennox did not know but that it might contain a baby and the possibility alarmed this man who was afraid of nobody.

"Hello!" he exclaimed.

In exclaiming, he stared. He liked the girl. But at the moment she was in the way. Moreover, why she had come to these rooms of his, where she had not been invited, and where she had not ventured before, was a mystery.

"How's your father?" he added.

There are people, as there are animals, that cannot be awkward and are never ridiculous. Cassy was one of them. None the less she stood on one foot. The tea-table had become very talkative. It told her that it was expecting somebody; that watercress sandwiches were not for her; no, nor Victorian horrors either.

"Be off!" it shouted.

"Sit down," said Lennox.

Cassy, hugging the bundle, remained in the doorway. It was not the tea-table merely, but something else, the indefinable something which one may feel and not describe that was telling her to hurry. Afterward, with that regret which multiplies tears and subtracts nothing, she wished she had hurried, wished rather that she had not come, wished that she had defied the wolf, outfaced the butcher, done anything except enter these rooms.

She shifted the bundle. "I have been gadding about in Wall Street. I never was there before, but it is so nice and windy I may go there again. This is just a good-day and good-bye."

As she spoke she turned, and as she turned Lennox' heart smote him. He hurried to her.

"See here! You can't go like this. Have a cup of tea."

Cassy gave him the rare seduction of her smile. "Thank you. I am out on business and I never drink in business hours."

But now Lennox had got himself between her and the vestibule.

"Business!" he repeated. "What is it? Anything in my line? Let's transact it here. Wall Street is no place"—for a pretty girl he was about to say but, desisting, he substituted—"for you."

"But you are expecting people."

"How in the world did you know? Anyway, they are not here yet and if they were they would be glad to meet you."

"I wonder!" said Cassy, whose wonder concerned not their pleasure but her own, and concerned it because she hated snobs, among whom she knew that Lennox moved.

"Now, tell me," he resumed.

Cassy, realising that it must be then or never, looked up at him.

"You remember father's violin?"

"I should say I did."

"Well, my business in Wall Street was to offer it as—what do you call it?—as collateral."

Lennox indicated the bundle. "Is that it?"

Cassy nodded. "I had to hide it and smuggle it out without his knowing it. He thinks it stolen. If he knew, he would kill me. As it is, he has gone crazy. To quiet him, I said I would go to the police."

Lennox laughed. "And I am the police!"

"Yes, you're the police."

"All right then. The police have recovered it. Take it back to him. How much do you need? Will a hundred do?"

That was not Cassy's idea. She shook her docked head at it. "You're the police but I am a business man. If you make the loan, you must keep the collateral."

"You are a little Jew, that's what you are," Lennox, affecting annoyance, replied.

Cassy smiled, "I like your jeu d'esprit. But not well enough to accept money as a gift."

"Good Lord!" Lennox protested. "Look here! I am not giving money away. I don't mean it as a gift. Pay me back whenever you like. Until then, what do you expect me to do with that thing? Give serenades? No, take it back to your father. I know just how he feels about it. He told me."

Cassy shifted the bundle. "Good-bye then." But as he still blocked the way, she added: "Will you let me pass?"

Moralists maintain that a man should never argue with a woman, particularly when she is young and good-looking. He should yield, they assert. Cassy's youth and beauty said nothing audible to Lennox. They said nothing of which he was then aware. In addition he was not a moralist. But there are influences, as there are bacilli, which unconsciously we absorb. For some time he had been absorbing a few. He did not realise it then. When he did, he was in prison. That though was later. At the moment he threw up his hands.

"I surrender. Will you mind putting it down somewhere?"

Cassy turned. Beyond was a table and near it a chair to which she went. There she dumped the violin. In so doing she saw Margaret's picture.

"What a lovely girl!"

Lennox, who had followed, nodded. "That is Miss Austen to whom I am engaged."

"Oh!" said Cassy. She did not know that Lennox was engaged. But suddenly the room had become uncomfortably warm and she blurted it: "How happy she must be!"

At the slip, for he thought it one, Lennox laughed.

"You mean how happy I must be," exclaimed this rare individual to whom the verb to be happy had a present tense, yet one which even then it was losing.

He had been fumbling in a pocket. From it he drew a wad of bills, fives and tens, and made another wad. "Here you are. I will mail you a receipt for the collateral."

Cassy, taking the money in one hand, extended the other. "May I say something?"

"Why, of course."

Cassy could talk and very fluently. But at the moment she choked. What is worse, she flushed. Conscious of which and annoyed at it, she withdrew her hand and said: "It's so hot here!"

Lennox looked about, then at her. "Is it? Was that what you wanted to say?"

Cassy shook herself. "No, and it was very rude of me. I wanted to thank you. Good-bye, Mr. Policeman."

"Good-bye," he threw after the girl, who, in leaving the room, must have taken the sunlight with her. As she passed over the rug, the puddle passed too. It followed her out like a dog.

That phenomenon, to which Lennox then attached no significance, he afterward recalled. For the moment he busied himself with pen and ink. Presently he touched a button.

From regions beyond the little old man appeared.

Lennox motioned at the bundle. "Take that to this address. Ask for Mr. Cara and say it comes from the police. From the police, don't forget, Harris."

"I'll not forget, sir."

"And go now. When the ladies come, I'll open the door."

As it happened, only shadows came. The shadows lengthened. They lapped the floor, devoured the silver, turned the rug into a pit, the room into darkness. Apart from shadows, no one came, no one rang. But, though Lennox was unaware of it, two people did come, and of the two one would have rung, had not the other prevented.

Lennox did not know that. On the inaccessible planes where events are marshalled, it was perhaps prearranged that he should not.

VII

MARGARET, on her way to Lennox that afternoon, wondered whether it might not be possible for them to live elsewhere.

Born and bred in the sordid hell with a blue sky that New York was before the war, latterly the sky itself had darkened. The world in which she moved, distressed her. Its parure of gaiety shocked. Those who peopled it were not sordid, they were not even blue. Europe agonised and they dined and danced, displayed themselves at the opera, summarised the war as dreadful, dismissed it, gossiped and laughed. It was that attitude which distressed this girl who, had she been capable of wishing ill to any one, might have wished them treated as were the élegantes of Brussels.

Margaret had no such evil wish. But she did hope that when married, she might reside elsewhere.

"There goes that Mrs. Tomlinson," said her mother. "Last night at the Bazaar—what do you suppose? She asked me to dinner. She actually did! The woman must be mad."

Margaret made no reply. Park Avenue was very bright. To her also for the moment the scientific savagery of the Huns was remote. The brightness of the April day was about her.

"I am in rags," continued Mrs. Austen, who was admirably dressed. "On Monday I must really look in on Marguerite. She is an utter liar, but then you feel so safe with her. Where is it that your young man lives? Somebody said that lies whiten the teeth. It must be there, isn't it? Or is it here? These places all look alike, none of them seems to have any numbers and that makes it so convenient."

They had reached a chalk cliff, on the face of which were windows, balconies and, at the base, two low steps. On the upper step, in large black letters, was the cliff's name.

Through glasses, which she did not need, Mrs. Austen surveyed it. "The Sandringham! Why not The Throne?"

Margaret went on and up. Mrs. Austen followed. At once they were in a large, marble-flagged hall. Beyond, from a lift, a boy in green and gilt, peered greedily. At the left was a door with a brass plate that said: "Dr. Winship." Opposite was another door with another plate on which was "Lennox."

That, also, Mrs. Austen surveyed. "I did not know your young man was an earl, but perhaps he is merely a duke. Shall we send that boy or do we ring? In bachelor quarters one hardly knows what to do—or what goes on in them either," she immediately and suggestively added.

The door at the right had opened. Cassy was coming out. The flush was still on her face and in her hand was the money. Mechanically she thumbed it. She had looked down at the roll of bills and through them at the butcher, the baker, the candlestickmaker. She looked up and saw Margaret whose photograph she had seen a moment before. Instantly she recognised her. Instantly she realised that it was for her the violets and the sack of bonbons were waiting. As quickly she understood why the teapot had shouted: "Be off!"

From Margaret she glanced at Mrs. Austen, who was well worth it. In and about her eyes and mouth there was an expression of such lofty aloofness, an air of such aristocratic disdain, that though she stood without motion, movement, or gesture; though, too, there was no draught, the skirt of her admirable frock seemed to lift and avert itself. It was the triumph of civilised life. Yet that triumph she contrived to heighten. Raising the glasses which she did not need, she levelled them at Cassy.

Cassy, who had but glanced at her, arrested the glance and, for a second, held it on her, but with an unconcern so obliterating that it had the effect of blotting-paper. Mrs. Austen felt herself disappearing. It was as though Cassy had looked at her and had seen nothing whatever.

And that to Mrs. Austen! The lady squirmed but she rallied, the more readily perhaps since now Cassy had gone, and she said and pleasantly enough: "What a charming vestal! Such an engaging manner! Seemed, too, so at home! Let me see? It was she, was it not, who was singing last night? Rather a coincidence, don't you think?"

Margaret made no reply. The incident, though long in the telling, had barely outlasted a moment, and crossing the hall, she was approaching Lennox' door.

Without haste, Mrs. Austen circumvented her. "Not to-day, my dear. As it is, it is fortunate we came on foot. Otherwise, it would have been awkward and that is always so distressing. Another day."

Quietly, easily she had got herself in front of Margaret who, without shoving, could not reach the bell.

With candid eyes she looked at her mother. "You seem to be suggesting——"

"Perish the thought!" Mrs. Austen sweetly and quickly cut in. "I would not even suggest that one and two make three, for perhaps they don't. No, my dear, I suggest nothing. I merely insist. To-day we must postpone our little visit and to-night, when he comes, you can have it out with him. A lover's quarrel! What more could you wish? But here now is the lift-boy. We must dissemble. It's quite like a play.

"No," she interrupted herself to remark at the approaching, greedy and enquiring youth, "I want nothing whatever except not to be engaged in conversation."

"Whachyer mean?" asked the boy, who, however, promptly blighted by her level stare, omitted to pursue it.

She turned again to Margaret. "We will find a taxi at the corner. These first spring days are so enervating."

Margaret faced her. "I am going in."

The sight of Cassy issuing from Lennox' rooms had surprised her, as the unexpected will surprise. But in saying that she was going in, it was not at all for explanations. Explanations are for strangers. Love understands—or should understand, and Margaret divined that Cassy had come on some errand from her father, of whose waylaying and rescue Lennox had long since told her.

"Will you please move a little?" she added.

Mrs. Austen, after routing the boy, had lowered her glasses. She raised them again. "Look there!"

At the entrance were two women with a child between them. On the stair was a man. The door marked "Dr. Winship" had opened. The wide hall was suddenly full of people.

Mrs. Austen lowered her lorgnette. "Don't make a scene, my dear. At least, don't make one over my dead body."

Resistance was easy, but to what end? Margaret felt that she could persist, insist, ring and go in, but now only to be accompanied by her mother's mocking and stilted sneers. The consciousness of that subtracted the brightness from the day, the pleasure from the visit. Then, too, that evening he would come. Then they would be alone.

She turned. A moment more and both were in the street, where Mrs. Austen forgot about the taxi. Other matters occupied the good woman and occupied her very agreeably. She had been playing a game, and a rare game it is, with destiny. The stakes were extravagant, but her cards were poor. Then abruptly, in one of the prodigious shuffles that fate contrives, a hand, issuing from nowhere, had dealt her a flush. She purred at it, at the avenue, at the world, at her daughter.

"I am so glad we are not going anywhere to-night." A car flew by, a gloved hand waved and the purr continued. "Wasn't that Sarah Amsterdam? By the way, what did the medium tell you? Anything about a dark man crossing your path? If not, it was very careless of her. But what was I talking about? Oh, yes, I am so glad we are to be at home. You can have a nice, quiet evening with your young man. Only, do you know, I wouldn't say anything about that little vestal. He might not like it. Men are so queer. They hate to be misunderstood and to be understood makes them furious. No, I wouldn't mention it. But now isn't he as full of surprises as a grab-bag? I thought him a model of the most perfect propriety, and that only shows how wrong it is to judge by appearances. Model young men always remind me of floor-walkers. Who was that that just bowed? Dear me, so it was, and he looked so down in the mouth he might have been a dentist. On Monday I really must go to my dentist. He does hurt terribly and that is so reassuring. You feel that you are getting your money's worth. Don't your teeth need attending to? Ah, here we are at last! God bless our home!"

Entering the hall, she looked at a little room to the right in which the manager awed prospecting tenants. Usually it was empty. It was empty then. Mrs. Austen looked, passed on and, preceding Margaret, entered a lift that floated them to the home on which she had asked a blessing.

VIII

THE Italians have a proverb about waiting for some one who does not come. They call it deadly. Among the lapping shadows Lennox felt the force of it. But concluding that visitors had detained his guests, he dressed and went around a corner or two to the Athenæum Club where usually he dined.

In the main room which gives on Fifth Avenue, he found Ten Eyck Jones talking war. Jones was a novelist, but he did not look like one. There was nothing commercial in his appearance, which was that of a man half-asleep, except when he talked and then he seemed very much awake. He was not fat and though an inkbeast, he dressed after the manner of those who put themselves in the best hands and then forget all about it. But for Lennox he had a superior quality, he was a friend. With him was Harry Cantillon, who, the night before, had danced away with Kate Schermerhorn. Straddling an arm of Cantillon's chair was Fred Ogston, a young man of a type that, even before the war, was vanishing and which was known as about town. Adjacently sat Peter Verelst. Servants brought little decanters and removed others. In a corner an old man glared with envious venom at the liquors of which he had consumed too many and of which, at the price of his eyesight, he could consume no more.

Jones waved at Lennox. "I have been telling these chaps that before they are much older they will be in khaki."

"Houp!" cried Cantillon. He sprang up, ran to the arched entrance, where, lightly, without effort, he turned a somersault and was gone.

The old man in the corner raised himself, shuffled to a table, sat down and wrote to the house committee. Such conduct could not be tolerated! Having said it, he raised himself again and shuffled over with the letter to Dunwoodie, a lawyer with the battered face of a bulldog and a ruffian's rumpled clothes.

Dunwoodie, instead of taking the letter, gave the old man a look, one look, his famous look, the look with which—it was said—he reversed the Bench. Angrily the old man turned tail, collided with Paliser, apologised furiously, damning him beneath his breath, damning Dunwoodie, damning the house committee, damning the club.

"Are you to dine here?" Jones asked Ogston, who swore gently, declaring that, worse luck, he was due at his aunt's.

"But you are," Jones told Lennox. "Come on and I'll make your hair stand on end." He turned: "And yours, too."

Peter Verelst smoothed the back of his head. "Thank you, Ten Eyck. But such hair as I have I prefer should remain as it is."

The two men went on and up into another room, spacious, high-ceiled, set with tables, where a captain got them seated, took their orders, carefully transmitted them to a careful waiter, an omnibus meanwhile producing ice-water which Jones had promptly removed.

He smiled at Lennox. "Who was the jeunesse you and Paliser were talking to last night? She had been singing."

Lennox unfolded a napkin. "I thought you were to make my hair stand on end."

"Well," said the novelist, who spoke better than he knew, "she may make Paliser's. There's a young man with plenty of perspective. I saw him in London just before the deluge. He was then en route for the Marquesas. I envied him that. I envied him the vanilla-scented nights; the skies, a solid crust of stars, and also, and particularly, the tattooed ghosts. But I am forgetting your hair. Were you ever in Berlin?"

Lennox scowled. "Yes. Once."

"And once is too often. The last time I was there, I looked down the Wilhelmstrasse and it got up and threatened me. Barring the possibilities of future avatars, I shall not promenade there again. But I would give a red pippin, I would give two of them, to have been in Potsdam on that night, that cloudless night, the night in July, when in a room, gorgeous as only vulgarity could made it, there was sounded the crack of doom."

Jones gestured and a waiter hurried to him. He motioned him away.

"You can picture it, Lennox, or, if not, who am I to refuse my aid? At the doors were lackeys; at the gates were guards. Without and beyond, to the four points of the compass, an unsuspecting world slept, toiled, feasted, fasted, occupied with its soap-bubble hates and loves. But, in that room, saurians, with titles as long as your arm, were contriving a cataclysm that was to exceed the deluge. Since then, and though it be but through the headlines, you and I stand witness to events that no mortal ever saw before. That night, in that room they were concocted. By comparison, what are the mythical exploits of Homer's warriors, the fabulous achievements of Charlemagne's paladins, the fading memories of Napoleon's campaigns? What are they all by comparison to a world in flames? Hugo, with his usual sobriety, said that Napoleon inconvenienced God. Napoleon wanted Europe. These gunmen want the earth. They won't get it. Hell is their portion. But, while they were planning the crib-cracking, I would give a red pippin to have been in their joint that night. A little more trout?"

Jones turned to the waiter. "Take it away and fetch the roast."

He was about to give other orders, yet these Lennox interrupted.

"But look here. You spoke of an unsuspecting world. The Kaiser had been rattling the sabre for years. Everybody knew that."

"So he had," said Jones, who contradicted no one. "But England did not take him seriously, nor did this country either. Consequently, when the war began it was regarded as but another robber-raid which shortly would be over. That was an idea that everybody shared, even to the Kaiser, who afterward said that he had not wanted this war. Incredible as it may seem he spoke the truth. He did not want a war in which he would be tripped on the Marne, blocked on the Yser and foiled at Verdun. He wanted a war in which France would be felled, Russia rolled back, a war in which, over Serbia's ravaged corpse, his legions could pour down across the Turkish carpet into the realm where Sardanapalus throned, beyond to that of Haroun-al-Raschid, on from thence to Ormus and the Ind, and, with the resulting thralls and treasure, overwhelm England, gut the United States, destroy civilisation and, on the ruins, set Deutschland über Alles!"

"Hear! Hear!" said Lennox from between bites.

Jones, after a momentary interlude with a fork, got back at it. "That is what he wanted! But to get it, he lacked one thing, one thing only. He had everything else, he had everything that forethought, ingenuity and science could provide. The arsenals were stocked. The granaries were packed, the war-chests replete. Grey-green uniforms were piled endlessly in heaps. Kiel—previously stolen from Denmark, but then reconstructed and raised to the war degree—at last was open. The navy was ready. The army was ready. Against any possible combination of European forces, the oiled machine was prepared. In addition, clairvoyance had supplied the pretext and stupidity the chance. Petersburg was then in the throes of a general strike—which the Wilhelmstrasse had engineered. In Paris, the slipshod condition of the army had been publicly denounced. England and Ireland were nearly at each other's throats. Yet, had they been in each other's arms, the Kaiser was convinced that England would not interfere. Moreover in France, mobilisation required weeks; in Russia, months; and even then the Russian army, otherwise unequipped, the Tsarina had supplied with two hundred Teuton generals. That woman used to exclaim at her resemblance to Marie Antoinette. She flattered herself. It is Bazaine whom she resembled. But where was I? Oh, yes. The opportunity was so obvious and everything so neatly prepared that, for good measure, the pretext was added. An archduke, sinister when living and still more sinister dead, was, by the Kaiser's orders, bombed to bits and the bombing fastened on Serbia. Allied stupidity provided the opportunity, imperial forethought supplied the rest. Since highwayry began, never was there such a chance. On the last gaiter was the last button. The Kaiser lacked but one thing."

Lennox shoved at his plate. "So you have said."

Jones, abandoning his fork, repeated it. "One thing! In Potsdam, on that cloudless July night, when the world, on which he proposed to batten, slept, toiled, feasted, fasted, occupied with its futile loves and hates, that thing must have occurred to him."

"Yes, but confound it, what was it?"

Jones lit a cigar. "Bernstorff said, or is said to have said—I do not count him among my acquaintances—that on that night this supercanaille showed symptoms of what I think I have seen described as vacillation. That is quite on the cards. It bears out my theory. In any event the fellow had his ambitions. He wanted to descend into the red halls of history disguised. He might have succeeded. History is very careless and to-day barely recalls that at five o'clock on the morning succeeding his marriage to a dowdy fat girl, he treated his regiment to a drill. The fact is uninteresting and would be equally unimportant were it not for the note that it struck. Subsequently, when he leaped on the throne, he shouted that those who opposed him he would smash. "There is no other law than mine"; he later announced—a fine phrase and yet but a modern variant of Domitian's: "Your god and master orders it." Incidentally, in addition to the Garter, an honorific which the Duke of Cambridge admirably summarised as "having, sir, none of the damned nonsense of merit about it," he had other distinctions. He had—and has—uranomania, that is to say, a flight of fancy in which the patient believes himself associated with God. He had also defilirium tremens, which manifested itself in those manœuvres that are war's image and in which the troops defile. Yet, when it came to the real thing, it may be that this paradomaniac lacked the stomach. Apart from the Kruger incident, and one or two other indecencies, his observance of international etiquette was relatively correct. The lackeys of history might therefore have deodorised him. With a sow's ear a lot may be done. Have a cigar?"

Lennox laughed. "I would prefer the point."

"Now, how greedy you are. Well then, here it is. On that fatidic night in July, this fellow was fifty-five."

"What of it?"

"Everything. At his age Alexander had been dead twenty years."

As Jones spoke he raised his hands. "Spirit of the Great Sinner, forgive me! This scrofulous dwarf has no kinship with thee!

"No," Jones, dropping his hands, resumed. "None. His kin are Herod, Caracalla, Attila, Genghis Khan, and Cloacus, Lord of Sewers. Those are his kin. To the shade of the Lampsacene, whom the world had forgotten; to that of Cloacus, whom civilisation had ignored, subsequently he devoted the army. For the troops he invoked them. But that night the ghosts of the others gave him pause. At his age, Caracalla, Attila, Genghis, were dead. They had died hideous, monstrous—but young. Herod alone may have seemed a promising saint to swear by, though, in the obscurities of Syrian chronology, even of him he could not be sure. The one kindred hyena who, at fifty-five, had defied the world was Tsi An, the Chinese Empress, and he had helped to squelch her. Do you see it now? To burglarise the world, this thug had every advantage. The police were asleep. The coast was clear. The jimmies and the dynamite sticks were ready. Even the dark lantern was packed. The kit was complete. He had everything. He lacked nothing, except the one essential—Youth! The eyes of youth are clear. His were too dimmed to foresee that the allies——"

Lennox was rising.

Amiably Jones switched on and off again. "Hold on a minute. You have not given me the "Who's Who of that young woman."

In Lennox' brain, instantly cells latent, alert, and of which he was entirely unconscious, functioned actively. Before him Cassy stood. Beside her was another. This other, very lovely, was a saint. Yet, prompted still by the cells and equally unaware of it, it occurred to him that a lovely saint may resemble a vase that is exquisite, but unresilient and perhaps even empty. Whereas a siren, like Cassy——

Abruptly he caught himself up. The unawaited disloyalty into which he had floundered, surprised and annoyed him. He could not account for the delicate infidelity and perplexedly he looked at Jones who still was at it.

"The diva I mean. The diva in duodecimo who sang at the Bazaar."

Lennox shook himself and sat down again. Modestly then the thrice-told tale was repeated—Angelo Cara, a violin in one hand, a sword-cane in the other, trudging home. The attack, the rout, the rescue, the acquaintance with Cassy that ensued.

Jones, absorbing the story, pigeonholed his memory with the details which, sometime, for copy purposes, might be of use.

"They are Portuguese," Lennox, rising again, concluded.

Jones peered about. The great room was filled with members, eating, drinking, laughing, talking—talking mainly of nothing whatever. He motioned. "Isn't that Cantillon over there with—of all people!—Dunwoodie?"

Lennox looked and nodded. "Cantillon is in Dunwoodie's office. He asked me to give him my law business." Indifferently, with the air of one considering the improbable, Lennox added: "Some day I may. Good-night."

But in the night into which he then went, already that day was breaking.

IX

THAT same evening, as Lennox was leaving the club, Mrs. Austen, rising from the dinner-table, preceded Margaret into the drawing-room and looked at the clock, a prostrate nymph, balancing a dial on the soles of her feet. At the figures on the dial, the nymph pointed a finger.

From the clock Mrs. Austen turned and exclaimed at the windows which she had already examined. "The jardinières have not yet been attended to! It is inconceivable!"

Margaret, who had seated herself, said: "You might send for the manager."

"He would only keep me waiting and then expect me to tell him what I wanted. He ought to know. Besides, I might have forgotten. It is very tiresome."

Margaret stood up. "I will tell him."

With a click, Mrs. Austen unfurled a fan and, with another click, refurled it. "No. I will see him myself. I am quite in the humour."

Margaret looked after her mother, who was leaving the room. The sudden tempest in a flowerpot surprised her. But the outer door closed. Margaret reseated herself. Presently he would come and together they would make those plans that lovers make—and then unmake, unless, elsewhere, they have been made for them.

Meanwhile she waited. The incident at the Sandringham, the sight of Cassy, her mother's facile insinuations, these things had distressed her, because, and only because, they had prevented her from enjoying the innocent pleasure of the innocent visit to the rooms of her betrothed, whom she loved with a love that was too pure and too profound, to harbour doubt and suspicion and that evil child of theirs which jealousy is. Her faith was perfect. That faith showed in her face and heightened her beauty with a candour that should have disarmed her mother, who, in the hall below, was, at that moment, instructing a man and not about flower-boxes either.

"Mr. Lennox, you may know him, by sight I mean, will be coming here shortly. Please have him shown into that room there."

Mrs. Austen passed on. The little room at which she had glanced that afternoon received her—a hospitality in which a mirror joined. The latter welcomed her with a glimpse of herself. It was like meeting an old friend. But no; a friend certainly, yet not an old one. Age had not touched this lady, not impudently at least, though where it may have had the impertinence to lay a finger, art had applied another, a moving finger that had written a parody of youth on her face which was then turning to some one behind her whom the mirror disclosed.

In turning, she smiled.

"It is so good of you, Mr. Lennox, to look in on me. The door-man told you about Margaret, did he not? No? How careless of him. The dear child has a headache and has gone to bed."

"Has she?" said Lennox. He found but that. But at least he understood why Margaret had not come to his rooms. The headache had prevented her.

"It is nothing." Mrs. Austen was telling him. "To-morrow she will be herself again. Nice weather we are having."

"Very," Lennox answered.

As he would have said the same thing if Mrs. Austen had declared that the weather was beastly, the reply did not matter. It did not matter to her; it did not matter to him. She was thinking of something else and he was also. He was thinking of Margaret, wondering whether he might not go to her. Were it not for the strait-jacket that conventionality is and which pinions the sturdiest, he would have gone. He was a little afraid of Mrs. Austen, as an intelligent man sometimes is afraid of an imbecile woman. But his fear of her fainted beside the idea that if, disregarding the bagatelles of the door, he made his way to Margaret, she herself might not like it. That alone restrained him. Afterward he wished he had let nothing prevent him. Afterward he regretted it. It is the misery of life—and sometimes its reward—that regret should be futile.

But, at the moment, grim and virile, a hat in one hand, a stick in the other, his white tie just showing between the lapels of his overcoat, already he was consoling himself. He had not seen Margaret in the afternoon, and he was not to see her this evening. No matter. The morrow would repay—that morrow which is falser than the former day.

Pleasantly at him and at his thoughts, Mrs. Austen played the flute. "Won't you sit down?" In speaking, she sank on a sofa which she occupied amply.

Lennox, shifting his stick, took a chair. Later, in one of those evil moods that come to the best, as well as to the worst, he wished he had brained her with it.

With the magic flute, Mrs. Austen continued: "To-morrow is Sunday, is it not? You must be sure to come. Dear me! I can remember when everybody went to church on Sunday and then walked up and down Fifth Avenue. Fifth Avenue had trees then instead of shops and on the trees were such funny little worms. They used to hang down and crawl on you. The houses, too, were so nice. They all had piazzas and on the piazzas were honeysuckles. But I fear I am boasting. I don't really remember all that. It was my father who told me. Those must have been the good old days!"

Lennox again shifted his stick. "To-day I had hoped that you would look in on me."

The flute caressed the strain. "Yes. It was too bad! We had quite counted on it. Bachelor quarters must be so exciting."

"Well, not mine at any rate. They are rather dark."

"But that must make them all the more exciting! Blindman's buff! Hide and go seek! What fun you must have with your friends romping about!"

"My friends are too busy for that. Though to-day——"

"Yes?"

Lennox hesitated. He knew that this woman took no interest in him whatever, but he had intended to tell Margaret about Cassy.

Pleasantly Mrs. Austen prodded him. "Yes?"

"Nothing of any moment. This afternoon, Miss Cara, the girl who sang last night, came to see me. You may remember I told you I knew her father."

"It seems to me I do."

"Things have not gone well there and I advanced her a trifle for him."

Mrs. Austen unfurled her fan. It was all Honest Injun. She had not a doubt of it and never had. But if she had thought it a Sioux and Comanche story, it would have been the same to her.

"I am sorry you did not meet her," Lennox continued. "You might have lent her a hand."

"Professionally, you mean?"

"Yes."

"I might have her sing here," replied Mrs. Austen, who would have seen Cassy hanged first.

Lennox considered the picture: Mrs. Austen in the rôle of shepherdess, herding for Cassy's benefit the flock of sheep that society is. But the picture did not detain him. He stood up.

"That would be very good of you. Please tell Margaret I am sorry she has a headache and that I will look in on her to-morrow."

No you won't, thought Mrs. Austen, who said: "Yes, do."

In a moment, when he had gone, she looked again in the mirror. It showed her a woman who would not steal, unless she could do so undetectably; a woman who would not forge, because she did not know how. Crimes ridiculous or merely terrific she was too shrewd to commit. But there are crimes that the law cannot reach. There are cards, too, that fate may deal.

After looking at the woman, she looked at the cards. They were dreamlike. Even so, they needed stacking. Mrs. Austen arranged them carefully, ran them up her sleeve and floated to the room where Margaret waited.

As she entered, Margaret turned to her. Her face had that disquieting loveliness which Spanish art gave to the Madonna, the loveliness of flesh eclipsed certainly by the loveliness of the soul, but still flesh, still lovely.

At sight of it Mrs. Austen experienced the admiration tinctured with the vitriol of jealousy that some mothers inject. Mrs. Austen had been a belle in the nights when there were belles but her belledom, this girl, who was not a belle, outshone. Yet the glow of it while necessarily physical had in it that which was moral. Unfortunately the radiance of moral beauty only those who are morally beautiful can perceive. Mrs. Austen was blind to it. It was her daughter's physical beauty that she always saw and which, though she was jealous of it, had, she knew, a value, precisely as beauty had a value in Circassia where, before the war, it fetched as much as a hundred Turkish pounds. In New York, where amateurs are keener and beauty is more rare, it may run into millions.

Commercially conscious of that, Mrs. Austen felt for the cards and carelessly produced one.

"Do you know, I believe we are to have a shower. Your young man got off just in time."

Margaret, who had glanced at the prostrate nymph, looked at her upright mother. "Do you mean that Keith has come—and gone?"

Mrs. Austen sat down and extracted another card. "My dear, when I went below he was coming in. We——"

Margaret, with her usual directness, interrupted. "But he is coming back?"

"That depends on you."

"On me? How? What do you mean?"

"That you must do as you like, of course. But if you elect to see him, for goodness' sake don't refer to it."

"Refer to it!" Margaret exclaimed. "Refer to what?"

"The vestal whom we saw this afternoon."

"I don't understand."

Indulgently Mrs. Austen motioned. "It is hardly proper that you should."

Margaret winced and coloured. "Your insinuation is horrible."

Cheerfully Mrs. Austen smiled. Margaret's start, her heightened colour, her visible annoyance, these things comforted her. A grandee of Spain warmed his hands at the auto-da-fé. There are people just like him. There are people that take comfort in another's distress. Mrs. Austen did not know that she resembled them. She had nothing but Margaret's welfare in view. Nothing but that and her own. Her own though came first.

She raised the fan. "My dear, you misjudge me. I always said that he is a good young man and I stick to it. He is good, far too good, too good to be true." With that, lowering the fan, she produced a trump. "Downstairs, a moment ago, he told me so."

Margaret gasped. "He told you—he told you——"

"Precisely. That is just what he did tell me."

Margaret straightened. "I don't believe it."

Mrs. Austen waved at her. "Oh, I don't mean that he has deceived you. He has done nothing of the kind. It is you who have deceived yourself. That was to be expected. At your age I deceived myself quite as thoroughly. I thought your father a conquering hero and he was merely a bore. But he pointed a moral, though he adorned no tale. He married to settle down. That is this young man's idea and I must give him credit for the fact that while he has not deceived you, he did deceive me. I thought him a tedious person; whereas, not a bit of it. He is exceedingly lively. If he keeps it up, his wife will be blessed among women. But that is just it. He won't keep it up. He swore he would not and I believe him. He has turned over a new leaf. I can't cry over it, but it is really too bad."

Margaret, who had straightened, stiffened. "If I believed a word of what you tell me, I would forgive him entirely."

Mrs. Austen, unprepared for that, leaned forward. "My dear, I had no idea you were so sensible."

"I would forgive entirely," Margaret continued. "But I would never see him again."

How good that tasted! Mrs. Austen swallowed it contentedly. "Of course you will see him. You are not going blind, I suppose. But when you do see him, it will be only decent of you to ignore the matter which is not a fit subject for you to discuss."

Margaret, who had straightened and stiffened, now was rigid. "I certainly shall ignore it. It is not worth talking about."

Mrs. Austen leaned back. "Ah, my dear, how right you are. He could not tell you that he had loved wisely, it would not be very flattering. He could not say he had loved too well, for that would be embarrassing. What a pretty frock you have on. Did Marguerite make it? Of course he could not. It would not be nice at all. But to me he made a soiled breast of it. Don't you think the skirt a bit too long? Stand up a minute."

Margaret coloured again. She coloured with a flush that put two red spots on her. She did not believe it. She could not and would not. Yet credence, like the wind, bloweth where it listeth.

Mrs. Austen, noting the spots, knew that the card had been well played and leisurely selected another.

"Perhaps it is the way you are sitting. Yes, altogether it is quite ducky. I really must go to Marguerite on Monday. Don't let me forget about it or the dentist either. I shall have my hands full and my mouth also. The proper caper, too, apparently. That little dollymop, whom we saw this afternoon, had her hands full. Did you notice the roll of bills that she was counting? Such an enjoyable occupation! But it won't last. You need not worry on that score. He had been paying her off. He assured me of that and so unnecessarily. Why, I saw the whole thing at a glance. Anybody but you would have seen it too. But you are so theosophically nearsighted. It was for that reason I took you away. Now, though, he is going to begin on a clean slate. Those were his very words, and you, I suppose, are the clean slate. He has such original expressions, hasn't he? But there! I forgot. He did not mean me to tell you. In fact, he begged me not to."

From Margaret's face the flush retreating left it white with that whiteness which dismay creates. A bucket of mud had drenched her. It did more, it dazed her. The idea that the bucket was imaginary, the mud non-existent, that every word she had heard was a lie, did not occur to this girl who, if a Psyche, was not psychic. In her heart was the mud; in her mother's hand was the bucket. But the mire itself, he had put there. The evidence of her own eyes she might have questioned. But he had admitted it and the fact that he had induced in her the purely animal feeling to get away, to be alone and to suffer unseen.

She left the room, went to her own, closed the door and at a prie-Dieu fell on her knees, not to pray—she knew that the Lords of Karma are not to be propitiated or coerced—but in humiliation.

In humiliation there may be self-pity and that is always degrading. With uncertain hands she tried to transform that pity into sorrow, not for herself, but for him. The burnt offering seared her. In the secret chambers of her being her young soul tripped and fell. For support she clutched at her creed. Ordinarily it would have sustained her. Ordinarily it would have told her that her suffering was the penalty for suffering which she had caused, a penalty that the gods of the doors that close behind our birth were measuring to her. Ordinarily she would have realised that in some anterior, enigmatic and forgotten life, she, too, had debased herself and that this cross was the punishment for that debasement. Ordinarily the creed would have sustained her. But as she clutched at it, it receded. Only the cross remained and that was too heavy.

In the drawing-room an indifferent nymph pointed a finger at hours, all of which wound and of which the last one kills.

In that room Mrs. Austen was writing a note. Addressed to Montagu Paliser, jr., esqre., it asked him to dinner.

X

IN the subway, the following evening, Cassy saw a man eyeing her. She turned and saw another man who also was eyeing her. On the seat opposite two women were discussing her clothes.

The clothes, her own manufacture, were not of the fashion, not behind it, or ahead of it, but above it. A mode, or a mood of her own, they consisted in a blue silk smock and a yellow cloth skirt. On the sleeves and about the neck of the smock there was also yellow, touches of it, with which the skirt married. Therewith she was hatless, rebellious and handsome.

Accustomed to the inquisitiveness of appraising eyes, she ignored the women as, already, she had ignored the men. With obliterating unconcern, she reduced them to the fluidity of the inchoate. Other matters occupied her, and, primarily, a trick, an extremely shabby one, from which she had not yet recovered.

The day before, after paying the butcher, the baker, and the punctual and pertinacious agent, she had scaled the walk-up where she found her father with the violin, on which, an hour earlier, Lennox had loaned her the money.

The spectacle flabbergasted her. Then, realising what Lennox had done, his iniquity struck her as hateful. At once, in an effort to account, however imaginatively, for the apparent sorcery of it all, she tried to invent a fairy-tale. But the tale would not come. Nor was it needed. Her father dispensed with any. Impatient of detail, as the artist usually is, he required none. The extraordinary perspicacity of the police who had nailed and returned the violin instanter, this wizardry that would have thrown any one else into stupors of bewilderment, interested him not at all. He had the violin. That sufficed. The rest did not matter.

It mattered though and monumentally to Cassy. To owe the butcher, the baker, the candlestickmaker, and to have them look slantingly at you, that was disgusting. But to be beholden for a gift, which you had refused to accept, and which then, behind your back, was dumped in on you, that was degrading. Consequently, while conjecturing new versions of Perrault, versions which it relieved her to find were not wanted, she gnashed her milk-white teeth at Lennox, felt that she hated him, yet felt, too, and the feeling was maddening, that the hatred was very tender.

All this was irritating enough and the Tamburini had contrived to add to the irritation. It had been arranged that the fallen star was to come to the walk-up and accompany Cassy to the Splendor. Instead of which, at the last moment, the ex-diva had telephoned that she would join her at the hotel, and Cassy foresaw a tedious sitting about in the lobby, for Ma Tamby was always late. But when have misfortunes come singly? Cassy foresaw, too, that the tedium would not be attenuated by Paliser's conversation.

It was not for that, or for him, that she was then in the subway, but for dinner. Young, healthy and consequently carnal, though not otherwise carnal than hunger can make you, she liked food, on condition that she had not prepared it, and—in particular, and why not?—she liked the savorously truffled menus that walk-ups lack. She had another reason for being in the subway, one that Ma Tamby had lodged, like a flea, in her ear.

But now, near the heart of Manhattan, the train had stopped. Cassy got out, looked at her white gloves, wondered if they smelled of benzine, decided that they did, took them off and went on to the Splendor where Paliser was waiting.

Other people appeared to be similarly occupied. In the high, wide hall were groups of careful men and careless women, the latter very scrumptious in their imported frocks. The sight of these Parisianisms abashed Cassy no more than her appearance abashed Paliser. Etiquette, Formality, the Proper Thing, the great inane gods of the ante-bellum heavens, he had never acknowledged and now, though locally their altars remained and their worship persisted, he knew they were forever dead, blown into the dust-bin of the things that were, tossed there in derision by that atheist, the War.

The careless women looked at Cassy and carefully looked away. The careful men looked at her and carelessly looked again. In the severity of the wide, high hall, the girl with her rebellious beauty and harlequin gown, struck a note which it lacked, struck two of them, the go-and-be-hanged-to-you and originality.

In evening clothes that said Savile Row, Paliser approached. "You are punctual as a comet and equally luminous."

Cassy, ignoring the remark, ignoring, too, the hand that accompanied it, cut him short. "Haven't seen Madame Tamburini, have you?"

Paliser's hair had the effect of a mirror. He smoothed the back of it. The ex-diva he had certainly seen and not later than just before she telephoned to Cassy. But it is injudicious, and also tiresome, to tell everything. With the wave of a cheque, the complicity of the former first-lady had been assured, and assured moreover without a qualm on her part. Ma Tamby did not know what it is to have a qualm—which she could not have spelled if she had known. She was differently and superiorly educated. In the university that life is, she had acquired encyclopedias of recondite learning. She knew that ice is not all that it is cracked up to be: that a finger in the pie is better than two in the fire, and that angels have been observed elsewhere than at Mons—learning which, as you may see, is surprising.

Over the ham and eggs of an earlier evening, the syllables of Paliser's name had awakened echoes of old Academy nights and Mapleson's "grand revivals" of the Trovatore, echoes thin and quavering, yet still repeating hymns in glory of the man's angelic papa. On the way from ham and eggs to Harlem, she had, in consequence, conjured, for Cassy's benefit, with performing fleas. But when, on this afternoon, M. P. jr., had come and waved cheques at her, she had felt that her worst hopes were realised, that her finger was really in the pie, and she had agreed to everything, which, however, for the moment, was nothing at all, merely to abandon Cassy that evening; merely also to collaborate later in the evocation of a myth, and meanwhile to keep at it with the fleas.

Now, in the hall of the Splendor, as Paliser patted the back of his head, he was enjoying Cassy's open-air appearance that needed only a tennis-racket to be complete.

Cassy glanced about. She had a penny or two more than her carfare and yet, if she had owned the shop, she could not have appeared more at ease in this smartest of smart inns, a part of which, destiny, in its capriciousness, was to offer her.

"No," he answered. "But I have a private room somewhere. She can find her way there, unless you prefer palms and an orchestra."

"I do," said Cassy, to whom a room with this man said only boredom and who liked to see what was going on.

Then when, presently, they were seated at a table, to which the chastened captain of the ham-and-egg night had piloted the way, Cassy beheld what she had never beheld before, and what few mortals ever do behold, a cradled bottle of Clos de Vougeot. But to her, the royal crû was very much like the private room. It said nothing. A neighbouring table was more eloquent.

Among the people seated there was an imperial woman with an imperial manner, whom Cassy instantly recognised. She was prima donna, prima donna assoluta, and though Cassy did not know it—nor would it have interested her if she had known—dissoluta also.

To be in her shoes!

In that seven-leagued dream, she forgot Paliser, the delinquent Tamburini, the trick that Lennox had played. In a golden gloom, on a wide stage, to a house packed to the roof, Cassy was bowing. Her final roulade had just floated on and beyond, lost now in cyclonic bravas.

"It was the Duc d'Aumale," Paliser was saying.

"Eh?" Abruptly Cassy awoke.

"Or, if not, some other chap who, recognising it, ordered his regiment to halt and present arms."

"To whom?"

"To the vineyard where the grape in that bottle was grown."

Cassy shook out a napkin. "You talk just like my janitress. I never understand a word she says."

But now a waiter was bringing delicacies other than those obtainable in Harlem; in particular, a dish that had the merit of pleasing Cassy.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Muskrat."

"What!"

"Muskrat with terrapin for a pseudonym. The pseudonym shows imagination. Let us be thankful for that. Gastronomy is bankrupt. Formerly it was worshipped. Formerly gastronomy was a goddess. To-day the sole tributes consist in bills-of-fare that are just like the Sahara minus the oases. It is the oases we want and it is muskrat we get. That is all wrong. The degree of culture that any nation may claim is shown in its cookery and if there is anything viler than what we get here it must be served in Berlin. It must have been Solon who said: 'Tell me what you eat and I will tell you who you are.' He added, or should have, that animals feed, man dines and, when permitted, dines devoutly. There are dishes, as there are wines, to which one should rise and bow. But hereabouts it is only by special dispensation that one gets them. In a hotel such as this there is an outward show of reverence, but it is sheer hypocrisy; of real piety there is none, a sham attempt to observe the sacred rites without knowing how. I admit I don't know either. From me the divine afflatus has been withheld. But elsewhere I have been conscious of the presence. Once or twice I was blessed. Here, though, in default of shrines there should be chairs. Harvard, Yale, Columbia, should establish a few. When I was in college I was taught everything that it is easiest to forget. If the youth of the land were instructed in gastronomy we would all be wiser and better. Chairs on gastronomy, that is what we need!"

Cassy laughed. "Why not tables?"

Paliser laughed with her. The laughter was a bond. It joined them however tenuously. It was what he had been driving at. Accustomed to easy successes, Cassy's atmosphere, with its flavour of standoffishness and indifference, appealed to this man, who had supped on the facile and who wanted the difficult. Cassy, he could have sworn, would supply it and, if he had, he would have sworn very truly.

Meanwhile the muskrat had gone. Dishes less false but equally fair had followed. Now, with the air of a conjurer, the waiter just showed them an entremets which he hastened to serve. It was a soufflée.

At it, Cassy, just showing the point of her strawberry tongue, exclaimed without rancour: "Ma Tamby has thrown us over."

Paliser lit a cigarette. "She may be singing in the private room."

Cassy laughed again. "Yes. 'Una voce poco fa!' That would be just the thing—wouldn't it?—to sing privately in private."

Paliser answered, though what, she did not hear. The orchestra drowned it and for a moment she considered him, conscious that he was less objectionable than he had seemed, yet entirely unconscious that such objection as she had experienced was due to his extreme good-looks, which in a man are always objectionable to a woman when she herself is handsome, for they make him resemble her and, in so doing, constitute an encroachment on her prerogatives, which, in itself, is an affront.

Cassy, ignorant of the psychology of it, equally unaware that familiarity which may breed contempt can also dissolve dislike, and feeling merely a lessening of her instinctive hostility, told herself that he was perhaps not as cocky as he looked and drank of the glass before her.

The Clos de Vougeot which, to the educated palate, is art, literature and song combined, meant nothing more to her than if it had been Médoc. She drank it because it was there at her hand, as she would have drunk water, without savouring it, without any realisation of the enormity of the crime. Yet though it meant nothing, nothing at least of which she was aware, the royal crû was affecting her. It modified and mollified, admonishing her that this man was an inoffensive insect who, circumstances favouring, might, as Ma Tamby when inserting the flea had told her, put her father on his feet.

In just what the favouring circumstances could consist, the fallen star had not bothered to indicate, and she had not bothered because they were too obvious and also because she was sure that Cassy was not insane.

Paliser abandoned his cigarette. "If you like, we might look in at the Metropolitan. I believe I have a box."

Apart from down-stage and the centre of it, apart, too, from the flys and the dressing-rooms, Cassy's imagination had not as yet conceived anything more beckoning than a box at the opera, even though, as on this occasion, the opera happened to be a concert. "Why, yes. Only——" Pausing, she looked about. The imperial lady had gone.

"Only what?" Paliser very needlessly asked for he knew.

"I fear I am a bit overdressed."

"Not for Sunday. The house will be full and nobody in it. Besides, what do you care?"

Cassy shrugged. "Personally, not a rap. It was of you I was thinking."

Paliser, who had been signing the check and feeing the waiter, looked at her. "I did not know that you were so considerate."

Cassy, in surprise not at him, but at herself, laughed. "Nor did I."

Paliser stood up and drew back her chair. "Be careful. You might become cynical. It is in thinking of others that cynicism begins."

The platitude slipped from him absently. He had no wish for the concert, no wish to hear Berlinese trulls and bubonic bassi bleat. But, for the tolerably delicate enterprise that he had in hand, there were the preliminary steps which could only be hastened slowly and anything slower than the Metropolitan on a Sunday night, it was beyond him to conjecture.

But though on that evening a basso did bleat, it may be that he was not bubonic. Moreover he was followed by a soprano who, whether trullish or not, at any rate was not Berlinese and whose voice had the lusciousness of a Hawaiian pineapple. But the selections, which were derived from old Italian cupboards, displeased Paliser, who called them painted mush.

But not twice! Cassy turned her back on him. The painted mush shook stars in her ears, opened vistas on the beyond. Save for him she would have been quite happy. But his remark annoyed her. It caused her to revise her opinion. Instead of an inoffensive insect he was an offensive fool. None the less, as the concert progressed, she revised it again. On entering the box she had seen his name on the door. The memory of that, filtering through the tinted polenta from the ancient cupboards, softened her. A man so gifted could express all the imbecilities he liked. Elle s'enfichait.

As a result, before it was over, in lieu of her back, she gave him the seduction of her smile, and, later when, in his car, on the way to the walk-up, he spoke of future dinners, fresher songs, she had so far forgotten the painted mush insult, that momentarily she foresaw but one objection. She had nothing to wear and frankly, with entire unconcern, she out with it.

For that he had a solution which he kept to himself. The promptly obliterating stare with which she would have reduced him to non-existence, he dodged in advance.

Apparently changing the subject, he said: "You know—or know of—Mrs. Beamish, don't you?"

"Never heard of her," said Cassy, entirely unaware that no one else ever had either.

"She was at the Bazaar the other night and admired your singing."

"Very good of her I am sure," replied Cassy, who, a born anarchist and by the same token a born autocrat, loathed condescension.

Paliser corrected it. "No, not good—appreciative. She wants you to sing at her house. If you are willing, could she arrange about it through Madame Tamburini?"

"If she tried very hard, I suppose she might," Cassy, with the same loftiness, answered.

But the loftiness was as unreal as Mrs. Beamish. Inwardly she jubilated, wondering how much she would get. A hundred? In that case she could repay Lennox at once. At the thought of it, again she revised her opinion. Paliser was young and in her judgment all young men were insects. On the other hand he was serviceable. Moreover, though he looked cocky, he did not presume. He talked rot, but he did not argue. Then, too, his car was a relief.

But now the car, after bolting through the Park and flying along the Riverside, had swerved. It was mounting the upper reaches of the longest highway on the planet. There it swerved again. From Broadway it barked loudly into a side-street where easily, with a soapy slide, it stopped.

Paliser got out, preceded Cassy to the steps of the walk-up and smiled in her face. "When?"

Cassy, the revised opinion of him about her, gave him her hand. "Ask the telephone."

The hall took her. She was scaling the stairs. On the way Mrs. Beamish accompanied her. She wished she could tell her father. Yet, if she told him, how could she account for what she did with the money? And would it be a hundred? Perhaps fifty, perhaps less.

But Paliser saw to it that Mrs. Beamish behaved properly. On the morrow Ma Tamby dumped in Cassy's astonished lap two hundred and fifty—less ten per cent., business is business—for samples of the bel canto which Mrs. Beamish was not to hear, and for an excellent reason, there was no such person.

XI

MRS. AUSTEN looked at Lennox, who had been looking at her, but who was then looking at the rug, in the border of which were arabesques. He did not see them. The rug was not there. The room itself had disappeared. The nymph, the dial, the furniture, the decorations and costly futilities with which the room was cluttered, all these had gone. Mrs. Austen had ceased to be. In that pleasant room, in the presence of this agreeable woman, Lennox was absolutely alone, as, in any great crisis of the emotions, we all are.

Of one thing he was conscious. He was suffering atrociously. Pain blanketed him. But though the blanket had the poignancy of thin knives, he kept telling himself that it was all unreal.

He raised his eyes. During the second in which they had been lowered, a second that had been an eternity in hell, his expression had not altered. He was taking it, apparently at least, unmoved.

Mrs. Austen, who was looking at him, saw it and thought: He is a gentleman. The reflection encouraged her and she sighed and said: "Believe me, I am sorry."

Lennox did not believe her, but he let it go. What he did believe was that Margaret could not see him. But whether she would, if she could, was another matter. On Saturday he had expected her at his rooms. She had not come. In the evening he had called. She had a headache. On the following day he had returned. She was not feeling well. Now on this third day, Mrs. Austen, who on the two previous occasions had received him, once more so far condescended, yet on this occasion to tell him that he was free, that it was Margaret's wish, that the engagement was ended.

In so telling him, Mrs. Austen told, for a wonder, the truth, though as will sometimes happen even to the best of us, not all the truth. It were extravagant to have expected it of her. But she told all that she thought good for him; more exactly good for Margaret; more precisely for herself.

It was then that the pleasant room with its clutter of costly futilities disappeared and this agreeable woman ceased to be. The avalanche of the modulated announcement sent Lennox reeling not merely out of the room, but out of the world, deeply into hell.

It was then, too, that with a sigh, modulated also, Mrs. Austen had added: "Believe me, I am sorry."

Lennox looked at her. "You say that Margaret wants our engagement broken. Why?"

"She has changed her mind."

"So I infer. But why?"

"Because she is a woman."

"But not the ordinary woman. It is the ordinary woman who changes her mind—when she has one to change. Margaret is not of that kind. Margaret is not the kind to promise herself to a man and then throw him over. You will forgive me if I speak heatedly, but I do not believe it."

With frosty indulgence Mrs. Austen reassured him. "You do not believe that I will forgive you? But, really, there is nothing to forgive. Though, whether Margaret is ordinary or superior, has nothing to do with it. Dear me, no. Women are not what they were. One often hears that and often, too, one hears people wondering why. That always amuses me. The reason is so simple, isn't it? Women are not what they were because they used to be girls. Before that they were children. At one time they were babes. Naturally they change. They can't help it. It must be a general law. Or at least one may suppose so. One may suppose, too, that, in changing, they develop and in developing acquire the extraordinary ability to think things over. That is just what Margaret had done. It is no reflection on you, Mr. Lennox, and I should be very sorry if you thought so. I am sure Margaret has the highest esteem for you. I know that I have."

Mrs. Austen, smiling frostily as she lied, thought: Now why doesn't he take it and go? I hope he won't be tedious.

Lennox too had his thoughts. She is trying to swamp me in words, he told himself. That angered him and he showed it.

"What are these things? When I last saw Margaret she said nothing about any things. There was no change in her then. I would stake my life that she had no idea of breaking our engagement. There must be a reason for it. What is it?"

Arrogantly Mrs. Austen took it up. "There is no reason for your raising your voice, at any rate. As for the things, they ought to be obvious. In addition to habits and customs, very suitable in Wall Street no doubt, but not otherwise appealing, Margaret has found you a bit rough, high-tempered, domineering for all I know to the contrary, and——"

That's a damned lie, thought Lennox, who aggressively cut in: "Margaret never found me anything of the kind. What is more I will thank you to understand that I will not accept this dismissal—if it be one—from you."

There is a show of decency that is due to any woman. But the veneer of civilisation is very thin. From beneath it, the potential troglodyte, that lurks in us all, is ready enough to erupt. Ready and eager then, he was visible in Lennox' menacing eyes, manifest in his threatening voice.

Mrs. Austen saw the brute, saw rather that little, if anything, restrained Lennox from jumping up, banging about, hunting for Margaret's room, entering there and catechising her violently. Margaret was ill but never too ill to tell the truth. Once he learned that, there was the fat in the fire.

She had no time to lose. From the wardrobe of the actress that she was, she snatched at an oleaginous mask and with the mucilage of it smiled at him.

"Why, of course not. Not for a moment would I have you accept it from me. I never dreamed of such a thing. It wouldn't be right. Margaret shall tell you herself. She would be here now, but the poor child had such a wretched night. You never had neuralgia, have you? At her age I was a martyr to it. I remember I took something that ended in 'ine.' Yesterday I suggested it but the doctor would not hear of it. Said she needed building up. Spoke of her just as though she were a town out West; so unsympathetic I thought him, but of course I did not say so. He might have charged extra and he is expensive enough as it is, and always so ready to talk about his own affairs, just like my dentist. I told him once—the dentist I mean—that I really could not afford to pay him thirty dollars an hour to hear about his wife and I don't think he liked it. I know I didn't when I got his bill. But where was I? Oh, yes. To-morrow or the next day, as soon as Margaret is the least bit better, you will be sure to have a line from her and if you do not, and you care to, you must certainly look in. For you must always regard us as friends. Me at any rate. Won't you, Mr. Lennox?"

Moistening her lips, mentally she continued: Yes, count on that. But inwardly she relaxed. Such danger as there may have been had gone. Under the dribble of the mucilage the fire in his eyes had flickered and sunk. He was too glued now for revolt. So she thought, but she did not know him.

During the sticky flow of her words, he knew she was trying to gammon him. But he knew quite as well that Margaret would make no such attempt, and he knew it for no other reason than because he knew she was incapable of it. Incidentally he determined what he would do. Having determined it, he stood up.

"Very good. I shall expect to hear from Margaret to-morrow. If I do not hear I will come, and when I come——"

Lennox paused and compressed his lips. The compression finished the sentence. If come he did, no power of hers, or of any one else, would budge him an inch until he saw Margaret and had it out with her.

"Good-evening," he added and Mrs. Austen found herself looking at his retreating back which, even in retreat, was a menace.

"Merciful fathers!" she exclaimed, and, with that sense of humour which is the saving grace, the dear woman put her hand to her stays. She was feeling for her heart. She had none. Or any appetite, she presently told a servant who came to say that dinner was served.

She misjudged herself. For twenty-five minutes, in an adjoining room, she ate steadily and uncomplainingly. She had bouillon, skate in black butter, cutlets in curl-papers, sweetbread and cockscombs, a cold artichoke, hot almond pudding, an apricot, a bit of roquefort, a pint of claret, a thimble of bénédictine and not a twinge, none of the indigestion of square-dealing, none of gastritis of good faith. She was a well-dressed ambition, intent on her food. No discomfort therefore. On the contrary. Margaret was in bed—safe there. Fate and the cook were kind.

With the taste of the liqueur still in her mouth, she went to her daughter who was ill with one of those maladies which, being primarily psychical, science cannot treat. Science is a classification of human ignorance. It has remedies for the flesh, it has none for the soul. The remedies exist, but they are dispensed only by the great apothecaries that time and philosophy are.

At the moment neither was available. Behind Margaret's forehead a monster crouched and crunched. That was nothing. It was in the tender places of her heart that the girl agonised and by comparison to the torture there, the monster was benign.

Margaret was nineteen, which is a very mature age; perhaps the most mature, since all girlhood lies behind it. Beyond are the pharmacopœias of time and, fortune favouring, the sofas of philosophy. But these sofas, even when within reach, are not adapted to everybody. To the young, they are detestable. Reposefully they admonish that nothing is important. They whisper patience to the impatient. To hope, they say, "Be still"; to desire, "Be quiet"; to wisdom, "Be foolish."

Conversation of that kind is very irritating, when you have heard it, which Margaret never had. She was otherwise ignorant. She did not know that a sage wrote a book in praise of folly. But she acted as though she knew it by heart. She believed, as many of us do believe, that love confers the right to run a fence around the happy mortals for whom we care. It is a very astounding belief. Margaret, who believed in many wonderful things, believed in that and, being credulous, believed also that her betrothed had crawled under the fence and into what mire! It polluted her, soiled her thoughts, followed and smeared her in the secret chambers of her being. Any cross is heavy. This cross was degrading.

In her darkened room, on her bed of pain, she had shrunk from it. Her forehead was a coronet of fire. That was nothing. A greater pain suppresses a lesser one. The burn of her soul was a moxa to the burn of the flesh.

The cross, at first, seemed to her more than she could bear. She tried to put it from her. Failing in that, she tried to endure it. But there are times and occasions when resignation in its self-effacement resembles suicide. She tried to resign herself, but she could not, her young heart rebelled.

In that rebellion, evil came, peered at her, sat at her side, pulled at her sleeve, sprang at her. The evil was hatred for this man who had taken her love and despoiled it. She clasped it to her. It bruised but it comforted. It dulled both the flame in her forehead and the shame in her soul. Then as suddenly she began to cry.

Philosophy she lacked, but theosophy, which is a pansophy, she possessed—when she did not need it. Now, when she needed it most, it was empty as the noise in the street. Even otherwise it could not have changed the unchangeable course of events.

There are sins that are scarlet. There are others, far worse, that are drab. Melancholy tops them. It is a mere duty to be serene. That she could not be. She could not face life, as life perhaps is. She could not smile at a lover who loved elsewhere. It was not herself, it was he who prevented her. So she thought and for hours in her darkened room she washed her hands of him, washed them in tears. It took a wise man to write the praise of folly.

The door of the room opened. It opened slowly, noiselessly, obviously. With exasperating precautions Mrs. Austen entered. The taste of bénédictine was still in her mouth and, savouring it, she whispered:

"Are you asleep?"

"No."

"Will you eat anything?"

"No."

"Are you able to talk?"

Margaret turned. She could talk, but to what end and to whom? Certainly not to her mother, who possessed in its perfection, the household art of misinterpreting everything. Margaret had tried to love her. But perhaps any affection is a habit when it does not happen to be an instinct. The habit had never been formed, the instinct had been repressed. Always her mother had treated her with that indulgence which is as empty as an unfilled grate. There was no heat there. You could not warm your heart at it. But a child must love some one. Margaret had begun by loving her mother. That is the way with children. They begin by loving their parents. Later they judge them. Sometimes, though not always, they forgive. One should not judge anybody. Margaret knew that, but she was a human being. She thought her mother a worldly woman. The fact that she was false as Judas was not apparent to this girl whose knowledge of Iscariotism was as hearsay as her knowledge of gorillas.

Now, as she turned in her bed, it was in defence against intrusion. Deference to her mother she had always observed. But she could not admit her to the privacy of her thoughts and, in turning her face to the wall, she told herself that she would not be cross-questioned.

Mrs. Austen had no intention of putting her daughter in the confessional. Anything of the kind would have bored her. Besides, what she thought was unimportant. It was what she did or might do that mattered.

Vacating the door she approached the bed. "Are you feeling any better?"

Margaret was feeling, if possible, worse. But she never complained, or, if she had to complain, then the complaint was solely by way of explanation. She turned again.

"For if you are," Mrs. Austen continued, "I ought to say something."

Margaret put a hand to her forehead.

But Mrs. Austen persisted. "It is important."

Margaret's eyes were open. She closed them and said: "Yes, mother, what is it?"

Through the door came light from the hall. Mrs. Austen looked about. Nearby was a chair on which was one of those garments, made of franfreluches, which the French call a Jump-from-bed. Removing it, she sat down.

"It is too bad. I know you don't feel like discussing affairs of State, but it is Luxemburg all over again. If I were alone concerned, I am sure I would capitulate. But where the State is concerned, and by that I mean you, I am like the little grand-duchess—pretty child, from her pictures, didn't you think?—and I must resist the invader. It is true, I don't know exactly what the grand-duchess did do, though they said she sat in a motor on a bridge and flourished a revolver. But you never can tell. I daresay she and her maids of honour hid in a cellar. Perhaps we may have to."

Margaret lowered her hand. "Mother, what are you talking about?"

"Your young man, of course. What else? A half-hour ago, he was roaring and stamping about and calling me a liar. If it had not been for my dead body, he would have rushed in here and killed you. My dead body, or what I told him about passing over it, was the revolver that I flourished. He has gone, but he swore he would return. Now, unless you rally to the colours, we will have to hide in the cellar, or rather, as we haven't any, in the pantry. Don't you think you could eat a bit of sweetbread, or perhaps some almond pudding?"

Again Margaret put her hand to her forehead. "Don't say that, mother. Keith did not call you a liar and it is not like him to roar and stamp about."

"My dear, I don't wonder you don't believe me. He went on like a madman. He could not get over the fact that his dollymop was one too many for you. He seemed to think that it was none of your business."

"Don't."

"My dear Margaret, you must do me the justice to admit that I stood up for him. I said he was an attractive young man. So he is. But that is just it. Attractive young men are most unreliable and reliable young men are most unattractive. At your age, I used to like them fair and false. That was your father's fault. He perverted me. He was so domestic!"

It was an old wound that Mrs. Austen touched then and under it Margaret winced. "The poor dear! He was a saint and you know it."

"Know it! I should say I did. I know too that he made me hate saints. But you love them and thought you had one, instead of which you got a devil. Your luck is far better than mine. If you take my advice, you will hang on to him like grim death. It is not too late. To-morrow he will be here, thundering at the gates."

Dimly at the moment the girl's creed turned a ray on her. She lifted her head.

"He will not thunder at the gates and he is not what you say. But perhaps I am. I may have done worse than he has and what he has done is my punishment."

It was very little but it was too much. Mrs. Austen, in spite of her facile digestion, gagged at it.

"If that is theosophy, I will believe it when I am old, fat and a Hun."

Margaret sank back. "But I am sorry you have been annoyed. It won't happen again. I will write to him."

Later, she did write.

Forgive me, dear Keith, if I cause you pain, but I feel that I am not suited to you. Forgive me therefore for not recognising it sooner. I have thought it all over and, though it wrings my heart to say it, I cannot see you again. Forgive me and forget.

MARGARET.

XII

HELL was supposed to be very hot, very red, full of pugnacious demons. Educated people do not believe in it any more. It is curious how ignorant educated people have become. Hell is an actual plane, less vivid than was formerly imagined, not hot but cold, grey rather than red, but amply provided with demons, with the devils of self-accusation, with the fiends of insoluble queries. Very real and very actual, it is surprising how many educated people are there. The oddity of that is increased by the fact that they regard it as a private establishment. They regard their hell as unique. Perhaps the idea flatters them. Yet sooner or later everybody enters it. Hell may seem private. It is universal.

Headlong into it, Margaret's letter precipitated Lennox. Being a man, he struggled up. But not out. In hell there are no signposts. It takes time to find one's way. It takes more, it takes resignation. When both have been acquired, the walls part of themselves. The aspect of life has altered, but you are free.

Lennox, in struggling up, encountered the demons of enigmatic riddles. Each word of Margaret's letter they converted into a Why? They thrust it at him, demanding an answer. But the answer her heart alone possessed. That heart had been his. It was his no longer. The heart that she had given him, she had taken away. Nothing could be simpler and nothing more mysterious. The mystification was complete, but not the suffering. Suffering is never complete.

However deep the hell, there is always a deeper one.

From the letter he looked at the walls. They were dumb. There was no answer for the demons there, not anywhere, perhaps, except among werewolves, basilisks and Mrs. Austens. These monsters did not occur to him. The monstrous letter sufficed. But Margaret was still too near, her vows were too recent for him to credit it, and the fact that he could not disclosed itself in those words which all have uttered, all at least before whom the inexplicable has sprung.

"It is impossible!"

Yet there it was. Yet there too was something else. But what? At once he was back again in the issueless circle of infernal questions.

The day before he had known that something was amiss. The attitude of Mrs. Austen had been too assured, too venomous, too smiling, for him to doubt it. But though he did not doubt that, not for a second did he doubt Margaret either. Always aware of the woman's hostility, he had been equally aware that it could not influence the girl. Not for a moment therefore had he accepted the statement that the engagement was broken. At the time he had thought that when next he had a word with Margaret it would all be explained. But all what? His life was as clean as his face. It was not that then. On the other hand he was not rich. By the same token, Margaret's only idea of money was to help others with it. It was not that then either. Nor was it that she had not loved him. She had loved him. He could have sworn it and not out of vanity, for he had none, but because never could she have promised herself to him if she had not. None the less, she could not see him again. She had thought it over. She was not suited to him. He was told to forget her. Why?

That Why, repeating itself, forced him deeper into the circles of which hell is made.

But even in hell despair is brief. Unless it consume you utterly, and it would not be hell if it did, it goads. It compels you to seek an issue. Apart from time, which is very slow, and resignation, which is never prompt, there is another portal.

A poet, who discovered it, scrawled on it: "Lascia la donna e studia la matematica"—a cryptogram which subsequent pilgrims variously deciphered. To some, it spelled Thought; to others, Action. Action is thought put in motion.

Lennox, to whom time was too dilatory and resignation too remote, happened on the device which he translated after his manner.

But however you construe the hierograph, the door must be demolished before you get out. Across the door is written: Hope. It is a very hard door to crack. When you succeed you are covered with splinters. They cling to you and pierce you. Joiners, carpenters, pilgrims, poets and fiends have a name for them. They call the splinters Regrets. Though you have escaped, they accompany you. Hell encircles you still.

It was on the day following the conversation with Mrs. Austen that Lennox received Margaret's letter. In his dark rooms it was waiting. A moment previous he had intended to go to her. He had it all planned. Mrs. Austen could say what she liked; the physician might interfere; he would submit to no one. He proposed to see her, to adjust it, to swing up and out from the circles which already were closing about him.

On leaving Mrs. Austen he had gone to dinner. He could not eat. He had gone to bed. He could not sleep. In the morning his face was flushed. Always fit, hard as nails, these phenomena perplexed. Yet he knew it was not illness that produced them. What he did not know was that poison had. The poison was anger, an unphilosophic emotion which disturbs the circulation, the stomach and social intercourse. He could have wrung Mrs. Austen's neck.

In that murderous mood he went to Wall Street and in that mood returned. Already hell was gaping. Headlong into it the letter threw him. Being a man he sought and found the door, smashed it and passed out. Not at once however. It took him many a sleepless hour before he deciphered the device Lascia la donna. Leave the lady? Certainly. Since she so wished, what else in decency could he do? Go and badger her with complaints and questions? Not he. But how do you translate: Studia la matematica? The dictionary that is in every man, who is a man, told him. Then he knew. Meanwhile the flush in departing left him grey.

In every affection there is the germ of hate. Margaret, confronted by the unawaited, hated Lennox. Lennox, confronted by the inexplicable, hated Margaret. Hatred is love turned inside out. Love is perhaps a fermentation of the molecules of the imagination. In that case so also is hate. Of all things mystery disturbs the imagination most. Margaret could not understand how Lennox could have acted as he had. Lennox could not understand how Margaret could act as she did. Dual misunderstanding, in which the imagination fermented. Hence the hate. Yet each, in hating, loved the other. Each felt the splinters which, as Browning somewhere noted, kept fresh and fine. Only a touch and the splinters would have joined.

Mrs. Austen, for all her horrible shrewdness, could not have prevented that. But pride, that gives so many of us a fall, was more potent than she. Margaret, insulted, could but turn away. Lennox, dismissed, could but let her go.

Any emotion is unbecoming. Pride is merely ridiculous. It resides in the youthful-minded, however old. In residing in these young people, it resisted the touch that would have combined them and, through its opposition, made one of them ill and the other grey. To be proud! How splendid it seems and how stupid it is. Hell is paved with just such imbecilities.

It is said of Dante that children peered at him and whispered: "That man has been in hell."

None of the children that clubmen are, pointed at Lennox, though two of them whispered. The others did not know, not yet at least. But Verelst knew and Jones guessed. The guess was due to the romantic profession that endows a novelist with the wonderful faculty of putting two and two together.

Hitherto, that is since the engagement was announced and, for that matter, long previously, Lennox had passed the evening in Park Avenue. Where else would he have passed it? After the rupture he sat about and read all the papers. When a man is down and out that is just what he does do, though not necessarily in the Athenæum Club.

Jones, noticing it, rapidly divined the reason which Verelst confirmed.

"Yes, her mother told me."

It was in a club window, of an afternoon. Before them was Fifth Avenue which, in the Aprils of not so long ago, used to be a horse-show of fair faces, ravishing hats, discreet liveries, folded arms and yards of yodling brass.

Verelst, eyeing the usurping motors, added: "It is because of some girl I believe, or rather I don't believe it."

Jones sat back. Instantly the motors were replaced by the picture of a girl whose face was noble and reserved. He had seen the face at the Bazaar. He had seen Lennox talking to it. Afterward Lennox had told him that the girl was Portuguese. The picture was attractive but unconvincing. In agreement with Verelst he was about to say so. But behind him he heard a voice that he knew and he switched and said:

"What a remarkable country Portugal is! Born dumb, she spoke twice: once when she gave Asia to Europe, again when she presented the Lusiades to the world. Her history is resumed in two miracles, a discovery and a masterpiece. But when the Cape of Good Hope was succeeded by Camoens, once more she relapsed into a silence that was broken only when she shouted her defiance at the Huns."

Now though that voice was addressing them. Both turned and Lennox asked: "What are you talking about—war?"

"Sit down," said Verelst, who gave him a hand.

Jones gave him another. "What else is there to talk about? It will be talked of forever. So will that scrofulous Kaiser. Unfortunately he knows it and that pleases him. Last year or the year before he called for the death and destruction of all who opposed him. With singular modesty he added: 'God who speaks through my mouth so orders!' Loti claims that what spoke through him was a hyena. Loti is lacking in literary sobriety. When a hyena has eaten he is at peace with the world. But when was bestiality ever filled? It is insatiable and so is this thug whom God, at most, may have permitted to look in the mirror without vomiting. Meanwhile we stand by. A generation ago we fought for Cuba. What is Hecuba to us in comparison to the Anima Mundi?"

Verelst turned on the novelist. "And what is literary sobriety? You are hurling words in massed formation."

Jones smiled at him. "Where is my harp?"

"You mean your megaphone," Lennox put in. "You are always rehearsing copy. One of these days I may give you some."

"From the front?" Jones asked.

"Yes, though I don't see how you knew. The President has asked for war. Why aren't we up and at 'em? If Congress hems and haws over it much longer, I'll get my gun and join the Foreign Legion."

Jones nodded. He had guessed that also and he said: "Wait and join the legions here. At present, the country is alarmingly apathetic. The man in the subway is muddled. The call to arms does not stir him. The issues, clear enough to us, seem to him mixed as macaroni. He does not understand a war that is three thousand miles away. But in a year, every man in the country—a country that has never been beaten!—will be in it body and soul. Undividedly, shoulder to shoulder, we will be in it as we have never been in anything before."

The novelist touched a bell. "Lennox, have a Bronx. Verelst, what will you take? I'll wager a pippin that war is declared to-morrow."

"Done," said Verelst—who lost it.

THE two hundred and fifty—less ten per cent—which an imaginary Mrs. Beamish had paid for the pleasure of not hearing Cassy sing, transported the girl who was not given to transports. These subsiding, she viewed the matter from its business aspect. She needed a frock, a wrap, a hat, gloves, shoes and certain things that are nowhere visible except in advertisements, shop-windows and extreme privacy. Also, her hair required tralalaing. Meanwhile, first and foremost, Lennox must be paid. The subsidy was not too much by a penny. These considerations occupied but an instant.

"When is it?" she asked the Tamburini, who, a moment before, had dumbfounded her with the money.

"When is what?" inquired the ex-star who already had forgotten Mrs. Beamish.

"Why, the concert!"

Carlotta Tamburini was dressed like a fat idol, in silk and false pearls. There the idolatry ceased. In her hand was an umbrella and on her head a hat of rose-leaves which a black topknot surmounted. About her shoulders was a feather boa. It seemed a bit mangy. Seated on Cassy's bed she looked at a window that gave on a wall. Cassy was standing. Behind Cassy was a door which the extinguished light had closed. Beyond, in the living-room, was the marquis. Anything that he did not hear would not hurt him.

"Oh, she'll let us know."

"What sort of a catamount is she?"

At that the former prima donna's imagination balked. But she got something out. "Nice enough. What do you care?"

"I hate all those snobs."

"So do I," said the Tamburini, who worshipped the breed even when non-existent. "But don't go and include him. If it hadn't been for him——"

"Was he with her?"

"You ought to have heard the way he went on about you. She said: 'Why, Monty, I do believe you'd like to marry her.' "

Cassy's mouth twitched as she munched it. "She presumed to say that! She's an insolent beast."

"He shut her up, I can tell you. He said if he got on his knees, you wouldn't dust your feet on him."

"That jackanapes! I should say not!"

"You might say worse. Take the Metro. You're spat on if you're down and spat at if you're up. A dog's own life." Lifting her voice, the fat woman sang: "Croyez-moi car j'ai passé par la."

"What has that to do with it?"

Nothing whatever, the Tamburini truthfully reflected but omitted to say so. Paliser, in producing Mrs. Beamish, had also produced the programme. With both was a cheque. With the cheque was the assurance of another and a bigger one. She had only to earn it. To earn it she had only to follow the programme. The poor soul was trying to. The job was not easy. Cassy was skittish. A pull on the rein and she would kick the apple-cart over.

Femininely she discounted it all. Cassy was not worth the time, the trouble, particularly the careful handling. There were girls in plenty, quite as good-looking, who, without stopping to count two, or even one, would jump at it. But there you were! Paliser did not want partridges that flew broiled into his mouth. A true sportsman, he liked to snare the bird. The feminine in her understood that also. Besides it was all grist for her mill. But the grist was uphill, and if the noble marquis got so much as an inkling of it, he was just the sort of damn fool to whip out his sword-cane and run her through. The honour of the Casa-Evora, what? Yet, being on the job, she buckled to it.

"What will you get, dearie?"

Cassy sat down. Her previous ruminations returned. Escorting them was a vision of a baronial castle. In the hall, a guest-book in which you wrote your name. A squad of lackeys that showed you into a suite of salons. Rugs on which there was peace; sofas on which there was ease; étagères on which there were reveries. Nothing else. No cupboards hung with confections. No models sailing in and out. Nothing so commercial as anything for sale. Nothing but patrician repose and the châtelaine—a duchess disguised as a dressmaker—who might, or might not, ask you upstairs.

In war time at that! Though, it is true, Congress had only just declared it.

But, Cassy reflected, two hundred and fifty, with Lennox deducted and less ten per cent, would not take her as far as the drawbridge. The fleeting vision of the castle passed, replaced by the bargain seductions of department-stores.

Fingering the money, she said: "Where does this person live? She ought to send a taxi."

"Certamente," replied the fat woman, lapsing, as she occasionally did lapse, into the easy Italian of the lyric stage. "She certainly will."

Cassy jumped up. "Well, then, you come along while I take a look about. Afterward we will have lunch. I'll eat, you can watch me and I'll tell you how it tastes. There's the telephone!"

Cassy opened the door, went out into the narrow and shadowy hall and took the receiver.

"Yes? Oh! None the better for the asking. To-night? Impossible. To-morrow? Perhaps. Good-bye."

"Who was that?" the noble marquis called from the room beyond.

"An imbecile who wants me to dine and go to the opera."

"Not that Paliser?"

Cassy, poking her head in at him, threw him a kiss and returned to the Tamburini with whom, a little later, she was praying among the worshippers that thread the sacred and silent way where Broadway and Sixth Avenue meet.

In an adjacent basilica, the atmosphere charged with pious emanations, with envy, malice, greed and all other charitableness, choked the girl. But at last the holy rites were ended. To the voluntary of $109.99, she passed into the peace of Herald Square where the ex-diva swayed, stopped and holding her umbrella as one holds a guitar, looked hopelessly and helplessly about.

"You're not preparing to serenade the Elevated?" Cassy bawled in her ear.

In the slam-bang of trains and the metallic howls of surface cars that herded and volplaned about them, the fat lady, now apparently gone mad, was gesticulating insanely. Yet she was but indicating, or trying to indicate, the relative refuge of a side street in which there was a cook-shop.

Then, presently, after all the dangers that may be avoided in remaining at home, and supplied with such delights as clam fritters offer, she savorously remarked: "I hope I am not going to be sick."

The charm of scented streets, the sedatives of shopping, the joy of lightsome fritters, these things, combined with the job, the unearned cheque and the fear of losing both, made her ghastly.

Cassy, devoid of pity, said: "Have some beer."

The Tamburini gulped. "I couldn't talk to you this morning and I've got to. It's for your own good, dearie; it is, so help me! Supposing he is a jackanapes. What do you want? A prize-fighter? Take it from me, whether he is one or the other, in no time it will be quite the same."

Cassy's lips curled. "Croyez-moi car j'ai passé par la." But, in mocking the woman, she frowned. "What business is it of yours?"

The fallen star gulped again. Conscious that she had struck the wrong note, she struck another. "Your papa is no better, is he? Between you and me and the bedpost, I doubt if he ever will be. I doubt if he plays again. You'll have to look after him. How're you going to? You can't expect to sing every night to the tune of two hundred and fifty. Not with war marching in on us. Not with everybody hard up."

Cassy had been about to order a chocolate éclair. The new note stayed her. But though new, it was not novel. She had heard it before. It rang true. Absently she shoved at her plate.

In theory she knew her way about. The migratory systems of domestic experience said nothing to her, nor, thus far, had the charts of matrimony either. In the sphere of life to which a walk-up leads, the charts were dotted with but the postman and the corner druggist. Men and plenty of them she had met, but they too said nothing and not at all because they were dumb, but because, as the phrase is, they did not talk her language. But for every exception there is perhaps a rule. The one man who did speak her language, had held his tongue.

Now, as she shoved at her plate, she saw him, saw the tea-caddy, saw his rooms and saw too, as she left them, the girl to whom he was engaged. In the memory of that she lingered and looked down.

"Why, he could lead an orchestra of his own, your papa could."

Cassy looked up. She had been far away, too far, in a land where dreams do not come true. Impatiently she twisted. "What?"

"Didn't you hear me, dearie? I was talking about money—bushels of it."

About the bushels the woman rolled her tongue. They tasted better than the fritters.

A waiter approached. The room was long, dark, narrow, slovenly, spaced with tables on which were maculate cloths and lamps with faded shades. Greasily the waiter produced the bill.

"Bushels!" she appetisingly repeated.

Cassy paid. The waiter slouched away.

"You will drive through life in a hundred horse-power car and be fined for speeding. The papers will say: 'Mrs. Pal——' "

"What did he pay you to tell me that?" Cassy exploded at her.

Unruffled by the shot, which was part and parcel of the job, and realising that any denial would only confirm what at most could be but a suspicion, the former diva fingered her pearls and assumed an air of innocence.

But already Cassy had covered her with her blotting-paper look. "As if I cared!"

"Dearie, he did pay me. He paid me the compliment of supposing that I take an interest in you. But he said nothing except what I said he said. He said if he got down on his knees you would turn your back on him."

"Then he is cleverer than he looks."

"Well, anyway, he is clever enough to have bushels of money and that is the greatest cleverness there is."

"In New York," retorted Cassy, who had never been anywhere else, physically at least, though mentally her little feet had trod the streets of Milan, the boards of the Scala.

"It can't be much different in Patagonia," replied this lady, who, to save her life, could not have told whether the land was Asiatic or African, nor who, to save her soul—if the latter were still salvable—could not have told that it was neither. "Besides," she added, "I was only thinking of your poor, dear papa."

Cassy said nothing. She stood up. She was making for the door and the charm of the scented streets.

Ma Tamby sighed, rose and followed. It was the devil's own job. Housebreaking must be easier!

XIV

CASSY'S department-store investments reached her the next day. Her father, who opened the door to them, fell back before the sum total of the C. O. D. With an arm in a sling, he could not hold the packages, much less pay for them, and he gasped as he called for aid.

The money that Cassy then produced seemed to him darkly mysterious and although he believed as firmly in her virtue, as, before the break, he had believed in the maestria of his own right hand, none the less, in addition to aid, he exacted light.

Cassy, dumping the packages on her bed, occupied herself in verifying the change which amounted to one cent. Then she sketched it.

His surprise fell away. The mythical catamount, the imaginary concert, the ponderable subsidy—two hundred and fifty, less ten per cent.—seemed to him natural and an unnatural world.

"And there's about ten dollars remaining," Cassy resumed. "Ten dollars and a penny. You can have the penny and I will keep the ten, or I'll keep the ten and you can have the penny."

That also seemed natural. But the addition or subtraction disclosed a deficit and he exclaimed at it. "You said two hundred and fifty!"

Cassy too saw the hole, but she could not lie out of it. "Well, I owed the difference."

In speaking she turned. Before her was a mirror in which she glanced at her hair that had been superiorly tralala'd. She turned again, reflecting that Lennox must have already received the postal-order, which she had mailed the night before, and wondering whether he had liked her little scrawl of indignant thanks.

"I'll tell you about it later," she added. "Now I must get your dinner. How would you like a tenderloin, a salad, and a box of Camembert?"

He shuffled. "There is no Camembert any more." The tragedy of that seemed to overwhelm him. "I wish I were dead."

Cassy laughed. "Now it's the cheese. On Saturday it was the violin. Well, you got it back. What will you say if I find some Camembert? Do stop meowing. Any one might think you didn't have me."

At her young laughter, he groaned. "Formerly if I let a day go without practising, I noticed it. If I let two days go, Toscanini noticed it. Now it's weeks and weeks. It's killing me."

To cheer him, Cassy said gaily: "The artist never dies."

But it did not cheer him. Besides, though Cassy had laughed, there had been a tugging at her heartstrings. Shabby, unkempt, in a frayed dressing-gown, his arm in a dismal sling, he looked so out of it, so forlorn, so old.

He had shuffled away. She bit her lip. Later, when he had had his tenderloin and she had department-stored herself, a pint of grocer's burgundy had reduced him to tears.

The day before it had seemed to her that the frock would do. But her judgment had been hurried. Shops, crowds, the vibrations of both, devitalised and confused her. In choosing the frock she had not therefore given it the consideration which it perhaps did not merit, and now her mirror shrieked it. The frock was not suited to her. Nothing was suited to her, except the produce of baronial halls, where the simplest thing exceeded the dreams of avarice, or else the harlequinades which she herself devised. None the less she would have liked to have had her father exclaim and tell her how smart she looked. He omitted it.

"Where are you going?"

"I told you. Dinner and the opera."

"Opera! There is no opera to-night. What do you mean? What did you tell me?"

On the table were dishes and the lamentable bottle. Cassy, in doubt whether to clear them then or later, hesitated. The hesitation he misconstrued.

"You told me nothing. You tell me nothing. I am kept in the dark."

Cassy, adjusting the wrap which she had left open that he might admire the unadmirable, moved to where he sat and touched him. "You're the silliest kind of a silly. I told you yesterday. Perhaps the opera was last night. But how could I go? Except that old black rag I had nothing to wear. If there is no opera to-night, there will be a concert or something. Don't you remember now? I was at the telephone."

He did remember, but apparently the recollection displeased. He growled. "Yes. It was that Paliser."

"Well, why not? If it had not been for him, I would not have got the catamount's money and you would not have had the burgundy."

But he was not to be mollified. The growl sharpened into a snarl. "Paliser! I don't like the breed. By God, if——"

The peradventure of that Cassy got before he could utter it. Paliser! Of all men! The absurdity convulsed her. Her laughter ran up and down the scale.

"You're the dearest old duck of a goose I ever heard of." She turned. Her wrap swished. "I only wish you were going too."

Below, in the street, a man, precipitatingly vacating the box of a machine, touched his cap at her. "Beg pardon, mem. Miss Cara? Mr. Paliser's compliments and he's sent a car."

Cassy glanced at the man, who looked like a Roman emperor. From the man she turned to the car. Superiorly and soberly finished, it beckoned. Now, though, the Cæsar was holding open the door. Cassy got in. The emperor hopped up. The car leaped.

On the front seat was a box with her name on it. In it was a handful of orchids. The luxury of the car, the beauty of the demon-flowers, the flight from the walk-up, yet more, perhaps, the caresses and surrenders of spring, affected her. If, she thought, if only the things that might be could be the things that are! If only——

On the pale cushions she leaned back. Before her a curtain parted. In a wide, marble-flagged hall she was looking at a girl who was looking at her. A moment before he had said: "That is Miss Austen to whom I am engaged." A moment before she had seen her picture. The girl was good to look at, so good that, without further acquaintance, you knew she was good through and through. There was no mistaking that. But was she good enough? Was any girl good enough for him? And who was that with her? Probably her mother who probably too was the catamount's sister. They had a family likeness. Then at once the scene shifted. Cassy was in a room floored with thick rugs, hung with heavy draperies, and in that room the catamount had hired her to sing!

But the disgust of it passed. The curtain fell. Cassy turned to the window, through which a breath of lilac blew.

She sniffed and stared. Where was she? Where was the Riverside? Where, for that matter, was the roar of the glittering precinct in which the Splendor tossed its turrets to the sky? Here were dirty and reeling goblins; budding trees that bowed and fainted; a stretch of empty road that the scudding car devoured. Afar was a house that instantly approached and as suddenly vanished. Dimly beyond was another.

Cassy, leaning forward, poked at the emperor. "I will thank you to tell me where you are going. Don't you know where the Splendor is?"

Back at her he mumbled, but what she could not hear.

"Stop at once," she called.

Easily, without a quiver, almost within its own length, the car drew in and the Cæsar, touching his cap, was looking at her. "Beg pardon, mem. There was a note for you in the box. Mr. Paliser said——"

But now Cassy had it.

Chère demoiselle—though I do not know why I call you that, except that it sounds less perfunctory than dear Miss Cara, who, I hope will do me the honour of dining in the country, if for no better reason than because there is no opera to-night and I am her obedient servant.

M. P., JR.

Cassy looked up from it. "Country! He says country. What country? What does this mean?"

"The Place, mem. Paliser Place. It's not far now."

Cassy had not bargained for that. Stories of girls decoyed, drugged, spirited away, never heard of again, sprang at her. Quite as quickly she dismissed them. But, being human, she had to find fault.

"You should have told me before. That will do. Drive on."

She sank back. The car leaped and she smiled. Paliser in the rôle of white-slaver! Her momentary alarm was now a mile behind her. But would they be alone? Though, after all, what did it matter? Yet in Harlem there was a broken old man who would not like it. And the basilica investments! If she had known she would have worn the black rag. But they would do for that tiresome Mrs. Beamish. As yet she had not decided what she would sing. The Caro nome occurred to her. Under her breath she began it and abruptly desisted. The Dear Name suggested another.

For it she substituted the Ombra leggiera. In its scatter of trills that mount, as birds mount, there were no evocations, though she did begin wondering again about Mrs. Beamish's music-room. If it were not too impossible she might give the Ernani involame. But at that and very unintentionally she thought of Lennox again.

She made a face and looked through the window. As usual she was hungry. The car now was bellowing through opening gates which, as she looked back, a man in brown was closing. On either side was a high stone wall, but beyond, as she looked again, was an avenue bordered with trees and farther on a white house with projecting wings in which was a court, an entrance and, above and about the latter, a pillared perron.

From the entrance she could see a man in livery hastening. Behind him, a man in black appeared. The car stopped. The first man opened the door.

Cassy got out. The other man additionally assisted by looking on and moving aside. Cassy went into a hall where a young person who did not resemble the Belle Chocolatière but whose costume suggested her, diligently approached.

"Would madame care to go upstairs?"

No, madame would not. But Cassy, instinctively insolent to pretentionness, was very simple with the simple. "Thank you. Will you mind taking my wrap? Thank you again."

She looked about the hall. Before she could inventory it, here was another man. "A nice trick you played on me," Cassy threw at him. "I was half-way before I discovered it. The orchids reconciled me. Thank you for them. Who is here?"

Smiling, deferential, apparently modest, perfectly sent out in perfectly cut evening clothes, Paliser took her hand. "You are and, incidentally, I am."

Cassy withdrew her hand. "I suppose you think you are a host in yourself."

"Merely the most fortunate of mortals," replied Paliser, who could be eighteenth-century when he liked, but who seldom bothered to keep it up.

Already he had been doing a little inventorying on his own account. The basilica frock did not say much and what it did say was not to his taste. The Sunday night fantasy he much preferred. It was rowdy, but it was artistic. But beauty may be dishonoured, it cannot be vulgarised. Even in pseudo-Parisianisms Cassy was a gem. A doubt though, one that had already visited him, returned. Was the game worth the possible scandal?

But now Cassy was getting back at him. "To stand about with the most fortunate of mortals ought to be a shape of bliss. As it happens, I would rather sit."

"Naturally. Only, worse luck, there is no throne."

Cassy gave it to him again: "There is a court fool, though. Where are your cap and bells?"

"Not on you at any rate."

He motioned and Cassy passed on into a room beyond which other rooms extended, each different, but all in the same key, a monotone attenuated by lustres and the atmosphere, infinitely relaxing, which wealth exhales.

Cassy's thin nostrils quivered. Since childhood, it was her first breath of anything similar. It appeased and disarmed this anarchist who was also an autocrat.

"Will you sit here?"

Paliser was drawing a chair. The table before it lacked the adjacent severity. On it were dishes of Sèvres and of gold. Adjacently were three men. Their faces were white and sensual. They moved as forms move in a dream.

The stories of girls decoyed, spirited away, never heard of again, returned to Cassy. She had put the orchids beside her. Her flexible mouth framed a smile.

"You know, for a moment, I had the rare emotion of feeling and fearing that I was being eloped with."

A pop interrupted. She turned to a man at her elbow. "Only half a glass, please, and fill it with water." She returned to Paliser, who was opposite. "I had been thinking of something. I had not noticed where the car was going; and all of a sudden, I found myself I did not know where. Then, houp! It got me."

Paliser helped himself to a clam. "The charm of elopements passed with the post-chaise. Then they had the dignity of danger and pistol shots through the windows. Nowadays you go off in a Pullman and return as prosaic as you started."

"Sometimes even more so," Cassy put in.

Paliser helped himself to another clam. "You speak feelingly and that is only right. This is a very important matter. It is a shame that romance should have passed with the post-chaise. Why should it not revisit us in the motor?"

Cassy sipped and considered it. "There ought to be a law on the subject."

"There is one. You may be summoned for speeding and get your name in the papers."

"Then the dignity of danger remains."

"But not in clams. Aren't you going to eat any?"

Cassy laughed. "I had some yesterday with Ma Tamby. They did not seem to agree with her. She became very noisy about a Mrs. Beamish. Who is she?"

"Mrs. Beamish?" Paliser repeated. He also had forgotten. But, with a click, memory raised a latch. From behind it the lady emerged. "Oh, she's a cousin of mine."

"Rather distant, I should fancy," said Cassy, who was conscious of the delay, though not of the click. The delay she had noticed without, however, divining the cause. But how could she possibly imagine that Mrs. Beamish had been evolved for the sole purpose of providing her with basilica opportunities? Yet the fault, if fault there were, resided in her education. She had never read Eliphas Levi. She did not know that genii can be evoked.

"Well, she is more my sister's cousin than mine," Paliser anxious to get out of it, threw in. "I mean my sister has a more cousinly nature."

"I did not know you had a sister," said Cassy, who not only did not know but did not care. "Though, come to think of it, a sister with a cousinly nature must be so gratifying. Another distant relative, isn't she?"

"Very. She is in Petrograd."

That too was evocative. Cassy began talking about the biggest cropper that history has beheld—a tsar tossed from the saddle to Siberia!

Paliser, glad to be rid of Mrs. Beamish, took it up. The sordid story of the Russian chief of staff, bought by Hindenburg and shot by the Grand-Duke Nicholas, whom the tsar then exiled, was told once more.

"What else could you expect of that Hun?" Paliser concluded.

"A Hun!" Cassy exclaimed. "Why he is a Romanov."

"No more than you are," Paliser replied. "The last of the Romanovs married Catherine the Greater. There the breed ended. Paul, who followed and who married a German drab, was Catherine's son but not her husband's. The rest of the litter, down to the father of the recent incumbent, all married German drabs. The father of the ex-tsar married a Dane. The fellow is therefore one-eighth Dane and seven-eighths Hun. Totally apart from which, a grocer who knew his business would not have had him for clerk. His family knew that and, before he had time to be tsar, tried to poison him. To the misfortune, not of Russia merely, but of Christendom, they failed. If they had succeeded the eastern front would be secure. As for his wife, I saw her once. It was in the Winter Palace which, before it was sacked, was a palace. Since the palace of the Caliphs of Cordova crumbled, there has never been a palace like it. It outshone them all. Well, that woman tarnished it."

Meanwhile dishes were brought and removed by servants, wooden-faced, yet with ears alert. The subject of elopements had seemed promising, but it led to nothing. At their own table, talk was gayer.

Cassy enjoyed the food, the diluted wine, Paliser's facile touch. He appeared to know a lot and she surprised herself by so telling him. "I wish I did," she added. "I am ignorant as a carp."

"You know how to charm," he replied. But, seeing her stiffen, he resumed, "With your voice. That is enough. It would be a mistake for you to be versatile. Versatility is for the amateur. The artist is a flower, never a bouquet."

It was decently said. In the decency of it, the agreeable insult which a compliment usually is was so chastened that Cassy flushed and felt that she had. It annoyed her, and she attributed it to the wine.

It was not the wine. Other influences were at work on this girl, born to a forsaken purple and whose soul was homesick for it. But purple is perhaps picturesque. It was not that for which her soul sighed, but the dream that hides behind it, the dream of going about and giving money away. To her the dream had been the dream of a dream, realisable only on the top rungs of the operatic ladder, which, later, she felt she was not destined to scale. None the less there are dreams that do come true, though usually, beforehand, there is a desert to cross.

"I wonder if I might have a cavatina?" Paliser asked, rising and moving to her.

Cassy shrugged. I have to pay for my dinner, she thought, but she too got up.

Preceding her, he led the way to a room of which the floor, inlaid and waxed, was rugless. The windows were not curtained, they were shuttered. In the centre was a grand and a bench. Afar, at the other end, masking a door, was a portière, the colour of hyacinth. Near it, were two unupholstered chairs; one, white; the other, black. Save for these, save too for a succession of mirrors and of lights, the room was bare. In addition, it was spacious, a long oblong, ceiled high with light frescoes, the proper aviary for a song-bird.

Cassy curtsied to it. At table she had not wanted to sing. The mere sight of this room inspired.

Paliser opened the piano and, seating himself, ran his long thin fingers over the keys. He was heating them, preluding a score, passing from it to another. Presently he looked up; she nodded and the Ah, non giunge floated from her.

"Brava!" Paliser muttered as the final trill drifted away. Again he looked up. "You will be a very great artist."

He did not mean it. He judged her voice colourful but lacking in carriage.

Cassy, leaning forward, struck the keys, giving him the note and again she sang, this time the Libiamo, which, old as the hills, claptrap, utterly detestable, none the less served to display the bravura quality of her voice.

When it passed, Paliser sprang up, faced her. "Open your mouth! There! Wide!"

Cassy, familiar with the ritual, obeyed. Paliser peered into the strawberry of her throat. It was deep as a well and he moved back.

"You have the organ but you do not know how to use it. You don't know how to breathe."

Cassy forgot that he was young, that she was, that in the great room in the great house they were alone.

Through the shutters came the smell of lilacs, the sorceries of spring. In the sexlessness of art these things were unnoticed. For the first time she liked him. It was his frankness that drew her, though if he had been a frank old woman she would have liked him as well.

"My father says that. He says it is Ma Tamby's fault. He can't bear her."

For a while they discussed it. Paliser maintaining that were it not for the war she ought to go to Paris and Cassy asserting, though without conviction, that the specialty of the Conservatoire consisted in dried fruit.

Finally she said: "It must be late. I have a wrap somewhere and oh! my orchids."

The young person was summoned. The wrap was recovered, the orchids reappeared.

Paliser, helping Cassy with the wrap, said: "Shall I see it here again?" He knew he would but he thought it civil to ask.

Cassy too had her thoughts. The freedom with which, during the ham-and-eggs episode, his eyes had investigated her, where was it? On Sunday he had bored her to tears. That also had gone. During the past hour or two he had shown himself reasonably intelligent, unpresuming, without offensiveness of any kind. With a movement of the hand she lifted the wrap at her neck. "Here?"

It occurred to her that she did not know where the polished and inlaid floor on which she stood was located. Nor did she particularly care. Besides if her geography were vague, the floor was pleasant, a bit slippery perhaps, though just how slippery she was yet to learn.

"Yes. The day after to-morrow. Why not? I would like to run over a score or two with you."

"Good heavens! You are not composing an opera, are you?"

Paliser laughed. "I want to lead you away from painted mush into the arms of——"

"Not Strauss?" Cassy interrupted. "Art does not recognise frontiers but the Huns do not either and I will not recognise a Hun. Is the car at the door?"

He saw her out and away, and reentering the house went to a room in the wing. It was lined with bookcases that you did not have to break your back to examine. They began four feet from the floor and ended two feet higher. The room contained other objects of interest.

From among the latter, Paliser helped himself to a brandy and soda. It had been dry work. The drink refreshed him. It stimulated too. Also it suggested. He put the glass down and lightly swore at it.

"Damn Benny! He has only one thumb."

For a moment he eyed the glass. Then taking from a shelf Gautier's very spiritual account of the de Maupin, he eyed that. Not for long though. He put it back. He did not want to read. He did not want to drink. There were several things that he did not want. In particular he did not want to be alone.

He rang, ordered out a car and went sailing in town, to a brownstone front where you could lose as much money as you liked and not in solitude either. On the way, the thought of the damned and thumbless Benny accompanied him.

XV

THROUGH the inflated proprieties of social New York, Paliser's father had driven four-in-hand, and at a pace so klinking that social New York cut him dead. A lot he cared! The high-steppers in their showy harness flung along as brazenly as before. He did not care. He had learned to since. Age is instructive. It teaches that though a man defy the world, he cannot ignore it. But tastes are inheritable. Monty Paliser came in for a few, but not for the four-in-hand. Less vigorous than his father, though perhaps more subtle, he preferred the tandem.

In preparation for one that he had in view, he looked in, not at a mart, but at a shrine.

It was on the afternoon succeeding Cassy's visit to his slippery floor. The day was radiant, a day not of spring, or of summer, but of both. Above was a sky of silk wadded with films of white cotton. From below there ascended a metallic roar, an odour of gasoline—the litanies and incense of the temple, Semitic and Lampsacene, that New York long since became.

Lampsacus worshipped a very great god and worshipped him uniquely. New York, more devout and less narrow, has worshipped him also and has knelt too to a god almost as great. Their combined rituals have exalted the temple into a department-store where the pilgrim obtains anything he can pay for, which is certainly a privilege. Youth, beauty, virtue, even smiles, even graciousness, Priapus and Mammon bestow on the faithful that garland the altars with cash.

In Park Avenue, on this radiant afternoon, Mrs. Austen and Paliser were occupied with their devotions. Mrs. Austen was priestess and Paliser was saying his prayers; that is, he was jingling his money, not audibly, but none the less potently in the lady's uplifted eyes.

"Yes," said the lady, who as usual did not mean it. "It is too bad. Margaret, the dear child, is so inexperienced that I feel that I must blame myself. I have kept from her—how shall I put it? Well, everything, and when she learned about this, I could not tell her that it was all very usual. It would have offended her modesty too much."

Pausing, Mrs. Austen smiled her temple smile. "I could not tell her, as somebody expressed it, that actresses happen in the best of families, but I left her to decide whether she cared to have them happen in her ménage."

The priestess, looking to the north and south, resumed: "It might have been different if she had been older, more experienced and had really cared for him. But how could she care? The child's nature is dormant. She does not know what love is. He is very nice, I have not a word to say against him, not one, but a lamp-post would be quite as capable of arousing her affection. She accepted him, I grant you that and you may well ask why. I know I asked myself the same thing, until I remembered that Mr. Austen offered to take me to Niagara Falls and I married him just to go there. At the time I was a mere chit and Margaret is little more. Now, I am not, I hope, censorious and I do not say that she had a lucky escape, but I can say she thinks so. It was such a relief that it gave her neuralgia. But the child will be up and about in no time and then you must come and dine. You got my note?"

Paliser stifled a yawn. The priestess was, he knew, entirely willing to deliver whatever he wanted at temple rates. But he knew, too, there were forms and ceremonies to be observed. Being bored was one of them.

At another portal he has been obliged to go through the forms with Carlotta Tamburini. She also had wearied him, though less infernally than Mrs. Austen, and of the two he preferred her. The ex-diva was certainly canaille, but her paw was open and ready, whereas this woman's palm, while quite as itching, was delicately withheld. Their gods were identical. It was the shrines that differed. The one at which the Tamburini presided was plain as a pikestaff. The Austen's was bedecked like a girl on her wedding-day. Behind each Priapus leered. Above both was the shining face of Mammon.

In the present rites, that which wearied Paliser was the recital of the reason of the broken engagement. It was broken, that was the end of it, an end which, in ordinary circumstances, he would have regretted. Ordinarily it would have made the running too easy. The hurdles were gone. There were no sticks, no fences. It would not even have been a race, just a canter. The goal remained but the sporting chance of beating Lennox to it would have departed. That is the manner in which ordinarily he would have regarded it. But the war, that was to change us all, already had changed his views. The draft act had not then been passed, yet it was realised that some such act would be passed, and generally it was assumed that among the exempt would be men with wives dependent on them and cogently he had reflected that if he married that would be his case precisely. At the same time he could not take a possible bride by the scruff of the neck and drag her off to a clergyman. Though it be to save your hide, such things are not done. Even in war-time there are wearisome preliminaries and these preliminaries, which a broken engagement abridged, the neuralgia of a possible bride prolonged. That was distinctly annoying and a moment later, when he had the chance, he vented the annoyance on Lennox.

"You got my note?" Mrs. Austen was asking.

"Yes," he replied, "and I will come with pleasure. Meanwhile, if my sympathy is not indiscreet, please convey it to your daughter." The kick followed. "Though, to be sure, Lennox is a loose fish."

"He is?" Mrs. Austen unguardedly exclaimed. Not for a moment had she suspected it and, in her surprise, her esteem for him jumped. Good heavens! she thought. How I have maligned him!

In the exclamation and the expression which her eyes took on, Paliser divined some mental somersault, divined too that behind it was something obscure, something that she was keeping back. Warily he backed.

"Oh, as for that, loose fish may mean anything. It is a term that has been applied to me and I dare say very correctly. If I did not live like a monk, I should be jailed for my sins."

He is his father all over again, Mrs. Austen cheerfully reflected and absently asked: "How is he?"

"Lennox? I haven't an idea."

"I mean your father."

"In a great hurry, thank you. The war has gone to his head."

"At his age? Surely——"

"He wants me to go," said Paliser, who had no intention of it whatever and whom subsequent events completely exempted. "He is in a hurry for me to enlist and in a greater hurry to have me marry."

Austerely, this pleasant woman grabbed it. "It is your duty!"

That was too much for Paliser, who, knowing as well as she did what she was driving at, wanted to laugh. Like the yawn, he suppressed it.

The priestess's austerity faded. A very fair mimic of exaltation replaced it. "Whoever she is, how proud she will be! A war-bride!"

But Paliser, who had his fill, was rising and, abandoning histrionics, she resumed: "The 24th at eight; don't forget!" Then as he passed from the portal, the priestess lifted her hands. "What a fish! Fast or loose, what a fish!"

Above her Mammon glowed, behind her leered Priapus.

Through the sunny streets, Paliser drove to the Athenæum, where everybody was talking war. The general consensus of ignorance was quite normal.

Lennox, seated with Jones at a window, was summarising his own point of view. "In a day or two I shall run down to Mineola. Perhaps they will take me on at the aviation field. Anyway I can try."

Jones crossed himself. He is signing his death-warrant, he thought. But he said: "Take you, Icarus. They will fly away with you. You will become a cavalier of the clouds, a toreador of the aerial arena, an archangel soaring among the Eolian melodies of shrapnel. I envy, I applaud, but I cannot emulate. The upper circles are reserved for youth and over musty tomes I have squandered mine. I am thirty-two by the clock and I should hie me to the grave-digger that he may take my measure. And yet if I could—if I could!—I would like to be one of the liaison chaps and fall if I must in a shroud of white swords."

Sombrely Lennox considered his friend. "Your shroud of white swords is ridiculous."

Jones agreed with him. To change the subject, he rattled a paper. "Have you seen this? There is an account here of a man who shot his girl. He thought her untrue. Probably she was."

"Reason enough then," said Lennox, who latterly had become very murderous.

"I wonder! Anyway, though the paper does not say so, that was not his reason. The poor devil killed her not because she had been untrue, but because he loved her. He killed the thing he loved the best out of sheer affection. Unfortunately, for his virtues, he loved her innocently, ignorantly, as most men do love, without any idea that the one affection worth giving is a love that nothing can alter, a love that can not only forgive but console."

"Is that what you call originality?" Lennox severely enquired. "If so, I have never run across any of it in your books."

"Heaven forbid that you should, dear boy. I live by the sweat of my pen. Originality never has, and never will make a best-seller."

It was while Jones was airing these platitudes that Paliser entered the room. He approached the two men. Lennox at once got up, turned his back, marched away.

A few days later, Jones, in reviewing the incident, wondered whether Lennox could, even then, have suspected. But, at the moment, in apology for him, he merely lied.

"I frightened him off with shop-talk."

Paliser took the vacant seat. "What are you writing?"

"Cheques. There is nothing simpler and, except cash, nothing so easily understood. To keep my hand in I will write one now."

Then Jones too got up. Paliser, to whom solitude was always irksome, found himself alone. But his solitude was not prolonged. A man joined him. Another followed. Presently there was a group.

From the table where Jones had gone, the inkbeast saw and seeing thought: Empires may totter, nations fall. The face of the earth will be changed. But the toady endureth forever.

CHAPTER XVI

IT was another perfect day, a forenoon after Veronese, a day of which the charm was heightened by the witcheries that Harlem knows—the shouted temptations of push-carts; the pastimes of children, so noisy, so dirty, so dear! the engaging conversation of German ladies; the ambient odour of cabbage and the household linen fluttering gaily on the roofs. It was rapturous. Just beyond was a sewer—the Hudson. But above was the turquoise of the mid-April day.

Cassy went by and on, turned a corner, crossed the street, descended into a cave, smiled sweetly at a man who was closing a door and who, seeing that smile, smiled at it, smiled wantonly, held the door open, yet, noting then but an arid blankness where her smile had been, banged the door and shouted fiercely: "Hundred-thirty-seven-street-next."

The train crashed on. Cassy, her nose in the air, assumed a barbed-wire attitude, her usual defensive against the conjecturing eyes of old men and the Hello, Kid! glances of New York's subtle youth. This attitude, which enabled her to ignore everything and everybody, enabled her also to think of what she liked, or of what she did not like, a circumstance that happened to her then and which was induced by her father.

That day he had been terrible. The tragedies of the fated Atrides, what were they to his? A lamentation longer than Jeremiah's followed. His arm, his skill, his art, his strength, his money, everything, for all he knew even his daughter, was taken from him. How long, O Lord, how long! And presto! da capo, all over and afresh she had it.

Then, shaking a finger, he cried: "Where were you last night?"

Cassy, reduced to tears, exclaimed at him. "Why here. Where else?"

Darkly he eyed her. "Yes, but earlier, before you came in, where were you?"

Cassy could not help it, she shook. A moment before she had been crying whole-heartedly, associating herself, as a daughter may, in her father's woe. But that was too much. With the tears still in her eyes, she laughed. "Gracious goodness! You don't take me for a fly-by-night?"

The noble marquis, who had been standing, sat down. Before him, on the ginger of the wall, hung the portrait of the gorgeous swashbuckler. Behind the latter were portraits, dim, remote, visionary, of other progenitors who probably never existed. But he was convinced that they had, convinced that always, sword in hand, they had upheld the honour of the Casa-Evora. No, surely, his daughter had not forfeited that. No, certainly, he did not suspect her. But there was much that he did not understand. The misery of the mystery of things overcame him. He wept noisily.

Cassy, who had been seated, stood up. She had on her rowdy frock. She also had on a hat—if you can call a tam-o'-shanter a hat. Therewith were white gloves which she had got at the basilica and which as yet were free from benzine. Her father had distressed her inhumanly, but she had survived it, as youth survives anything, and she looked then, not tear-stained in the least, but, as usual, very handsome.

Bending forward, she touched him. "There, you dear old thing, don't take on so. I have been planning something fat for you. Everything will come out right. Just wait and see—and when you're hungry, there's some nice cold veal in the kitchy."

But though in the kitchen there was cold veal, which it were perhaps poetic to describe as nice, yet even the poetry of that was exceeded by the poetry of the plan. Cassy had planned nothing lean or fat, nothing whatever. She had spoken as a little mother may, in an effort to console, though perhaps prompted subconsciously by the inscrutable possibilities of life. Anything may happen. Already on the stage of which destiny is the scene-shifter, the fates, in their eternal rôle of call-boy, were summoning the actors to the drama in which the leading rôle was hers and on which the curtain was about to rise.

Her father, comforted by the imaginary, looked up. She had gone. From the sling he took his arm. The elbow was stiff, though less stiff than it had been. Moreover the wrist moved readily and the fingers were as flexible as before. Consoled by that, comforted already, he shuffled into the kitchen and consumed the cold veal.

Now, in the crashing car, Cassy's thoughts went forward and back. Her father's question, that had succeeded in being both pointed and pointless, returned. She smiled at it. It would take another Don Juan than Mozart's to entice me, she serenely reflected. Yet, after all, would he have to be so remarkable? At any rate he would have to be fancy free and not engaged as was a certain person who had not so much as said Boo!

Cassy coloured. Always corsetless, she was not straight-laced. Given the attraction and with it the incentive, and that tam-o'-shanter might have gone flying over the windmill. The tam was very safe. There was no incentive and, though there was no moral corset either, she was temperamentally unable to go poaching on another's preserves. Barring the chimerical, that any girl may consider and most girls do, she was straight as a string. A shabby old man had no need to ask.

"Seventy-second!" The trainman bawled unmollifiably at her.

Cassy left a certain person there. Into her thoughts another man had hopped. She surveyed him. He was good-looking. He was rich. These attributes said nothing. A beautiful male—always an anomaly—never attracts a beautiful woman. That other anomaly, a man of inherited wealth, is disgusting to the anarchist. Cassy was a beauty and an anarchist. She was also an aristocrat. The tattered portières of the House of Casa-Evora, the bedrabbled robes of the marquisate, all that was ridiculous to her. She was an aristocrat none the less. She had a high disdain for low things. In the kitchen, which she called the kitchy, she bent her back but not her head. Her head was unbowed. She sullied her hands but not her conscience. A dirty act she could not perform. Aristocrat and anarchist, she was also an artist. With simple things and simple people, she was simple as you please. Stupidity and pretentiousness enraged her. The philistine and the ignoble she loathed.

Now, through the windows of her soul, she surveyed him. His looks, his money, said nothing. On the other hand there was about him an aroma that appealed. The aroma was not the odour that local society exhales. At that Cassy's nose was in the air. A lot of nobodies occupied with nothing—and talking about it! Such was her opinion of the gilded gang, an opinion which Paliser—to do him the justice that the historian should—would have had put to music and arranged for trumpets. It was not that, therefore. The aroma was more fetching. The man talked her language, liked what she liked, never presumed. In considering these factors, she considered her gloves. Thank God, they did not smell of benzine!

"Grand Central!"

Cassy, abandoning Paliser there, went on to Fifth Avenue, where, with the protection of cross-town traffic, she attempted to get to the other side. But halfway, she saw, or thought she saw, the young woman to whom a certain person was engaged. She turned to look, backed into the traffic-sign and put it in motion. Instantly motors were careering at each other. Instantly a purple policeman grown suddenly black, was smitten with St. Vitus.

Dancing and bellowing as he danced, he righted the sign and swore at Cassy, who, for added outrage, had flung herself at him and was smiling sweetly in his swollen face. About them the torrent poured. Then all at once, in a riot that afterwards seemed to her phantasmagoric, the policeman raised a forefinger in salute. From the maelstrom she was hoisted bodily into a car. Somebody, the policeman probably, was boosting her from behind. Never had she suffered such indignities! To accentuate them, somebody else was shouting in her face.

"I've saved your life, you'll have to marry me."

"Well, I declare!" Cassy, horribly ruffled, exclaimed at Paliser, who had the impudence to laugh. She smoothed the smock, patted the hat, passed a gloved hand over her nose.

"You're all there," Paliser, amused by the mimic, was telling her. "What is more, one pick-me-up deserves another."

With his stick, he poked at the mechanician, gestured with it, indicating a harbour.

The car veered and stopped at a restaurant that had formerly resided in Fourteenth Street, but which had moved, as the heart of Manhattan moved, and was then thinking of moving again.

In the entrance were Cantillon and Ogston, agreeable young men, who stood aside for Cassy, raised their hats at Paliser, nudging each other with unfathomable good-fellowship.

"A peach!"

"No, a pair!"

Their pleasantries were lost. Cassy and Paliser moved on and in to the Fifth Avenue room, crowded as usual on this high noon. But what are head-waiters for? Promptly there was a table, one not too near the orchestra and yet which gave on the street.

"What would you dislike the least?" Paliser from over a bill-of-fare inquired. He had brought his hat and stick with him and, in spite of a waiter's best efforts, had put both on the floor.

I am not fit to be seen, thought Cassy, looking about at two and three hundred dollar frocks and at blouses that were almost as cheap.

Paliser, turning to the waiter, translated passages from the menu. "Surprised tomatoes, cocottish eggs, suprême on a sofa, ice Aurora Borealis. And a baked potato." He turned to Cassy. "Barring the ice, a baked potato is the only thing in which they can't stick grease."

"Et comme vin, monsieur?" enquired the waiter who ought to have been at the front.

"Aqua pura. But probably you have not got it. Celestial Vichy, then." He looked again at Cassy. "What else might displease your ladyship?"

"Do stop talking like a low comedian," Cassy vexatiously retorted. "If you had not used force I would not be here. I could not make a row at the door."

"No, one scene on Fifth Avenue is enough for one day."

"I should say so and it was you who made it. I was going quietly about my business when I was derricked into your car."

"Not at all. You threw yourself at my head. If it had not been for me, the policeman would have marched you off to prison."

Cassy laughed. "The dear man! He knew I would be worse off with you."

"Yes. He was certainly perspicacious. Where did you say you were going?"

Cassy removed her gloves. "Before I was attacked? To a music-shop. There is a song I want to get for Mrs. Thingumagig's, Mrs. Beamish——"

"Mrs. Who?" Paliser asked. Again he had forgotten the lady. But from one of memory's pantries her wraith peered out. "Ah, yes, of course! Well, we can stop by for it and you can run it over in the country to-night. You remember that you are to dine with me, don't you?"

Cassy lifted a lip as a dog does when about to bite. "Remember it, I have thought of nothing else."

But now the waiter put a dish between them and Paliser said: "You make me feel like this surprised tomato."

Then came the bite. "While you are about it, you can feel like both of them. I am not going."

Argument weakens everything and wearies everybody—except the young. The mouths of youth are naturally full of objections and insults. Were it otherwise, young people would be too servile to the past, too respectful to the present and the future would not know them as guides.

Paliser, young in years, but old at heart, omitted to argue. He did what is perhaps superior, he changed the subject. "What is this song you were speaking of? Why not try that thing of Rimsky-Korsakov, the 'Chanson Hindoue'?"

Then, throughout that course and the courses that followed, peace descended upon them. Even to talk music soothes the savage breast. It soothed Cassy and to such an extent that, finally, when the ice came she made no bones about admitting it was her favourite dish.

"Du café, monsieur? Des liqueurs?" the slacker asked.

But no, Paliser did not wish anything else, nor did Cassy. The ice sufficed. She ate it slowly, a little forkful at a time, wishing that her father could share it, wishing that he, too, could have sofa'd suprêmes and some one to pay for them. She raised her napkin.

Paliser lit a cigarette and said: "You made no reply to that statement of mine."

She stared. "What statement?"

"About saving your life."

"And ruining my reputation?"

"Well, life comes first. I said you would have to marry me to pay for it. Will you?"

Cassy lowered the napkin. He was talking in jest she knew, or thought she knew, but the subject was not to her taste, though if he had been serious she would have disliked it still more. She wanted to give it to him, but no fitting insolence occurred to her and she turned to the window before which two Japanese were passing, with the air, certainly feigned, which these Asiatics display, of being hilarious and naïf.

"Will you?" he repeated.

"Will I what?"

"Marry me?"

Perhaps he did mean it, she thought. He was cheeky enough for anything. But now he was prodding her. "Say yes. Say to-morrow; say to-day."

She turned on him. "Why not yesterday? Or is it just another of your pearls of thought? You are simply ridiculous."

Paliser put down his cigarette. "That is the proper note. Marriage is ridiculous. But it is the most ancient of human institutions. Divorce must have been invented at least three weeks later."

Cassy did not mean to laugh and did not want to, but she could not help herself and she exploded it. "You are so ardent!"

Innocently Paliser caressed his chin. He had made her laugh and that was a point gained. But such pleasure as he may have experienced he succeeded in concealing.

"Again the proper note! I am ardent. Yet—shall I admit it?—formerly I walked in darkness. It is all due to my father. I have forgotten the prophet preaching on the hillside who denounced respectability as a low passion. But my father, while deeply religious, has views more advanced. He dotes on respectability. He tried to instil it into me and, alas! how vainly! I was as the blind, the light was withheld and continued to be until, well, until a miracle occurred. You appeared, I was healed, I saw and I saw but you. What do you say?"

"That your conversation is singularly edifying." In speaking, Cassy gathered her gloves with an air slightly hilarious but not in the least naïf. Before Paliser could cut in, she added: "If I don't hurry, Ma Tamby will be out and I shall lose my lesson."

Paliser shifted. She is devilish pretty, he thought. But is she worth it? For a second he considered the possible scandal which he had considered before.

He stood up. "Let me take you. We can stop for the song on the way."

XVIII

"MY Carlottatralala! Dear Carlottatralala!"

Lightly at the door, Cassy strung the words to a mazourka. Her voice twisted, swung, danced into a trill that was captured by echoes that carried it diminishingly down the stairway of the mansion where Carlotta Tamburini lived.

"Eh?"

Partially the door opened. A fat slovenly woman showed an unpowdered nose, a loose unpainted mouth, and, at sight of Paliser, backed. "For God's sake! One moment, dearie. Straight ahead. With you in two shakes."

Cassy, her yellow frock swishing, led the way to a room furnished with heaped scores, with a piano, a bench, chairs and a portrait, on foot, of a star before the fall. Adjacently were framed programmes, the faded tokens of forgetless and forgotten nights, and, with them, the usual portraits of the usual royalties, but perhaps unusually signed. The ex-diva had attended to that herself.

Paliser, straddling the bench, put his hat on the piano and looked at Cassy, who had gone to the window. It was not the palaces opposite that she saw. Before her was a broken old man revamped. In his hand was a baton which he brandished demoniacally at an orchestra of his own. The house foamed with faces, shook with applause, and without, at the glowing gates, a chariot carried him instantly to the serenities of elaborate peace.

"It won't take over an hour."

The vision vanished. Across the way, in a window opposite, a young man was dandling, twirling one side of a moustache, cocking a conquering eye. Cassy did not see him. Directly behind her another young man was talking. She did not hear.

On leaving the restaurant and, after it, the music-shop, the car had taken them into the Park where Paliser, alleging that he was out of matches, had handed her into another restaurant where more Vichy was put before her and, with it, that question.

The air was sweet with lilacs. On the green beyond Cassy could see them, could see, too, a squirrel there that had gone quite mad. It flew around and around, stopped suddenly short, chattered furiously and with a flaunt of the tail, disappeared up a tree.

"What a dear!" was Cassy's reply to that question.

But Paliser gave her all the rope that she wanted. He had no attraction for her, he knew it, and in view of other experiences, the fact interested him. It had the charm of novelty to this man who, though young, was old; who, perhaps, was born old; born, as some are, too old in a world too young.

He struck a match and watched the little blue-gold flame flare and subside. It may have seemed to him typical. Then he looked up.

"Frankly, I have no inducements to offer, and, by the same token, no lies. It would be untrue if I said I loved you. Love is not an emotion, it is a habit, one which it takes time to form. I have had no opportunity to acquire it, but I have acquired another. I have formed the habit of admiring you. The task was not difficult. Is there anything in your glass?"

"A bit of cork, I think," said Cassy, who was holding the glass to the light and who was holding it moreover as though she had thoughts for nothing else.

But her thoughts were agile as that squirrel. A why not? Why not? Why not? was spinning in them, spinning around and around so quickly that it dizzied her. Then, like the squirrel, up a tree she flew. For herself, no. She did not want him, never had wanted him, never could.

"May I have it?" Paliser took the glass. Save for subsiding bubbles, and the bogus water, there was nothing there. "Will you take mine? I have not touched it."

Cassy took it from him, drank it, drank it all. Her thoughts raced on. She was aware of that, though with what they were racing she could not tell.

"I don't know why I am so thirsty."

Paliser knew. He knew that the taste of perplexity is very salt. She was considering it, he saw, and he payed out the rope.

"People who claim to be wise are imbeciles. But people who claim to be happy are in luck. I have no pretensions to wisdom but I can claim to be lucky if——"

Cassy, her steeple-chasing thoughts now out of hand, was saying something and he stopped.

"It is very despicable of me even to listen to you. I don't think I would have listened, if you had not been frank. But you have had the honesty not to pretend. I must be equally sincere. I——"

It was Paliser's turn. With a laugh he interrupted. "Don't. A little sincerity is a dangerous thing and a great deal of it must be fatal. Besides I know it all by heart. I am the son of rich and disreputable people. That is not my fault, and, anyway, it is all one to you. But what you mean is that, should you consent, the consideration will not be—er—personal with me or—er—spiritual with you, but—er—just plain and simple materialism."

Cassy looked wonderingly at him. It was surprising how quickly and how completely he had nailed it. But into the bewilderment there crept something else. "Yes, and I am ashamed to look myself in the face."

Paliser gave a tug at the rope. "Then don't do that either. Look at me. Matrimony is no child's play. It is like a trip to England—close confinement with the chance of being torpedoed. Interference is the submarine that sinks good ships. If you consent, there is only one thing on which I shall insist, but I shall insist on it absolutely."

Visibly the autocrat stiffened. "Shall you, indeed!"

Paliser pounded, or affected to pound, on the table. "Yes, absolutely."

You may go to Flanders then, thought Cassy, but, with that look which she could summon and which was tolerably blighting, she said, "Ah! The drill sergeant!"

"Yes, and here is the goose-step. The drill sergeant orders that you must always have your own way in everything."

Considerably relaxed by that, Cassy laughed. "You are very rigorous. But don't you think it is rather beside the mark?"

"Beside it!" Paliser exclaimed. "It tops it, goes all over it, covers it, covers the grass, covers everything—except a fair field, a free rein and every favour."

Cassy was gazing beyond where the squirrel had been. A limousine passed. A surviving victoria followed. Both were superior. So also were the occupants. They were very smart people. You could tell it from the way they looked. They had an air contemptuous and sullen. The world is not good enough for them, Cassy thought. In an hour, car and carriage would stop. The agreeable occupants would alight. They would enter fastidious homes. Costly costumes they would exchange for costumes that were costlier. They would sit at luxurious boards, lead the luxurious life and continue to, until they died of obesity of the mind.

None of that! Cassy decided. But already the picture was fading, replaced by another that showed a broken old man, without a penny to his name, or a hope save in her.

From the screen, she turned to Paliser, who, aware of her absence, had omitted to recall her. Now, though, that she again condescended to be present, he addressed her in his Oxford voice.

"But what was I saying? Yes, I remember, something that somebody said before me. Nowadays every one marries except a few stupid women and a few very wise men. Yet, then, as I told you, I have no pretensions to wisdom."

"Nor I to stupidity," Cassy thoughtlessly retorted. Yet at once, realising not merely the vanity of the boast but what was far worse, the construction that it invited, she tried to recall it, tangled her tongue, got suddenly red and turned away.

"You do me infinite honour then," said Paliser, who spoke better than he knew. But her visible discomfort delighted him. He saw that she wanted to wriggle out of it and, like a true sportsman, he gave her an opening in which she would trip.

"Matrimony is temporary insanity with permanent results. You must not incur them blindfolded. Do me the favour to look this way. Before you sits a pauper."

In the surprise of that, Cassy did look and walked straight into it. "What?"

"Precisely." In sheer enjoyment he began lying frankly and freely. He lied because lying is a part of the game, because it is an agreeable pastime and because, too, if she swallowed it—and why shouldn't she?—it might put a spoke in such wheels as she might otherwise and subsequently set going.

"Precisely," he repeated. "It is different with my father. My father has what is called a regular income. One of these days I shall inherit it. It will keep us out of the poorhouse. But meanwhile I have only the pittance that he allows me."

Yes, Cassy sagaciously reflected. What with Paliser Place, its upkeep and the rest of it, it must be a pittance. But the lie behind it, which she mistook for honesty, tripped her as it was intended to do. A moment before she might have backed out. Now, in view of the lie that she thought was truth, how could she? It would be tantamount to acknowledging she was for sale but that he hadn't the price. Red already, at the potential shame of that she got redder.

Paliser, who saw everything, saw the heightening flush, knew what it meant, knew that he was landing her, but knew, too, that he must bear the honours modestly.

"Bread and cheese in a cottage and with you!" he exclaimed. "But, forgive me, I am becoming lyrical."

He turned, summoned the waiter, paid for the water, paid for the service and took from the man his stick.

Cassy went with him to the car. She had made no reply. If she were to take the plunge, there was no use shivering on the brink. But what would her father say? He would be furious of course, though how his fury would change into benedictions when he found himself transported from the walk-up, lifted from Harlem and cold veal! Presently there would be a flower in his button-hole and everything that went with the flower. Moreover, if the poor dear wanted to be absurd, she would let him parade his marquisate; while, as for herself, she would have to say good-bye to so much that had been so little. Good-bye! Addio per sempre! The phrase from La Tosca came to her. It told of kisses and caresses that she had never had. Yet, beneath her breath, she repeated it. Addio per sempre!

Then suddenly, without transition, she felt extraordinarily at peace with herself, with everybody, with everything. After all, she did not know, stranger things had happened, she might even learn to care for him and to care greatly. But whether she did or she did not, she would be true as steel—truer! He had been so nice about it! Yes, she might, particularly since she had made a clean breast of it and he knew she was marrying him for what it pleased him to describe as his pittance.

The car now was flying up the Riverside. An omnibus passed. From the roof, a country couple spotted the handsome girl and the handsome young man who were lolling back so sumptuously, and the lady stranger, pointing, said to her gentleman: "Vanderbilt folk, I guess, ain't they dandy!"

Behind the lady sat a novelist who was less enthusiastic. Another girl gone gay, was his mental comment. Well, why not? he reflected, for Jones' prejudices were few and far between. Besides, he added: Les Portugais sont toujours gais. But he had other things to think about and he dismissed the incident, which, in less than a week, he had occasion to recall.

Cassy, meanwhile, after serenading a fat woman's door and looking from a palatial window at the moving-pictures of her thoughts, at last heard Paliser, who, already, had twice addressed her.

"It won't take over an hour or so."

But now the Tamburini, ceremoniously attired in a wrapper, strode in and Paliser, who had been straddling the music-bench, stood up.

The fact that they had come together and were together, had already darkly enlightened the fallen star and as she strode in she exclaimed with poetry and fervour: "Two souls with but a single thought!"

Paliser took his hat. "We are a trifle better provided. I have as many as three or four thoughts and one of them concerns a license. I am going to get it."

His face was turned from Cassy and his eyes, which he had fastened on his hostess, held caveats, commands, rewards.

Massively she flung herself on Cassy. "Dearie, I weep for joy!"

Cassy shoved her away. "Not on me, Tamby."

But the dear lady, in attacking her, shot a glance at Paliser. It was very voluble.

Cassy, too, was looking at him. Her education had been thorough. She knew any number of useless things. In geography, history, and the multiplication-table she was versed. But Kent's Commentaries, passionate as they are, were beyond her ken. The laws to which they relate were also. None the less, on the subject of one law she had an inkling, vague, unprecised, and, for all she knew to the contrary, incorrect. She blurted it. "Don't I have to go, too?"

Ma Tamby grabbed it. "Go where, dearie?"

"For the license?"

Ma Tamby tittered. "Not unless you love the song of the subway. The license is a man's job." Twisting, she giggled at Paliser. "But not hard labour, he, he!"

"A life-term, though," he answered and added: "I'll go at once."

That settled it for Cassy. A chair stretched its arms to her. She sat down.

Wildly the fat woman gesticulated. "Dearie, no! But how it gets me! As true as gospel I dreamed so much about it that it kept me awake. I do believe I have a pint of champy. Shall I fetch it? I must."

Coldly Cassy considered her. "Don't. You'll only get tight."

Paliser, making for the door, called back: "Save a drop for me."

"May the Lord forgive me," sighed the fat woman. "I was that flustered I forgot to congratulate him. But how it takes me back! Dearie, I too was young! I too have loved! Ah, gioventu primavera della vita! Ah, l'amore! Ah! Ah!"

"You make me sick," said Cassy.

"Dearie——"

"Be quiet. My father won't like it and I can't lie to him about it. But I shall need some things and you will have to go for them. What will you tell him?"

With one hand, the fat woman could have flattened Cassy's father out. But not his tongue. The nest of vipers there, even then hissed at her.

"Why, dearie, to-morrow you'll have your pick of Fifth Avenue and until then, if you need a tooth-brush, I'll get one for you around the corner."

"But my father will have to be told something. He'll worry to death. I might write though, and put on a special delivery. Look here. Have you any note paper that isn't rotten with scent? If not, I do believe I'll chuck it."

"For God's sake, dearie!"

Hastily, in search of scentless paper, the fat woman made off.

XIX

OVER the way, on the jimcrack of the stately mansion opposite, the westering sun had put an aigrette of gold. The young man with the conquering eye had gone. A lovely Jewess, leaning like a gargoyle, violently threatened some Ikey in the unlovely street below. Above was a pallid green. Beyond, across the river, the sun, poised on a hill-top, threw from its eternal palette shades of salmon and ochre that tinted an archipelago of slender clouds. But in the street was the music of carefree lads, playing baseball, exchanging chaste endearments. There too was the gaiety of little trulls, hasty and happy on their roller-skates. While perhaps to generalise these delights, a trundled organ tossed a ragtime. The charm was certainly affecting and that charm the horn of Paliser's approaching car merely increased.

Long since the letter had gone and, with it, another to Mrs. Yallum. In the former, Cassy had tried to gild the pill, yet without succeeding in disguising it.

Dear Daddy:

You are the best man in the world and the next best your little girl is to marry now, right away, and become Mrs. Monty Paliser. But my heart will be with you and so will Mrs. Yallum. Don't fuss with her, there's a dear, and take your medicine regularly and be ready to give me your blessing as soon as I can run in, which will be at the first possible moment, when I shall have more news, good news, better news, best of daddies, for thee.

A whirlwind of kisses,
CASSY.

Adjacently, on the upper reaches of Broadway, Ma Tamby was shopping. The sun now, gone from the river, was painting other spheres. From a corner, shadows crept. They devoured the floor, absorbed the piano, assimilated the room. They left pits where they passed. They enveloped Cassy.

Suddenly, she shivered.

She had been far away, outside of the world, in a region to which the clamouring street could not mount. Her thoughts had lifted her to a land that had the colours, clear and yet capricious, of which dreams are made. There beauty stood, and truth with beauty, and so indistinguishably that the two were one. But truth, detaching herself, showed her candid face. The shadows elongating, reached up and darkened it. The candour remained, but the candour had become terrible. Cassy saw it. She saw that the land to which she had been lifted was the land of beauty and horror. It was then she shivered.

Instantly something touched her. There was no one. The land, the beauty, the horror had faded. No longer on the heights, she was in a trivial room in Harlem. She was awake. She was absolutely alone. None the less something that was nothing, something invisible, inaudible, intangible, imperceptible, something emanating from the depths where events crouch, prepared to pounce, had touched her. She knew it, she felt it. Her impulse was to scream, to rush away. But from what? It was all imaginary. Commonsense, that can be so traitorous, told her that. Then, immediately, before the wireless from the unknown, which modern occultism calls the impact, could impel her, the room was invaded.

Ma Tamby, tramping in, switching on the lights, was exclaiming and gesticulating at her and at Paliser, who had followed and who was standing in the doorway.

"Dearie! For God's sake! The child's asleep! In all my born days I never knew the likes of that!"

Icily Cassy eyed her. "What have you there?"

"Where? What? This?" Feelingly the woman exhibited a nice, big package. "Why, the things I bought for you!"

"And do you for a moment suppose that I am going to carry a bundle?"

"Saints alive, child! Didn't you tell me——"

But now Paliser, in his cultured voice, intervened. "If I may have it?" He took it, moved to the window, leaned from it, called: "Mike! You see this? Then see too that you don't muff it."

The bundle vanished.

He turned to Cassy. "I telephoned to Dr. Grantly. He is a clergyman. It might seem uncivil to keep him waiting."

Cassy saw him at once—a starchy old man, with a white tie and little side whiskers, who lived—and would die—in a closed circle of thought.

Then again that nothing touched her, though, because of the others, more lightly, less surely. But it touched her. She was quite conscious of it, equally conscious that there was still time, that she could still desist, that she had only to say that she would not, that she had changed her mind and tell them no, right out and be hanged to them. On the strawberry of her tongue it trembled. At once before her there floated another picture, the picture of a shabby old man, without a penny in the world, or a hope save in her.

She stood up.

"Dearie, dearie, I wish you joy, I do!" the fat woman sobbed, or appeared to sob, and everything being possible, it may be that she did not sob. La joie fait peur. She had done her part. On the morrow a cheque would reach her. "Dearie, dearie!"

"Don't be a fool," Cassy frigidly threw at her.

"Will you take my arm?" Paliser asked.

"Don't be a fool either," she threw at him and bravely, head up, went on to the events that waited.

In the street below a strain overtook her. Ma Tamby was amusing herself with "Lohengrin."

XX

PALISER, alighting, turned to help Cassy. But Cassy could get out unassisted.

The gravel crunched beneath the wheels of the retreating car. From afar came the bark of a dog, caught up and repeated. Otherwise the air was still, very sweet. The house too was silent. In the hall and in the windows there were lights, but there seemed to be nobody about and that and the quiet gave her the delicious impression that the house was enchanted. It was a very nonsensical impression, but it was the nonsense that made it delicious.

Paliser was saying something, though what she did not hear. The sky now was indigo and in it hung a yellow feather. On the Hudson it had been very pale, the ghost of a feather. But, as Harlem receded, it had ridden higher and brightened in the ride. Cassy had watched it, wishing that Paliser would not talk. He had sat next to her, on the same seat, yet if the portion of it which he occupied had been in a Queensland back-block, he could not have been farther from her heart. He took her hand and she let him. He kissed her and she submitted to that. But she wondered whether courtesans do not hate the men who pay them, more than they hate themselves. Was she any better? However a priest mumbled at her, she was selling herself. Love alone is marriage. She had none, nor had he. The whole thing was abominable, and, as he held her hand and pressed her lips, her young soul rebelled. Even for her father's sake, this cup was too much.

Now though, the empty hall and the great silent house took on the atmosphere of the Palace of the White Cat. The cup became a philtre. The abomination changed into deliciousness. There are fairy-tales that are real. For all she knew, Paliser might change into Prince Charming and certainly he looked it.

He had been saying something, what she did not hear. But on the steps beneath the perron, she turned and saw that which previously she had not realised, he was extraordinarily good-looking, and about her closed a consciousness that her rowdy frock was a tissue of diamonds and that he was in doublet and hose.

A moment only. But during it something melted about her. Immediately aware of the phenomenon, she felt that she ought to freeze. She tried to and failed. The atmosphere of deliciousness prevented and, though she did not know the reason, she did know that she had failed and the fact instead of annoying, amused. Then, as she followed Paliser into the house, she told herself that she was an imbecile, that she did not know her own mind and, without transition, wondered how her father was taking it.

From the hall, they passed through a succession of rooms vacant, subdued, rich, and on into that other room where she had sung. At the farther end was a hyacinth curtain that masked a door. But near the entrance through which she had come was an ivory chair. Cassy, seating herself on it, wondered what had become of the bundle. She was sure that it held everything except what she wanted. Then suddenly behind her blue smock came a gnawing. She thought she would ask Paliser to have somebody fetch her a sandwich, two sandwiches, or else some bread and butter, but, now that she looked for him, he had gone.

She got up, crossed the room and sat down on another chair which was black, probably ebony. It had a curial appearance that suggested the senate, not the senate at Washington, but the S. P. Q. of Rome. It was quite near the hyacinth curtain and behind the latter she heard voices. Like the rooms they were subdued. She could distinguish nothing. Yet there must be a bell somewhere and she decided that if Paliser did not shortly return, she would ring. The gnawing was sharper. She was very hungry.

Again she got up and looked from a window. It gave on a garden in which there was underbush that the moon was chequering with amber spots. After all, it was a queer sort of a wedding. But what had she expected? Grace Church? St. Thomas'? Invitations a fortnight in advance, aisles banked with flowers, filled with snobs and the garbage of the Wagner score that Ma Tamby had tossed after her? Not by a long shot!

She turned. Paliser was entering. But the gnawing had nibbled away the enchantment and, as she turned, she looked rather cross.

Paliser, noticing that but mistaking the cause, said very sympathetically: "During the Terror, a princess jogged along, smelling a rose. Marriage is no worse than the guillotine, besides being much less summary. Will you come?"

"Less summary? I should say so!" Cassy retorted. "It is far too lingering."

But she followed him out into another hall, one that was hung with tapestries. They were dim and embroidered with what seemed to be pearls. On the floor was a rug, dim also, narrow, very long, that extended to a room, lined with high-placed bookcases and set with low-placed lights. In the room stood a man. He wore a long black coat and a waistcoat that reached to his collar. In his hand was a book.

"Dr. Grantly," said Paliser, who added, "Miss Cara."

Dr. Grantly bowed but without distinction. Because of the position of the lights, his face was obscured and what Cassy could discern of it she judged young and uninteresting. When Paliser had first mentioned him—and how long ago it seemed!—she had fancied him old. She had fancied too that he would have little side whiskers. The fact that he was young was not a disappointment. Clergymen, whether old or young, did not interest her. She did not care for them, or for churches, or the services in them. The ceremonial of worship seemed to her empty. Creeds professed but not practised seemed to her vain. But she would carry an injured cat for miles. A lost dog was found the moment she spotted it. She did what good she could, not because it is a duty, but for a superior reason. She liked to do it. One may be a Christian without caring for churches.

"Dearly beloved——"

In the depths over which she had passed, excitement and the novelty of it had, until then, supported her. But at that exordium, instantly, they fell away; instantly fear, like a wave, swept over her. Instantly she felt, and the feeling is by no means agreeable, that she was struggling with the intangible in a void. But she had not intended to drown, or no, that was not it, she had not wanted to marry. Aware of the depths, not until then had she known their peril. Until that moment she had not realised their menace. Then abruptly it caught and submerged her.

"I require and charge you both as ye will answer at the dreadful day of judgment——"

The solemnity of the sonorous exhortation was water in her ears. The sound of it reached her confusedly, in a jumble. She was drowning and it was unconsciously, in this condition, that poked by Paliser, she heard herself uttering the consenting words that are so irrevocable and so fluid.

It was over then—or nearly! The thought of it shook her from the mental swoon. Behind her some one spoke and she wondered who it could be. But a movement distracted her. Dr. Grantly had shifted the book from one hand to the other and as absently she followed the movement, she saw that the hand that now held the book was maimed or else malformed.

But what immediately occupied her were other words which, prompted by him, she was automatically repeating. The words are very beautiful, really exalting, they are words that spread peace as dawn spreads upon the sea. Yet, in their delivery, twice Dr. Grantly tripped and, though on each occasion he pulled himself up and went on again without embarrassment, it seemed to Cassy that he did so without dignity.

The impression, which was but momentary, drifted; another distraction intervened, her finger was being ringed. I'm done for! she despairingly thought.

"Amen!"

"Ouf!" Cassy gasped. It was really over, over at last, and still a little bewildered, she turned. The butler and the maid were leaving the room, which they must have entered when the ceremony first overwhelmed her. From the hall a slight cackle floated back.

It amused them, she generously reflected.

Paliser did not notice. He was addressing the clergyman. "Thank you very much, doctor." He turned to his bride. "Cutting your head off may have been worse, don't you think?"

If I can't be gay at least I should appear so, she told herself and desperately she laughed.

Meanwhile the man of God, relapsing into the man of the world, or of its neighbourhood, did not seem to know what to do with himself. He dropped the book, picked it up, put it on the table. Considerately, in his Oxford voice, Paliser instructed him.

"You must be going? Ah, well, I appreciate. Let me thank you again."

Dr. Grantly mumbled something, smiled at the bride, smiled at the happy man or, more exactly, he smiled at an envelope which the happy man was giving him and which, Cassy divined, contained his fee. How much? she wondered. However much or little, it was excessive.

The hall took him and the groom grappled with the bride, embracing her with that rudimentary paranoia which lawful passion comports.

She struggled free and, a bit breathless, but with the same desperate gaiety, exclaimed: "If this is matrimony, give me war!"

"Perhaps you would prefer dinner first," Paliser, with recovered calm, replied.

Wouldn't she, though! Now that she was definitely dished, hunger again bit at her and she accompanied Paliser through the dim hall, through the music-room, through the long suite, into the dining-room where, as before, three men, with white sensual faces, stood waiting.

Paliser motioned. "Mrs. Paliser will sit there. Move the other chair here." He drew a seat for her and gave additional instructions. "There will be people here to-morrow. If we are motoring, have them wait."

"What people?" asked Cassy, before whom an uncomfortable vision of her father and Ma Tamby jumped.

Paliser replied in French. "A man and a woman or two from Fifth Avenue."

I wonder where that bundle is, thought Cassy who said: "A man? What man?"

"Oh, just a clerk. That is almond soup. Do you care for it?" He looked down at his plate which appeared to engross him.

Cassy raised her spoon. "A penny for your thoughts."

He looked up. "They are worth far more. I was thinking of the night I first met you."

Cassy laughed. "And Ma Tamby's ham and eggs?"

Paliser, raising his own spoon, added: "It was Lennox who introduced us. You knew he was engaged to Miss Austen? Well, she has broken it."

Cassy must have swallowed the soup the wrong way. She coughed, lifted her napkin and saw a road, long, dark, infinitely fatiguing on which she was lost. But the soup adjusted itself, the road turned to the right. Lennox had never so much as said boo! In anger at herself she rubbed her mouth hard and put the napkin down.

Paliser, who had been tasting and sniffing at a glass, looked at the butler. "What is this? Take it away.

It is not fit for a convict." He looked over at Cassy. "I am sorry."

"One gets so bored with good wine," said Cassy, who recently had been reading Disraeli. Yet she said it absently, the unscrambled eggs about her.

But the saying was new to Paliser, to whom few things were. He relished it accordingly and the more particularly because of its fine flavour of high-bred insolence.

From where he sat, he eyed her. Although she was eating, which is never a very engaging occupation, her face had an air that was noble and reserved. At the moment, a scruple in which there was a doubt, presented itself. In view of the coming draft act, it occurred to him that he might have gone the wrong way about it. But the scruple concerned merely the expediency of the adventure. It was not related to his conscience. He had none.

Now, though, a new decanter was before him; he tried it, drank of it, judged it decent and drank again. Being decent, it was not heady. It did not affect him. Cassy had done that. In her was a bouquet which the vineyard of youth and beauty alone produces. He had hankered for it. Now, like the decanter, it was before him. He could drink his fill. Then like the other wine, he could send it away.

XXI

THE elder Paliser, seated in the hall of his town house, held a cup. In the chair, a doge had throned. On the bottom of the cup was an N topped by a crown. The cup contained hot milk.

Returning, a little before, from a drive, he had been helped up the steps, into the hall, into the chair. He had not wished to be helped farther. In the hall, the milk had been brought. As he sipped it, he looked placid, dignified, evil. He looked very much like a wicked old doge.

"When I don't move, it is remarkable how well I feel."

His son, to whom he spoke, sat in a sedan-chair which, delicately enamelled without, was as delicately upholstered within. Through the window of the chair, only the young man's face showed. If you had not known better you might have mistaken it for the face of a lady of an earlier, a politer, though not of a bloodier age. But you would have known better. The hair, powdered white, was absent; so too were the patches; so also was the rouge.

Behind the doge's chair a servant stood. Adjacently was a malachite bench. Beyond was a malachite stairway. The elder Paliser, finishing with the milk, extended the cup. The servant took it and turned. Recesses, back of the stairway, engulfed him.

Monty Paliser straightened. The movement disclosed his collar, the white of his tie.

It was the evening of the fourth day since the wedding. He had motored in to dine at the Austens'. Cassy had seen him go and had seen too uninterrupted hours in the music-room. The prospect was consoling.

But, pending the dinner and with an ample quarter of an hour to the good, he had looked in on his father whom he had found in the hall. Nothing filial had motived this looking-in. On the surface, it was a visit of circumstance such as one gentleman may pay to another. But, beneath the surface, was an object which, when the servant and the cup had gone, he approached.

"I hope Benny has not been in your way."

"Not in the least. I told him to go back to you."

"Is he still here?"

"I haven't an idea."

"You might send him to Newport."

"You want to be rid of him, eh?"

"The Place does not need three gardeners."

The old man, who seemed to be feeling about for something, scowled. "What it does not need is the atmosphere that you are giving it. You may go to the devil your own way. I sha'n't stop you. But it puts a bad taste in my mouth to have you turn it into a road-house. Damn it, sir, you were born there."

Through the window of the sedan-chair, the young man was watching. He saw it coming and masked himself.

"How funny of Benny to give you such an idea."

Then, straight at him, went the bomb.

"It was not a gift. What I got, I extracted. Why don't you marry? Eh? Why don't you? In order that you might, I made over to you a thing or two. I wish to God, I hadn't. But perhaps you are satisfied. If you are, well and good. As it is, unless you marry, I'll leave the property to Sally's brat and have him change his name. By Gad, sir, if I don't have some assurance from you and have it now, I'll send for Jeroloman. I will make a new will and I'll make it to-night. If you came here to dine, you can stop on and listen to it."

The bomb was full of fumes. In the still air they floated. But in throwing it, the old man's scowl had deepened. It had become a grimace that creased every wrinkle into prominence. His hand had gone to his chest. Gasping, he held it there. Then presently it fell. His features relaxed and dryly, in an even tone, he resumed: "It is remarkable how well I feel, if I don't talk. Any excitement suffocates me."

In the trench, that the sedan-chair had become, Monty Paliser tightened the mask. "There is no need for any excitement. I will marry. You have my word."

On the great blasoned throne, the old man shifted. The easy victory mollified him. "Ah! You dine here?"

"Thank you, no. I am dining at the Austens'."

"Where?" the elder Paliser asked. He had heard but he wanted it repeated. It seemed vaguely promising.

"At the Austens'. You may remember that the pearl of the household was engaged. It's off."

Slowly the old man twisted. "What is? The engagement?"

"So her mother told me."

"And you are dining there."

"In a few minutes."

The old man took it in, turned it over. It seemed not only victory but peace, and peace with annexation.

"Very good then. I draw the veil over your roadhouse. Put the young woman in a flat. Put her in two flats. Nobody who is anybody ever sees anything that was not intended for them. Don't beat the drum. That is all that the right people ask and all I require, except——"

He paused, considered the annexation and added: "I wish you an excellent appetite. Austen himself was a drivelling idiot and his wife used to be a rare old girl—is still, I daresay—but they came of good stock, and the daughter has looks and no brains. You couldn't do better."

He paused again, appeared to lose himself in the past, looked up and suddenly exclaimed: "You are ridiculous in that damned thing! Oblige me by getting out."

The young man extracted himself and sat down on the malachite bench. It was more exposed than the trench and the fumes of the gas bomb that his father had hurled were hazardous still. Additional protection from them was needed and he said: "What will you do about Benny?"

The old man disliked to be questioned. On the arm of his chair he beat with his fingers a quick, brief tattoo.

"Benny belongs to the Place. His father served me there. His grandfather served yours. You don't get such people nowadays."

Negligently the young man smoothed his tie. "Very picturesque and feudal. But I don't want him."

His father did not seem to hear, or to care. He was afar, wandering from it. "Ever notice that he has only one thumb? Same way with his father. Probably a family trait. I wish there were more families like 'em. This house is full of trollops and rascals. So is Newport. The house at Newport is full of rapscallions. Believe I'll offer it to the Government for a hospital. I wish to God Sally would come over and run it. Do you ever hear from her?"

The young man stood up. "Never."

"I don't doubt she is well rid of Balaguine. I've run into a baker's dozen of Russian princes. All canaille. What she wanted to marry him for, God only knows, and in saying that I exaggerate. Nice mess they have made of things there. Are you going? Oblige me by touching the bell."

The young man touched it and, while he was at it, something else. "Couldn't you oblige me by shipping Benny to Newport?"

The old man motioned. It was as though he dismissed it. "My compliments to her mother and remember that I have your word. Don't dilly-dally. Good God, sir, can't you realise that any day now you may be drafted? You've no time to lose. If I were your age, I'd enlist to-morrow. Don't stand on one foot, you make me nervous."

The son, putting on a white glove, got back at it. "I was asking you about Benny."

Again the old man shifted. "Hum! Well! Since you make a point of it. Yes. I'll send him to Newport."

"You won't forget?"

"I never forget," replied the old man, who, from that moment, forgot it utterly—until the following night when throttlingly it leaped at him.

Even if he had remembered, it could only have delayed the course of events. Benny went the next day and, in going, merely accelerated a drama which perhaps was preordered.

But now, from behind the recesses of the malachite stairway, a rascal appeared and approached and opened a bronze door, from which a young gentleman passed out and entered his car.

It was dark then, darker than convenient. There are ways that are obscure. The martyr who discovered that virtue is its own reward, died unwept, unhonoured, unsung. History does not know him. Perhaps he was an editor. But he bequeathed a valid idea.

As the car swam on, Monty Paliser was conscious of it. It would, he reflected, simplify matters very much if his father died immediately. He had no ill-feeling toward him, no good-feeling, no feeling whatever. For the property conveyed to him and otherwise bestowed, he had no gratitude. These gifts were in the nature of things. Gifts similar or cognate his father had received, as also had his grandfather, his great-grandfather and so on ab initio. They were possessions handed down and handed over for the greater glory of the House. He had therefore no gratitude for them. When the time came he would repeat the process and expect no gratitude either. Meanwhile though the gifts were adequate, there were more en route, so many that they would lift him within hailing distance of the richest men in the world. Though whether that were worth five minutes of perplexity, ten minutes of tears, a row and, possibly, your name in the papers, depended on the point of view.

In considering it, he found himself—and very much to his disgust—rememorating a moral axiom: Great wealth is a great burden. The axiom was a favourite with his father, who had sickened him with it. But on its heels always there had trod a variant. "By Gad, sir, you can say what you like, it puts you in a position to tell anybody to go to hell."

The variant had a lilt, a go, a flourish. To employ a vulgarism of the hour, it had the punch. It landed you and between the eyes. It required neither commentaries nor explanation. It was all there. It was tangible as a brickbat, self-evident as the sun.

In admiring it, the young man philosophised stoically. Did he not have enough for that already?

Yes, but later? Later might he not want to philosophise less stoically and more luxuriously? It was a problem. Meanwhile there was Cassy. He had no wish to lose her. Yet about him already was the shadow of the inevitable draft act. That was not a problem merely, it was a pit.

Meanwhile there was Cassy whom he did not wish to lose. She was delightful, delectable, delicious. Not divine though, thank heaven! The gleam in her eyes could be quite infernal. The gleam heightened a charm which in itself was fugitive. He recognised that. However delicious a dish may be, no man can feed on it always. Not he at any rate. But, for the time being, it was very appetising. For the present, it did very well. On the other hand, Margaret Austen represented a succession of courses which, in addition to being appetising, would lift him to a parity with the super-rich.

It was certainly perplexing. But it is a long turning that has no lane. He was a decent whip and a string made up of Margaret and Cassy was one that, let him alone for it, he could handle.

But now the car had stopped. Abandoning perplexity, he went on and up.

XXII

"HERE you are! Bright and late as usual!"

In her fluted voice, with her agreeable smile, Mrs. Austen greeted him. The lady was attired in a manner that left her glitteringly and splendidly bare. With her, in the cluttered drawing-room, were Margaret, Kate Schermerhorn, Poppet Bleecker, Verelst, Cantillon and Ogston.

"Will you take my daughter out?" Mrs. Austen, with that smile, continued. "Oh!" she interrupted herself to remark. "You have not congratulated Mr. Cantillon. Has no little bird told you? It's this dear child Kate. Just now—don't you think?—engagements, like lilacs, are in the air." She turned to Verelst. "Grey deceiver!"

Verelst crooked his arm. "However much I tried to deceive, I got grey before I could."

"What are you laughing at?" Mrs. Austen with her tireless smile enquired of Paliser, who, after speaking to the girls, had said something to Cantillon.

"Somersaults being a specialty of his, I was telling him that now is the time for a triple one."

Paliser turned to Margaret. She had said nothing. She was very pale. Mute, white, blonde, she was a vision.

At table, Verelst, addressing him, asked: "How is your father?"

"Thank you. Enjoying his usual poor health." He turned again to Margaret. "No one could mistake my father for an auctioneer. He has so few admirations. But he knew your father and admired him greatly."

Margaret made no reply. She was thinking of the land of Splendours and Terrors, where the princess sat in chains. Margaret envied her. Over the hill the true knight was hastening and Margaret knew, as we all know, what happened then. It is a very pretty story, but it can be equally sad to a sorrowing girl who has no true knight, or who had one, and who found that he was neither knightly nor true.

Paliser misconstrued her silence. About her eyes and mouth was an expression that is displayed by those who have suffered from some long malady or from some perilous constraint. That also he misconstrued. He had been told she had washed her hands of Lennox and had washed them with the soap of indifference, which is the most effective of all. He was not credulous but he had believed it. The idea that her throat was choked and her heart a haunt of regret, did not occur to this subtle young man. He attributed both her silence and her expression to neuralgia. The latter did not disturb him. But her loveliness did. It inundated him. The gallery of his memory was hung with fair faces. Her face exceeded them all.

The dinner proceeded. Presently, Kate Schermerhorn called over at him. "Who was the damsel I saw you making up to in the Park the other day?"

Paliser turned to her. "I have forgotten."

"I don't wonder. You seemed to have lost your head."

"Probably then because it wasn't you."

"Fiddlesticks! You looked as though you could cut your throat for her. Didn't you feel that way? I am sure you did."

"You must be thinking of Cantillon. That's the way he looks at you. If he didn't, he wouldn't have any feeling at all. One might even say he was quite heartless."

Kate was laughing. In laughing she showed her red mouth and her teeth, small, white, a trifle uneven, and, though she continued to show them, her laughter ceased. With her red mouth open, she stared. That mouth closed, opened again. She was saying something.

Everybody was exclaiming. All were hurriedly getting up.

Paliser turned to Margaret. She had gone.

Verelst now was between him and her chair. He was bending over. Bending also was Mrs. Austen. On the other side were Cantillon, Ogston and Miss Bleecker.

Then, as the surprise of it lifted Paliser, he saw that they were lifting her.

"Brandy!" said Verelst. "Tell the man."

"Permit me!" Without officiousness, without noticeable shoves, Paliser got among them and got on his knees beside the girl whom Verelst and Mrs. Austen were supporting.

Mrs. Austen wanted to wink at him. Instead, she made way. He took her place, took the girl in his arms and thought he would like to keep her there—though not, of course, forever. But he said: "The other room, perhaps."

Margaret's head was on his shoulder. She raised it. Her eyes had opened. She looked at him, at the arms that were about her. A shudder shook her. Verelst stretched a hand, Ogston another. With them, but otherwise without effort, she stood up.

Cantillon exclaimed at her. "Right as rain again! I say, Miss Austen, you did give us a start!"

Yet at once, and so endearingly, with the air of an elder sister, Mrs. Austen resumed the maternal functions. "Dearest child, you have been overdoing it!"

Kate patted the girl. "Margaret! I nearly fainted too. I was looking at you. You went over like that!"

"Sorry," said Margaret evenly. Her hands had gone to the back of her head. She dropped them and added: "If you will excuse me."

Lovingly her mother dismissed her. "The smelling-salts! You will find them somewhere." The lady looked about. "Shall we have coffee in the other room? You men can smoke there if you like, or here if you prefer."

It was quite modern. But Verelst was old, therefore old-fashioned. He preferred the dining-room. Already the girls had followed Margaret. Mrs. Austen passed out. Verelst sat down. So also did Cantillon and Ogston. But Paliser, who had nothing to say to them, accompanied Mrs. Austen.

"It never happened to her before," she told him. "Where shall you sit? Here, by me?" In speaking she made room on the sofa and with amiable suspicion eyed him. "You hadn't said anything to her, had you?"

Paliser shook his handsome head. "I wanted to."

Pleasantly she invited it. "Yes?"

"I wanted to ask her to marry me."

There he was dangling, and what a fish! The dear woman licked her chops, not vulgarly, of course, but mentally.

Paliser, who knew perfectly well what she was at, smiled tantalisingly. "It is beastly to boast, but I am an epicure."

What in the world does he mean? the dear woman wondered. But she said: "Of course you are."

Paliser, who was enjoying himself hugely, resumed:

"An epicure, you know, postpones the finest pleasures. He does so sometimes because of the enchantment of distance and again because he can't help himself. That has been my case."

It was fully a moment before Mrs. Austen got it. Then she said: "But I told you, didn't I? Mr. Lennox is dead and buried."

It was quick work. Paliser, admiring her agility, laughed. "So recently though! The immortelles have not had time to fade."

That would have made a saint swear! Not being a saint, Mrs. Austen contented herself with virtuous surprise. "But there were none! I told you that. I told you that any attraction he may have had for my child, he shocked straight out of her. Not deliberately. Dear me, I would not have you fancy such a thing for a moment. Nor would I misjudge him. I hope I am too conscientious. But such interest as the child had in him—an interest I need hardly say that was girlish and immature—he destroyed."

The picture, bold but crude, had its defects. To remedy them, Mrs. Austen applied the brush. "That singing-girl! You know whom I mean. I saw you with her the night we went to the Bazaar."

Paliser nodded. He knew indeed! He knew too that, for a moment, he had fancied that Cassy was in love with Lennox. But that idea he had long since abandoned and what she could now be doing in this galley intrigued him.

With a free hand Mrs. Austen laid on the colours. "You will hardly credit it, but we as good as caught him with her. As good or as bad. It is a matter of taste. For me it was very painful. A woman should be spared such an experience. As for Margaret, while the child certainly did not understand—how could she?

—yet, even in her innocence, she realised—well—that he is just what you said."

It was a bit thick and Paliser began to laugh.

Mrs. Austen saw that he did not believe her. The fact annoyed and in vexation she piled it on. "Afterward, in this very room, I taxed him with it and he admitted it."

What a lie! thought Paliser, who specialised in that article. But, a second thought prompting, he wondered whether it were a lie. His knowledge of Cassy refuted it. At the same time, where women are concerned, you never know. One thing, however, he did know. In his quality of expert he knew that there are statements which, whether true or false, may come in handy and, comfortably, he smiled.

"So that was the reason why the engagement was broken."

"What more would you have?" replied the candid creature, who now felt that he had swallowed it.

Quite as comfortably, Paliser returned to his muttons. "I may cease then to be an epicure?"

There was the fish again, but how to land him? The glittering fisherlady could not bind and gag the bait and drop her into his mouth. At any such attempt, the bait would pack and go, might even go without packing. Yet there was the fish, eager, willing, the gills awiggle. Barring a few gold-fish in Bradstreet, in Burke and in Lemprière, this fish was the pick of the basket. To see him glide away, and for no other earthly reason than because the bait refused to be hooked, was simply inhuman. Flesh and blood could not stand it. No, nor ingenuity either. Instantly the angler saw that in default of bait, a net may do the trick and, with the ease of a prestidigitateur, she produced one.

"You have my blessing!"

Paliser laughed and bowed. He was in it, it was where he wanted to be and he liked it. But in view of existing domestic arrangements, he was in it a bit too soon and, wriggling through a mesh, he stopped laughing and looked solemn.

"You are very good. But beforehand my father will expect to be consulted and, just at present, that is impossible. The physicians would forbid it."

"The poor dear old man! You don't mean——"

Paliser half raised a hand. The gesture was slight but expressive. One never knew!

But so much the better, thought Mrs. Austen. Pending the delay she could so bombard the bait, bombard her day in, day out, and the whole night through, that, like Liège and Namur, her resistance would crumble, and meanwhile he would come in for everything, or nearly everything, she reflected, and the reflection prompting, she affected concern.

"Has your sister been informed?"

"I cabled her to-day," said Paliser, who had done nothing of the kind.

With the same concern, Mrs. Austen lied as freely. "It is too sad for words." But at once the air of the sympathiser departed, replaced by that of the hostess. Through one door the men were entering. Through another came the girls.

Kate Schermerhorn approached. "Dear Mrs. Austen, Margaret's all right, but she has a headache." As she spoke, she threw a glance at Cantillon.

Poppet Bleecker also approached. "It is too bad, Margaret is such a dear! I would like to stop on but they tell me my maid is here. Thank you so much, dear Mrs. Austen.

The lady stood up. "But you are not all going!"

They all were though. She knew it and was glad of it. The object of the dinner was achieved and achievement, however satisfactory, is fatiguing. "You too!" she successively exclaimed at Ogston and Cantillon. "And you also!" she exclaimed at Paliser, to whom, dropping her voice, she added: "If possible, remember me to him."

As they went, Verelst surveyed her. He stood against the mantel, his back to the empty grate.

Turning she saw him. "Well, what now?"

Verelst, adjusting his glasses, said, and distantly enough: "What now? No, what next?"

Mrs. Austen sat down. "Peter, if you ever loved me, don't adopt that tone."

"It is not the tone, it is the tune and the tune is yours."

"Tune? What tune? What on earth are you talking about?"

"The tune to which the dinner was set. I heard it. Margaret heard it. It knocked her out."

She raised her eyes to him, made them pathetic. "Peter, I haven't a penny."

"You have twenty thousand a year."

"Nineteen, not a dollar more, and that is genteel poverty and there's nothing genteel in poverty now."

Verelst tugged at his moustache. "Tell me this. Is she to marry him?"

In affected surprise, she started. "How you do jump at conclusions."

Angrily he nodded. "I appear to have jumped at the correct one."

But his anger had gained her. She faced him. "Heavens and earth! What have you against him? What have you all against him? My eyes are as good as any one's. I can't see it."

"You might feel it then."

"Feel what?"

Verelst tugged again at his moustache. He had never heard of elementals and, if he had heard, he would not have believed in them. He knew nothing of auræ—which photography has captured. He was very old fogy. But he knew an honest man when he saw one and a gentleman before he opened his mouth.

"Feel what?" Mrs. Austen repeated.

Verelst, thrashing about, could not get it, but he said: "I can't describe it, but it's something. His father had it. He——"

"His father is at death's door."

"Ah! Is he? Well, I'm sorry for that. M. P. used to be no better than the law allows—and the law is very lenient."

"You were too."

"I daresay. But M. P. has got over it. Without boasting, I think I have also. But that is neither here nor there. In the old days, I have seen people shrink from him."

"Nonsense! Precious little shrinking I ever did."

"Timidity was never one of your many virtues."

"Don't be coarse, Peter, and if possible don't be stupid. If you know anything against Monty, say it. I may find it in his favour."

Impatiently Verelst motioned. "Decent men avoid him."

"And you!" Mrs. Austen retorted. "What do you call yourself? You are always civil to him."

Verelst showed his teeth. "One of the few things life has taught me is to be civil to everybody."

"Except to me. Now do sit down and make yourself uncomfortable. You have made me uncomfortable enough. Any one might think you a country parson."

But Verelst, scowling at the dial which the legs of the nymph upheld, removed his glasses. "I am going." He moved to the door, stopped, half turned, motioned again. "Tell Margaret I would rather see her in her coffin."

Angrily she started. "I'll tell her nothing of the kind."

It was his back that she addressed. She saw him go, saw too her anger go with him. The outer door had not closed before the tune of which he had spoken was dispersing it.

But was it a tune? It seemed something far rarer. In it was a whisper of waters, the lap of waves, the muffled voice of a river, which, winding from hill to sea, was pierced by a note very high, very clear, entirely limpid, a note that had in it the gaiety of a sunbeam, a note that mounted in loops of light, expanding as it mounted, until, bursting into jets of fire, it drew from the stream's deepest depths the sonority and glare of its riches.

The ripple of it ran down the spine of this woman, who at heart was a Hun and to whom the harmonies disclosed, not the mythical gleam of the Rheingold, but the real radiance of the Paliser wealth.

At the glow of it she rubbed her hands.

XXIII

IN the club window, on the following afternoon, Jones was airing copy.

"Capua must have been packed with yawns. It is the malediction of mortals to want what they lack until they get it, when they want it no more. Epicurus said that or, if he did not, Lucretius said it for him. 'Surgit amari aliquid.' But here I am running into quotations when the only ones that interest anybody are those in the Street. Conditions here are revolting. Nowhere at any time has there been a metropolis that so stank to heaven. The papers drip with stocks and scandals and over there, before the massed artillery, the troops are wheeling down to death. But wheeling is perhaps poetic. The Marne was the last battle in the grand style."

"I don't see what that has to do with Capua," said Verelst.

"Nor I," Jones replied. "But, come to think of it, there is a connection. In Capua everybody yawned their heads off. In Flanders and Champagne they are shot off. Life swings like a pendulum between boredom and pain. When the world is not anæmic, it is delirious. If ever again its pulse registers normal, sensible people will go back to Epicurus, whose existence was one long lesson in mental tranquillity. By the Lord Harry, the more I consider it, the more convinced I become that there is nothing else worth having. Niente, nada, rien. Nothing whatever."

Verelst smiled. "In that case it is hardly worth while getting excited over it." He raised the lapel of his coat. There were violets in it. He took a whiff and added: "Has Lennox been here to-day?"

But Jones did not know.

Regretfully, Verelst continued: "He goes to Mineola to-morrow and soon he will be over the top."

Jones lit a cigarette. "Assuming that he gets back, the women will be mad about him. Some of them at any rate."

Verelst rolled an enquiring eye.

"Of course they will," Jones resumed. "Times have changed precious little since Victor Hugo.

'Les belles ont le goût des héros. Le sabreur
Effroyable, trainant après lui tant d'horreur
Qu'il ferait reculer jusqu'à la sombre Hécate,
Charme la plus timide et la plus delicate.
Sur ce, battez tambours! Ce qui plait à la bouche
De la blonde aux yeux doux, c'est le baiser farouche.
La femme se fait faire avec joie un enfant,
Par l'homme qui tua, sinistre et triomphant.
Et c'est la volupté de toutes ces colombes
D'ouvrir leur lit à ceux qui font ouvrir les tombes.'

"What rhythm! What music! The score is Napoleonic but——"

"Hello!" Verelst interrupted. Before the window a car had passed. He was looking at it. On the back seat was a man in a high hat and an overcoat. "M. P.!" he exclaimed.

"What of it?" Jones asked.

Verelst removed his glasses and looked distrust-fully at them. It was as though he doubted their vision. Then, after a moment he said: "Last night I heard he was dying."

"Which," Jones remarked, "is the aim, the object and the purpose of life. But apparently he has not achieved it yet. Apparently also you are a futurist. The Napoleonic score did not interest you."

Verelst, resuming his glasses, replied: "It would not interest Lennox, if that is what you mean. He has been hit too hard."

Jones nodded. He knew all about it. It had even suggested a story, a famous story; one that was told in Babylon and has been retold ever since; the story of lovers vilely parted in the beginning and virtuously united at the end. It is a highly original story, to which anybody can give a fresh twist and Jones had planned to have the hero killed at the front and the heroine marry the villain, but only to divorce the latter before the hero—whose death had been falsely gazetted—limps in.

But Jones knew his trade. He knew that the reader always balks unless the hero gets the heroine first-hand and he had thought of making the villain an invalid. Yet at that too he knew the reader would balk. The reader is so nice-minded!

Now, the plot recurring, he said to Verelst: "Your knowledge of women has, I am sure, made you indulgent."

"Not in the least."

"But——"

"Look here," Verelst interrupted. "When I was young and consequently very experienced, I was indulgent. But monsters change you. Last night I dined with one."

"Enviable mortal!"

"You remember Abraham?" Verelst continued. "His name was Abraham—wasn't it?—that benevolent old man in the Bible who made the sacrifice of sacrificing an animal instead of his son? Well, last night it seemed to me that there are women Abrahams, only less benevolent. The altar was veiled, the knife was concealed, but the victim was there—a girl for whom, at your age, I would have died, or offered to die, which amounts to the same thing. What is more to the point, at your age, or no, for you are much older than your conversation would lead one to believe, but in my careless days I offered to die for her mother. I swore I could not live without her. That is always a mistake. It is too flattering, besides being untrue. Perhaps she so regarded it. In any event another man fared better or worse. Afterward, time and again, he said to me: 'Peter, for God's sake, run away with her.' Am I boring you?"

"Enormously."

"Well, he was very gentlemanly about it. Without making a fuss at home, he went away and died in a hospital. She was very grateful to him for that. But her gratitude waned when she came in for his money. It was adequate but not opulent, the result being that she tried to train her daughter for the great matrimonial steeplechase. Just here the plot thickens. Recently the filly shied, took the bit in her teeth and—hurrah, boys!—she was off on her own, until her mother jockied her up to a hurdle that she could not take and the filly came a cropper. But her mother was still one too many for her. She had her up in a jiffy and now she is heading her straight for the sweepstakes."

"Excuse me," Jones with affected meekness put in. "I assume that the sacrificial victim and the filly are one and the same."

"Your perspicacity does you much credit."

Jones laughed. "I have my little talents. But you! The wizardry with which you mix metaphors is beautiful. You produce a dinner-table and transform it into an altar which instantly becomes a racecourse. That is what I call genius. But to an every-day sort of chap like me, would you mind being less cryptic?"

"Can you keep a secret?"

"Yes."

"So can I."

Again Jones laughed. "Not in my neighbourhood. You were talking of Lennox and drifted from him into the Bible. Your thoughts of the one recalled studies of the other and at once you had Abraham's daughter downed on the racecourse. Well, she won't be."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because it is my business to see things before they occur. Miss Austen——"

"I never mentioned her," Verelst heatedly exclaimed. "You have no right to——"

"I admit it. But because of Lennox the whole matter has preoccupied me and quite as much, I daresay, as it has distressed you."

"I don't see at all what you have to do with it."

"Perhaps not. But preoccupation may lead to crystal-gazing. Now I will wager a red pippin that I can tell what you said at the steeplechase to the steeplestakes. You asked after his father."

Verelst stared. A man of the world and, as such, at his ease in any circumstances, none the less he was startled. "How in God's name did you get that?"

"It is very simple. Five minutes ago his father sailed by. You made a remark about him. The remark suggested a train of thought which landed you at the racecourse where you saw, or intimated that you saw, the steeplestakes. But what visible sweepstakes are there except M. P.'s son? You and M. P. are friends. It is only natural that you should ask about him."

Verelst turned uneasily. "I don't yet see how you got it. The only thing I said is that I heard he was dying."

"And five minutes ago you exclaimed at his resurrection. There is a discrepancy there that is very suggestive."

"It is none of my making then."

"It is none the less suggestive. The death-bed was invented."

"M. P. may have recovered."

"Yes, men of his age make a practice of jumping into their death-bed and then jumping out. It is good for them. It keeps them in training."

"Oh, rubbish!" Verelst resentfully exclaimed.

"No," Jones pursued. "The story was invented and the invention had a reason. If you like, you may ask what it is."

"You seem to be very good at invention yourself. I shall ask nothing of the kind."

"But you would like to know and I will tell you. It was invented to delay a possible announcement. It could have had no other object."

"I said nothing of any announcement," Verelst angrily protested. "What anouncement are you talking about?"

"The heading of the filly for the sweepstakes. The expression—very graphic by the way—is your own."

"Graphic or not I wish you would drop it. Besides——"

"Besides what?"

"Why, confound it, admitting the engagement, which I ought not to admit for it is not out yet, why should he play for delay?"

"Ha!" exclaimed Jones, whom the spectacle of Paliser and Cassy sailing up the Riverside had supplied with an impression or two. "I thought I would interest you. He played for delay because he feared that if it were known, a pitcher of ice-water might come dashing over it."

"Why do you say that?" asked Verelst, eager and anxious enough for a spoke—if spoke there could be—to shove in a certain lady's wheels.

"Given the man and the deduction is easy."

The spoke was receding. Verelst, swallowing his disappointment, retorted: "Incoherence is easy too."

"Well, you are right there," Jones, lighting another cigarette, replied. "But there is nothing incoherent in the fact that fear is magnetic. What we dread, we attract. If our winning young friend fears the pitcher, the pitcher will probably land on him. That is the reason why, to vary your various metaphors, I declared that there would be no downing on the racecourse. On the contrary and look here. I will wager you not one pippin or two pippins, I will go so far as to lay a whole basket that Miss Austen becomes Mrs. Lennox."

Verelst sniffed. "You don't know her mother."

"No. I have not that honour. But I enjoy a bowing acquaintance with logic."

"Do you, now? I wonder if it bows back. I'll book your bet."

"Very good. Make it fancy pippins."

Verelst stood up. "Fancy is the only term that could be applied them."

"And of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," Jones told himself as the old man moved away.

He looked about. The great room had filled. Stocks, money, war, the odour of alcohol, the smell of cigars, the rustling of evening papers, the sound of animated talk about nothing whatever, the usual atmosphere had reassembled itself.

From it he turned to the window, to the westering sun, to the motors, the smart gowns and the women who looked so delightful and of whom all had their secrets—secrets trivial, momentous, perverse or merely horrible.

Again he turned. Lennox, who had approached, was addressing him. "You were at the law school. I have to make a will. Will you help me?"

Serviceably Jones sprang up. "Come to my shop. It is just around the corner"

XXIV

AMONG the old brocades with which the room was fitted and which, together with the silver bed and the enamelled faïence, gave it an earlier century air, Cassy stood before a cheval-glass.

She was properly dressed. Her costume, light cloth, faintly blue, was exquisitely embroidered. Beneath it was lingerie of the kind which, it is said, may be drawn through a ring. Behind and between was Cassy, on whose docked hair sat a hat that was very unbecoming and therefore equally smart.

A moment before she had thanked and dismissed Emma. Emma was the maid. With a slant of the eye, that said and suppressed many things, Emma had gone.

Through the open windows came the call of birds, the smell of fresh turf. A patch of sky was visible. It was tenderly blue. There was a patch too of grass that showed an asparagus green.

From the mirror Cassy went to a table and, from a jade platter, took a ring. It was made of six little hoops each set with small stones. She put it on. The platter held other rings. There was a sapphire, inch-long, deep and dark. She put that on. There was also an Australian opal and an Asian emerald, the latter greener than the grass. She put these on. Together with the wedding-ring they made quite a show. Too much of a show, she thought.

Like the costume, the hat, like other costumes, more hats and box after box of lingerie, they had all surprisingly dumped themselves, there, at her feet, the day after the wedding. The bundle, which she had brought with her, she had found very useless and so awkward that she would have given it to Emma, had it not seemed unsuited to a young person manifestly so fine. Since then it had been tucked away in a cupboard, safely out of sight.

That was just five days ago, a brief eternity, during which life seemed to be driving her headlong to some unimagined goal. Until the evening previous she had had barely a moment. But on that evening, Paliser, who was dining at the Austens', had given her a few hours to herself.

Now, on this afternoon, he was again in town.

The air was very still. Afar, a train bellowed, rumbled, died away. From the garage came the bark of a dog, caught up and repeated on the hillside beyond. On the lawn, a man in an apron was at work. Otherwise the air was still, fragant, freighted with spring.

Cassy, turning from the table, went to the mirror again and tilted the hat. However unbecoming, it was certainly smart, and Cassy wondered what her father would think of Mrs. Monty Paliser.

In the spaciousness of the name, momentarily she lost herself. It is appalling to be a snob. But there are attributes that pour balm all over you. In the deference of the bored yet gracious young women who, with robes et manteaux, had come all the way from Fifth Avenue, there had been a flagon or two of that balm. In the invariable "Thank you, mem's" of the Paliser personnel there had been more. It is appalling to be a snob. There are perfumes that appeal.

Then also, particularly after Harlem, the great, grave, silent house had a charm that was enveloping, almost enchanted. Apparently uncommanded, it ran itself, noiselessly, in ordered grooves. Cassy fancied that somewhere about there must be a majordomo who competently saw to everything and kept out of the way. But she did not know. In her own rooms she was now at home, as she was also at home in the state chambers on the floor below. In regard to the latter, she had an idea—entirely correct, by the way—that at Lisbon, the royal palace—when there was one—could not have been more suave. But the rest of the house was as yet unexplored, though in regard to the upper storey she had another idea, that there was a room there close-barred, packed with coffins.

The idea delighted her. In this Palace of the White Cat it was the note macabre, the proper note, the note that synchronised the circumambient enchantments. In the historical nights of which Perrault told, the princess had but a gesture to make, the offender sank dead. At once a bier was produced, the corpse was hurried away, and the veils of charm restored fell languorously.

Yet, in that historical epoch, there subsisted—perhaps as a reminder of the vanities even of fairyland—the rose-leaf suggestively crumpled. The crumple affected Cassy but far less than she had expected. Paliser had been very gentlemanly. He had deferred to her in all things, agreed with her about everything, and though none the less he always had his own way, yet the pedestal was so obvious that if she had not known otherwise she might have thought herself continuously upon it.

The crumple was not there, or at least only such crumple as she had naturally awaited. The discomfort of the leaf consisted in the fact that married she was not mated, that she did not love him, and probably never could.

Now, as she tilted her hat, the spaciousness of the name recurred to her. Its potentialities she had considered before she accepted it, but only because of her father. The idea that it would lift him out of the walk-up, out of Harlem and cold veal, was the one excuse for her voyage to Cytherea. The voyage had been eminently respectable. Undertaken with full ecclesiastical sanction, Aphrodite and her free airs had had nothing to do with it. None the less it was to Cytherea that she had gone—and to Lampsacus also, for all she and her geography knew to the contrary.

Now, though, in tilting her hat, the disreputable beauty of the land was forgotten. She was in another and a fairer realm. A modern garden of the Hesperides lay about her. She saw herself distributing the golden fruit. The mirror showed her a red-crossed Lady Bountiful in an ambulance, in two ambulances, in a herd of ambulances, at the front. There was no end to the golden fruit, no end to his father's money, no end to the good he might allow her to do.

The picture so delighted her that she flushed and in the emotion of it two tears sprang to her eyes that were not of the crying kind.

She dried them, telling herself that if he framed the picture, she could love him, and she would.

It would be all so perfect, not the loving, but the giving, the joy of giving, the joy of always giving, of giving with both hands, of just shovelling it out and keeping at it, of never saying "No," of saying, "Yes, and here is more and here is more," of saying, too, "Don't thank me, it is for me to thank you." What joy ever was there, or ever will be, that can compare to that!

Why, I'm crazy, she thought, and thought also, he never will but he might, he could and if he should——

Then at once the Paliser of the Savile Row clothes and the St. James's Street boots, the Paliser of the looking-glass hair and the Oxford voice, assumed the hue and stature of a deva. Love him! It would be something higher. It would be worship!

She made a face. It was sheer nonsense. He had an allowance which, obviously, was very liberal and with which he was liberal enough. Unlike many rich men he was not close. But to fancy him beneficent was laughable. Cassy could not imagine him in the rôle of Lord Bountiful. Then too there was something queer about him. He hated to be alone. There are people who kill silence and he was one of them. He was always talking. Cassy could not understand it. To be silent with any one procures an intimacy which talk cannot supply. Moreover solitude was as necessary to her and as refreshing as her bath. Silence and solitude he could not endure. She tilted her nose and went to the window.

That night they were to go to the opera. But in a moment she was to motor in and see her father. Since she put Harlem behind her, she had wondered and worried about him. The condition of his heart was hazardous and she had been told that any excitement might be fatal. She had worried over that, over his sudden rages at tradespeople, and she had been fearful lest Mrs. Yallum, the janitress, who spoke no known tongue, had, instead of being of use, only enraged him further.

She would see to it, though. It was for that she was going in. As yet she had no money. But there were the rings and one more or one less, what did it matter? Of the lot she preferred the string of hoops. It was quaint, there was nothing philistine about it and probably it had not cost so very much. The emerald was different. It was a stone that would please any woman with plenty of money and a modicum of taste. Probably it had cost a thousand on Fifth Avenue, in which case it would fetch a hundred on Broadway. Or if not, then the sapphire would. Either or both she would hock very willingly. But not the hoop-ring and not the opal, unless she had to, and if Paliser, who apparently noticed nothing and saw everything, asked concerning them, why then she would out with it. Her father was a beggar! Did he expect her to let him starve? But what on earth do you suppose I married you for? For yourself? Take a walk. I sold myself for bread—and butter, and you can fork them over.

At the possibility of any such conversation—and of such language!—she flushed afresh and again called herself a fool. There could be no such conversation. Paliser would never question. He was too indifferent. The consciousness comforted, precisely as, a moment before, the picture of herself shovelling gold had moved her to tears.

Then absently she found herself looking in the garden where the aproned man was at work. But it was Lennox that she saw. Again and again since the wedding-evening, when Paliser had told her of the unscrambled eggs, she had wondered about the broken engagement. On that evening she had felt that she had taken the wrong road and had lost her way. The feeling was momentary. If Lennox had never been engaged, the result would have been the same. Not once had he so much as said boo! He had not even looked it. At table, on the wedding-evening, the unscrambled eggs had not tasted very good, but reflection had salted them and since then, in reviewing the matter, it had occurred to her that it was none of her business.

Now as she looked out on the garden she wondered whether he had cared very greatly for this girl, for if he had, what then did she mean by throwing over a man who was too good for her, too good for anybody?

She sighed and absently looked again at the gardener. He was bending down, occupied in planting something. Since she had first noticed him he had half-circled a parterre and she was about to telephone and ask if the car were ready when he straightened, turned, extracted a pipe and attempted to light it.

The air was very still, there was no breeze, but the match was ineffective. On his trousers, with a backward movement, he struck another match and raised it to the bowl. The flame, faintly blue, mounted and, with it, a curl of smoke. But it was not Cassy or, more exactly, it was not her objective self, that saw it. It was her subjective self that registered and afterward reproduced that momentary and entirely commonplace incident. What the objective Cassy saw was not the flame or the smoke or the pipe, but the hand that held the match. It was thumbless. Many hands are. From the hand she looked at the man's face and gave a little scream, instantly suppressed.

But her mouth twitched, she tried to swallow and she experienced, what was new to her, an odd sensation in the epiglottis. She did not remember that she had ever been what is called sick at the stomach, none the less she realised that she was on the point of becoming so. Like the little scream, she choked it back. But the immanence of nausea stifled her, and she sat down on a brocade-covered chair.

Her hand had gone to her throat and though almost at once the sensation subsided, she held it there. The gold bands of the rings that were pressed against her throat cooled it, but the palm of the hand was wet. Unconscious of that, she was unaware that she could not think. A crack on the head makes you dizzy and into her dizziness a somnolence had entered. The somnolence dulled all the cells of the brain save one and that one cell, vehemently active, was inciting her to some effort, though to what she did not know.

"I must get up," she presently told herself and told it once more.

In the repetition of the words there was the effect of a spray. The irritability of the one active cell subsided, that of the others was aroused. Somnanbulism ceased. The entire brain awoke. But the truth had not yet fully permeated all the cerebral convolutions and the fact that it had not, manifested itself in the melodramatic phrase which, a week previous, Lennox had uttered, which all have uttered, all at least before whom the unforseen has sprung.

"It is impossible!"

She got up, went to the window, looked again. There was no impossibility there, no doubt even, or the peradventure of one. There was only the ineluctable truth. The aproned man disclosed it. His thumbless hand had held the book. From his mouth, in which there was a pipe, had come the benediction. He was Dr. Grantly. That was the ineluctable truth, the truth which already perhaps she had intercepted in the land of Beauty and Horror.

The first sight of it had sickened. Now the physical effect had gone. But the nausea in passing had been replaced by another sensation, deadlier, equally human, that made her red and hot, blurred her eyes, set her quivering, shook her, put her thoughts on fire, vitriolised her with hate.

Nietzsche said that a woman's ability to hate is in proportion to her inability to charm. The brute omitted to add that a woman's ability to charm corresponds to her evolution.

There was nothing evolved about Cassy then. She had lapsed back into the primitive. Like Armide, she could have burned the palace that enchanted her. None the less, she did nothing. To do nothing may be very important. The inactivity saved her. During it, the vitriol vaporised; the hate fell by. She was still trembling, her hands were unsteady, but the fever was departing, the crisis had passed, the primitive had slunk back into the cellars of the subconscious, and, in the chair, to which without knowing it she had returned, she faced it.

Without, some one knocked and, getting no answer, accepted the invitation as most people do.

"Beg pardon, Mrs. Paliser. The car is at the door."

Cassy half turned. "What?"

Emma reconstructed it. "Whenever you are ready, mem, the car will be waiting."

Cassy turned away. "That will do."

"Thank you, mem."

With that air which servants assume, Emma pursed her lips, reopened them, thought better of it, closed them and closed too the door.

Facing it still, Cassy sat in the brocaded chair. Anger had shaken her and gone, taking with it its spawn which hatred is. What inhabited her then was disgust.

I am in a nice mess, she told herself. But she told it without surprise, as though all along it was something which she might have known, could have avoided, but into which she had put her foot. A momentary vision of the red-crossed Lady Bountiful returned and she even smiled at it. It was a sad little smile though.

Abstractedly, she had been turning and twisting the rings. The motion aroused her. It drew her attention to them. They also had something to say. Something which they had been saying ever since the smoke curled from the pipe. She had not heard it then. There had been too many things tumbling about her. But now she did hear. She took them off, stood up and dropped them on the table where they fell between gold-backed brushes and a vase, gorgeous in delicacy, the colour of ox-blood.

From a cupboard she took the rowdy frock, the tam, the basilica underwear and, for a moment, searched and searched vainly for a pair of stockings. In hunting for them she unearthed the bundle, and that together with the other things, she threw on the bed, which was not brocaded, or even daised. It was silver. A few days before, when she had first seen it, she had clapped her hands. The vase too she had applauded. Now the lovely room, that had seemed so lovely, a curl of smoke had turned into a lupanar.

Quickly, one after another, the modish hat, the delicious frock, the things that could be drawn through a ring, were removed and replaced. In the mirror she looked, stopped, looked again, adjusted the tam and was going to the bed for the bundle when she heard a horn. Head-drawn, she listened.

She would have so much preferred to leave without seeing him or speaking to him. If she could, she would have gone without a word, silently, in the only dignified manner that was possible. But, apparently, matters had arranged themselves otherwise. She went to the bed, took the bundle, moved back to the table and waited.

She did not wait long. Paliser, with the pretence of a knock and a smile on his lips walked in—but not far. That frock, that bundle, the sight of her there, sufficed. He knew. With an awkwardness that was unusual with him, he closed the door and twisted his hat. The smile had gone from his lips. They were dry.

Then as he looked at her and she looked at him—and with what a look!—words seemed such poor things. It was as though already everything had been said, as perhaps in the silent temples of their being, everything, accusations, recriminations, all the futilities of speech had been uttered, impotently, a moment since. A moment earlier she had said her say. As he looked at her he knew that she had and knew too, that before he entered the room, already she had heard his replies.

The consciousness of this, equally shared by both, was so intense that, for a second, Cassy felt that everything happening then had happened ages ago, that she was taking part in a drama rehearsed on a stage that memory cannot reconstruct but which stood, and, it may be, still stands, back of those doors that close behind our birth.

The hallucination, if it be one, and which, given certain crises of the emotions, is common enough, vanished abruptly as it had come. But two seconds had gone since Paliser entered the room, yet, in those seconds, both recognised that eternity had begun between them.

With his hat, a hat studiously selected, made to order, Paliser motioned and with the same studiousness, selecting a platitude, he produced it. "I was going to take you out."

"After taking me in," Cassy in reviewing the situation subsequently commented. But at the time she said nothing. She merely looked. Her rage was gone, her anger spent. Only disgust remained. It was that which her face expressed. It was withering.

Paliser, steadying himself and, as was perhaps only natural, hedging still, resumed: "But apparently you have other intentions."

What a cad that blackguard is! thought Cassy who still said nothing.

"May I ask what they are?"

Cassy threw up her chin. "My intentions are to leave——"

"But why?"

"Don't presume to interrupt me. My intentions are to leave your assignation-house and have you horsewhipped."

Paliser had been served with strong drink before, but none ever as strong as that. It steadied him. He had expected that when it got to her, as eventually it must, there would be the passionate upbraidings, the burst of sobs, the Oh! Oh's!, the What will become of me?, the usual run up and down the scale and the usual remedies which a bank account supplies. He had expected all that. He had prescribed for it often. There was not a symptom for which he did not know the proper dose and just when to administer it. But barely had he crossed the threshold before he realised that all his science would be in default.

Cassy presented an entirely new case, but, fortunately, in the drink which she had served, he saw or thought he saw how to treat it.

He gestured again. "I never cared for scenes. But this house, which it has pleased you to describe from your knowledge of other establishments, is——"

Whatever he may have intended to add, was interrupted. Cassy, previously inexorable as fate, but converted then into a fury, dropped the bundle and caught up the vase. Missing him, it hit the door, where musically it crashed and shattered.

He turned, looked at it, looked at her, at the table. Barring the gold-backed brushes, the jade platter and that bundle, there was nothing that she could conveniently shy, and, in his Oxford voice, but civilly enough, he gave it to her.

"Allow me. There is no necessity whatever for your acting in this manner. The situation, such as it is, it had been my intention to remedy. It had been my intention, I say. But yesterday it came to my knowledge that it is because of your relations with Lennox that his engagement is broken."

Take that, he mentally added and continued aloud: "I might not have believed the story, but I was told that Lennox admitted it." Take that, too, he mentally resumed. I shall be treated to tears in a minute and in no time it will be "Kamerad!"

Sidewise he looked at the ruin of the vase, on which Daughters of Heaven and an ablated dynasty may have warmed their eyes. It affronted his own. Insult, yes, that could be tossed about, but not art, not at least the relatively unique.

With a crease in his lips which now were dry no longer, he looked at Cassy. The awaited tears were not yet visible. But the blood-madness that had seized her, must have let her go, routed, as hæmatomania may be, by the trivial and, in this instance, by a lie. That lie suffocated her. It was as though, suddenly, she had been garroted.

The condition was only momentary, but, during it, a curtain fell on this vulgar drama, which was to affect so many lives. Before the girl a panorama passed. She saw herself leaving Lennox' rooms. She saw Margaret Austen, saw the woman with her, saw the former's candid eyes; saw the latter's ridiculous airs, saw the construction which between them they had reached and saw, too, the consequences that had resulted. The dirt with which she had been besplattered she did not see. The panorama did not display it. What it alone revealed was Lennox' disaster. Of herself she did not think and regarding Margaret she did not care. That which occupied her was Lennox.

But was it true? In Paliser nothing was true, not even his lies. For it was unaccountable that a matter so simple could not have been cleared with a word. But it was not unaccountable at all. It was obvious. Margaret, a born snob, had given Lennox no chance for that word. Some one, Paliser probably, had invented the admission and she had refused to see him, after condemning him unheard.

I will attend to that, Cassy decided.

At once the suffocation ceased, the panorama sank, the scene shifted, the curtain parted, the drama proceeded and she found herself staring at Paliser, who was staring at her.

"As it is——" he tentatively resumed and would have said more, a lot, anything to coerce the tears to her eyes and with them surrender.

She gave him no chance. She took the bundle and, before he could continue, she passed him, opened the door, slammed it with a din that had in it the clatter of muskets, went down the stair and out to the perron, before which stood a car.

"The station!" she threw at the mechanician.

The house now, jarred a moment earlier by the crash of porcelain and the slamming door, had recovered its silence.

From within, Emma, very agreeably intrigued, a footman with a white sensual face beside her, looked out with slanting eyes.

XXV

HARRIS, wrinkled as a sweetbread and thin as an umbrella, blinked at Cassy. "Mr. Lennox is out, mem."

"Then go and fetch him."

Past the servant, Cassy forced her way through the vestibule, into the sitting-room, where the usual gloom abided, but where, unusually, were a smell of camphor, two overcoats, two trunks and a bag.

Cassy, putting down the bundle, exclaimed at them. "He is not leaving town?"

"Yes, mem, to-morrow morning, for Mineola." He spoke grudgingly, looking as he spoke like a little old mule at bay.

Cassy, noticing that, said: "See here, I don't mean to bully you, but it is most important that I should see Mr. Lennox—important for him, do you hear?"

"I hear you, mem, but I don't know where he is."

"Then find out. There must be a telephone."

Harris scratched his head but otherwise he did nothing.

"Come!" Cassy told him. "Hurry!"

Harris shifted. "I don't know as how he'd like it. He's been that upset these last few days. I——" He hesitated. Visibly an idea had visited him with which he was grappling. "You're not from Miss Austen, now, are you?"

Cassy caught at it. To confirm it would be fanciful.

To deny it would be extravagant. Choosing an in-between for the benefit of this servant whom she knew to be English, she produced it.

"I am the Viscountess of Casa-Evora."

Harris wiped his mouth. A viscountess who had come only the other day with a bundle, and who now forced her way in with another bundle, did not coincide with such knowledge as he had of the nobility. But she was certainly overbearing enough to be anybody.

He turned. "Very good, your ladyship, I'll telephone."

Don't ladyship me, Cassy was about to reply, but judging that impolitic, she sat down.

On the train in she had debated whether she would go first to Harlem or to Lennox and in either case what afterward she should do. She had a few dollars which her father would need. The thought of these assets reminded her that in changing her clothes she had omitted to change back into her own stockings. Well, when she changed again she would return the pair which she had on and, as she determined on that, she saw Paliser's face as she had seen it when she threw the vase. That relapse into the primitive shamed her. She had behaved like a fish-wife. But though she regretted the violence, she regretted even more deeply the vase. The destruction of art is so despicably Hun! For moxa, she evoked the Grantly masquerade.

The entire lack of art in that seemed to her incongruous with the surface Paliser whom she had known. But had she even known the surface which itself was a mask? Yet behind the mask was an intelligence which at least was not ordinary, yet which, none the less, had descended to that! She could not understand it. She could not understand, what some one later explained to her, that a high order of intellect does not of itself prevent a man from soiling it and, with it, himself and his hands. The explanation came later, when other matters were occupying her and when Paliser, headlined in the papers, was dead.

Meanwhile the train had landed her in the Grand Central and she decided to go to Lennox first.

Now as she sat in his sitting-room where, for all she knew, she might have to sit for hours, it comforted her to think that she had so decided. If she had put it off until the morrow, Lennox would, by then, have gone to the aviation-field, where he might be killed before she could patch things up. At thought of that, she wondered whether he might not stay out undiscoverably all night and send for his things to be fetched to the station.

But in that case, Cassy promptly reflected, I'll go to her, pull her out of bed, drag her there—and no thanks either. I didn't do it for you, I did it for him. He's too good for you.

On the mantel, a clock struck, while thinly, through a lateral entrance, Harris emerged.

"The hall-porter at Mr. Lennox' club says he's just gone out with Mr. Jones. Yes, ma'am."

"Mr. Jones! What Mr. Jones? The novelist?"

"I'm thinking so, ma'am. A very haffable gentleman."

"Try to get him. Ask if Mr. Lennox is there. Or, no, I'll do the talking."

Then presently she was doing it, collaborating rather in the dialogue that ensued.

"Mr. Jones?"

"Yes, darling."

Cassy, swallowing it, resumed: "Mr. Jones, forgive a stranger for intruding, I——"

"Beautiful voice, forgive me. Triple brute that I am, I thought it was my aunt."

"Then let me introduce myself. This is Miss Cara."

"Casta diva! You do me infinite honour!"

"Mr. Jones, I must see Mr. Lennox. It is a matter of life and death."

"Lennox is engaged with death now."

"What!"

"He is preparing for the great adventure. At this moment he is making his will. Miss Cara?"

"Yes?"

"Lennox takes even serious matters gravely."

"But he is with you?"

"In my workshop and at your service as I am."

"You will let me come there?"

"Enthusiastically and yet with all humility for I have no red carpet to run down the stair."

"Then hold on to him, please."

Ouf! sighed Cassy, as she hung it up. Another man who might be Mrs. Yallum's husband! She took the telephone-book, found and memorised the address and turned to Harris. "Thank you very much. Will you mind giving me that package?"

"Beg pardon, ma'am," the little man said, as he opened the door for her. "There's nothing more amiss, is there?"

Cassy covered him with her lovely eyes. "When Mr. Lennox comes back here, he may tell you to unpack."

"Then may God bless your ladyship."

Cassy went on.

At Jones' shop, a floor in a reconstructed private house, a man who had the air of performing a feat, showed her into a room that was summarily, but not spartanly, furnished. On one side was a bookcase supported by caryatides. Above, hung a stretch of silk on which was a flight of dragons. Above the silk was an ivory mask. Fronting the bookcase was the biggest table that Cassy had ever seen.

Jones, vacating the table, advanced to greet her. Perched on his shoulder, was a cat that peered at her. It had long hair, the colour of smoke; a bushy tail; the eyes of an angel and a ferocious moustache.

Although Cassy had other matters in hand, she exclaimed at it. "What a duck!"

Jones, who saw, and at once, that she had not come to ask the time of day, exclaimed also: "Yes, but ducky is as ducky does. That cat talks in her sleep."

But now Lennox, advancing too, had taken her hand.

Withdrawing it, she put the bundle on the table, on which were papers, and, noticeably, a dagger, brilliant, wicked, thin as a shadow. On the blade was a promise—Penetrabo.

She looked up. Jones and the cat had gone. She looked at Lennox. "I don't know where to begin."

Lennox could not tell her. On learning that she wanted to see him, he had supposed it was about her father and he had said as much to Jones. But in greeting her, the novelist knew from her vibrations that whatever her object might be, at least it was not ordinary. Then, taking the cat, he had gone.

Now, though, Cassy was at it. "The day you loaned me a hundred, you remember? As I went out I had the money in my hand. In the hall was Miss Austen. You had just shown me her picture. I recognised her at once. With her was a woman, thin-faced, thin-lipped, thin-minded. She saw me, saw the money, gave me a look. I did not forget it. But it is only to-day that I learned what it meant. It meant that I am no better than I ought to be—or you either."

Lennox had one hand on the table. He raised the other. "Who told you this?"

"Paliser. He said it was the reason your engagement was broken."

In the palm of the upraised hand, the fingers moved forward and back, regularly, methodically, mechanically. Lennox was unaware of it. He was unaware of anything except the monstrous perversity of the tale.

"I came directly from him to your rooms. Your man said you were going away. Thank goodness, I am not too late."

Cassy had seated herself, but now, reaching for the bundle, she stood up. Across the street, in the house opposite, a boy was lowering a shade. It seemed to Cassy that she had raised one. But there are explanations that explain nothing. To Lennox there was a shade suspended before Margaret, who had judged him unheard. It obscured her. He could not see her at all.

Over the way, the boy lowered a second shade and Cassy, as though prompted by it, raised another. "Paliser said you admitted it."

From the obscurity Lennox turned, but it was still about him. "Admitted what?"

Cassy reddened. "What I told you."

With the movement of the head that a bull has when he is going for you, Lennox bent his own. The movement, which was involuntary, was momentary. The shade had lifted. He saw Margaret, but behind her he saw others holding her back, telling her he was not fit to be spoken to. He was going for them. Meanwhile he had forgotten Cassy. He looked up, saw her, remembered the part attributed to her in the story and struck the table.

"It is damnable that such a thing should be said of you."

"Oh," Cassy put in. "It was not at all on my account that I told you. I——" She stopped short. The promised horsewhipping occurred to her.

Lennox took up the knife, gave it a turn, shoved it away. It was very much as though he had twisted it in somebody's gizzards. The idea had come to him that Paliser had concocted the admission. But, as he was unable to conceive what his object could be, he dismissed it. None the less, for what the man had said, he deserved to be booted down the club steps.

Cassy had stopped short. The story behind the story did not concern Lennox, yet as he might wonder how Paliser had ventured with her on such a subject, she began at it again.

"We were married recently, or anyway I thought so. To-day I discovered that the ceremony was bogus. Then I told him a thing or two and he told me that."

Lennox stared. Angry already, angry ever since the rupture, angry with that intensity of anger which only those who love—or who think they do—and who are thwarted in it ever know, and all the angrier because he had no one and could have no one to vent it on, until he got to the front and got at the Huns, at that last fillip from Cassy he saw some one on whom he could vent it, and yet to whom none the less he felt strangely grateful. For, whatever Paliser had done or omitted, at any rate, he had completely clarified the situation.

"I must run," said Cassy. "But you can tell Miss Austen, can't you?"

Lennox, controlling himself, motioned. "Would you mind repeating this to Jones?"

Cassy's eyebrows arched themselves. "It was hard enough to tell you. Were it not for your engagement, I wouldn't have said anything. When dreadful things happen to a girl, people always think that she must be dreadful herself. Isn't that nice of them? I——"

"See here," Lennox interrupted, "you can't leave it like this. Something has got to be done. I can give Paliser a hiding and I will. But that isn't enough. I don't know whether a criminal action will lie, but I do know that you can get damages and heavy ones."

Cassy's lovely eyes searched the room. "Who was that speaking? It wasn't you, was it?"

Lennox, recognising the rebuke, acknowledged it. "Forgive me. I forgot whom I was addressing. Jones will be less stupid. Let us have him in."

But when Jones, immediately requisitioned, appeared, Cassy again putting down her bundle, protested. "Mr. Lennox regards me as an Ariadne and expects me to act like a young lady in a department-store. Either rôle is too up-stage."

Jones, taken with her mobile mouth, her lovely eyes, the oval of her handsome face, said lightly: "It seems to me that you might assume any part."

Lennox struck out. "Paliser hocuspocused her with a fake marriage. He——"

"Oh," Cassy gently put in, "I have no one to blame but myself. I ought to have known better."

Jones nodded. "Probably you did know. The misadventure is rare of which we are not warned in advance. We cannot see the future but the future sees us. It sends us messages which we call premonitions."

Instantly Cassy was back in the Tamburini's room, where she had seen both beauty and horror. She had not reached the latter yet and the sudden vision Lennox dissipated.

"Stuff and nonsense! Haven't you anything else to say?"

Amiably Jones turned to him. "I can say that no one is wise on an empty stomach." He turned to Cassy. "The Splendor is not far. Will you dine with us, Mrs. Paliser?"

Violently Lennox repeated it; "Mrs. Paliser! Miss Cara is no more Mrs. Paliser than you are."

"To err is highly literary," Jones with great meekness replied. "I hear that it is even human."

Cassy reached again for the bundle. "It is only natural. If I had been told in advance, I could not have believed it. I could not have believed that mock marriages occur anywhere except in cheap fiction. But we live and unlearn. Now I must run."

Lennox took her hand. "I owe you a debt. Count on me."

He spoke gravely and the gravity of it, the force that he exhaled, comforted Cassy's bruised little heart and the comfort, the first that she had had, made her lip twitch. None of that, though! Reacting she rallied and smiled.

"Good-bye—and good luck!"

Jones saw her to the door, followed her out, followed her down to the street, where for a moment he detained her.

"Just a word, if you don't mind. You have been abominably treated and you seek no revenge. That is very fine. You have been abominably treated and you bear no malice. That is superior. You have been abominably treated and you accept it with a smile. That is alchemy. It is only a noble nature that can extract the beautiful from the base. Where do you live?"

At the change of key Cassy laughed but she told him. "Good-bye," she added. "My love to your cat."

She passed on into the sunset. The bundle seemed heavy now, but her heart was lighter. She had got it off, Lennox knew, presently a young woman would be informed and though she could not be expected to dance at the wedding, yet, after all——

The Park took her.

XXVI

WHEN Cassy had gone, Jones went back to his rooms. He went absently, his mind not on her story, which was old as the Palisades, but on a situation, entirely new, which it had suggested.

"Nice girl," he remarked as he re-entered the workshop. "Suppose we go and have dinner."

Sombrely Lennox looked up. At the table where he sat, he had been fingering some papers. He threw them down.

"I am going to have a word with Paliser."

Jones cocked an eye at him. "See here, you are not a knight-errant. The age of chivalry is over." The novelist paused and exclaimed: "What am I saying! The age of chivalry is not over. It can't be. Last night, Verelst dined with a monster!"

Lennox pushed at the papers. "If I were alone concerned, I would thank Paliser. He has done me a good turn. He has set me straight."

Then, to the listening novelist, who later found the story very useful, Lennox repeated Cassy's version of the rhyme and reason of the broken engagement.

The tale of it concluded, Lennox flicked at a speck. "I am grateful to Paliser for that, but for the manner in which he treated her, I shall have a word with him. Just one."

Jones sat down. "A word, eh? Well, why not? Flipping a man in the face with a glove was fashionable in the days of Charles II. Tweaking the nose was Georgian. The horsewhip went out with Victoria. Posting your man was always rather coffee-house and a rough-and-tumble very hooligan. If I were you, which I am not, but if I were, I would adopt contemporaneous methods. To-day we just sit about and backbite. That is progress. Let me commend it to you."

With a wide movement, Lennox swept the papers, shoved them into a pocket and stood up.

Jones also stood up. "Got an appetite? Well, dining has the great disadvantage of taking it away. Come along."

Lennox put on his hat. "I am going first to Park Avenue."

No you're not, thought Jones, who, with an agility which for him was phenomenal, hurried to the door and backed against it.

Lennox motioned him aside.

Jones, without budging, lied. "They're out of town." It was very imbecile. He knew it was, knew, too, that Lennox knew it, and, for the imbecile lie, he substituted another. "I mean they are dining out."

"What the devil are you driving at?" Lennox asked, and not very civilly either.

"A windmill, I suppose. You look like one. I——"

Jones broke off. The expression on Lennox' face arrested him. The attempt at interference, the stupid evasions, the conviction which these things produced, that there was something behind them, something secreted, something about Margaret that Jones knew and which he was concealing, made him livid.

"Out with it."

Jones looked at him, looked away, adjusted his neckcloth, vacated the door, crossed the room and sat down. He did not know to what saint to vow himself. But realising that it was all very useless, that everything is, except such solicitude as one pilgrim may show to another, and that, anyway, Lennox would soon hear it, he gave it to him.

"She is engaged to Paliser."

Lennox, who was approaching, stopped short. "Miss Austen is?"

Jones nodded.

"To Paliser?"

But it seemed too rough and, to take the edge off, Jones added. "It may not be true."

"How did you hear?"

"Verelst told me. He dined there last night."

Lennox turned on his heel. Futilely in that hell to which one may look back and see that it was not hell but purgatory prior to paradise, futilely there he had sought the reason of his damnation. A few minutes before he had thought that Cassy's story revealed it. In the light of it he had seen himself condemned, as many another has been, for crimes which he had not committed. But he had seen, too, the order of release. He had only a word to say. He was going to Park Avenue to say it.

When Jones was below with Cassy so he had thought and not without gratitude to Paliser either. If the cad had held his tongue, enlightenment might have been withheld until to his spirit, freed perhaps in Flanders, had come the revelation. Personally he was therefore grateful to Paliser. But vicariously he was bitter. For his treatment of that girl, punishment should follow.

That girl! Obscurely, in the laboratory of the senses where, without our knowledge, often against our will, our impulses are dictated, a process, intricate and interesting, which Stendhal called crystallisation, was at work.

Unaware of that, conscious only of the moment, to his face had come the look and menace of the wolf.

Now——!

"There is a book over there," Jones, who was watching him, cut in. "It is Seneca's 'De animæ tranquilitate.' Take a peek at it. It will tell you, what it has told me, that whatever happens, happens because it had to happen and because it could not happen otherwise. There is no sounder lesson in mental tranquillity."

But for all Lennox heard of that he might then have been dead. Without knowing what he was doing, he sat down. Paliser, Margaret! Margaret, Paliser! Before him, on encephalic films, their forms and faces moved as clearly as though both were in the room. He saw them approaching, saw them embrace. The obsession of jealousy that creates the image, projected it. He closed his eyes, covered his face with his hands. The image got behind them. It persisted but less insistently. The figures were still there. It was their consistence that seemed to fade. Where they had been were shadows—evil, shallow, malign, perverse, lurid as torches and yet but shades. For the jealousy that inflames love can also consume it and, when it does, it leaves ashes that are either sterile with indifference or potent with hate. At the shadows that were torches Lennox looked with closed eyes. Obscurely, without his knowledge, in the laboratory of his senses, crystallisation was at work.

Jones, leaning forward, touched him. "I say, old chap!"

Lennox had been far away, on a journey from which some men return, but never as they went. At Jones' touch he dropped his hands. The innate sentiment of form repossessed him. He straightened, looked about and, after the manner of the deeply preoccupied, who answer a question ten minutes after it is put, said evenly:

"Suppose we do."

Do what? But Jones, getting it at once, stood up. "Come along, then."

On the way to the neighbourly Athenæum, the novelist talked endlessly about the disadvantages of not being born, which is a very safe subject. Talking still, he piloted Lennox to the dining-room where, the advantages of sedatives occurring to him, he ordered a bottle of Pommard, which is mother's milk.

But when it was brought Lennox would not touch it. He wanted brandy and soda and told Johnson, a captain, to see to it.

In the great high-ceiled room, other members were dining. From one of the tables Ogston sauntered over and, noting that Jones and Lennox had not dressed, which he had, and very beautifully, remarked brilliantly: "You fellers aren't going to the opera, are you? It's the last night."

It was another safe subject and Jones smiled falsely at him. "But you are, eh? Sit down."

Ogston put a hand on the novelist's chair. "No. I'm off to a theatre-party. But I have a ticket for the Metropolitan. You don't either of you want it, do you?"

"Let me see, what is it, to-night?" Jones, with that same false smile, enquired. "And where is the seat?"

"In Paliser's box. He's to be alone and left it here with a note asking me to join him."

Deeply, beneath his breath, Jones swore, but with the same smile, he tried to shift the subject. "You're quite a belle, aren't you?"

"See here, Ogston," Lennox put in, "let me have it."

Ogston, fumbling in his white waistcoat, extracted the ticket and handed it over.

"By the way, Lennox, do you mind my doing a little touting for Cantillon? He's with Dunwoodie. Give him your law business—some of it, anyhow."

"I'll give him some, when I have it," answered Lennox, who was to have some, and sooner and far more monumentally, than either he, or even Jones, suspected.

"Good for you, Lennox. Good-night, Jones." The brilliant and beautifully dressed young man nodded and passed on.

But now the captain was bearing down on them.

Jones looked at Lennox. "You will have to come back to my shop after dinner. There is a phrase in your will that I omitted. I forgot the 'seized and possessed.' "

Lennox drank before he spoke. Then he said: "After dinner, I shall do for Paliser."

Jones, waiting until the captain had gone, looked at Lennox again. "The greatest revenge is the disdain of any."

Lennox made no reply. A waiter put a plate before him and another before Jones. Members passed, going to their tables or leaving them. Occasionally one of them stopped, exchanged the time of day and then passed on. In each exchange Jones collaborated. Lennox said nothing. The food before him he tormented, poking at it with a fork, but not eating it.

Presently he asked for coffee, drank a cup and got up.

Jones, too, got up and, to stay him, put out a hand.

Lennox, treating it, and him, like a cobweb, went on.

Afterward, Jones thought of the Wild Women of whom Æschylus tells, the terrible Daughters of Hazard that lurk in the shadows of coming events which, it may be, they have marshalled.

Afterward he thought of them. But at the moment, believing that Lennox would do nothing and realising that, in any case, nothing can be more futile than an attempt to avert the inevitable, he was about to resume his seat, when something on the floor attracted him. He bent over, took it, looked at it and tucked it in a pocket.

Then, sitting down again, mentally he followed Lennox, whom later he was to follow farther, whom he was to follow deep in the depths where the Wild Women, lurking in wait, had thrown him.

XXVII

THE Park that had taken Cassy and from which, at that hour, children and nursemaids had gone, was green, fragrant, quiet. Its odorous peace enveloped the girl who had wanted to cry. In hurrying on she had choked it back. But you cannot always have your way with yourself. The tears would come and she sat down on a bench, from behind which a squirrel darted.

Before her the grass departed, the trees disappeared, the path wound into nothingness. In their place was the empty vastness that sorrow is. The masquerade that had affected her physically, had affected her psychically and in each instance profoundly. It had first sickened and then stabbed. There had been no place for sorrow in the double assault. There had been no time for it either. Occupied as she had almost at once become with the misadventures of another, she had no opportunity to consider her own. Yet now the aspect that sorrow took was not that of disaster. What it showed was the loneliness of the soul, solitary as it ever is in that desert which, sooner or later, we all must cross. Vast, arid, empty, before her it stretched.

Nearby, on the bench, crouching there, eager, anxious, wary, a squirrel, its fluffy tail and tiny nostrils aquiver, watched her with eyes of bead. From the desert she turned and seeing the little gracious thing, stretched her hand. She would have liked to take it and pet it. It would have made her solitude less acute. At the movement, a ball of misty fur bounded. Where it had been, there was air.

The abrupt evaporation distracted her. Before her the desert lay, but in it now was her father. She had been going to him. Previously, she had thought that, when she did go, her hands would be filled with gifts. Instead they were bruised, bare to the bone. They would madden him and she wondered whether she could endure it. The long, green afternoon, that had been so brief, had been so torturesome that she doubted her ability. But he would have to be told. She could not lie to him and humanly she wished that it were to-morrow, the day after, the day after that, when it would be over and done for, put away, covered by woes of his own, though inevitably to be dragged out again and shown her, and shown her, too, with the unconscious cruelty that those who love you display.

It would be crucifying, but there was no help for it. Reaching for the bundle, she stood up and went her way, across the Park, to the subway, from which she got out in Harlem.

The loveliness of that land of love seemed to have changed, though the change, she then recognised, was in herself. But at least the walk-up was unaltered. In the grimy entrance was Mrs. Yallum, a fat Finn, who looked like a dirty horse, and who yapped at her volubly, incomprehensibly, but with such affection that Cassy, yapping back, felt less lonely as she ascended the stair.

The comfort was mediocre. In the afternoon she had gone from a ruin. Now she had the sensation of entering another, one from which she had also gone, but to which she was returning and with a spirit so dulled in the journey! Had she, she wondered, any spirit left at all? At least enough remained to prevent any wish for the reconstruction of the ruin behind her. About the fallen walls were forms of filth; in the crevices there were vermin, and though, before her, the desert stretched, it was clean. However arid, it was wholesome.

But now she was at the door. She let herself in, hurried to the living-room, where, with the feigned cheerfulness of the unselfish, she beamed at her father and bent over him.

"Here I am to look after you again! How well you look. I am so glad and oh! where is your sling?"

In speaking she stroked him. His skin was clearer, she thought, and the abandoned sling was a relief.

He looked up at her. "You got married without me. I ought to have been there. Why didn't you tell me? It was for me to give you away. Who did?"

"Who did what?"

"Who gave you in marriage?"

With the mimic of gaiety, Cassy laughed. "Why, you old dear, all that has gone out. Hereabouts, nowadays, a father never goes to a wedding—only to funerals."

She paused and, with the idea of breaking it to him in bits, resumed: "Besides, it was all done in a hurry, in too much of a hurry."

He took it in, but at the wrong end. "Sick of him already, eh? Well, it isn't because I did not warn you. Where is he?"

Cassy moved back. Should she give it to him then or later? But the question, repeating itself, followed her.

"Where is your husband?"

Now for it, she thought. But at once he switched. "There was nothing in the papers. Why is that? What is that package?"

Cassy looked at the bundle which she still held. It gave her courage.

"I am not married."

For a second he stared. It was obvious that he had not got it. "Where have you been, then?"

Cassy fingered the bundle. Always she had hated to explain and of all possible explanations what could be more hateful than this? If only he would guess it, flare up, stamp about, get it over, let it go. But the cup was there and she drank it.

"I thought I was married. I am a fool."

For the awaited curse, she braced herself. The explosion did not come, but his eyes had widened. They covered her. Then, with an intake of the breath and of understanding, he lowered them. Apparently he was weighing it and Cassy thought he was trying to restrain himself, and she blessed him for it. It was less terrible than she had feared. But immediately it occurred to her that instead of trying to restrain himself, he was seeking the strength wherewith to rend her. And I am so innocent, she despairfully thought.

Her eyes were upon him and he looked up into hers.

"Why did you think you were married?"

"I told you, because I am a fool. There was a clergyman and a ceremony. Afterwards I found that the clergyman was not a clergyman and that the ceremony was a sham."

"When was that?"

"This afternoon."

"What did you do?"

"What was there for me to do? I left him."

"Where is he now?"

Cassy put down the bundle. She had no idea. But she said: "This evening we were to go to the opera. I hardly fancy he will miss it on my account." She paused and with a little catch in her voice continued: "I know it is all my fault, I ought to have known better and I shall be so unhappy if you mind. Won't you try not to?"

As she spoke, he stood up and she thought that the delayed volcano of his wrath was about to burst. To smother it, she touched him. "Of course you will mind. But I would not have been such a fool if I had not believed that everything would be so much nicer for you. Can't you see that and, if you do, can't you forgive me?"

He had moved from her to the piano; there he turned and looked. "There is nothing to forgive, Cassy. You have been a good girl always. I am sorry, of course I am sorry, but you are not to blame."

Understanding instead of maledictions! Sympathy in lieu of abuse! Such things are affecting. The tears swam to her eyes and wretchedly and yet thankfully she wept.

He did not seem to notice. In the narrow space he was moving about, shifting things on the piano, displacing and replacing a score, which, finally, he let fall. He stooped for it. As he raised it, Cassy saw through her tears that his hand was shaking. He, too, may have seen it. He left the room and she heard him pottering in the kitchen.

She wiped her eyes. Across the court was another kitchen in which were a woman and a child. Often she had seen them there, but if she had seen them elsewhere she would not have recognised them. They were but forms, the perceptions of a perceiver, and though Cassy had never read Fichte and was unacquainted with Berkeley, the idea visited her that they had no real existence, that, it might be, she had none either, that all she had endured was a dream drifting by, with nothing past which to drift.

It was her father's attitude that had induced these metaphysical hysterics. She had expected that some demon within him would spring out and gibber. Instead of which he had told her, and so gently, that she was not to blame. It is words like these that bring tears swiftest. The tears had come, but the words had also sufficed to reduce the people across the way into baseless appearances, in which, for the moment, she included herself.

But now at least her father was actual. He was coming in with glasses and a bottle which he put on the table.

"You are tired," he said. "Have a little."

Seating himself, he drank and Cassy feared that if the liquor exerted the authority that liquor has, he might go back into it and exact from her details which it would revolt her to supply. In helping himself, he had poured a glass for her. She did not want it. What she wanted was bed and the blanket of long, dreamless sleep. It could not be too long. She was tired, as he had said, but more so than he knew, tired with the immense fatigue that emotions and their crises create.

She moved over to where he sat. Several minutes had gone since he spoke yet it seemed to her but the moment before.

"Yes, I am tired, but you're a good daddy and I love you."

She bent over him, went to the kitchen, got a glass of milk and a biscuit, which she carried to her room, where she opened the window and closed the door.

Long later, when she awoke, it was with the consciousness of something there, something waiting, something evil, something that had jeered and pummelled her in her sleep. But what? Then, instantly, she knew. A palace of falsehoods had tumbled about her and the lies had laughed and bruised her as they fell. They had been laughing and falling the whole night through.

The light distracted her. In the morning, because of the building opposite, her room was dark. Now it was bright. The sun had scaled the roof. A gleam looked in and told her it was noon.

How could I have slept so long? she wondered. She put some things on and opening the door smelled coffee. The poor dear! she thought, he had to make it himself.

She went on into the living-room. There her father sat. On the table before him was a paper.

Without speaking he pointed at a headline. The letters squirmed. They leaped and sprang at her. From before them she backed. But what nonsense! It was impossible. She could not believe it. Yet there it was! Abruptly there also was something else. An electric chair, the man of all men in it!

From before the horror of that she reeled, steadied herself, looked at her father, looked without seeing him.

"God of gods! And I did it!"

XXVIII

IN high red boots, wide purple breeches and a yellow mandarin jacket, Jones entered the workshop. His appearance did not alarm him. He was invisible. Lloyd George and Clémenceau might have called. Mr. Ten Eyck Jones was not at home, sir. If necessary he was dead. Always, while he dressed, his servant put, unseen, a tray on the workshop table and, still unseen, disappeared. With the tray was the morning paper and the usual letters, which Jones never read. Morning in the workshop meant work. No interruptions permitted. On one occasion the house got on fire. His servant did not venture to tell him, though the firemen did. Apart from such outrages, necessarily infrequent, the only intrusion was the morning paper and the cat that talked in her sleep. The cat had many privileges, the paper had few. Sometimes it was briefly considered, more often it was not even looked at, but its great privilege consisted in being stacked.

On this morning Jones did look, but quite involuntarily, and only because a headline caught his eye. It was the same headline from before which Cassy backed. The leaping words shouted at the girl. They shouted at the novelist, a circumstance which did not prevent him from breakfasting.

The fruit, the crescents, the coffee he consumed, not as was customary, with his thoughts on his own copy, but on that which the paper supplied. It was very colourful. At the opera, the night before, Monty Paliser had been killed.

In New York, many men are killed, but not so many are murdered and of those that are murdered, few are millionaires and fewer still have a box at the Metropolitan, where, apart from stage business, no one up to then had been done for. The case was therefore unique and, save for the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, without a parallel. In the circumstances, the leaded line of leaping words was justified.

According to the story that followed and which, Jones realised, must have reached the city editor just as the paper was going to press, an attendant, whose duty it was to visit the boxes after the performance and see what, if anything, the occupants had forgotten, had, on entering Paliser's box, found him at the back of it, unconscious, on the floor. There were no external marks of violence, but a commandeered physician pronounced him dead and, on examination, further pronounced that death was due to internal hemorrhage, superinduced by heart-puncture, which itself had been caused by some instrument, presumably a stiletto.

A picturesque detail followed. The box at the right was owned by the Leroy Thompsons. The box at the left was the Harriwells'. At the late hour, an attempt to communicate with the former had failed, but over the wire, Mr. Legrand Harriwell stated that the deceased had come in during the third act, that he had spoken to Mrs. Harriwell, after which he had moved back and had either gone, or remained in the rear of the box. Mr. Harriwell knew nothing else, he had been unaware of anything occurring, he was not in the habit of spying about and he wished it distinctly understood that he must not be mixed up in the matter, or Mrs. Harriwell either.

The dear thing! thought Jones, who saw him, a tall, thin-lipped beast of a brute, with a haw-haw manner and an arrogant air. God bless him!

But, Jones resumed to himself, voyons! The opera was Aïda. Paliser came in during the third act. The house then is brilliant. But during the fourth—the duo in the crypt—it is dark. It was then that he was done for and with what is assumed to have been a stiletto.

To cut out the account, Jones turned in search of a dagger, long, thin, wicked, which, one adventurous night in Naples, he had found—just in time—in his back. On the blade was inscribed a promise, Penetrabo. Now his eyes roamed the table. He lifted the tray, lifted his copy, looked on the floor. Yet only the evening before, when Lennox was there and Cassy Cara had come, he had seen it. Since then it had gone.

The disappearance did not disturb him. Occasionally, in hunting for an object, he found it in his hand. It is somewhere, he cogently reflected and, taking a pencil, set to work.

But the muse was timorous as a chicken. The metaphor is entirely metaphorical. Jones had no faith in the wanton. He believed in regular hours, in silence and no interruptions. No intrusions of any kind. A letter was an intrusion, so also was the news of the day. These things he considered, when he did consider them, after his work was done. Sometimes he ignored them entirely. Usually he had a bushel of letters that he had not opened, a bale of papers at which he had not looked. Of such is the life known as literary or, at any rate, such was the life led by Jones.

On this morning, his copy, ordinarily fluent enough, would not come. Ideas fluttered away just out of reach. The sequence of a chapter had been in his head. Like the dagger, it had gone. He could not account for that disappearance, nor did he try. It would turn up again. So, ultimately, would the ousted sequence. For the latter's departure he did not try to account either. The effort was needless. He knew. An interruption had occurred. The news of the day had intruded itself upon him. A headline had entangled his thoughts.

Abandoning the pencil, he lit a cigarette. Across the room, above the bookcase, was a stretch of silk, a flight of dragons that he had got in Rangoon. Above the silk was an ivory mask, the spoil of a sarcophagus, which he had found in Seville. He looked at them. The dragons fled on, the mask fell asleep. Something else took their place.

On the wall was the scene at the opera.

In the golden gloom of the darkened house, it showed Paliser, sitting back in his box, presumably enjoying the Terra addio, for which Caruso had, as usual, been saving himself. Without, in the corridor, a figure furtively peering at the names on the doors. Then the voice of the soprano blending with that of the tenor and, during the divine duo, the door of the box opening, letting in a thread of light; Paliser turning to look and beholding that figure and a hand which, instantly descending, deepened the gloom forever.

It was certainly Terra addio, Jones reflected. Certainly, too, the scene is easy enough to reconstruct. But whose was the hand?

Flicking his ashes, he looked about and saw two hands, between which, he also saw, he was entirely free to pick and choose. One hand, slight and fragile, was Cassy Cara's. The other, firm and virile, was Lennox'.

Lennox had threatened. He had been acidly murderous. He had a motive. He had the opportunity. He knew where Paliser would be. He had been supplied with a seat in that box. The hand was his. It was a clear case. That was obvious, particularly to Jones, who regarded the obvious as very misleading.

Given the chance, he reflected, and Lennox might have done for Paliser, but he would have done for him with bare fists, never with a knife. It was not Lennox to use one. It was not Lennox at all.

Jones threw him out and pulled in Cassy Cara.

The case against her was equally clear. Presumably she owned the stiletto which a hat pin is. In addition, she also had a motive. If ever a girl had cause to up and do it, she had. Then, too, the risk was negligible. Any jury would acquit and tumble over each other to shake hands with her. For equity has justice that the law does not know. Moreover there are crimes that jurists have not codified. Some are too inhuman, others too human. Cassy's righting of her own wrongs belonged among the latter. Cassy's, that is, provided she had done it. But had she? Logically, yes. If the police could look behind the scenes, logically they would say to her, "Thou art the man."

But, Jones resumed, logic when pushed far enough becomes incoherence. The psychologist prefers vision and it would display none to believe that she did it. In the abstract, that is to be regretted. A lovely assassin! A beautiful girl slaying a recreant lover! A future prima donna killing a local millionaire! Monty Paliser murdered by the Viscountess of Casa-Evora! And at the opera! If I had ever put anything of the kind in my copy, reviewers would have indolently asked: "Why doesn't this imbecile study life?"

Jones laughed. The enjoyment of one's own ideas —or of the absence of them—is a literary trait. When Dumas wrote, he roared.

Here it is, then, Jones continued. If the police knew certain things they would nab Lennox. If they knew others, they would nab Cassy Cara. If they knew more, they would nab me. I should be held as a witness. This is cheerful, particularly as my sole complicity in the matter has been due to a desire to be of use. But that is just it. Through the enigmatic laws of life, any kindness is repaid in pain.

Pleasurably, for a moment, he considered the altruism of that aphorism. Then he got back at the murder which, he decided, must have been premeditated by some one who knew where Paliser would be. That conclusion reached, he groped for another. Lennox knew, but did Cassy know, and, if she did, had she utilised the knowledge?

To decide the point he reviewed the visit of the previous evening.

Ostensibly Cassy's visit had been occasioned not by any wish to relate what had happened to her, but to acquaint Lennox with the cause of what had happened to him. In view of what had befallen her, the proceeding was certainly considerate. In the misadventures of life, the individual is usually so obsessed by his own troubles that they blind him to those of another. But ostensibly Cassy had sunk her troubles and had pulled them up, not to exhibit them, but to show Lennox the lay of the land as it affected not her at all but him. The proceeding was certainly considerate—unless it were astute, unless her object had been to employ Lennox for the wreaking of her own revenge.

That was possible, but was it probable?

An ordinary young woman would have gone at it differently, gone at it hammer and tongs. Cassy's methods were merely finer. That was the common sense view. But was it psychology? The common sense view that is applicable to the average individual is inapplicable to a problematic nature and, consequently, not to Cassy, who must therefore have had another incentive for her visit, an incentive stronger than the primitive instinct for revenge.

But, Jones asked himself, what are the fundamental principles of human activity? They are self-preservation and the perpetuation of the species. Every idea that has existed, or does exist, in the mind of man is the result of the permutations and combinations of those two principles, of which the second is the stronger and its basis is sex. That is what actuated Cassy. She is, or was, in love with Lennox, and told him for no other reason.

That is it, Jones decided. But the course of her true love could not have run very smooth and, knowing that Lennox was otherwise interested, she took up with Paliser out of pique.

Pique! he repeated. But no, that is not Cassy Cara either. She——

Like a thread snapped suddenly, the novelist's meditations ceased. On the wall before him the dragons alighted, the mask awoke. Between them a canvas was emerging. Dim, shadowy, uncertain, it hesitated, wavered, advanced.

Then, as it hung unsupported in the air—far too unsupported, he presently thought—he looked it over.

To apparitions he was accustomed. They were part of his equipment. Unsummoned, without incantations they came, sent, one might think, by the muse whom he derided, but more naturally and very simply produced by the machinery in his brain.

Now, as he examined the canvas, its imprecision diminished, the shadows passed, the obscurity lifted, the penumbra brightened, outlines defined themselves, the colouring appeared, a colouring, after the manner of Rembrandt, composed of darkness in which there is light and which, as such, reveals.

Jones stood up, turned around and sat down again as gamblers, disquieted by their luck, will do.

Before him still the picture floated. He disavowed it, disowned it. Yet there it was, the child of his fancy, the first-born of the morning, the fruit of his concentrated thought, and as, surprisedly, he considered it, it took on such semblances of legitimacy, that the disavowals ceased. Then, slowly disintegrating, its consistence lessened. It was departing, vaporously as it had come. Jones waved at it, omitting out of sheer abstraction to say Au revoir, yet omitting also, and through equal modesty, to say Eureka!

He pressed a button. Instantly, as though sprung from a trap, his servant appeared.

"Get Mr. Lennox on the telephone."

The minutes lengthened. Finally the servant reappeared.

"Mr. Lennox is not at home, sir. His man says he's gone to Centre Street. He's been arrested. Mr. Lennox has been arrested. Yes, sir."

Pausing, the servant cocked an ear and added: "They're calling extras, sir. Would you wish one?"

Circuitously, through the open door, the cat, her tail in the air, approached and wowed.

Jones leaned over and tickled her in the stomach. The cat hopped up on him. He put a finger to his forehead, held it there, removed it and looked at the man.

"In war-time, with the price of everything going up, it is a criminal waste of money to buy an extra—particularly when you know what isn't in it."

"Yes, sir."

Jones motioned. "Look through the old newspapers. Among the March issues there is one that has an article entitled 'The Matter of Ziegler.' Let me have it."

The cat, now on his shoulder, purred profusely in his ear. Raising a hand, he tickled her again.

"Mimi-Meow, this Matter of Ziegler may interest us very much and after we have looked it over, I will attend to our friend von Lennox, who seems to have become a Hun."

ALREADY over the picked-up codfish, flapjacks, Hamburg steaks and cognate enticements on which the Bronx and Harlem breakfasts, the news of it had buttered the toast, flavoured the coffee, added a sweetness to this April day and provided a cocktail to people who did not know Paliser from the Pierrot in the moon. That he was spectacularly wealthy was a tid-bit, that he had been killed at the Metropolitan was a delight, the war news was nothing to the fact that the party with the stiletto had escaped "unbeknownst." These people were unacquainted with Paliser. But here was a young man with an opera-box of his own, and think of that! Here was the mythological monster that the Knickerbocker has become. Here was the heir to unearned and untold increments. These attributes made him as delectable to the majority who did not know him, as he had become to the privileged few who did.

Elsewhere, and particularly in and about fashion's final citadel which the Plaza is, solemn imbeciles viewed the matter vehemently. "Young Paliser! Why, there is no better blood in town! By Jove, I believe we are related!"

Or else: "That's M. P.'s son, isn't it? Yes, here it is. I never met the old cock but I heard of him long before we came East. A damned outrage, that's what I call it."

Or again: "Dear me, what is the world coming to? What a blessing it is we were not there. They might have come and murdered us all!"

Adjacently, in clubland, old men with one foot in the grave and the other on Broadway, exchanged reminiscences of the nights when social New York was a small and early family party and M. P. led the ball, and at a pace so klinking that he danced beyond the favours of the cotillon—the german as it, the cotillon, was then lovingly called—into assemblies, certainly less select, but certainly, too, more gay, and had horrified scrumptious sedateness with the uproar of his orgies.

The indicated obituaries followed. "Well, at any rate, they didn't murder him for it." "The son now, a chip of the old block, eh?" "Nothing of the kind, a quiet young prig." "The papers say——" "Damn the papers, they never know anything." "You mean they don't print what they do know." "I mean they don't give us the woman. For it was a woman. I'll eat my hat it was a woman." "Let's have lunch instead."

Generally, for the moment, that was the verdict, one in which the police had already collaborated. But what woman? And, assuming the woman, whence had she come? Where had she gone?—problems, momentarily insoluble but which investigations, then in progress, would probably decide.

At the great white house on upper Fifth Avenue, the servants knew only that they knew nothing. Nothing at all. Already coached, they were sure and unshakable in their knowledge of that. A Mr. Harvey—from Headquarters—could not budge them an inch. Not one!

The night before, at the first intelligence of it, M. P. came nearer to giving up the ghost than is commonly advisable. Suffocation seized him. An incubus within was pushing his life-springs out. So can emotion and an impaired digestion affect a father. The emotion was not caused by grief. It was fear. For weeks, for months, during the tedium and terror of the trial, his name, Paliser, would top the page! It had topped it before, very often, but that was years ago. Then he had not cared. Then the wine of youth still bubbled. No, he had not cared. But that was long ago. Since then the wine of youth had gone, spilled in those orgies which he had survived, yet, in the survival, abandoned more and more to solitude and making him seek, what the solitary ever do seek, inconspicuousness. For years he had courted obscurity as imbeciles court fame. And now!

If only the boy had had the decency to die of pneumonia!

It was then the incubus gripped him. For a second he saw the visage, infinitely consoling, that Death can display and possibly, but for an immediate drug, there too would have echoed the Terra addio!

He was then in white velvet. A preparation of menthe, dripping from a phial, spotted it green. He did not notice. At the moment the spasm had him. Then as that clicked and passed, he looked in the expressionless face of the butler who had told him.

The spasm had shaken him into a chair.

The room, an oblong, was furnished after a fashion of long ago. The daised bed was ascended by low, wide steps. Beyond stood a table of lapis-lazuli. A mantel of the same material was surmounted by a mirror framed in jasper. Beneath the mirror, a fire burned dimly. The lights too were dim. They were diffused by tall wax candles that stood shaded in high gold sticks. On the table there were three of them.

The chair was near this table, at which M. P. had been occupied very laboriously, in doing nothing, a task that he performed in preparation for the bed, which was always ready for him, and for sleep, which seldom was. There he had been told. It had shaken him to his feet, shaken apoplexy at him and shaken him back in the chair.

Now, as he looked at the servant's wooden mask, for a moment he relived an age, not a pleasant one either and of which this blow, had he known it, was perhaps the karma. He did not know it. He knew nothing of karma. None the less, with that curious intuition which the great crises induce, he too divined the woman and wished to God that he had kept his hands off, wished that he had not interfered and told Monty to put her in a flat and be damned to her! It was she, he could have sworn it. At once, precisely as he wished he had let her alone, he hoped and quite as fervently that she had covered her tracks, that there would be no trial, nothing but inept conjectures and that forgetfulness in which all things, good and bad, lose their way.

The futility of wishing passed. The time for action had come. He motioned. "Is Benny here?"

"He left this noon, sir."

"Did he say anything?"

The butler did not know whether to lie or not, but seeing no personal advantage in either course, he hedged. "Very little, sir."

That little, the old man weighed. A little is often enough. It may be too much.

"He spoke about a girl, eh?"

"He said a lady was stopping there. Yes, sir."

"What else?"

The butler shuffled. "He said she was very pretty, sir."

"Go on, Canlon."

"Well, sir, it seems there was a joke about it. The young lady thought she was married."

"How was that?"

"I'm not supposed to know, sir. But from what was let on, Benny was rigged out as a dominie and it made 'em laugh."

The old man ran his head out like a turtle. "Damnation, what has that to do with it?"

"Why, sir, he pretended to marry her."

"Benny did?"

"Yes, sir."

"He pretended that she was his wife."

"No, sir, he pretended to marry her to Mr. Monty."

"Good God!" the old man muttered and sank back. The blackness was blacker than any black he had entered. In days gone by, he had agreeably shocked New York with the splendid uproar of his orgies. He had left undone those things which he ought to have done and done those things which he should have avoided. He had been whatever you like—or dislike—but never had he been dishonest. Little that would avail him now. If this turpitude were published, it would be said that he had fathered it. At the prospect, he felt the incubus returning. In a moment it would have him and, spillingly, he drank the green drug.

The agony receded, but the nightmare confronted him. He grappled with it.

"The coat I had on at dinner. There is a card-case in the pocket. Give it to me."

Probably it was all very useless. Probably no matter what he contrived, the police would ferret her out. There was just one chance though which, properly taken, might save the situation.

The card-case, pale damask, lined with pale silk, the man brought him. He put it on the table.

"Canlon!"

"Yes, sir."

"Benny said nothing."

"Very good, sir."

"I have a few hundred for you here, between eight and nine, I think."

"Thank you, sir."

"To-morrow there will be more."

"I am sure I am very grateful, sir."

"Don't interrupt me. Recently my son returned from Cuba. Occasionally he went visiting. Where he went, he did not tell you. That is all you know. You know nothing else. You heard nothing. Nobody here heard anything. Nobody, in this house, knows anything at all. You understand?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then see to it. The police will come. You must be at the door. You know now what to say. They will want a word with me. I am too prostrated to see anybody."

"Thank you, sir."

"Telephone to the Place. Get Benny. Repeat my orders. Say I will do as well by him as I shall by you."

"Thank you, sir."

"Take the money. You may have the case also."

"I thank you, sir."

"Tell Peters to fetch me some brandy. The 1810. That will do."

Presently, when the police did come and, several hours later, in the person of Mr. Harvey, came again, they came upon the barriers, invisible and unscalable, which ignorance, properly paid, can erect. With an empty bag, Mr. Harvey made off; not far, however, a few squares below to the Athenæum Club.

There, the hall-porter succeeded in being magnificent. The strange and early visitor he rebuked. It was not customary for members to be murdered!

A badge, carelessly disclosed, disconcerted him. For a second only. However unusual a member might be, no information could be supplied concerning him. There was another rule, equally strict. Strangers were not admitted. Though, whether the rule applied to a bull, he was uncertain. Momentarily, the hall-porter, previously magnificent, became an unhappy man. Misery is fertile. A compromise surprised him.

He crooked a thumb. "Here! Go 'round by the back way and ask for Mr. Johnson—he's one of the captains."

From the steps, in the slanting rays of the morning sun, he saw him off. But the gaiety of the eager rays that charged the air with little gold motes, did not cheer him. The lustre of his office was tarnished. A member had been murdered! It was most unusual.

Meanwhile, down the area steps, a hostile and hasty youth in shirt-sleeves and a slashed waistcoat barred the way. The barring was brief. The badge and a smile demolished it. Within, beneath a low ceiling, at a long table, other youths, equally slashed but less hostile, were at breakfast.

Affably, the intruder raised a hand. "Gentlemen, don't let me disturb you. I'm just having a look-in on Mr. Johnson."

Mr. Johnson did not breakfast with slashed young men; it would have been subversive to discipline, and it was negligently, through a lateral entrance, that presently he appeared. In evening clothes on this early morning, he surveyed his visitor, a big fellow with a slight moustache, an easy way and a missing front tooth, who went straight at it.

"Pleased to meet you, Mr. Johnson. My name's Harvey. It's about young Paliser. There may be something in it for you. I'm from Headquarters."

The captain coughed. "It's awful. I can't tell you anything though. He wasn't here often. Doubt if I've seen him in a week." He looked about. The slashed youths were edging up. "Come in here."

In an adjoining room, he took a chair, waved politely at another, coughed again and resumed. "You say there may be something in it for me?"

Mr. Harvey sat down. "Cert. There'll be a reward—a big one."

The captain turned it over. "It is as much as my place is worth, but last evening one of the members was talking fierce about him."

"Yes, so I heard," said Mr. Harvey, who had heard nothing of the kind and who, not for an instant, had expected to tumble on a fierce-talking member. "I heard his name too. It's—er——"

"Lennox," the captain put in.

"Lennox, yes, that's it, and just to see how my account tallies with yours, what did he say?"

"He said he'd do for him. I could have laughed."

"It was funny, I laughed myself, and about a woman, wasn't it?"

"I don't know. But he was engaged to be married. I saw it in the papers."

"And this young Paliser butted in?"

"I couldn't say. But he threw up his business and sat around and last night he was going to do for him."

"At the opera?"

"He was talking random-like. He had just had a B. and S. I didn't hear anything about the opera. He wasn't got up for it. Just a business suit. But, Lord bless you, he didn't do it. He isn't that kind. Nice, free-handed feller."

"No, of course not. I wouldn't believe it, not if you told me so. Let me see. Where did I hear he lives?"

"I don't rightly know. Somewhere in the neighbourhood."

"So I thought and his first name is?"

"I've forgotten. Hold on! Keith! That's it. Keith Lennox. Are you going to see him? P'raps he can set you straight."

"P'raps he can."

"But don't let on about me, my friend."

"Not on your life," replied his friend, who added: "Where's your hat?"

"My hat!" Mr. Johnson surprisedly exclaimed.

Affably that friend of his nodded. "Ever been to Headquarters? Well, you're going there now!"

Then, presently, the captain and his friend ascended a stairway, down which, a few hours later, hoarse voices came.

"Extra! Extra!"

XXX

AT the Athenæum, that afternoon, members gathered together, buttonholed each other, talked it over and so importantly that, if you had not known better, you might have thought the war a minor event. It gave one rather a clear idea of the parochialism of clubland. But then, to discuss the affairs of people who never heard of you is, essentially, a social act.

Meanwhile the shouted extras had told of Lennox' arrest. The evening papers supplied the evidence.

In them you read that Lennox had said he would "do" for Paliser, that in his possession had been found a stiletto, an opera-check, together with a will, and that, when apprehended, he had been effecting what is called a getaway.

There you had the threat, the instrument, the opportunity and what more could you ask, except the motive? As for the rest, it was damning. On that point foregathering members agreed—with one exception.

In a seated group was Jones. His neighbours alarmed him. They belonged, he thought, to a very dangerous class, to a class which a sociologist defined as the most dangerous of all—to the stupid. According to them, Lennox was not merely guilty, he was worse. He had besplattered the club with the blood of a man who, hang it all, whether you liked him or not, was also a member. The Athenæum would become a byword. Already, no doubt, it was known as the Assassin's. Et cetera and so forth.

The group thinned, increased, thinned again, scattered.

Jones, alone with a survivor, addressed him. "How is my handsome friend to-day?"

Verelst turned impatiently. "In no mood for jesting. I ought to have hurried him off. Now he is in jail."

Jones lit a cigarette. "There are honest men everywhere, even in jail, perhaps particularly in jail. Whom has he, do you know?"

"To defend him? Dunwoodie. Ogston told me. Ogston says——"

"I daresay he does. His remarks are always very poignant."

"But look here. Before the arrest was known, Ogston was in this room telling everybody that, last night, he gave Lennox a seat in Paliser's box. He will have to testify to it. He can't help himself."

"Perhaps I can help him though. I was with Lennox at the time."

"You were? That's awkward. You may have to corroborate him."

"I certainly shall. I have the seat."

"What?"

"Lennox dropped the ticket. After he had gone, I found it on the floor. It is in my shop now."

"Well, well!" Verelst astoundedly exclaimed. "But, here, hold on. The papers say he had a return check."

Jones flicked his ashes. "I have one or two myself. Probably you have. Even otherwise return checks tell no tales, or rather no dates."

"I never thought of that."

"Think of it now, then."

"Yes, but confound it, there is the stiletto."

"As you say, there it is and I wish it were here. It is mine."

Verelst adjusted his glasses. "What are you talking about?"

"The war," Jones answered. "What else? In my shop last evening, Lennox was drawing his will. In gathering up the sheets, the knife must have got among them and, without knowing it, he carried it off. This morning I missed it. The loss affected me profoundly. It is an old friend."

"You don't tell me."

"Don't I? I'll go so far as to lay you another basket of pippins that the police can't produce another like it. On the blade is inscribed Penetrabo—which is an endearing device."

"But see here," Verelst excitedly exclaimed. "You must tell Dunwoodie. You——" In sheer astonishment he broke off.

Innocently Jones surveyed him. "You think it important as all that?"

"Important? Important isn't the word."

With the same air of innocence, Jones nodded. "I thought it wasn't the word. I should have said trivial."

"But——"

Wickedly Jones laughed. "If you feel reckless enough to go another basket of pippins, I will wager that if I tell Dunwoodie anything—and mind the 'if' —he will agree that the paper-cutter is of no consequence—except to its lawful owner, who wants it back."

"But tell me——"

"Anything you like. For the moment, though, tell me something."

"What?"

Jones blew a ring of smoke. "Do you happen to know whether Paliser had anything?"

"What on earth has that to do with it?"

Jones blew another ring. "I had an idea that his mother might have left him something. You knew her, didn't you? Any way, you still know M. P. Did he ever say anything about it?"

"He did not need to. It was in the papers. He made over to him the Splendor, the Place, and some Wall Street and lower Broadway property that has been part of the Paliser estate since the year One."

"What is it all worth?" Jones asked. "Ten or twenty million?"

"Thirty, I should say. Perhaps more. But what has it to do with Lennox?"

Negligently Jones flicked his ashes. "Well, it changes the subject. I can't talk about the same thing all the time. It is too fatiguing."

As he spoke, he stood up.

Verelst put out a hand. "Dunwoodie is sure to look in. Where are you off to?"

Jones smiled at him. "I am going to gaze in a window where there are pippins on view."

"Go to the devil!" said Verelst, who also got up.

Fabulists tell strange tales. It is their business to tell them. Jones had no intention of looking at pippins. What he had in mind was fruit of another variety. It was some distance away. Before he could make an appreciable move toward it, Verelst, who had turned from him, turned back.

"There!"

Beyond, through the high-arched entrance, a man was limping. He had the battered face of an old bulldog and the rumpled clothes of a young ruffian.

"There's Dunwoodie!"

Verelst, a hand on Jones' elbow, propelled him toward the lawyer, who gratified them with the look, very baleful and equally famous, with which he was said to reverse the Bench.

But Verelst, afraid of nothing except damp sheets, stretched a hand. "You know Ten Eyck Jones. He has something very important to tell you."

"Yes," said Jones. "In March, on the eighth or ninth, I have forgotten which, but it must be in the 'Law Journal,' a decision was rendered——"

He got no farther. Other members, crowding about, were questioning, surmising, eager for a detail, a prediction, an obiter dictum, for anything they could take away and repeat concerning the murder, in which all knew that the great man was to appear.

But Dunwoodie was making himself heard, and not gently either. It was as though already he was at the district attorney's throat.

"Where is the evidence? Where is it? Where is the evidence? There is not a shred, not a scintilla. On the absence of facts adduced, I shall maintain what I assert until the last armed Court of Appeals expires. Hum! Ha!"

Fiercely he turned on Jones. "What were you saying, sir?"

Before Jones could reply, Verelst cut in. "The stiletto is his. He has the opera-ticket. He——"

"Imbeciles tell each other that great men think alike," Jones, interrupting, remarked at Dunwoodie. "I merely happened to be forestalling your views, when a recent decision occurred to me and——"

Jones' remarks were lost, drowned by others, by questions, exclamations, the drivel that amazement creates.

"But, I say——" "Tell me this——" "No evidence!" "The stiletto his!" "How did Lennox get it?" "Then what about——"

Dunwoodie, fastening on Jones, roared at him. "You tell me the instrument is yours?"

Jones patted his chin. "I did not, but I will."

"How do you know, sir?"

"It has a little love message on it."

"Hum! Ha!" Dunwoodie barked. "Come to my office to-morrow. Come before ten."

Dreamily Jones tilted his hat. "I am not up before ten. Where do you live? In the Roaring Forties?"

But, in the mounting clamour, the answer, if answer there were, was submerged. Jones went out to the street, entered a taxi, gave an address and sailed away, up and across the Park, along the Riverside and into the longest thoroughfare—caravan routes excepted—on the planet.

On a corner was a drug-shop, where anything was to be had, even to umbrellas and, from a sign that hung there, apparently a notary public also. Opposite was a saloon, the Ladies Entrance horribly hospitable. Jones' trained eye—the eye of a novelist—gathered these things which it dropped in that bag which the subconscious is. Meanwhile the car, scattering children, tooted, turned and stopped before a leprous door.

In the hall, a girl of twelve, with the face of a seraph, and the voice of a fiend, was shrieking at a switchboard. Jones fearing, if he addressed her, that she might curse him, went on and up, higher, still higher, and began to feel quite birdlike. On the successive landings were doors and he wondered what tragedies, what comedies, what aims, lofty, mean or merely diabolic, they concealed. They were all labelled with names, Hun or Hebrew, usually both. But one name differed. It caressed.

There he rang.

When it opened, a strawberry mouth opened also. "Oh!" Cassy's blue eyes were red. There was fright in them. "It is horrible! Tell me, do you think it was he?"

Jones removed his hat. "I know it was not."

That mouth opened again, opened for breath, opened with relief. Gasping, she stared. "Thank God! I was afraid—— But are you sure? It was I who told him—I thought it my fault. It was killing me. Tell me. Are you really sure?"

Jones motioned. "His lawyer is. I have just seen him."

"He is! Thank God then! Thank God! And my father! It has made him ill. He liked him so! I am going for medicine now. Will you go in and speak to him?"

She turned and called. "It is Mr. Jones—a friend of Mr. Lennox." She turned again. "I will be back in a minute."

Beyond, in the room with the piano and the painted warrior, the musician lay on a sofa, bundled in a rug. There was not much space on the sofa, yet, as Jones entered, he seemed to recede. Then, cavernously, he spoke.

"Forgive me for not rising. This business has been too much for me. Sit down."

Jones put his hat on the table and drew a chair. "I am sorry it has upset you. It amounts to nothing."

Perplexedly the musician repeated it. "Nothing?"

"I was referring to our friend Lennox."

"You call his arrest nothing?"

"Well, everything is relative. It may seem unusual to be held without bail and yet, if we all were, it would be commonplace."

The musician plucked at the rug. "I suppose everybody thinks he did it?"

"Everybody, no. I don't think so and I am sure your daughter doesn't."

"I wish she would hurry."

"Nor do you."

"No, I don't think so."

"I doubt if the police do either."

"After jailing him!"

Jones, who had been taking in the room, the piano, the portrait, the table, sketched a gesture.

"We are all in jail. The opinion of the world is a prison, our own ideas are another. We are doubly jailed, and very justly. We are depraved animals. We think, or think we think, and what we think others have thought for us and, as a rule, erroneously."

From a phonograph somewhere, in some adjacent den, there floated a tenor aria, the Bella figlia del amore, pierced suddenly and beautifully by a contralto's rich voice.

Jones turned. "That's Caruso. I don't know who the Maddelena is. Do you remember Campanini?"

"Yes, I remember him. He was a better actor than Caruso."

"And so ugly that he was good-looking. Caruso is becoming uneven."

Vaguely the musician considered the novelist. "You think so?"

"It rather looked that way last night."

Angelo Cara plucked again at the rug.

"But," Jones continued, "in the 'Terra addio' he made up for it. What an enchantment that duo is!"

The musician's hand moved from the rug to his face. "You were there then?"

I was this morning, thought Jones, but he said: "How sinful Rigoletto is by comparison to Aïda—by comparison I mean to the last act."

The other duo now had become a quartette. The voices of Gilda and Rigoletto were fusing with those of the figlia and the duke.

The musician appeared to be listening. His sunken eyes were lifted. Slowly he turned them on Jones.

"You didn't see anything, did you?"

"Last night? I did not see Lennox, if that is what you mean, or Paliser—except for a moment, during the crypt scene."

Chokingly the musician drew breath. In the effort he gasped. "Then you know."

"Yes, I know."

The rug rose and fell. It was as though there were a wave beneath it.

With an air of detachment, Jones added: "Paliser turned to see who was there. A sword-cane told him."

The musician's lips twitched, his face had contracted, his hand now was on his breast. "I wish Cassy would hurry. She's gone for amyl."

"Is it far?"

"The corner. Are you going to do anything?"

Jones shook his head. "I don't need to."

The sunken eyes were upon him. "Why do you say that?"

"You are an honest man."

The sunken eyes wavered. "At least I never supposed they would arrest Lennox. How could I?"

"No one could have supposed it. Besides, in your own conscience you were justified, were you not?"

"You know about that, too?"

"Yes, I know about that."

The Rigoletto disc now had been replaced by another, one from which a voice brayed, a voice nasal, jocular, felonious.

"That beast ought to be shot," Jones added.

The musician raised himself a little. "You don't misjudge her, do you?"

Jones, annoyed at the swill tossed about, had turned from him. He turned back. "Believe me, Mr. Cara, there is no one for whom I have a higher respect."

A spasm seized the musician. For a moment, save for the effort at breath, he was silent. Then feebly he said: "I wish she would hurry."

"Can I do anything?"

"Yes, tell me. Do you condemn me?"

The novelist hesitated. "There are no human scales for any soul. Though, to be sure——"

"What?"

"It might have been avoided. As it is, they will suspect her."

"Cassy?"

"Naturally. They can't hold Lennox on a paper-cutter—that belongs to me, and a few empty words said in my presence and which, if necessary, I did not hear. They can't hold him on that. But when they learn, as they will, the circumstances of your daughter's misadventure, they will arrest her."

"Merciful God!"

The jeopardy to her, a jeopardy previously undiscerned, but which then shaken at him, instantly took shape, twisted his mouth into the appalling grimace that mediæval art gave to the damned.

"And you don't want that," Jones remotely resumed.

"Want it!" Galvanised by the shock, the musician sat suddenly up. "Last night, after I got back, I slept like a log. This morning, I felt if I had not done it, I would still have it to do and that satisfied me. But afterwards, when I learned about Lennox, it threw me here. Now—— My God!"

He fell back.

The poor devil is done for, thought Jones, who, wondering whether he could get it over in time, leaned forward.

"Mr. Cara, don't you think you had best make it plain sailing for everybody, and let me draw up a declaration?"

The disc now had run out. The grunt of the beast was stilled. From beyond came the quick click of a key. Almost at once Cassy appeared.

She hurried to her father. "There were people ahead of me. They took forever. Has Mr. Jones told you? Mr. Lennox did not do it."

Breaking a tube in a handkerchief, she was administering the amyl and Jones wondered whether she could then suspect. But her face was turned from him, he could not read it, and realising that, in any event, she must be spared the next act, he cast about for an excuse to get her away. At once, remembering the notary, he produced him.

"Your father wants me to draw a paper on which his signature should be attested. If I am not asking too much, would you mind going back to the druggist for the notary whose sign I saw there?"

Cassy turned from her father. "A paper? What paper?"

Bravely Jones lied. "A will."

Cassy looked from one to the other. "The poor dear often has these attacks. He will be better soon —now that he knows. Won't you, daddy?"

Angelo Cara's eyes had in them an expression infinitely tender, equally vacant. It was as though, in thinking of her, he was thinking too of something else. Though, as Jones afterward decided, he probably was not thinking at all.

Cassy exclaimed at him. "Besides, what have you—except me?"

"Everybody has to make a will," Jones, lying again, put in. "There has been a new law passed. The eternal revenue collector requires it."

Cassy smoothed the rug, put the handkerchief on the table, opened a drawer, got out some paper, a pen, a bottle of ink.

In a moment she had gone.

Jones seated himself at the table. "Forgive me for asking, but may I assume that you believe in God, a life hereafter and in the rewards and punishments which, we are told, await us?"

The musician closed his eyes.

"Thank you," said Jones, who began to write:

I, Angelo Cara, being in full possession of my senses and conscious of the immanence of death, do solemnly swear to the truth of this my dying declaration, which, I also solemnly swear, is made by me without any collusion with Keith Lennox. First; I firmly believe in God, in a life hereafter, and in future rewards and punishments. Second; I alone am guilty of the murder of Montagu Paliser, jr., whom I killed without aid or accomplices and without the privity or knowledge of any other person.

Jones, wishing that in his law-school days he had crammed less and studied more, looked up.

"I cannot compliment you on your pen, Mr. Cara. But then, pen and ink always seem so emphatic. Personally, I prefer a pencil. Writing with a pencil is like talking in a whisper."

It was in an effort to deodorise the atmosphere, charged with the ghastly, that he said it. The declarant did not appear to notice. His sunken eyes had been closed. Widely they opened.

"The other side!"

Jones blotted the declaration. "The other side cannot be very different from this side. Not that part of it at least which people, such as you and I, first visit. A bit farther on, I suppose we prepare for our return here. For that matter, it will be very careless of us, if we don't. We relive and redie and redie and relive, endlessly, ad infinitum. The Church does not put it in just that manner, but the allegory of the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting amounts, perhaps, to the same thing. 'Never the spirit was born, the spirit shall cease to be never.' That is the way Edwin Arnold expressed it, after the 'Gita' had expressed it for him. But probably you have not frequented the 'Gita,' Mr. Cara. It is an exceedingly——"

"Cassy's lace dress is all torn. It was so pretty."

He is in the astral now, thought Jones, who said: "She will have a much prettier one."

But now again from the hall came that quick click and Cassy appeared, a little fat man behind her.

Jones stood up. "How do do. You know Mr. Cara. Mr. Cara wants his signature attested."

The little man exhibited his gold teeth. "With a will that is not the way. I told this young lady so but she would have it that I come along."

The young lady, who was taking her hat off, left the room.

Jones fished in a pocket. "It is very good of you.

Here, if you please, is your fee. The document is not a will, it is a release."

As the novelist spoke, he put the pen in the musician's hand and, finding it necessary, or thinking that it was, for, as he afterward realised, it was not, he guided it.

"You acknowledge this——" the notary began. But at the moment Cassy returned and, it may be, distracted by her, he mumbled the rest, took the reply for granted, applied the stamp, exhibited his teeth. Then, at once, the hall had him.

Cassy turned to Jones. Her face disclosed as many emotions as an opal has colours. Relief, longing, uncertainty, and distress were there, ringed in beauty.

"Miss Austen ought to know how she has misjudged him. Do you suppose she would let me see her?"

Bully for you! thought Jones, who said: "I cannot imagine any one refusing you anything."

In speaking, he heard something. Cassy turned. She too had heard it. But what?

With a cry she ran to the sofa. "Daddy!"

His face was grey, the grey that dawn has, the grey than which there is nothing greyer and yet in which there is light. That light was there. His upper-lip was just a little raised. It was as though he had seen something that pleased him and of which he was about to tell.

"Daddy!"

Jones followed her. He drew down the rug and bent over. After a moment, he drew the rug up, well up, and, with a forefinger, saluted.

Cassy, tearing the covering back, flung herself there. Jones could not see her tears. He heard them. Her slim body shook.

XXXI

ON leaving the walk-up Jones discovered a restaurant that he judged convenient and vile. But the convenience appealed, and the villainy of the place did not extend to the telephone-book, which was the first thing he ordered.

While waiting for it, it occurred to him that in a novel the death he had witnessed would seem very pat. Why is life so artificial? he wonderingly asked.

The query suggested another. It concerned not the decedent but his daughter.

By the Lord Harry, he told himself, her linen shall not be washed in public if I can prevent it, and what is the use in being a novelist if you can't invent?

But now the book was before him. In it he found that Dunwoodie resided near Columbia University. It was ages since he had ventured in that neighbourhood, which, when finally he got there, gave him the agreeable sensation of being in a city other than New York.

Hic Labor, Haec Quies, he saw written on the statue of a tall maiden, and though, in New York, quiet is to be had only in the infrequent cemeteries, deep down, yet with the rest of the inscription he had been engaged all day.

Gravely saluting the maiden, who was but partly false, he passed on to an apartment-house and to Dunwoodie's door, which was opened by Dunwoodie himself. In slippers and a tattered gown, he was Hogarthian.

"I thought it a messenger!" he bitterly exclaimed.

Jones smiled at him. "When a man of your eminence is not wrong, he is invariably right. I am a messenger."

In the voice of an ogre, Dunwoodie took it up. "What is the message, sir?"

Jones pointed at the ceiling. Involuntarily, Dunwoodie looked up and then angrily at the novelist.

"An order of release," the latter announced.

Dunwoodie glared. "I suppose, sir, I must let you in, but allow me to tell you——"

Urbanely Jones gestured. "Pray do not ask my permission, it is a privilege to listen to anything you may say."

Dunwoodie turned. Through a winding hall he led the way to a room in which a lane went from the threshold to a table. The lane was bordered with an underbush of newspapers, pamphlets, magazines. Behind the underbush was a forest of books. Beside the table were an armchair and a stool. From above, hung a light. Otherwise, save for cobwebs, the room was bare and very relaxing.

Dunwoodie taking the chair, indicated the stool. "Now, sir!"

Jones gave him the declaration.

With not more than a glance Dunwoodie possessed himself of the contents. He put it down.

"If I had not known you had studied law, not for a moment would that rigamarole lead me to suspect it."

In a protest which was quite futile, Jones raised a hand. "The notary is unnecessary, I know that. I know also that a dying declaration is not the best evidence, but——"

"Do you at least know that the declarant is dead?"

Jones, who favoured the dramatic, nodded. "He died in my arms."

Dunwoodie took it in and took it out. "It is curious how crime leads to bad taste."

Jones leaned forward. "I may tell you for your information——"

"Spare me, I am overburdened with information as it is."

Jones sat back. He had no intention of taking Dunwoodie then behind the scenes. That would come later. But he did want to try out an invention that had occurred to him. He sighed.

"Don't you care to hear why he did it?"

"Not in the least."

"But——"

Dunwoodie fumbled in a pocket. "The district attorney may be more receptive. I shall go to him in the morning and I will thank you to go with me."

"I am not up in the morning."

"Then don't go to bed."

From the pocket, Dunwoodie extracted an enormous handkerchief. It fascinated Jones. He had never seen one that resembled it.

"You dispose of me admirably. The district attorney, I suppose, will enter a nolle prosequi."

In that handkerchief, Dunwoodie snorted. "You may suppose what you like."

Jones laughed. "It is my business to suppose. I suppose, when the murder was committed, that Lennox was at home. If I am right, he has an alibi which his servant can confirm."

Dunwoodie stared. "Whatever your business may be, it is not to teach me mine."

Jones drew out a cigarette-case. "Let me sit at your feet then. What does Lennox say?"

"How inquisitive you are! But to be rid of you, he——"

"May I smoke?" Jones interrupted.

"Good God, sir! You are not preparing to make a night of it?"

"I have one or two other little matters in hand. But since I may suppose all I like, I take it that Lennox intended to go to the opera, though I fancy also that he had no intention of going to Paliser's box. I suppose that he intended to wait about and go for him hot and heavy when he came out. I suppose also that, while dressing, he changed his mind. And, by the way, isn't there such a writ as a mandamus, or a duces tecum? I would like my paper-cutter returned."

"Confound your paper-cutter! You don't deserve to have me admit it, but Lennox' account of it is that before going on to the opera, he stopped to write a letter to Miss—er—Hum! Ha!"

"Miss Austen?"

"And when he got through it was midnight."

"I'll lay a pippin he didn't send it."

"What, sir?"

"Lennox had a lot to say. It was gagging him. He would have suffocated if he had kept it in. The effect of getting it on black and white was an emetic. He read it over, judged it inadequate, tore it up. I have done the same thing. I daresay you have."

The great man sat back. "His scrap-basket has been visited. The letter was there."

"Well, then, I suppose the short and long of it is, you will have him out to-morrow."

"As I said, you may suppose all you like."

"Without indiscretion then, may I suppose that you live here alone?"

Dunwoodie flourished his handkerchief. It was cotton and big as a towel.

"I am not as young as you are, sir, and whether erroneously or not, I believe myself better informed."

"Ah!" Jones put in. "Your physiognomy corroborates you. I have sometimes thought that it were difficult for the Seven Sages to be as wise as you look —which is the reason, perhaps, why I do not quite follow you."

"I did not imagine that you would. You are a sociable being. Every imbecile is pitiably sociable. But for a thinking man, a man without vices and without virtues, what is there except solitude?"

Appreciatively Jones motioned. "Thank you for descending to my level. As it happens, I also have a cloister where I have the double advantage of being by myself and of not being with others. But now that I am in your hermitage, there is this Matter of Ziegler, concerning which I would like the benefit of your professional advice."

"Hum! Ha! Got yourself mixed up with a woman and want me to pull you out. Well, sir, you will find it expensive. But a hermitage is not an office. I shall expect you at mine to-morrow. I shall expect you before ten."

Dunwoodie stood up. "To-morrow, though, your turpitudes will have to wait. Have you been served?"

Jones laughed. "Not yet."

"Time enough then. You can find the door?"

Through the lane, bordered by rubbish, and on through the winding hall, Jones went out. As Dunwoodie had said, there was time enough. There had been no service—no summons, no complaint. It might be that there would be none. The matter might adjust itself without any. It might be that there was no ground for action. Jones could not tell. After the manner of those who have crammed for a law examination, there had been a moment when he knew, or thought he knew, it all. But also after the manner of those who have not taken the post-graduate course which practice is, the crammed knowledge had gone. Only remnants and misfits remained. It was on these that he had conjectured the suit which, meanwhile, constituted a nut to crack. There was time and to spare though. Besides, for the moment, he had other things to do.

Then, as he went on to attend to them, he wondered why Dunwoodie, who, he thought, must make a hundred thousand a year, lived like a ragpicker.

Before him, the starshell, which imagination projects, burst suddenly.

He said he had no virtues and probably told the truth, Jones decided. In which case he cannot be a miser. But he also said he had no vices and probably lied like a thief. The old scoundrel is a philanthropist. I would wager an orchard of pippins on that, but there is no one to take me up—except this policeman.

"Officer," he resumed aloud. "Behold a stranger in a strange land. By any miracle, is there a taxi-stand nearby?"

Then presently Jones was directing a driver.

"The Tombs!"

XXXII

IN a dirty cell Lennox sat on a dirty cot. Through a door, dirty too, but barred, came a shuffle of feet, the sound of the caged at bay and that odour, perhaps unique, which prisons share, the smell of dry-rot, perspiration, disinfectants and poisoned teeth. In addition to the odour there was light, not much, but some. Nearby was a sink. Altogether it was a very nice cell, fit for the Kaiser. Lennox took no pleasure in it. Rage enveloped him. The rage was caused not by the cell but by his opinion of it. That was only human.

Events in themselves are empty. It is we who fill them. They become important or negligible, according to the point of view. We give them the colours, violent, agreeable, or merely neutral, that they obtain. It is the point of view that fills and affects them. The point of view can turn three walls and a door into a madhouse. It can convert them into an ivory tower. To Lennox they were merely revolting.

That morning he had laughed. His arrest amused him. He laughed at it, laughed at the police. They took no offence. Instead they took the cigars that he offered and a few accessories which they grabbed. It is a way the police have. Still Lennox laughed. He knew of course that at Headquarters he would be at once released, the entire incident properly regretted. When he found himself not only elaborately wrong but in court, laughter ceased. Anger replaced it. He had been first amused, then surprised, afterwards exasperated, emotions that finally addled into rage, not at others but at himself, which was rather decent. In any of the defeats of life, the simple blame others; the wise blame themselves; the evolved blame nobody. Lennox had not reached that high plane then but in directing his anger at himself he showed the advantages of civilisation which the war has put in such admirable relief.

Now, on that cot, in that cell, ragingly he retraced his steps. He saw himself loving Margaret Austen as though he were to love her forever. A hero can do no more. He saw her loving him with a love so light that a breath had blown it away. A nymph in the brake could do no worse. Yet whether on her part it were perversity or mere shallowness, the result was the same. It had landed him in jail. For that he acquitted her completely. What he could not forgive was his own stupidity in persisting in loving her after she had turned away.

The night before, while, at the opera, the Terra Addio was being sung, he had been writing her one of the endless letters that only those vomiting in an attack of indignation morbus ever produce. In the relief of getting it in black and white, the nausea abated. Then judging it all very idle, he tore the letter in two. It was a gesture made before relapsing into a silence which he had intended should be eternal. At the very moment when Paliser was being run through the gizzards, he, turning a page of life, had scrawled on it Hic jacet.

Now, on that cot, Paliser recurring, he thought of him with so little animosity that he judged his spectacular death inadequate. But who, he wondered, had staged it? Not Cassy. Cassy took things with too high a hand and reasonably perhaps, since she took them from where her temperament had placed her. Then, without further effort at the riddle, his thoughts drifted back to that afternoon when, from his rooms, the sunlight had followed her out like a dog.

He had been looking at the floor, but without seeing it. Then at once, without seeing it either, he saw something else, something which for a long time must have been there, something that had been acting on him and in him without his knowledge. It was the key to another prison, the key to the prison that life often is and which, in the great defeats, every man who is a man finds at his feet and usually without looking for it either.

"But I love her!" he suddenly exclaimed.

There is a magic in those words. No sooner were they uttered than his mind became a rendezvous of apparitions. He saw Cassy as he had seen her first, as he had seen her last, as he had seen her through all the changes and mutations of their acquaintance, saw her eyes lifted to his, saw her face turned from him.

The crystallisation which, operating in the myriad cells of the brain, creates our tastes, our temptations, our desires; creates them unknown to us, creates them even against our will, and which without his will or knowledge, had, like a chemical precipitate, been acting on him, then was complete.

"I love her!" he repeated.

The dirty cot, the dirty cell, the dirty floor, a point of view was transforming. At the moment they ceased to be revolting. Then immediately another view restored their charm.

"She won't have me!"

The dirty cell reshaped itself and he thought of life, a blind fate treacherous always.

"Good Lord, how I envy you!"

Lennox turned. Wriggling through the bars a hand which a keeper checked, stood Jones.

"When Cervantes enjoyed the advantages that you possess, the walls parted and through them cavalcaded the strumpet whose name is Fame. In circumstances equally inspiring Bunyan entertained that hussy. Verlaine too. From a dungeon she lifted him to Parnassus, lifted him to the top. If I only had their luck—and yours! It is too good for you. You don't appreciate it. Besides you will be out to-morrow."

"I ought not to be here at all," Lennox indignantly retorted.

"No, you are most undeserving. Mais écoute. C'est le père de la petite qui a fait le coup. Il me l'a avoué, ensuite il a claqué et depuis j'ai vu ton avocat. C'est une brute mais——"

"Can that," put in the keeper, a huge creature with a cauliflower face, dingy and gnarled. "You guys got to cough English."

Ingratiatingly Jones turned to him. "I mistook you for a distinguished foreigner. Dear me, my life is too full of pleasure!"

He turned to Lennox. "That's it. You are here to-day and gone to-morrow. Now that I have envied you insufficiently I'll go too. While I am about it I'll go to Park Avenue. Any message?"

"None."

"Make it briefer. Besides, look here. I'll wager a wilderness of pippins that Park Avenue was not and never thought of being engaged to what's his name.

I'll wager because it is not in the picture. Do you hear me?"

"I hear you."

"You are very gifted. Nothing wrong with your tongue, though, is there?"

"Nothing whatever."

"Behold then the messenger awaiting the message."

"Very good. I'm through. Absolutely, completely, entirely. If you must be a busybody say that. I'm through."

But that was not Jones' idea of the game and he out with it. "I'll do nothing of the kind."

"Won't you?" Lennox retorted. He had remained seated. But rising then, he looked at the keeper, motioned at Jones.

"If that man asks for me again, say I'm out."

Jones laughed. "Wow-wow, old cock! I wish I could have said that but I probably shall. Meanwhile book this: Dinner to-morrow, Athenæum at eight. By-bye. Remember Cervantes. Don't forget Verlaine. Sweet dreams."

Lennox sat down, looked at the key, tried to turn it. That door too was barred.

XXXIII

THE offices of Dunwoodie, Bramwell, Strawbridge and Cohen were supplied with a rotunda in which Jones sat waiting, and Jones loved to sit and wait.

Since the musician's tenement had crumbled and the soul of the violinist had gone forth, gone to the unseen assessors who pityingly, with indulgent hands, weigh our stupid sins, since then a week had passed. During it, a paper signed by the dead had been admitted by the living, a prisoner had been discharged and for no other imaginable reason than because he had killed nobody, Lennox became a hero.

New York is very forgetful. Lennox sank back into the blank anonymity to which humanity in the aggregate is eternally condemned and from which, at a bound, he had leaped. The papers were to tell of him again, but casually, without scareheads, among the yesterdays and aviators in France. That though was later.

Meanwhile an enigma remained. Very heroically a young man had done nothing. Hurrah and good-bye! The calciums of curiosity turned on an obscure fiddler who, after murdering another young man, had succeeded in bilking the chair.

But why had he killed him? That was the enigma, one which would have been exciting, if the solution had not been so prompt and so tame. At the proceedings which resulted in Lennox' discharge, it was testified that Angelo Cara had been temporarily deranged.

The testimony, expertly advanced by a novelist who was not an expert, the reporters grabbed before the court could rule it out. The grabbing was natural. The decedent's declaration had been made to Jones who, though not an alienist, was the teller of tales that have been translated into every polite language, including the Japanese, which is the politest of all. Moreover, have not the mendacious been properly subdivided into liars, damned liars and expert witnesses? To Verdun with the lot! Mr. Ten Eyck Jones was certainly not an expert, but certainly too he was somebody, he was a best-seller and in the way we live now, the testimony of the best-seller is entitled to every editorial respect. The court might rule his testimony out, city editors saluted it.

Jones' little invention did wash therefore and, in the washing, poured balm by the bucket over the father of the murdered man.

Then, gradually, like everything else, except war and the taxes, both murderer and murdered were dropped in the great dustbin of oblivion that awaits us all.

In the rotunda, meanwhile, Jones sat kicking his heels. It was in the morning, and always in the morning Jones was invisibly at work. Now, his routine upset, loathingly he kicked his heels. But Jones had ways of consoling himself that were very commonplace.

I am doing all the evil I can, he vindictively reflected, and it was with the comfort of his animosity about him that, ultimately, he was shown into an office—bright and, on this May forenoon, very airy—that gave on Broad Street.

Dunwoodie, twisting in a chair, glared at him.

"Ecce iterum Crispinus!" Jones tritely began. "What price retainers to-day?"

"I hoped to God I had seen the last of you," Dunwoodie, with elaborate, old-fashioned courtesy, replied.

Jones, disdaining to be asked, drew a chair.

Viciously Dunwoodie eyed him. "What the devil do you want?"

Jones smiled at him. "That decision."

"What decision, sir?"

"The one I cited when I brought you the paper that secured Lennox' discharge."

"Damme, sir, nothing of the kind. I would have had him discharged any way."

Jones' smile broadened. "You seem capable of anything. It is a great quality. Believe me, if I thought you lacked it, you would not now be enjoying my society."

"You flatter yourself strangely, sir. If you have nothing to say, don't keep on saying it."

"On the contrary, I am here to listen to you," Jones agreeably put in. "I want your views on that case, 'The Matter of Ziegler.'"

"Hum! Ha! Got yourself in a mess. Yaas. I remember. Been served yet? Give me the facts."

One after another, Jones produced them.

During their recital, Dunwoodie twirled his thumbs. At their conclusion, he expressed himself with entire freedom. After which, he saw Jones to the door, an act which he performed only when he felt particularly uncivil. At the moment the old bulldog's lip was lifted. But not at Jones.

Broad Street was very bright that day. Its brilliance did not extend to the market. Values were departing. The slump was on. Speculators, investors, the long and the shorts, bank-messengers, broker's-clerks, jostled Jones, who went around the corner, where a cavern gaped and swallowed him.

Crashingly the express carried him uptown. He did not know but that he might have lingered. There is always room at the top, though perhaps it is unwise to buy there. At the bottom, there is room too, much more. It is very gloomy, but it is the one safe place. Jones did not think that the market had got there yet. None the less it was inviting. On the other hand, he did think he might eat something. There was a restaurant that he wot of where, the week before, he had had a horrible bite. The restaurant was nauseating, but convenient. To that dual attraction he succumbed.

At table there, he meditated on the inscrutable possibilities of life which, he decided, is full of changes, particularly in the subway; whereupon a tale in Perrault's best manner occurred to him.

A waiter, loutish and yet infinitely dreary, intervened. Jones paid and went out on the upper reaches of Broadway. The fairy-tale that he had evoked accompanied him. It was charmful as only a fairy-tale can be. But the end, while happy, was hazy. He did not at all know whether it would do.

Abruptly he awoke.

"Will you come in?" Cassy was saying.

She had her every-day manner, her every-day clothes, her usual hat. Jones, noting these details, inwardly commended them. But at once, another detail was apparent. The entrance to the room where the Bella figlia had been succeeded by a dirge, was blocked. There was a table in it.

Cassy motioned. "I was trying to get it out when it got itself wedged there. Will you crawl under it, as I have to, or would you prefer to use it as a divan?"

"Where your ladyship crawleth, I will crawl," Jones gravely replied. "I just love going on all fours."

As he spoke he went under. With a sad little smile she followed.

"I know I ought to be in mourning," she told him as he brushed his knees.

She hesitated and sat down. She did not say that she lacked the money to buy the suits and trappings. She did not want to say that she had sold the table, which was the last relic of her early home, nor yet that she had been trying to get it out, in order to prevent the Jew purchaser from again coming in. Instead, she fingered her smock.

"I have been looking for an engagement and they don't want you in black."

Jones took a chair. "War has made mourning an anachronism in Europe. If it lasts long enough, it will do the same here and do the same with art. But you are very brave." He looked about. "I understood your father had a Cremona."

"The poor dear thought so, but a dealer to whom I took it said it was a Tyrolean copy."

Jones put down his hat. "The brutes always say something of the kind. What did it look like?"

Cassy glanced at him. "A flute, of course. What else would a violin look like?"

"You are quite right. I meant the colour."

"Oh, the colour! Madeira with a sheen in it."

"Yes!" Jones exclaimed. "That is the exact and precise description of the Amati varnish, of which the secret is lost. I hope you did not let the brute have it."

Cassy did not want to tell him that either. But when you are very forlorn it is hard to keep everything in.

"I needed a little for the funeral and he gave it to me."

"And it was worth thousands! Have you found an engagement?"

"The season is ending. Then too, either I have lost confidence or I am not up to it, not yet at least."

"I can understand that."

Cassy gestured. "It is not this empty room, it is the doors that slam. We know we should hasten to love those whom we do love, lest they leave us forever before we have loved them enough. But do we? We think we have time and to spare. I know I thought so. I was careless, forgetful, selfish. That is one of the doors. I can't close it."

"Time will."

"Perhaps. Meanwhile I am told I should change my name. At first, I felt very bitterly toward you for what you did here. It seemed inhuman of you. Since then I have realised that you could not have done otherwise. It saved Mr. Lennox. I would have done that."

"I am sure of it."

"But I won't change my name. I won't put such an affront on the poor dear who thought—yet there! I shall never know what he thought, but who, however wrongly, did it because of me. If only I had not told him! I ought never to have said a word. Never! That door slams the loudest. It wakes me. It is slamming all the time."

"That too shall pass."

Cassy doubted it. The door and the noise of it hurt. Her eyes filled. Yet, too sensitive to weep at anybody, even at an inkbeast, she stood up, went to the window and, while reabsorbing her tears, looked, or affected to look, at a lean stripe of blue sky.

Meditatively Jones considered her. "Fine day for a walk."

It was as though he had offered her a handkerchief. Tearful no longer, but annoyed, she turned and sat down.

"You seem very original."

"It is absentmindedness, I think. I meant to ask, are you ever down near the Stock Exchange?"

"That is where Mr. Lennox goes, isn't it?"

"There are others that frequent the neighbourhood. Among them is a deacon named Dunwoodie."

"Isn't he the lawyer who acted for Mr. Lennox?"

"Now you mention it, I believe he is. Anyway, I wonder if you would care to have him act for you?"

Cassy crossed her hands. "I don't understand you."

"For a moment or two, he didn't either. Then he said he would like to see you. That was an hour ago. I have just come from his office."

"But what in the world does he want of me? Everything is over now, isn't it? Or are there more doors? Really, if there are, I don't think I can stand it. I don't think I can, Mr. Jones."

"Yes, but there are doors that don't slam, doors that are closed and locked and barred. Sometimes there is romance behind them, sometimes there are santalwood boxes crammed with rubies; sometimes there are secrets, sometimes there are landscapes of beckoning palms. One never quite knows what there is behind closed doors. He may open one or two for you. Wouldn't it interest you to let him try?"

Cassy's eyelids had been a trifle tremulous, in her under-lip there had been also a little uncertainty. But at the vistas which the novelist dangled at her, she succeeded in looking, as she could look, immeasurably remote.

"That sort of thing is chorus-girl!"

Blankly Jones stared. "What sort of thing?"

"Why, you want me to bring an action. I will do nothing of the kind. Even if he were living, I would rather be dead. Besides, it was all my fault. I ought to have known better."

"Better than what?" enquired the novelist, who now had got his bearings.

"Mr. Jones, I told you all about it."

"Forgive me, if I seem to contradict you. You did not tell all."

Cassy stiffened.

"How could you?" Jones continued. "Details are so tiresome. To-day when I was talking to Dunwoodie, I advanced a few. Dunwoodie is a very ordinary person. Details bore you, they bore me. He dotes on them. By the way, you said something about changing your name. I wish you would. Couldn't you take mine?"

"You are ridiculous."

"As you like. Any one else would call me mercenary."

He's crazy, Cassy uncomfortably reflected. What shall I do?

Modestly the novelist motioned. "Ten Eyck Jones now! It doesn't rhyme with Victor Hugo or even with Andrew Carnegie, but it has a lilt. It might be worse."

"What are you talking about?" Cassy, with increasing discomfort, put in.

"There is a little thing that turns men into flint and women into putty. That's what I am talking about. I am talking money."

"Thank you. The subject does not interest me."

"Ah, but you are evolved! Would that the butcher were! We all have to consider his incapacities and money helps us. I have an idea that your dear departed may have left you a trifle."

"Really, Mr. Jones, you are talking nonsense."

"It is a specialty of mine."

"Besides, it is impossible."

"Impossible is a word that intelligent young women never employ."

"Very good. Admitting the possibility, I won't take it."

"It might be paid into your bank."

"I haven't any bank."

"One could be found for you."

"I would tell them not to accept it."

"The bank that won't accept money does not exist."

Cassy flushed. "I rather liked you. Couldn't you be less hateful?"

"You are trying to pick a quarrel with me."

"Nothing of the kind."

"Then will you let me take you to Dunwoodie?"

"Certainly not."

"Then will you go alone?"

"But why? Why should I? What does this man with an absurd name want of me?"

Jones pulled at a cuff. "Well, look at it from this angle. Before you discovered that your marriage was a sham, you were prepared to assume a few obligations and some of them may still subsist. The man with the absurd name can tell you what they are. Surely you are not a slacker. This is war-time."

With that abandonment which is so gracious in a woman, Cassy half raised a hand. "My front line is wavering."

Jones reached for his hat. "Over the top then!"

Under the table they crawled.

XXXIV

"YOUR very obedient servant, madam."

With that and a fine bow, Dunwoodie greeted Cassy when Jones had succeeded in getting her into the inner and airy office. The old ruffian drew a chair.

"Do me the honour."

Cassy sat down. What a funny old man, she thought.

Jones addressing the door, remarked dreamily: "Pendente lite, I will renew my acquaintance with Swinburne's 'Espousals.' "

Dunwoodie glared. "You will find it in the library." Then he sat down, folded his hands on his waistcoat and smiled at Cassy. "Nice day."

"Very."

"Down here often?"

Cassy shook her docked hair. "No, and I don't at all know why I am here now. I do know though, and I may as well tell you at once, I have no intention of making a fuss."

Dunwoodie's smile, a smile quasi-ogrish, semi-paternal, expanded. "If our Potsdam friend only resembled you!"

For a young woman so recently and doubly bereaved, Cassy's blue smock and yellow skirt seemed to him properly subdued. Moreover, from a word that

Jones had dropped, he realised that wealth had not presided at their selection.

He twirled his thumbs. "But let me ask, what may your full name be?"

"Bianca Cara."

"Hum! Ha! Most becoming. And how young are you?"

Well, I like that! thought Cassy, who answered: "Twenty-one."

Dunwoodie crossed his legs. "You think me an impertinent old man. I don't mean to be impertinent. I take a great interest in you."

"Very good of you, I'm sure."

"Not at all. Is your grandmother living?"

"For heaven's sake! You did not know her, did you?"

"No, but I stand ready to take her place."

"You would find it difficult. She is buried in Portugal."

"The place of your grandfather then, the place of any one whom you can trust."

"But why?"

"Well, let me ask. What are your plans?"

"My plans? Mr. Jones asked me that. I have a sort of a voice and I am looking for an engagement. But the season is ending. Then too I am told I ought to change my name. I won't do it."

"Hum! Ha! But it appears that you have."

He's crazy too, thought Cassy, who said: "I don't know what you are talking about."

Dunwoodie extracted his towel "Why, my dear young lady, you are Mrs. Paliser."

Cassy flushed. "I am nothing of the kind. I don't know how you got such an idea."

Dunwoodie, quite as though he were doing some hard thinking, folded and refolded that towel which was his handkerchief. "Yet you married Montagu Paliser, jr., did you not?"

"Not at all. That is I thought I did, but the man who performed the ceremony was a gardener."

"Dear me! Is it possible! And where was this?"

What is it to you? thought Cassy. "At Paliser Place, if you must know."

"And when did it occur?"

"Really, Mr. Dunwoodie, I can't see why you are putting me through this examination, but if it is of any benefit to you, it happened just five days before he died."

"Anybody about?"

"Oh, yes. There were two other servants who enjoyed it very much. I heard them laughing and I don't blame them. It was a rare treat. A child would have laughed at it. All my fault too. I behaved like a ninny. But my great mistake was in telling my father. I would give the world if I had not. Won't you please send for Mr. Jones? As I told you, I don't know why I am here."

Dunwoodie shook out the towel. "You must blame him then. He said you were Paliser's widow."

"Well, you see I am not."

"Yet you consented to be his wife."

"Whose? Mr. Jones'?"

"Paliser's, my dear young lady. However fictitious the ceremony, you consented to be Paliser's wife."

"What if I did? It has nothing to do with it now."

"Just a little, perhaps. Did you hear Jones say that he would renew his acquaintance with Swinburne?"

"From the way he talks, one might think he knew him by heart."

"Yaas, he is very objectionable. But you are referring to the poet. He was referring to the jurist. The jurist wrote a very fine book. Let me quote a passage from it. 'It is the present and perfect consent the which alone maketh matrimony, without either solemnisation or'—here, Dunwoodie, skipping the frank old English, substituted—'or anything else, for neither the one nor the other is the essence of matrimony, but consent only. Consensus non concubitus facit matrimoniam.' Hum! Ha! In other words, whether marriage is or is not contracted in facie ecclesiæ, it is consent alone that constitutes its validity. You understand Latin?"

Cassy laughed. "I dream in it."

Dunwoodie laughed too. "Pleasant dreams to you always. But what I have quoted was the common law, and so remained until altered by the Revised Statutes, with which no doubt you are equally familiar."

Cassy smoothed her frock. "I was brought up on them."

"I don't need to tell you then that when adopted here they provided that marriage should be a civil contract. In so providing, they merely reaffirmed the existing common law. Subsequently, the law was changed. The legislature enacted that a marriage must be solemnised by certain persons—ecclesiastic, judicial or municipal—or else, that it should be entered into by written contract, which contract was to be filed in the office of the town clerk. Coincidentally the legislature prohibited any marriage contracted otherwise than in the manner then prescribed."

That morning Cassy had been to an agent, a saponacious person with a fabulous nose. At the moment the nose was before her. She was wondering whether it would scent out for her an engagement.

"However," Dunwoodie, twisting the edge of his towel, continued, "various amendments were afterward adopted and certain sections repealed. Among the latter was the one containing the prohibition which I have cited. In my opinion, it was not the intention of the legislature to repeal it. Yet, however that may be, repealed it was. Since then, or, more exactly, a few weeks ago, the enactments regarding the manner in which marriage must be solemnised were held to be not mandatory but directory, the result being that the law originally prevailing has now come again into operation, common-law marriages are as valid as before and——"

Here Dunwoodie flaunted the towel.

"And you are Mrs. Paliser."

Of the entire exposition, Cassy heard but that. It ousted the agent and his fabulous nose. She bristled.

"I can't be. I don't want to be. You don't seem to see that the clergyman was not a clergyman at all. He was one of the help there. I thought I told you. Why, there was not even a license! That man said he had one. It was only another of the whimsicalities that took me in."

Dunwoodie repocketing the towel, showed his yellow teeth. "A young gentlewoman who dreams in Latin, and who was brought up on the Revised Statutes, must be familiar with Byron. 'Men were deceivers ever.' Not long ago, a Lovelace whose history is given in the New York Reports conducted himself in a manner that would be precisely analogous to that of your late husband, were it not that, instead of dying, he did what was less judicious, he married again—and was sent up for bigamy. He too had omitted to secure a license. He also entertained a lady with a fancy-ball. None the less, the Supreme Court decided that he had legally tied the matrimonial noose about him and that decision the Court of Appeals affirmed."

Cassy shook her pretty self. "Well, even so, I don't see what difference it makes, now at any rate. He is dead and that is the end of it."

"Hum! Not entirely. As widow you are entitled to a share in such property as your late husband possessed. How much, or how little, he did possess I cannot say. But I assume that such share of it as may accrue, will be—ha!—adequate for you."

"But he hadn't anything. He told me so."

"He didn't always tell you the truth though, did he? In any event it is probable that he left enough to provide for your maintenance."

Cassy threw up her hands. "Never in the world."

Dunwoodie again ran his eyes over the severity of her costume. "You think it would be inadequate?"

But Cassy was angry. "I don't think anything about it. Whether it would or would not be adequate, does not make the slightest difference. I won't take it."

"Ha! And why not?"

Cassy fumed. "Why not? But isn't it evident? That man had no intention of marrying me, no intention whatever of leaving me a cent."

"As it happens, he did both."

Cassy clenched her small fist. "No matter. He did not intend to and don't you see if I were to accept a ha'penny of his wretched money, I would be benefiting by a crime for which may God forgive my poor, dear father."

There was a point which the legislature had not considered, which not one of all the New York Reports construed, a point not of law but of conscience, a point for a tribunal other than that which sits in banco. It floored Dunwoodie.

Damnation, she's splendid, he decided as, mentally, he picked himself up. But it would never do to say so and he turned on her his famous look.

"Madam, once your marriage is established, the money becomes rightfully and legally yours, unless——"

With that look he was frowning at this handsome girl who took law and order with such a high hand. But behind the frown was a desire, which he restrained, to hug her.

Frowning still he looked from Cassy to the door and there at a boy, who was poking through it a nose on which freckles were strewn thick as bran.

"Mr. Rymple, sir, says he has an appointment."

The old ruffian, rising, turned to Cassy. "One moment, if you please."

The door, caught in a draught, slammed after him, though less violently than other doors that were slamming still. Would they never stop? Cassy wondered. Would they slam forever? Were there no rooms in life where she might enter and find the silence that is peace? Surely, some time, somewhere that silence might be hers.

She turned. Jones, looking extremely disagreeable, was walking in.

Cassy, closing her ears to those doors, exclaimed at him. "Here's a pretty how d'ye do. Mr. Dunwoodie says I am Mrs. Paliser."

"That afternoon, when you sent your love to my cat, I could have told you that. In fact I did."

From Jones' air and manner you would have said that he was willing and able to bite a ten-penny nail.

Cassy did not notice. "It appears, too, that I am entitled to some of his wretched money."

"It is unfortunate I did not know that also."

"I believe you did. But I sha'n't take it."

Jones drew a chair. Hatefully he looked her up and down.

"You are quite right. Sixty years ago there was but one millionaire in the country. The plutocrat had not appeared in the street, he had not even appeared in the dictionary. The breed was unknown. To-day there are herds of such creatures. I was reading the statistics recently and they depressed me beyond words. It is always depressing to know how much money other people have. You are quite right not to suffer poor devils to be depressed by you."

Mrs. Yallum! thought Cassy, who said as much; "I don't know what you are talking about."

"You are very intelligent. I am talking small change."

Cassy gave a shrug. "Mr. Dunwoodie said I would have enough to live on. I can do as well as that myself, thank you."

"No doubt," Jones snarled. "I am even sure you could do worse. It is extraordinary how much one can accomplish in refusing a dollar or two that might save another man's life. To hell with everybody! That is the noble attitude. I admire your spirit. A handful of bank-notes are crying at you: 'I'm yours, take me, give me to the wounded, to the starving!'

Not a bit of it. The Viscountess of Casa-Evora is too proud. That's superb."

Cassy turned on him. "See here, young man——"

"Don't you young man me," Jones irritably cut in. "In the rotunda out there, Dunwoodie gave me a foretaste of your swank and I can tell you I relished it. You won't look at a penny of this money because, if you did, you would be benefiting by an act committed by your father, who, as sure as you live, was impelled by the powers invisible to rid the earth of Paliser and to rid it of him for no other reason than that this money might serve a world in flames. Refused by you it will only revert to an old rounder who never did a good deed in his life; whereas, instead, it could call down blessings on your father's grave. But no, perish the thought! All that is leather and prunella to a young woman who regards herself as the arbiter of destiny. By God, you are prodigious!"

"I think you are horrid."

"So are you. You are the heiress to millions and millions. No wonder you put on airs."

Occasionally, to exceptional beings, a hand issuing from nowhere offers a cup brimming with madness, filled to the top with follies and dreams.

At that cup Cassy stared. It was unreal. If she tried to touch it, it would vanish.

"It is impossible!" she cried.

Jones looked about. "Where is my harp?"

Cassy did not know, she could not tell him. She had not even heard. A crater in the Wall Street sky had opened and from it, in an enchanted shower, fell sequins, opals, perfumes and stars.

But Jones must have found his harp. To that shower he was strumming an accompaniment.

"In to-day's paper there is a Red Cross appeal which says that what we give is gone. It is incredible, but educated people believe it. The ignorance of educated people is affecting. By reason of their education, which now and then includes mythology, they believe that happiness is the greatest of all the gifts that the gods can bestow. Being mortal, they try to obtain it. Being ignorant, they fail. Ignorance confounds pleasure with happiness. Pleasure comes from without, happiness from within. People may be very gay and profoundly miserable, really rich and terribly poor. In either case their condition is due to the fact that the happiness which they sought, they sought for themselves. Their error would be stupid were it not pathetic. In seeking happiness for themselves they fail to find it, but when they succeed in securing it for others, they find that on them also it has been bestowed. The money we give is not gone. It comes back to us. It returns in happiness and all the happiness that the richest, the poorest, the wisest, the stupidest can ever possess, is precisely that happiness which they have given away."

Where now where those doors? Cassy, the cascade of flowers and stars about her, looked at the harper. In listening to him, the doors had ceased to slam. About them there was peace. But her eyes had filled.

Jones was still at it.

"The greatest happiness is the cessation of pain. That pagan aphorism the Red Cross might put on its banners. Spiritually it is defective, but practically it is sound and some relief the Red Cross supplies. Give to it. You can put your money to no fairer use. It will hallow the grave where your father lies."

From beyond, from the adjacent Curb, came the shouts of brokers.

Jones, abandoning his harp, looked over at the girl. "What are you crying about?"

"I am not crying," spluttered Cassy, who was blubbering like a baby. "I never cry. It is disgusting of you to say so."

"You are crying."

"I am not crying," Cassy, indignantly sniffing and sobbing, snapped at him. Fiercely she rubbed her eyes. "It is none of your business, anyhow." Pausing, she choked, recovered and blearily added: "And, anyway, if the money is mine, really mine, honestly mine, I will give it away, all of it, every p—penny."

"No, no, not all of it," Jones hastily threw in, for now the door was opening and Dunwoodie appeared. "Keep a pear for your thirst, put a little million aside."

He turned to the lawyer. "Mrs. Paliser accepts her responsibilities."

"Hum! Ha!" The great man sat down and looked at Cassy. He looked many things but he said very few. "My dear young lady, familiar as you are with Latin, with law and with literature, who am I to remind you that chickens should first be hatched? Your rights may be contested. The Paliser Case, as it will be called, may——"

"The Paliser Case!" interjected Jones, who could see the headline from where he sat. "Shade of Blackstone! It will be famous! It will be filmed! The eminent jurist here will be screened and you, too, my lady."

Balefully Dunwoodie shot a glance at the inkbeast and another at Cassy.

"It may last some time. I have no doubt of the result. None whatever. But in spite of your legal knowledge I suggest that you have associate counsel. Now, permit me to ask, would you care to retain me or would you prefer some one else?"

Cassy, who had dried her eyes, looked at him and it was remarkable how pretty she looked.

"Why, no, Mr. Dunwoodie, I would much rather have you, only——" Uncertainly she paused.

The eminent jurist took it up. "Only what?"

"Well, all I know about law is that it is very expensive and I have nothing except my grandfather's portrait."

Dunwoodie touched a button. "Ha! One moment."

A thin young man, with a pasty face and a slight stoop, opened the door.

The old ruffian raised a stubby finger. "Purdy, a cheque for a thousand dollars, to the order of Bianca Paliser, is to be mailed to this lady to-night."

"But, Mr. Dunwoodie!" Cassy exclaimed.

"You must allow me to be your banker," he told her, and turned again to the clerk. "Get Mr. Jeroloman. Say, with my compliments, I shall be obliged if he will look in here. And, Purdy, see to it that that cheque is attended to. Mrs. Paliser will give you her address."

"But, Mr. Dunwoodie!" Cassy exclaimed again, as the sallow youth went out.

To distract her attention, instantly Jones improvised a limerick. "There was a young man named Purdy, who was not what you'd call very sturdy. To be more of a sport, he drank gin by the quart, and danced on a hurdy-gurdy."

"You're insane," announced Cassy, who was a trifle demented herself.

Dunwoodie extracted his towel. "Jeroloman is the attorney for the other side. He will want to meet Mrs. Paliser, but that honour will not be his to-day."

Cassy stood up. "I should hope not. He would be the last camel on the straw—I mean the last straw on the camel."

Dunwoodie, rising also, gave her his fine bow and to Jones a hand.

Then as the two made for the door, from over her shoulder she smiled back at him.

"My grandmother could not have been nicer."

"What do you mean by that?" Jones absently inquired.

But, in the rotunda now, Mr. Purdy was asking her address. If he had dared he would have followed her there. Fortune favouring, he would have followed her to the ends of the earth. It was what one of our allies calls the thunderbolt. Never before had he beheld such a face. Earnestly he prayed that he might behold it again. Allah is great. The prayer was granted.

In the cañon below, Jones, as he piloted her to the subway, pulled at his gloves.

"If I had the ability, I would write an opera, call it 'Danaë' and offer you the title-rôle."

Cassy, her thoughts on her grandmother, repeated it. "Danaë?"

"Yes, the lady disconnected by marriage with Jupiter who tubbed her in gold—gold ink, I suppose. But as I am not a composer I shall put you between the sheets—of a novel I mean. Fiction has its consolations."

But now, leaving the cañon, they entered a cavern which a tunnel fluted. There Cassy looked up at the inkbeast. "How is Mr. Lennox? Do you see him?"

"I find it very difficult not to. Unattached people are sticky as flies. When Lennox was engaged, he was invisible. Now he is all over the place."

From the tunnel a train erupted. It came with the belch of a monstrous beetle, red-eyed and menacing, hastening terribly to some horrible task.

Jones, shoving the girl into its bowels, added: "I was happier when he was jugged."

A corner beckoned. There, as the beetle resumed its flight, the novelist spread his wings.

"I would have wagered a red pippin that you couldn't say Jack Robinson before he and that young woman were convoluting joyously. I even planned to be best man. Saw my tailor about it. Whether it were on that account or not the Lords of Karma only know, but he told Miss Austen to go to hell."

Cassy started. From before her everything was receding.

Jones noting the movement, interpreted it naturally and therefore stupidly. He apologised.

"Forgive me. I picture you as Our Lady of the Immaculate Conversation. Forgive me, then. Besides, what Lennox did say, he said with less elegance. He said: 'I'm through.' Yes and asked me to repeat it to her. I studiously omitted to, but as Proteus—Mr. Blount in private life—somewhere expressed it, 'Hell has no more fixed or absolute decree.'"

Because of the crashing beetle Jones had to shout it. He shouted it in Cassy's ear. It was a lovely ear and Jones was aware of it. But only professionally. Since that night in Naples when, by way of keepsake, he got a dagger in his back, he had entertained the belief that a novelist should have everything, even to sex, in his brain. Such theories are very safe. Jones' admirations were not therefore carnal. To Balzac, a pretty woman was a plot. Cassy was a plot to Jones, who continued to shout.

"If Lennox and Margaret Austen moved and had their being in a novel of mine, the wedding-bells would now be ringing at a cradle in the last chapter. Commercially it would be my duty to supply that happy and always unexpected touch. I even made a bet about it, which shows how iniquitous gambling is. What's more, it shows that I must have an unsuspected talent for picture-plays. As it was in heaven, so it is now in the movies. It is there that marriages are made. But forgive me again. I am talking shop."

The renewed apology was needless. Though Jones shouted, Cassy did not hear. It was not the clattering beetle that interfered. To that also Cassy was deaf. She heard nothing. The echo of noisy millions had gone. The slamming doors were silent. But her face was pale as running water when, the beetle at last abandoned, she thanked Jones for seeing her all the way.

All the way to where? God, if she only knew!

XXXV

LATER that day, Jeroloman, the attorney for the other side, who at the time had no idea that there was another side, or any side at all, entered the rotunda and asked for Dunwoodie.

In asking, he removed his hat, glanced at its glisten, put it on again. The hat was silk. It topped iron grey hair, steel-blue eyes, a turn-under nose, a thin-lipped mouth, a pointed chin, a stand-up collar, a dark neckcloth, a morning coat, grey gloves, grey trousers, drab spats and patent-leather boots. These attributes gave him an air that was intensely respectable, equally tiresome. One pitied his wife.

"This way, sir."

In the inner and airy office, Dunwoodie nodded, motioned at a chair.

"Ha! Very good of you to trouble."

Jeroloman, seating himself, again removed his hat. Before he could dispose of it, Dunwoodie was at him.

"Young Paliser's estate. In round figures what does it amount to?"

Jeroloman, selecting a safe place on the table, put the hat on it and answered, not sparringly, there was nothing to spar about, but with civil indifference: "Interested professionally?"

"His widow is my client."

Jeroloman's eyes fastened themselves on Dunwoodie, who he knew was incapable of anything that savoured, however remotely, of shysterism. But it was a year and a day since he had been closeted with him. In the interim, time had told. Diverting those eyes, he displayed a smile that was chill and dental.

"Well, well! We all make mistakes. There is no such person." He paused, awaiting the possible protest. None came and he added: "The morning after the murder, his father told me that the young man contemplated marriage with a lady who had his entire approval. Unfortunately——"

"Yaas," Dunwoodie broke in. "Unfortunately, as you say. The morning after was the 26th. On the 21st, a gardener, who pretended to be a clergyman, officiated at his marriage to my client."

Dryly but involuntarily Jeroloman laughed. Dunwoodie was getting on, getting old. In his day he had been remarkably able. That day had gone.

"Well, well! Even admitting that such a thing could have happened, it must have been only by way of a lark."

Dunwoodie whipped out his towel. "You don't say so!"

Carelessly Jeroloman surveyed him. He was certainly senile, yet, because of his laurels, entitled to all the honours of war.

"Look here, Mr. Dunwoodie. You are not by any chance serious, are you?"

"Oh, I'm looking. While I was about it, I looked into the case. Per verba de præsenti, my client consented to be young Paliser's wife. Now she is his widow."

Jeroloman weighed it. The weighing took but an instant. Dunwoodie was living in the past, but there was no use in beating about the bush and he said as much.

"You are thinking of the common law, sir."

Absently Dunwoodie creased his towel. "Now you mention it, I believe I am."

Jeroloman glanced at his watch. It was getting late. His residence was five miles away. He was to dress, dine early and take his wife to the theatre. He would have to hurry and he reached for his hat.

"The common law was abrogated long ago."

Dunwoodie rumpled the towel. "Why, so it was!"

Jeroloman took the hat and with a gloved finger rubbed at the brim. "Even otherwise, the term common-law wife is not legally recognised. The law looks with no favour on the connection indicated by it. The term is synonymous for a woman who, having lived illicitly with a man, seeks to assume the relationship of wife after his death and thereby share in the proceeds of his property."

From under beetling brows, Dunwoodie looked at him. "Thanks for the lecture, Jeroloman. My client has no such desire. In this office, an hour ago, she refused them."

Jeroloman stood up. "Very sensible of her, I'm sure." He twirled the hat. "Who is she?"

"I thought I told you. She is Mrs. Paliser."

Jeroloman waved that hat. "Well, well! I thought I told you. As it is, if you will take the trouble to look at the laws of 1901, you will find that common-law marriages are inhibited."

"Hum! Ha! And if you will trouble to look at the Laws of 1907, you will find they are inhibited no longer."

Jeroloman stared. "I have yet to learn of it."

Dunwoodie repocketed his towel. "Is it possible? Then when the opportunity occurs you might inform yourself. At the same time let me recommend the Court of Appeals for March. You may find there additional instruction. But I see you are going. Don't let me detain you."

Jeroloman sat down. "What case are you referring to?"

"The Matter of Ziegler."

Uncertainly Jeroloman's steel-blue eyes shifted. "It seems to me I read the syllabus."

"Then your powers of concealment are admirable."

"But just what does it hold?"

"Can it be that you don't remember? Well, well! —to borrow your own agreeable mode of expression —it holds that common-law marriages that were valid before and until the enactments which you were good enough to cite, were again made valid by their appeal in Chapter 742 of the Laws of 1907."

"But," Jeroloman began and paused. "But——" He paused again.

Comfortably Dunwoodie helped him. "Yes?"

"You say that marriages valid before and until the Laws of 1901 are, by virtue of a repeal, now valid again?"

"That is what I say, Jeroloman. Merely that and nothing more. In addition to the Ziegler case, let me commend to you 'The Raven.'"

"Let's get down to facts, sir. From your account of it, this alleged marriage never could have been valid."

Dunwoodie wiped his mouth. "Dear me! I had no idea that my account of it could lead to such interesting views. You do surprise me."

"Mr. Dunwoodie, you said the ceremony was performed by a gardener who pretended to be a clergyman. Those were your very words."

"Yaas. Let the cat out of the bag, didn't I?"

Archly but chillily Jeroloman smiled. "Well, no, I would not care to put it in that way, but your office-boy must know that false representations void it."

"Good Lord!" Dunwoodie exclaimed. It was as though he had been hit in the stomach.

Jeroloman, who was eyeing him, gave a little nod that was tantamount to saying, "Take that!"

But Dunwoodie was recovering. He sat back, looked admiringly at Jeroloman, clasped his hands and twirled his thumbs.

Jeroloman, annoyed at the attitude and in haste to be going, pursed his thin lips. "Well, sir?"

With an affability that was as unusual as it was suspicious, Dunwoodie smiled at him. "Your objection is well taken. Not an hour ago, in that chair in which you are sitting, this lady, my client, who not once in her sweet life has opened the Revised Statutes, and who, to save it, could not tell the difference between them and the Code, well, sir, she entered that same objection."

"I don't see——"

"Nor did she, God bless her! And I fear I wearied her with my reasons for not sustaining it. But I did not tell her, what I may confide in you, that in Hays versus The People—25 New York—it is held immaterial whether a person who pretended to solemnise a marriage contract, was or was not a clergyman, or whether either party to the contract was deceived by false representations of this character. Hum! Ha!"

Jeroloman pulled at his long chin. In so doing he rubbed his hat the wrong way. He did not notice. That he was to dress, dine early, take his wife to the theatre, that it was getting late and that his residence was five miles away, all these things were forgotten. What he saw were abominations that his client would abhor—the suit, the notoriety, the exposure, the whole dirty business dumped before the public's greedy and shining eyes.

"Who is she?" he suddenly asked.

"Who was she?" Dunwoodie corrected. "Miss Cara."

Jeroloman started and dropped his hat. "Not——?"

Dunwoodie nodded. "His daughter."

Jeroloman, bending over, recovered his hat. Before it, a picture floated. It represented an assassin's child gutting the estate of a son whom the father had murdered. It was a bit too cubist. Somewhere he had seen another picture of that school. It showed a young woman falling downstairs. He did not know but that he might reproduce it. At least he could try. Meanwhile it was just as well to take the model's measure and again his eyes fastened on Dunwoodie.

"What do you suggest?"

Dunwoodie, loosening his clasped hands, beat with the fingers a tattoo on his waistcoat.

"Let me see. There is 'The Raven,' the first primer, the multiplication table. Is it for your enlightenment that you ask?"

Jeroloman moistened his lips. Precise, careful, capable, intensely respectable, none the less he could have struck him. A moment only. From the sleeve of his coat he flicked, or affected to flick, a speck.

"Yes, thank you, for my enlightenment. You have not told me what your client wants."

"What a woman wants is usually beyond masculine comprehension."

Methodically Jeroloman dusted his hat. "You might enquire. We, none of us, favour litigation. In the interests of my client I always try to avoid it and, while at present I have no authority, yet—— Well, well! Between ourselves, how would a ponderable amount, four or five thousand, how would that do?"

Blandly Dunwoodie looked at this man, who was trying to take Cassy's measure.

"For what?"

"To settle it."

That bland air, where was it? In its place was the look which occasionally the ruffian turned on the Bench.

"Hum! Ha! Then for your further enlightenment let me inform you that my client will settle it for what she is legally entitled to, not one ponderable dollar more, not one ponderable copper less."

Mentally, from before that look, Jeroloman was retreating. Mentally as well, already he had reversed himself. He had judged Dunwoodie old, back-number, living in the past. Instead of which the fossil was what he always had been—just one too many. Though not perhaps for him. Not for Randolph F. Jeroloman. Not yet, at any rate. The points advanced were new, undigested, perhaps inexact, filled with discoverable flaws. Though, even so, how M. P. would view them was another kettle of fish. But that was as might be. He put on his hat and stood up.

"Very good. I will give the matter my attention."

"Do," Dunwoodie, with that same look, retorted, "And meanwhile I will apply for letters of administration. Hum! Ha! My compliments to your good lady."

He turned in his chair. Attention, indeed! He knew what that meant. The matter would be submitted to M. P. The old devil had not a leg to stand on, he lacked even a crutch, and in that impotent, dismembered and helpless condition he would be thrown out of court. A ponderable amount! Hum!

For a moment he considered the case. But it may be that already it had been heard and adjudged. Long since, perhaps, at some court of last resort, the Paliser Case had been decided.

XXXVI

ON the morrow, Jeroloman waited on his client, who received him in the library, an agreeable room in which there was nothing literary, but which succeeded at once in becoming extremely unpleasant.

M. P. was in tweeds. When his late lamented departed this life, he wore crêpe on his hat for ninety days. It was a tribute that he paid, not to the lady's virtues, which were notoriously absent; nor to any love of her, for he had disliked her exceedingly; nor yet because it was conventional, he hated conventionality; but, by Gad, sir, because it bucks the women up! All that was long ago. Since then he had become less fastidious. At his son's funeral he appeared in black.

Now, on this day, dressed in tweeds, he greeted Jeroloman with his usual cordiality.

"I hope to God you are not going to bother me about anything?"

The wicked old man, who had faced wicked facts before, faced a few of them then. The stench of the main fact had been passing from him, deodorised by the fumigating belief that his son had been killed by a lunatic. Now here it was again, more mephitic than ever, and for the whiffs of it with which Jeroloman was spraying him, he hated the man.

"Whom has she?"

"Dunwoodie."

He reviewed the bar. There was Bancroft, whose name was always in the papers and to whom clients flocked. There was Gwathmay, whom the papers ignored and whom only lawyers consulted. He might have either or both, the rest of the crew as well, and in spite of them all, unless he permitted himself to be done, the publicity would be just as resounding.

In the old nights, when social New York was a small and early, threats had amused him. "I have my hours for being blackmailed, this is not one of them," he had lightly remarked at a delightful gang. "Do your damnedest."

They took him at his word and so completely that the small and early saw him no more. What was that to him? There were other pastures, less scrumptious perhaps, but also far less fatiguing. He had not cared, not a rap. Behind him the yard of brass yodled in a manner quite as lordly as before. His high-steppers lost none of their sheen; his yacht retained all its effulgence; so, too, did the glare of his coin. No, he had not cared. But that was long ago, so long that it might have happened in an anterior existence. He had not cared then. Age is instructive. He had learned to since. Moreover, in testimony of his change of heart, a miracle had been vouchsafed. The affair at the Opera, attributed to a lunatic, had been buried safely, like his son, the scandal tossed in for shroud. How freely he had breathed since then! The little green bottle of menthe he had barely touched. He might live to see everything forgiven or, what is quite as satisfactory, forgotten. And now! Columns and columns, endlessly, day in, day out; the Paliser Case dragged from one court to another, the stench of it exceeded only by that of the Huns! But, by comparison, blackmail, however bitter, was sweet. When one may choose between honey and gall, decision is swift.

"What'll she take?"

Jeroloman, who had left his hat on the malachite bench in the hall, smoothed his gloves. He was about to reply. Before he could, his client shook a fist at him.

"The slut hasn't a cent. Came to the Place with a bundle, damn her. A suit like this costs something. Where's she going to get it? What'll she take?"

Jeroloman looked up from his gloves. "I don't know."

"Then find out."

"I offered Dunwoodie a ponderable amount."

"Well?"

"He refused it."

"Double it, then, triple it."

"Mr. Paliser, I'm sorry, but it won't do."

"Damnation, why not?"

"It is all or nothing with him and maybe nothing in the end. I told him so. I told him that the courts view with no favour a woman who, having lived illicitly with a man, claims, on his demise, to be his widow. Such a claim is but the declaration of a woman entered after the death of her alleged husband and, as such, is inadmissable under Section 829 of the Code. I have posted myself very thoroughly in the matter, though I find it has been held——"

"Damn what has been held. It's all or nothing, is it?"

Jeroloman pulled at his long chin.

All, the wicked old man reflected. All! All would be ten million and ten million was less than a tenth of his wealth—ten million for which he had no earthly need, which it would fatigue him to spend, burden him to hoard, disgrace him to fight for, and which, normally, would go to a brat whom he had never seen and whom, as next in line, he hated.

Already he had decided. Though, it may be that on planes of which he knew nothing, long since it had been decided for him.

None the less it hurt. It hurt horribly. From a pocket, he drew a little bottle.

"Settle it then."

"On what basis?"

"All and be damned to her."

But now the menthe that he had raised to his lips was trickling from the bottle, staining his tweeds. He hiccoughed, gasped, motioned.

"And good-day to you."

Below, on the malachite bench, a silk hat was waiting. When that hat again appeared in Dunwoodie's office, the Paliser Case was over. It had ended before it began.

XXXVII

CASSY sat in the kitchen. Before her were a cheque and a letter. The letter was from the theatre-man. The cheque was Dunwoodie's. The cheque begged to be cashed, the letter begged her to call.

During the night she had gone looking along an avenue where there were houses with candid windows from which faces peered and smiled. But it was not for these that she was looking and she awoke in a tempest of farewells.

Now, across the court, in the kitchen opposite, were two inoffensive beings. On that evening when her father had made her cry, they had seemed unreal. On this forenoon their baseless appearance persisted. But their unreality was not confined to them. Their kitchen, the court, the building shared it. They were all unreal, everything was, except one thing only, which perhaps was more unreal than all things else.

She looked at the letter and from it at the cheque. The day before, on returning from the shower of millions that had caught and drenched her in Broad Street, she was not entirely dry. The glisten of the golden rain hung all about her. None the less on reaching the walk-up she forgot it. There were other matters, more important, that she had in mind. But only a philosopher could be drenched as she had been and remain unaffected. The bath is too voluptuous for the normal heart. On its waters float argosies crimson-hulled, purple-rigged, freighted with dreams come true. You have but a gesture to make. Those dreams are spaniels crouching at your feet. At a bath not dissimilar but financially far shallower, Monte Cristo cried: "The world is mine!" It was very amusing of him. But though, since then, values have varied, a bagatelle of ten millions is deep enough for any girl, sufficiently deep at least for its depths to hold strange things.

At those things, strange indeed and yet not unfamiliar, Cassy beckoned. In their embrace she saw herself, as Jones had pictured her, going about, giving money away, strewing it full-handed, changing sobs into smiles. The picture lacked novelty. Often she had dreamed it. Only recently, on the afternoon just before the clock struck twelve, just before the gardener lit his pipe and the mask had fallen, only then, and, relatively, that was but yesterday, she had promenaded in it. It was a dream she had dreamed when a child, that had haunted her girlhood, that had abided since then. It was the dream of a dream she had dreamed without daring to believe in its truth. Now, from the core of the web that is spun by the spiderous fates, out it had sprung. There, before her eyes, within her grasp was that miracle, a rainbow solidified, vapour made tangible, a dream no longer a dream but a palette and a palette that you could toss in the air, put in the bank, secrete or squander, a palette with which you could paint the hours and make them twist to jewelled harps. No more walk-up! Good-bye, kitchy! Harlem, addio! The gentleman with the fabulous nose could whistle. Vaudeville, indeed! She could buy the shop, buy a dozen of them, tear them down, build them up, throw them into one and sing there, sing what she liked, when she liked, as she liked. Yes, but for whom? God of gods, for whom?

A local newspaper bears—or bore—a sage device: La nuit porte conseil. That night, on her white bed, in her black room, Cassy sought it. But the counsel that night brings is not delivered while you toss about. Night waits until you sleep. Then, to the subjective self that never sleeps, the message is delivered. It may be fallible, often it is and, in our scheme of things, what is there that is not? Yet in any dilemma bad advice may be better than none. Then, without transition, the black room changed into an avenue where faces peered and smiled. It was not though for these that she was looking, but for her way. It must have been very narrow. Though she looked and looked she could not find it. Yet it was near, perhaps just around the corner. But in some manner, she could not reach it. Sleep sank her deeper. When she awoke, there it was.

Now as she sat in the kitchen, before which, in the kitchen opposite, bundles of baseless appearances came and went, she began counting her wealth on her fingers. Youth! Up went her thumb. Health! The forefinger. Lungs! The second finger. Not being a fright! The fourth. How rich she was! But was there not something else? Oh, yes! Sadly she smiled. A clear conscience! She had forgotten that and that came first. Youth, health, lungs, looks, these were gamblers' tokens in the great roulette of life. In the hazards of chance at any moment she might lose one or all, as eventually she must lose them and remain no poorer than before. But her first asset which she had counted last, that was her fortune, the estate she held by virtue of a trust so guardedly created that if she lost one mite, the whole treasure was withdrawn.

On the washtub—covered admirably with linoleum —at which she sat, were the cheque for a thousand dollars and the bid from the vaudeville man. The bid, she knew, meant money. But the cheque would beggar her.

She drew breath and sat back. From above a filter of sunlight fell and told her it was noon. Across the court the bundles of baseless appearances transformed themselves into a real woman, an actual child. The kitchen in which they moved, the house in which they dwelled were no longer the perceptions of a perceiver. They also were real. So, too, was life.

An hour and Mr. Purdy's pasty face turned feebly red. He stammered it.

No, unfortunately, Mr. Dunwoodie was out. Would Mrs. Paliser wait? In Mr. Dunwoodie's private office? And the 'Herald' perhaps or the 'Times'—or —or——

Everything there, Broad Street to boot, the Stock Exchange included, Mr. Purdy was ready and anxious to offer.

No, Mrs. Paliser would not wait—and mentally she thanked her stars for it. But would Mr. Purdy do something for her?

Would he! The brave spirit of Talleyrand must have animated that sickly young man. If what Mrs. Paliser desired were possible it would be done: if impossible, it was done already.

Cassy gave him the rare seduction of her smile. She also was entertaining an emotion or two. She had not at all known where she would find the strength to confront and confute a grandmotherly old ruffian. But luck was with her. He was out.

So very good of Mr. Purdy then and would he please give Mr. Dunwoodie this cheque and say she's sorry she can't accept it or the other money either? She had said she would, but, really, it was not intended for her. Supposing she took it. She would feel like a thief in a fog. Exactly that. A thief in a fog. No, she couldn't. Couldn't and wouldn't. Just as grateful though to Mr. Dunwoodie. Her regrets to him and a thousand thanks.

"And good-day, Mr. Purdy. I thank you also."

Mr. Purdy, flushing feebly, saw her to the door, saw her to the hall without. There, while he waited with her for a descending lift, a silk hat that had just come from a malachite bench, alighted from an ascending one. Immediately the other lift took her.

"Who was that?" the hat's owner alertly asked.

Mr. Purdy rubbed his perspiring hands. "Mrs. Paliser."

Jeroloman wheeled like a rat. He looked at the cage. It had vanished. He looked at the other. Above it a moving finger pointed upward. Cold-blooded, meticulously precise, intensely respectable, none the less, for one delirious second, madness seized him. He wished to God he could hurry down, overtake the impostor, lure her into his own office, frighten her out of such wits as she possessed and buy her off for tuppence. Instantly Respectability had him by the collar. He could not. Precision gave him a kick. Wouldn't stand if he did.

Deeply he swore. The millions were gone. Hands down, without a struggle, the Paliser estate was rooked. No fault of his though, and mechanically he adjusted that hat. Damn her!

In the street below, superbly, with sidereal indifference, the sun shone down on the imbecile activities of man. The storm of the day before that had drenched Cassy so abundantly, had been blown afar, blown from her forever. The sky in which a volcano had formed was remote and empty.

"Ouf!" Cassy muttered in relief and muttered, too: "Now for the agent!"

She had reached the corner. Just beyond was the subway. It would land her within two squares of the man's greasy office. Now, though, suddenly, she felt a gnawing. A sandwich would taste good. Two sandwiches would taste better. Then, quite as suddenly, that vision, the street with it, everything, except one thing only, vanished.

Blocking the way stood Lennox.

"Where to in such a hurry?"

Easily she smiled and told him. "I'm going to buy a rhinoceros." But for all the easiness of it her tongue nearly tripped. "And what are you doing?"

"I? Oh! Cleaning up."

Wall Street is not a Japanese tea-garden. It lacks the klop-klop of fountains. Yet, even in its metallic roar there may—for exceptional beings—be peace there. Not for Cassy, though. She could have screamed.

A moment only. Lennox turned and both moved on.

"Let's get out of this."

Cassy looked up at him. "You forget my little errand."

"Ah, yes! The rhinoceros. Couldn't you ask me to meet him?"

"I shall be giving dinner-parties for him every evening. Would you care to come?"

They had reached cavernous steps down which Cassy was going.

Lennox raised his hat. "I will come to-night."

Through the metallic roar, the four words dropped and hummed.

XXXVIII

"IT is going to be splendid. There will be candles!"—a young person, dead since but still living, exclaimed of her poet's fête. The fête, however lavish, and which you will find reported by Murger, was not held in a kitchen. The poet's garret did not contain a kitchen. That was Paris.

Hereabouts, nowadays, walk-ups are more ornate. Cassy's dinner that night was served on rich linoleum and not out of snobbishness either but because the table had gone from the living-room and though the piano remained one could not very well dine on that, or, for that matter, on the sofa. There are details into which a hostess never enters. Cassy—in black chiffon—did not offer any and Lennox—in evening clothes—did not ask. He had never dined in a kitchen before and, so far as the present historian knows not to the contrary, he did not dine in one again. But he enjoyed the experience. There was cold chicken, a salad, youth, youth's wine and running laughter. For dessert, a remark.

The rich linoleum then had been abandoned for the other room where Cassy sat on the sofa and Lennox on the one surviving chair. Beyond was the piano. Additionally, in some neighbourly flat, a phonograph performed.

Among these luxuries sweets were served. A question preceded them.

"Do you remember the afternoon you were in my rooms?"

Yes, Cassy remembered it.

Then came the remark. "That afternoon I laughed. Until to-night—except once—I haven't laughed since then."

Very good dessert, with more to follow.

"When you went, the sunlight went with you. It went out at your heels like a dog. I was thinking about it recently. I don't seem to have seen the sunlight again, until it played about your rhinoceros."

There are sweets that are bitter. Cassy took one.

"Mr. Jones told me. It does seem such a pity, such a great pity. I saw her once and I could see she was not merely good to look at but really good, good through and through."

"May I smoke?" Lennox asked.

Had he wished he could have stood on his head. Cassy nodded at him. He got out a cigar.

"Miss Austen is all you say. She is a saint. A man doesn't want a saint. A man wants flesh and blood."

Cassy took another bitter-sweet. "She's that. Any one would know it."

Lennox bit at the cigar. "Too good for me, though. So good that she threw me over."

Cassy put a finger through it. "She did not understand. Any girl might have done the same."

Sombrely Lennox considered her. "Would you? You say she did not understand. I know well enough she did not. But if you cared for a man, would you throw him over because of a charge which you could not be sure was true and without giving him a chance to disprove it? Would you?"

He could stand on his head, yes, but it was unfair to grill her. She flushed.

"I don't see what that has to do with it."

"How, you don't see?"

"Isn't it obvious? Miss Austen and I move in different worlds. On any subject our views might differ and I don't mean at all but that hers would be superior."

"There can be but one view of what's square."

"I am sure she meant to be."

Unconcernedly, Lennox smiled. The smile lit his face. From sombre it became radiant.

"That's all very well. The point is what you would think. Would you think it square to throw a man over as she threw me?"

Cassy showed her teeth. "If I didn't care for him, certainly I would."

"But if you did?"

That was too much. Cassy exclaimed at it. "If! If! How can I tell? I don't know. I lack experience."

"But not heart."

He was right about that, worse luck. How it beat, too! It would kill her though to have him suspect it.

"I do wish you would tell me," he added.

Cassy, casting about, felt like an imbecile and said brilliantly: "Haven't you a match? Shall I fetch one?"

Lennox extracted a little case. "Thanks. It's an answer I'd like."

It was enough to drive you mad and again casting about, but not getting it, she hedged.

"It will have to be in the abstract, then."

"Very good. Let's have it in the abstract."

Yet even in the abstract! However, with an uplift of the chin that gave her, she felt, an air of discussing a matter in which she had no concern at all, she plunged.

"One never knows, don't you know, but it seems to me that if by any chance I did care for a man—not that it is in the least presumable that I ever shall—but if I did, why, then, no. He couldn't get rid of me, not unless he tried very hard, but if he didn't, then no matter what I heard, no matter how true it might be, I would cling to his coat-tails, that is, if he wore them, and if, also, he cared for a ninny like me."

Cassy paused, shook her docked hair and solemnly resumed: "Which, of course, he couldn't."

"I knew you would say that."

"Say what?" Previously flushed, she reddened. But there is a God. The room had grown dim.

"That you wouldn't cut and run."

She could have slapped him. "Then why did you ask me?"

Lennox blew a ring of smoke.

"To have you see it as I do. To have you see that at the first flurry Miss Austen ran to cover. I am quite sure I could show her that she ran too quick, but I am equally sure it is a blessing that she did run. It is not ambitious of a man to want a girl who will stand her ground. Sooner or later some other flurry would have knocked the ground from under and then it might have been awkward. This one let me out."

He stood up, opened the window, dropped the cigar from it. The cigar might have been Margaret Austen.

"What are your plans?" he asked and sat again.

Ah, how much safer that was! Cassy grabbed at it.

"You are the third person to ask me. First, Mr. Jones. Then—then——" But she did not want to mention Dunwoodie or anything about the great cascade of gorgeous follies and she jumped them both. "Then an agent. He asked me yesterday and to-day he had a contract for me and a cheque in advance. He is a very horrid little man but so decent!"

"When does it begin?"

"The engagement? Next week. What plans have you?"

"A few that have been made for me. Presently we sail."

"For France?"

"For France."

It was cooler now, at least her face was, and she got up and switched the light.

"I wish I might go, too," she told him. "But I lack the training to be nurse and the means to be vivandière—canteener, I think they call it." She hesitated and added. "Shall I see you before you go?"

But now from the phonograph in the neighbourly flat, the Non te scordar drifted, sung nobly by some fat tenor who probably loathed it.

Lennox, who had risen with her, asked: "May I come to-morrow?"

The aria enveloped them and for a moment Cassy trilled in.

"Perhaps to-morrow you will sing for me," he continued.

"Yes, I'll sing."

Later, in the black room on the white bed, the fat tenor's tuneful prayer floated just above her. Cassy repeated the words and told herself she was silly. She may have been, but also she was tired. She knew it and for a moment wondered why. Painted hours dancing to jewelled harps are not to be sneezed at. But when they are not yours, when you have really no right to them, it is not fatiguing to say so. A gesture does not fatigue. It is certainly taxing to go to a greasy office, sign your name and receive a cheque.

Taxing but endurable. It is not that that does you up. It is argument that tires you, particularly when there is no need for any and you are forced to turn yourself inside out. How fortunate it was, though, that the room had been dark! In the balm of that, sleep took her.

The next day she had many things to do and succeeded in botching most of them. I have no mind for anything, she decided. What is the matter with me? But, at least, when at last she opened the door for him, there was nothing amiss with her appearance.

In the room where the piano was, she sat down on the bench and smiled up at him. "Shall I sing now?"

Lennox put his hat on the sofa. "If you don't mind my talking to you."

"Very good, we will have a duo."

Over the keys her fingers moved, sketching a melody, passing from it into another.

Beside the bench Lennox had drawn the only chair. He looked about, then at her.

"I remember so well the first time I came here."

Her lips tightened, but, suppressing the smile, she turned to him and said and so patiently:

"Is it a song without words you want, or words without song?"

Lennox leaned toward her. It was then or, it might be, never.

"It is you I want."

Cassy turned from him. Her fingers, prompted by a note, had gone from it into Gounod.

"Will you marry me?"

"Certainly not."

It was as though he had asked her to go skating. To mark the absurdity of it her voice mounted.

"Le printemps chasse les hivers——"

The words are imbecile but the air, which is charming, seemed to occupy her wholly.

"Et sourit dans les arbres verts——"

"I know you don't care for me but couldn't you try?"

"Eh?" Cassy stayed her fingers, reached for a score on the top of the upright. "I thought you wanted me to sing."

"I want to know whether you can't ever care for me."

It sang about her like a flute. Something else was singing, not the bird in her throat, for she had hushed it, but a bird in her heart. It had been singing ever since he had entered the room. It had been singing with her the duo of which lightly she had spoken. But it was singing too loud.

Hastily she replaced the score, pulled at another, shoved it back.

"Won't you tell me?" Lennox was asking.

It will burst, she thought. Sidling from the bench, she went to the sofa, looked at it as though she had never seen it before, and sat down.

"Won't you?" he repeated.

She glanced over at him. Apparently now she was calm as you please.

"People marry out of optimism, or at any rate I did. I have had my lesson, thank you."

Lennox stood up. "You have suffered——"

"I read somewhere," she cut in, "that we have to suffer terribly before we learn not to suffer at all." Pausing, she added: "I suppose then we are dead."

She was getting away from it and he rounded on her.

"See here! We have both been in hell, but that's over. Even otherwise, hell would not be hell to me if I were in it with you."

Thump! Thump! It was worse than ever. None the less she looked cool as a cucumber.

"The prospect is not very tempting. Besides, even if it were——" Again she paused, but this time without getting on with it.

He came toward her. "Even if it were what?"

"Temptation has its dangers. It may lead to captivity."

"And you fear that?"

"For you, yes."

"For me!" he exclaimed.

How it thumped! It thumped so that it hurt, yet spartanly she contrived to smile.

"You or any one. I was speaking generally. Then, too, you know, hell may not be all your fancy pictures it."

He floundered in it. "What do you mean?"

"In no time you might get sick to death of me."

"Never!"

The denial exploded with such violence that the walls fell. Or at least so it seemed to Cassy. It seemed to her that the room had become a tent of fulgurant colours. They were blinding. She could not look at them. How delicious it all was, though! In spite of which, she sighed.

"Well, there is no telling. Some day I may go and take a look there."

With mounting astonishment he repeated it. "Some day! But, if you ever will, why not now?"

Her eyes then were on him. "To find out."

"Find out what?"

"How you felt about it."

"But how could you, if you don't care for me?"

"Why do you say that?"

"Because you told me so."

Innocently, with an air of wonder, she took it up. "Did I? I don't think so. I am sure I did not. I am convinced that I would not have volunteered it and I am certain you did not ask."

"I asked you a moment ago."

If I don't make it stop, she thought, it will jump out. What shall I do?

"And I ask you again," he gravely continued.

It was in her throat. Try as she might she could not choke it back. Out it came.

"I have never cared for any one else."

Lennox stared. It was incredible. Like many another it was incredible to him that he should have sought afar for what was at his side.

But not having finished, she resumed. "And I never shall."

To that there could be but one reply. It was rough enough. Cassy did not mind, but she freed herself, undulantly, as a woman can.

Unrebuffably Lennox renewed it. "Let's be married at once."

Cassy smoothed her rumpled hair. "No." The monosyllable fell like a stone.

Lennox kicked it. "In God's name, why not?"

Cassy turned away. It was the hardest of all. Beside it, what was the gesture of the day before?

"Because. Just because."

"Because why?"

"Because I could not live to see you regret it."

"But why should I? I never shall." His hands on her shoulders, violently his eyes probed her own.

She thought him so dear, but she said: "I have not cared for any one else. You have. The growth of love is slow. You cannot love me now as I love you."

He wanted to shake her and nearly did. "But when you find I do?"

"Ah, when that day comes, I will."

"And meanwhile?"

She just plucked at his sleeve. Nothing could have been more yielding. It was yielding as water, and yielding still, her eyes fell.

"For your sake only. Later—if—if——"

Any great astonishment is dumb and, at the moment, a whirlwind tossed his thoughts. In the swirling gale were sudden pictures; the girl's fair arms, the delight of her lips, his own desire. Tumultuously they passed. Before him flew the hazards of life, of death, and, curling there, the iniquity of leaving her afterward, as leave her he must, alone to face them. The counterblast steadied him. Astonishment may be dumb, love is clairvoyant.

"For your own sake, no. The war cannot last forever and if I return, then—then——"

Shortly, among the Victorian horrors of his gloomy rooms, she came to see him off.

Mrs. Austen, who heard of everything, heard of that. "I always knew it!" she exclaimed. The dear woman had known nothing of the kind and her perspicacity amazed her.

But this has nothing to do with the Paliser Case which ended before it began.

PARNASSIANS PERSONALLY ENCOUNTERED

In Paris there was a street that extended on from the Arc toward Passy. I have forgotten the name, and it is too much bother to look it up. For convenience, let me call it the Avenue Chose. Midway there are — or were — half a dozen apricot houses of the type known as English basement. At one of those houses an emperor used to look in on an effulgence. The emperor was Pedro of Alcantara and Brazil. The effulgence was Victor Hugo. Dom Pedro, very decent as emperors went, was a scholar and a gentleman. Victor Hugo radiated the glare of genius at its apogee. Already I had been sunstruck by him. Gautier said that when admitted to the presence he nearly fainted. That I should enter there I no more dared to dream than of genuflecting to the Dalai Lama. But the possibilities of life, and particularly of youth, are inscrutable. A potent nonentity viséd my passport to the realm of light. Whether I prostrated myself before the august being I have forgotten. Probably I did not. But I remember rehearsing beforehand the Byzantine formula: "May I speak and live?" Very unnecessarily, too. The being was human and even commonplace. From a great chair that resembled a shrine and in which he looked precisely like an old idol, he deigned to ask about my état d'âme. "Very shaky," I might have replied, and afterward regretted that I had not. But the audience was at an end, and I descended the heights with, I am sure, rays about my brow.

Presently the municipality took the Avenue Chose back to the font and rebaptised it Avenue Victor Hugo. At the first rumor of it angered hierophants hastened to the Master. "But this is ridiculous! The city itself ought to be re-named. Paris should be Hugoville!"

Serene and vatic the Master gestured: "Ca viendra" — That will come.

The modesty of the elect is a lesson to us all. Yet even that modesty was exceeded. At the Master's funeral, at which all Paris assisted, all the world too, a funeral that extended from one end of Hugoville to the other, the body of the being was, by his own direction, borne in a beggar's hearse. It was said that in that antithesis apotheosis had been staged.

Well, why not? Augier called the rites a coronation. The term seems a bit heavy. Apotheosis is perhaps more exact, though not to critics. Literary people do not care for Hugo. But to the simple, there are guitars in his verse, there are sequins, opals, rainbows, joy — joy that there can be verse like his!

In the procession, I encountered Stuart Merrill, a very youthful poet, engagingly pyrrhonian — on heavy subjects he expressed light views — whose own funeral occurred at Versailles during the scarlet August when Germany's jehad began.

Born with a gold pen in his mouth, his verse, always in French, might have led him into the Académie had he not been an American, or more exactly, a New Yorker. Through his indulgence, I subsequently obtained the unmerited privilege of exchanging the time of day with Leconte de Lisle.

On earth, Leconte de Lisle was pontiff of a flock of poets of whom quotable singers were Sully Prudhomme and François Coppée. The verse of Sully Prudhomme seemed to me calm and empty; the verse of François Coppée calm and inane. But the verse of Leconte de Lisle, calm also, marmorean for that matter, I read on my knees. Yet some of it educated France detested. For the purposes of the baccalauréat, some of it had to be put in Latin. In Latin! It is said that the devas converse in colors. It is in their tongue only that the Poéms Antiques could adequately be put.

It was those poems that I read on my knees. When by the grace of the gods and Stuart Merrill I was permitted to behold and even to address the Olympian, I said as much, and added: "You are a church, you have your worshipers."

The high muse wears a radiant peplum. Praise or blame cannot reach the souls she haunts. Leconte de Lisle, who had the apostolic appearance of a head-waiter and who, in private life, was a public librarian, listened, or appeared to listen, with an indifference that was boreal.

This attitude, I understood, was habitual. I understood also that, by some, it was attributed to pride and objected to accordingly. But, as you may have noticed, people who object to pride never have anything to be proud of.

It was in a beer-hall that he was good enough to receive me. The accessories were not perhaps very dignified. Yet if, as one may suppose, a poet's superiority consists in the quality of his relations with the infinite, the qualities displayed in the Poéms Antiques are sufficient to have made him refulgent in a sewer.

On saluting him, I thought of Joaquin Miller whose pleasant ghost dwells now, I like to think, in some wigwam on the Parnassian slopes. At school I had been vilely fatigued by bores that have survived only because Death has ignored them, and there the Songs of the Sierras were myrrh and cassia to my adolescent heart. Their note, occasionally a bit Byronic, but otherwise new, seemed to me splendid, and the legend of the minstrel, fighting Indians and the prairie fire while finding and fashioning his numbers, superb. The idea of meeting the poet-scout never entered my head. Unexpectedly that honor was mine. At the New York Hotel — a Broadway inn long since demolished — an acquaintance presented me. Immediately I recited a verse from the Songs and ventured to tell him that it was the finest thing in the English language. He was good enough to agree with me.

Subsequently, in Paris, I said the same thing to Owen Meredith, but in New York, meanwhile, I had omitted to say it to a florid troubadour with an anxious manner who, for better commerce with the muse, maintained a separate and private establishment in Tompkins Square. Why Tompkins Square I cannot say. I do not even know where it is. For which reason I once wrote a story about it and, on the proceeds, thought of going there in a cab. Each mortal has his Carassonne. But there each day the troubadour went. In silence he came and in silence departed, until the neighbors, thinking him a counterfeiter, called the police — to whom ragingly he unmasked himself. "I am Edgar Fawcett, author of 'Et cetera and Soforth'."

Pausing, he fumed. It takes a poet to concoct a horrible revenge. Then at once he had it, and threateningly he resumed: "I will read you my last poem." He turned for that weapon. He turned again. Terrified, the police had fled.

Later, in Paris, I was witless enough to repeat to Owen Meredith the unoriginal remark that I had made to Joaquin Miller. Previously viceroy of India — the proper post for a poet — he was then ambassador to France.

He had been appointed viceroy by Disraeli, for a reason very honorable and equally rare. Bulwer Lytton — Owen Meredith's father — was of some slight service to Disraeli before the latter had time to become prime minister and when he lived in a state of siege, barricaded from bailiffs and duns. It was in gratitude for the service that the post was given to Bulwer's son. He was said to be unsuited for it, but that is nonsense. A poet who cannot be viceroy has mistaken his vocation, and Owen Meredith had not mistaken his. He was a poet, minor certainly, and, it may be too, a poet for minors, but the wings of the muse were about him. They fanned his verse into flames, thin, perhaps, but clear.

It is a long time ago that I had the honor of meeting him and, on the encephalic film that I retain, his picture has become a blur. In the blur is a face less Parnassian than pleasant, a jovial face framed in abundant hair. Beneath is a Victorian adornment, a watch-chain circling the neck and swinging glitteringly and voluminously down to a pocket on an ample waist. The waist evokes the hero of gastronomy that the bard of "books" and "cooks" had become.

We had been having dinner with an English woman in whose Florentine villa Mrs. Oscar Wilde afterward went to die. In the course of the dinner she gave the poet a novel and asked him to translate the epigraph, which was in Greek.

He looked at it and said: "My eyes are not what they were, give it to our young friend."

But the passage that stumped him stumped me and I said: "It is not fit to be translated."

"Arcades ambo — Rogues both of us," he laughed and exclaimed. Then it was, and merely for the diversion, that I recited a verse of his and added that witless remark.

Afterward I mentioned the incident to Fawcett who looked extremely uncomfortable. For a moment I did not understand, then, almost at once, I did. I had omitted to say the same thing to him. The omission repaired, he thanked me with that gravity which, even in serious matters, he usually displayed.

Usually, but not always. The sight of a rejected manuscript was supersufficient to make him turn his apartment into a bestiarium of words that roared. "I will not wear that coat," I once, through closed doors, heard him shout at his servant. "I tell you I will not wear that coat!" He paused, possibly for breath, then in the tone of an assassin hissed: "Very good, I will wear it; and if I catch cold it will be your fault." At that, the doors were thrown open and the portrait, on foot, of an English beefeater appeared. "And how," I soothingly inquired, "is the Master?" "I am starving!" he flung at me. "So-and-So has returned my poem. Were the varlet here, I would take my battle-axe and I would kill him."

All of which was purely poetry. Fawcett had no battle-axe. Even otherwise, he would not have harmed a fly. Moreover, the next day or the day after I met him on Fifth Avenue. He was arm and arm with that varlet. I knew what happened. He had written something that pleased him. Fawcett kept an account book, alphabetically arranged. If you offended him, in it you went with bad marks after you. If he wrote anything that he particularly liked, he rose from the table, bowed to himself in the mirror, and granted a general amnesty. The varlet had profited by some such remission.

"Non omnis moriar" — I shall not wholly die — he remarked to that mirror and to me and so remarked not because he habitually talked in Latin, but because like Horace, who said it before or behind him, he believed his verse would live. In that, I think he erred, and I think too it is a confounded shame. He was a real poet. But sensitive! Some sheet or other pitched into a book of his, and any criticism not written with the hat off gave him an attack of indignation morbus. Then and there he wrote and told the editor what he thought of him. To argue with a newspaper is like talking metaphysics to a bull. The first thing you know you get a horn in the midriff. That letter of his, published in full, was headlined: The Worm Turns. The amount of poison that a minim of printer's ink can contain for the unphilosophic, merits an essay. Fawcett took to his bed.

A contemporary was Frank Saltus. Cabanel painted his portrait. It shows a young man with a face smeared with cold cream — not the young man's cold cream but the cream of the pastry-cook that Cabanel was. Fawcett could scribble a song, as poet should, in no time. But what he scribbled he rewrote, wrote again. It should have saved him. On one occasion, in less than an hour, Frank Saltus scribbled a ballad to Patti in four languages and put it to music. His facility was frightful and, as he never revised, it was fatal.

Like Fawcett, he too missed it. He missed it because he had perhaps a fibre too many, as Fawcett missed it because, it may be, he had a fibre too few. To contemporary critics both were minor violins in the great orchestra of letters. But at least they were in the orchestra. That they are not there now must be quite immaterial to them. Yet, everything being possible, when they return here one or the other may hold the baton.

Meanwhile there were relaxations. Fawcett, after the manner of poets, rather fancied himself, and Frank Saltus used to write him letters that purported to come from passionate young heiresses feverishly in love with the bard. These letters, to my great delight, he always read to us — like a gentleman, though, in strictest confidence — yet with an air, dear me! of what complacent satisfaction! Though he may know now that the bacchantes were myths, he did not then. To the day of his death he believed in them. To the day of his death he used to say, "I too have dwelled in Arcady." Now probably he knows. In his rocking-chair on Parnassus probably too he forgives. He had a big head but always a bigger heart.

Subsequently, in Paris, a revolution occurred. Against Hugo's deluge of splendors and the marmorean calm of Leconte de Lisle, the Symbolistes revolted. Symbolism in literature is what bolshevism has become in life, a form of hydrophobia. In bolshevism you have a vested right to bite and rob. The symbolists bit, but they did not rob, not ideas at least, which is a pity, for they had none of their own. The deficit is symptomatic. Revolutions are caused not by ideas but by appetites. The symbolists, hungry for chaos, substituted delirium for calm and incoherence for clarity. They are gone, but while they were here they were rabid as the Reds. In the Terror, Verlaine took part.

Afterwards I had the signal honor of meeting the poet who at the time had recently been discharged from prison, from a prison rather where he had been put, as he was put in other prisons, for a beautiful error. He currently mistook the time of day for the Renaissance, that epoch when artists were above the law. In those days Charles V stooped and restored a brush which Titian had dropped, remarking as he did so that only by an emperor can an artist be properly served. He was quite right. As it happens, there are no more emperors, but then there are no more Titians, which is not a comfortable adjustment, though, praise God, we still have Verlaine, or at least his verse, reams of which he wrote in jail where he had the leisure and the opportunity to admire everything except the façade.

On that point, perhaps humorous, he left a book: Mes prisons. In addition, he talked about them. He talked about "his" prisons and "his" charity hospitals unaffectedly, without snobbishness, as a landed proprietor may speak of his estates. One of Verlaine's estates I visited. It was an enclosure, at the back of a shop, in a blind alley, where he had a cot that stood not on the floor, there was no floor, but on the earth. From that tower of ivory he wrote to a friend asking the loan of ninety centimes, which he faithfully promised to repay in two months. Yet which — the unforeseen intervening — he was unable to return so soon.

It was not there, but at the Café François Premier, on the left bank, that I had the extraordinary good fortune of being addressed by him. Very shabby, rather dirty, a trifle drunk, he talked delightfully. He talked as only great poets and some madmen can talk. He talked of things beautiful or merely horrible that never happen, that never could happen, but which were real to him. "Cheat yourself and dream," said Epictetus. It was his method, and the proper one for a glory of France who had not where to lay his head.

In the erudite pandemonium that occultism is, Swinburne is said to have been Catullus and Tennyson, Ovid. If that be true, Verlaine may have been Alcæus, but with something added, something indescribably and delicately unique, something that brought him voices that no other poet has heard, voices which came to him in jail, where he had been put, not as Villon was for highwayry but, much more innocently, for having shot a brother bard.

On the heights where his repentant spirit roamed, Mallarmé tried to follow. The throne-rooms of the ideal are spacious but the thrones are few. Only the elect may mount to where they glow. Mallarmé fell over backward into the incomprehensibleness of L'Après-midi d'un faune, a poem that afterward fell deeper, into the gymnastics of a ballet.

I met Mallarmé at a dinner where he sat next to a gorgeous young American, then known as Madame de Chimay, who wore a string of emeralds as big and as naked as eggs, and who, only a little later, executed a fugue with a fiddler. In so doing she set a fashion that Elvire of Spain and Louise of Belgium immediately adopted, and with which Louise of Saxony caught up later on. It was said that they were all insane, but as not one of them ran off with a poet, the diagnosis was perhaps incorrect.

Meanwhile Mallarmé was talking English to this young person. In talking he asked to be appointed shepherd of her smiles. The conceit, very pretty by the way, he afterward put in the last line of a sonnet, the only coherent line that he or any other symbolard ever wrote.

George Moore somewhere said that Mallarmé looked like a refined peasant. To me he rather suggested a scholarly school-teacher. It is small matter. The man now is a ghost. His absurd verse is ghostlier. Other Parnassians whom I have met are ghosts as well. From among them, I ask leave to resummon one and evoke another.

Before Stuart Merrill definitely deserted Fifth Avenue, he gave a dinner at which George Pellew and several others, your servant included, were present. In the course of it the post-mortem swam up. The usual stupidity that there is nothing in it was not advanced. My fellow guests were too modern. One of them quoted a strophe from the Gita: "Never the spirit was born, the spirit shall cease to be never." The Hindu lay is perhaps recondite. The Song of the harper going out from Amenti is perhaps even more so. Another man quoted from it: "Life is death in a land of darkness, death is life in a land of light." Then, unobstrusively I hope, but incorrectly I fear, I repeated what Hafiz said of ghostland: "A breath, a wind, a sound, a voice, a tinkle of the camel-bell."

At that, Pellew, who was a poet, promised that if he were alive when he was dead, he would come back and say so. The promise seemed a poetic draft on an equally poetic future. But it may be that there is no future. It may be that there is merely a continuous present in which events unroll. Pellew died that night. When going home, he slipped, fell, and broke his skull. Presently he kept his promise. At the time William James was confusing the sceptical, and even the credulous, with the clairaudience of Mrs. Piper. Pellew spoke through that medium. I am not making this up. It is all down in the reports concerning her.

Obviously, as ghosts go, Pellew is very much alive, which is more than I can say of his verse. Yet, in point of time, he belonged to the Victorian era, during which, in this country, in England, and in France, there was a constant cascade of real song. Today there is no more verse like that. There are no poets now such as those that have gone. In the youth of centuries that is usually the case. Probably, in a generation or two, bards will bloom afresh. Then they too shall pass, and a hundred years hence it will be said that there is no more verse like theirs. But, in default of poets there are their ghosts and, when these are laid, always there will be other poets.

THE TRUTH ABOUT
TRISTREM VARICK.

I.

It is just as well to say at the onset that the tragedy in which Tristrem Varick was the central figure has not been rightly understood. The world in which he lived, as well as the newspaper public, have had but one theory between them to account for it, and that theory is that Tristrem Varick was insane. Tristrem Varick was not insane. He had, perhaps, a fibre more or a fibre less than the ordinary run of men; that something, in fact, which is the prime factor of individuality and differentiates the possessor from the herd; but to call him insane is nonsense. THE TRUTH ABOUT TRISTREM VARICK.

I.

It is just as well to say at the onset that the tragedy in which Tristrem Varick was the central figure has not been rightly understood. The world in which he lived, as well as the newspaper public, have had but one theory between them to account for it, and that theory is that Tristrem Varick was insane. Tristrem Varick was not insane. He had, perhaps, a fibre more or a fibre less than the ordinary run of men; that something, in fact, which is the prime factor of individuality and differentiates the possessor from the herd; but to call him insane is nonsense. If he were, it is a pity that there are not more lunatics like him.

It may be that the course of conduct which he pursued in regard to his father's estate served as basis to the theory alluded to. At the time being, it created quite a little stir; it was looked upon as a piece of old-world folly, an eccentricity worthy of the red-heeled days of seigneurial France, and, as such, altogether out of place in a money-getting age like our own. But it was not until after the tragedy that his behavior in that particular was brought up in evidence against him.

The facts in the case were these: Tristrem's father, Erastus Varick, was a man of large wealth, who, when well on in the forties, married a girl young enough to be his daughter. The lady in question was the only child of a neighbor, Mr. Dirck Van Norden by name, and very pretty is she said to have been. Before the wedding Erastus Varick had his house, which was situated in Waverley Place, refurbished from cellar to garret; he had the parlor—there were parlors in those days—fitted up in white and gold, in the style known as that of the First Empire. The old Dutch furniture, black with age and hair-cloth, was banished. The walls were plastered with a lime cement of peculiar brilliance. The floors of the bedrooms were carpeted with rugs that extended under the beds, a novelty in New York, and the bedsteads themselves, which were vast enough to make coffins for ten people, were curtained with chintz patterns manufactured in Manchester to frighten children. In brief, Erastus Varick succeeded in making the house even less attractive than before, and altogether acted like a man in love.

After three years of marriage, Tristrem was born and Mrs. Varick died. The boy had the best of care and everything that money could procure. He was given that liberal education which usually unfits the recipient for making so much as his bread and butter, and at school, at college, and when he went abroad his supply of funds was of the amplest description. Shortly after his return from foreign lands Erastus Varick was gathered to his fathers. By his will he bequeathed to Tristrem a Panama hat and a bundle of letters. The rest and residue of his property he devised to the St. Nicholas Hospital. The value of that property amounted to seven million dollars.

Now Dirck Van Norden had not yet moved from the neighborhood to a better place. Tristrem was his only grandson, and when he learned of the tenor of the will, he shook his fist at himself in the looking-glass and swore, in a bountiful old-fashioned manner which was peculiar to him, that his grandson should not be divested of his rights. He set the lawyers to work, and the lawyers were not long in discovering a flaw which, through a wise provision of the legislature, rendered the will null and void. The Hospital made a bold fight. It was shown beyond peradventure that from the time of Tristrem's birth the intention of the testator—and the intention of a testator is what the court most considers—had been to leave his property to a charitable institution. It was proved that he had made other wills of a similar character, and that he had successively destroyed them as his mind changed in regard to minor details and distributions of the trust. But the wise law was there, and there too were the wise lawyers. The decision was made in accordance with the statute, and the estate reverted to Tristrem, who then succeeded in surprising New York. Of his own free will he made over the entire property to the account of the Hospital to which it had been originally devised, and it was in connection with that transfer that he was taxed with old-world folly. But the matter was misunderstood and afterward forgotten, and only raked up again when the press of two continents busied itself with his name. At that time he was in his twenty-fifth or twenty-sixth year.

He was slender, of medium height, blue of eye, and clear-featured. His hair, which was light in color, he wore brushed upward and back from the forehead. When he walked, it was with a slight stoop, which was the more noticeable in that, being near-sighted, he had a way of holding his chin out and raising his eyebrows as though he were peering at something which he could not quite discern. In his face there was a charm that grew and delighted and fastened on the beholder. At the age of twenty-six he would have been recognized by anyone who had known him as a boy. He had expanded, of course, and a stoop and dimness of vision had come with years; but in his face was the same unmistakable, almost childish, expression of sweet good-will.

His school-days were passed at Concord. When he first appeared there he looked so much like a pretty girl, in his manner was such gentleness, and his nature was found to be so vibrant and sensitive, that his baptismal name was promptly shortened into Trissy. But by the time he reached the fourth form it was lengthened back again to its rightful shape. This change was the result of an evolution of opinion. One day while some companions, with whom he happened to be loitering, scurried behind a fence, he stopped a runaway horse, clinging to the bridle though his arm had been dislocated in the earliest effort. Another time, when a comrade had been visited, unjustly it appeared, with some terrible punishment—five hundred lines, perhaps, or something equally direful—Tristrem made straight for the master, and argued with him to such effect that the punishment was remitted. And again, when a tutor asked how it was that there was no W in the French language, Tristrem answered, "Because of Waterloo."

Boys are generous in their enthusiasms; they like bravery, they are not deaf to wit, but perhaps of all other things they admire justice most. And Tristrem seemed to exhale it. It is said that everyone has a particular talent for some one thing, whether for good or evil, and the particular talent which was accorded to Tristrem Varick was that of appreciation. He was a born umpire. In disputes his school-fellows turned to him naturally, and accepted his verdict without question. When he reached the altitudes which the Upper School offers, no other boy at St. Paul's was better liked than he. At that time the form of which he was a member — and in which, parenthetically, he ranked rather low — was strengthened by a new-comer, a turbulent, precocious boy who had been expelled from two other schools, and with whom, so ran the gossip, it would go hard were he expelled again. His name was Royal Weldon, and on his watch, and on a seal ring which he wore on his little finger, he displayed an elaborate coat-of-arms under which for legend were the words, Well done, Weldon, words which it was reported an English king had bawled in battle, ennobling as he did so the earliest Weldon known to fame.

Between the two lads, and despite the dissimilarity of their natures, or perhaps precisely on that account, there sprang up a warm friendship which propinquity cemented, for chance or the master had given them a room in common. At first, Tristrem fairly blinked at Weldon's precocity, and Weldon, who was accustomed to be admired, took to Tristrem not unkindly on that account. But after a time Tristrem ceased to blink and began to lecture, not priggishly at all, but in a persuasive manner that was hard to resist. For Weldon was prone to get into difficulties, and equally prone to make the difficulties worse than they need have been. When cross-questioned he would decline to answer; it was a trick he had. Now Tristrem never got into difficulties, except with Latin prosody or a Greek root, and he was frank to a fault.

It so happened that one day the head-master summoned Tristrem to him. "My dear," he said, "Royal is not acting quite as he should, is he?" To this Tristrem made no reply. "He is a motherless boy," the master continued, "a poor motherless boy. I wish, Tristrem, that you would use your influence with him. I see but one course open to me, unless he does better—" Tristrem was a motherless boy himself, but he answered bravely that he would do what he could. That evening, as he was battling with the platitudes of that Augustan bore who is called the Bard of Mantua, presumably because he was born in Andes—Weldon came in, smelling of tobacco and drink. It was evident that he had been to town.

Tristrem looked up from his task, and as he looked he heard the step of a tutor in the hall. He knew, if the tutor had speech with Weldon, that on the morrow Weldon would leave the school. In a second he had seated him before the open dictionary, and in another second he was kneeling at his own bedside. Hardly had he bowed his head when there came a rap at the door, the tutor entered, saw the kneeling figure, apologized in a whisper, and withdrew.

When Tristrem stood up again, Weldon was sobered and very pale. "Tristrem—" he began, but Tristrem interrupted him. "There, don't say anything, and don't do it again. To-morrow you had better talk it over with the doctor."

Weldon declined to talk it over with anyone, but after that he behaved himself with something approaching propriety. Two years later, in company with his friend, he entered Harvard, from which institution he was subsequently dropped.

Tristrem meanwhile struggled through the allotted four years. He was not brilliant in his studies, the memorizing of abstruse questions and recondite problems was not to his liking. He preferred modern tongues to dead languages, an intricate fugue was more to his taste than the simplest equation, and to his shame it must be noted that he read Petrarch at night. But, though the curriculum was not entirely to his fancy, he was conscientious and did his best. There are answers that he gave in class that are quoted still, tangential flights that startled the listeners into new conceptions of threadbare themes, totally different from the usual cut and dried response that is learned by rote. And at times he would display an ignorance, a stupidity even, that was fathomless in its abysses.

After graduation, he went abroad. England seemed to him like a rose in bloom, but when autumn came and with it a succession of fogs, each more depressing than the last, he fled to Italy, and wandered among her ghosts and treasuries, and then drifted up again through Germany, to Paris, where he gave his mornings to the Sorbonne and his evenings to orchestra-stalls.

II.

It was after an absence of nearly five years that Tristrem Varick returned to the States. He had wearied of foreign lands, and for some time previous he had thought of New York in such wise that it had grown in his mind, and in the growing it had assumed a variety of attractive attributes. He was, therefore, much pleased at the prospect of renewing his acquaintance with Fifth Avenue, and during the homeward journey he pictured to himself the advantages which his native city possessed over any other which he had visited.

He had not, however, been many hours on shore before he found that Fifth Avenue had shrunk. In some unaccountable way the streets had lost their charm, the city seemed provincial. He was perplexed at the discovery that the uniform if depthless civility of older civilizations was rarely observable; he was chagrined to find that the minutiæ which, abroad, he had accepted as a matter of course, the thousand trifles which amount, after all, to nothing particularly indispensable, but which serve to make mere existence pleasant, were, when not overlooked, inhibited by statute or custom.

In the course of a week he was surprised into reflecting that, while no other country was more naturally and bountifully favored than his own, there was yet no other where the art of living was as vexatiously misunderstood.

Of these impressions he said nothing. His father asked him no questions, nor did he manifest a desire for any larger sociological information than that which he already possessed. His grandfather was too irascible for anyone to venture with in safety through the shallows of European refinements, and of other relatives Tristrem could not boast. Few of his former friends were at once discoverable, and of those that he encountered some had fallen into the rut and routine of business life, some had married and sent in their resignations to everything but the Humdrum, and some passed their days in an effort to catch a train.

For the moment, therefore, there was no one to whom Tristrem could confide his earliest impressions, and in a month's time the force of these impressions waned; the difference between New York and Paris lost much of its accent, and in its place came a growing admiration for the pluck and power of the nation, an expanding enthusiasm for the stretch and splendor of the land.

During the month that followed, an incident occurred which riveted his patriotism forever. First among the friends and acquaintances whom Tristrem sought on his return was Royal Weldon. Outwardly the handsome, turbulent boy had developed into an admirable specimen of manhood, he had become one on whom the feminine eye likes to linger, and in whose companionship men feel themselves refreshed. His face was beardless and unmustached, and into it had come that strength which the old prints give to Karl Martel. In the ample jaw and straight lips was a message which a physiognomist would interpret as a promise of successful enterprise, whether of good or evil. It was a face which a Crusader might have possessed, or a pirate of the Spanish main. In a word, he looked like a man who might be a hero to his valet.

Yet, despite this adventurous type of countenance, Weldon's mode of life was seemingly conventional. Shortly after the removal from Harvard, his father was mangled in a railway accident and left the planet and little behind him save debts and dislike. Promptly thereupon Royal Weldon set out to conquer the Stock Exchange. For three years he grit his teeth, and earned fifteen dollars a week. At the end of that period he had succeeded in two things. He had captured the confidence of a prominent financier, and the affection of the financier's daughter. In another twelvemonth he was partner of the one, husband of the other, and the taxpayer of a house in Gramercy Park.

Of these vicissitudes Tristrem had been necessarily informed. During the penury of his friend he had aided him to a not inconsiderable extent; though afar, he had followed his career with affectionate interest, and the day before Weldon's wedding he had caused Tiffany to send the bride a service of silver which was mentioned by the reporters as "elegant" and "chaste." On returning to New York, Tristrem naturally found the door of the house in Gramercy Park wide open, and it came about that it was in that house that his wavering patriotism was riveted.

This event, after the fashion of extraordinary occurrences, happened in a commonplace manner. One Sunday evening he was bidden there to dine. He had broken bread in the house many times before, but the bread-breaking had been informal. On this particular occasion, however, other guests had been invited, and Tristrem was given to understand that he would meet some agreeable people.

When he entered the drawing-room, he discovered that of the guests of the evening he was the first to arrive. Even Weldon was not visible; but Mrs. Weldon was, and, as Tristrem entered, she rose from a straight-backed chair in which she had been seated, and greeted him with a smile which she had copied from a chromo.

Mrs. Weldon was exceedingly pretty. She was probably twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, and her intellect was that of a girl of twelve. Her manner was arch and noticeably affected. She had an enervating way of asking unnecessary questions, and of laughing as though it hurt her. On the subject of dress she was very voluble; in brief, she was prettiness and insipidity personified—the sort of woman that ought to be gagged and kept in bed with a doll.

She gave Tristrem a little hand gloved with Suède, and asked him had he been at church that morning. Tristrem found a seat, and replied that he had not. "But don't you like to go?" she inquired, emphasizing each word of the question, and ending up with her irritating laugh.

"He does," came a voice from the door, and Weldon entered. "He does, but he can resist the temptation." Then there was more conversation of the before-dinner kind, and during its progress the door opened again, and a young girl crossed the room.

She was dressed in a gown of canary, draped with madeira and fluttered with lace. Her arms and neck were bare, and unjewelled. Her hair was Cimmerian, the black of basalt that knows no shade more dark, and it was arranged in such wise that it fell on either side of the forehead, circling a little space above the ear, and then wound into a coil on the neck. This arrangement was not modish, but it was becoming—the only arrangement, in fact, that would have befitted her features, which resembled those of the Cleopatra unearthed by Lieutenant Gorringe. Her eyes were not oval, but round, and they were amber as those of leopards, the yellow of living gold. The corners of her mouth drooped a little, and the mouth itself was rather large than small. When she laughed one could see her tongue ; it was like an inner cut of water-melon, and sometimes, when she was silent, the point of it caressed her under lip. Her skin was of that quality which artificial light makes radiant, and yet of which the real delicacy is only apparent by day. She just lacked being tall, and in her face and about her bare arms and neck was the perfume of health. She moved indolently, with a grace of her own. She was not yet twenty, a festival of beauty in the festival of life.

At the rustle of her dress Tristrem had arisen. As the girl crossed the room he bethought him of a garden of lilies; though why, for the life of him, he could not have explained. He heard his name mentioned, and saw the girl incline her head, but he made little, if any, acknowledgment; he stood quite still, looking at her and through her, and over her and beyond. For some moments he neither moved nor spoke. He was unconscious even that other guests had come.

He gave his hand absently to a popular novelist, Mr. A. B. Fenwick Chisholm-Jones by name, more familiarly known as Alphabet, whom Weldon brought to him, and kept his eyes on the yellow bodice. A fair young woman in pink had taken a position near to where he stood, and was complaining to someone that she had been obliged to give up cigarettes. And when the someone asked whether the abandonment of that pleasure was due to parental interference, the young woman laughed shortly, and explained that she was in training for a tennis tournament. Meanwhile the little group in which Tristrem stood was re-enforced by a new-comer, who attempted to condole with the novelist on the subject of an excoriating attack that one of the critics had recently made on his books, and suggested that he ought to do something about it. But of condolence or advice Mr. Jones would have none.

"Bah!" he exclaimed, "if the beggar doesn't like what I write let him try and do better. I don't care what any of them say. My books sell, and that's the hauptsache. Besides, what's the use in arguing with a newspaper? It's like talking metaphysics to a bull; the first you know, you get a horn in your navel." And while the novelist was expressing his disdain of all adverse criticism, and quoting Emerson to the effect that the average reviewer had the eyes of a bug and the heart of a cat, Tristrem discovered Mrs. Weldon's arm in his own, and presently found himself seated next to her at table.

At the extreme end, to the right of the host, was the girl with the amber eyes. The novelist was at her side. Evidently he had said something amusing, for they were both laughing; he with the complacency of one who has said a good thing, and she with the appreciation of one accustomed to wit. But Tristrem was not permitted to watch her undisturbed. Mrs. Weldon had a right to his attention, and she exercised that right with the pertinacity of a fly that has to be killed to be got rid of. "What do you think of Miss Finch?" she asked, with her stealthy giggle.

"Her name isn't Finch," Tristrem answered, indignantly.

"Yes it is, too—Flossy Finch, her name is; as if I oughtn't to know! Why, we were at Mrs. Garret and Mlle. de l'Entresol's school together for years and years. What makes you say her name isn't Finch? I had you here on purpose to meet her. Did you ever see such hair? There's only one girl in New York——"

"It is black," Tristrem assented.

"Black! Why, you must be crazy; it's orange, and that dress of hers——"

Tristrem looked down the table and saw a young lady whom he had not noticed before. Her hair, as Mrs. Weldon had said, was indeed the color of orange, though of an orange not over-ripe. "I thought you meant that girl next to Royal," he said.

"That! Oh! that's Miss Raritan."

Mrs. Weldon's voice had changed. Evidently Miss Raritan did not arouse in her the same enthusiasm as did Miss Finch. For a moment her lips lost their chromo smile, but presently it returned again, and she piped away anew on the subject of the charms of Flossy Finch, and after an interlude, of which Tristrem heard not one word, she turned and cross-questioned the man on her left.

The conversation had become very animated. From Royal's end of the table came intermittent shrieks of laughter. The novelist was evidently in his finest form. "Do you mean to tell me," Miss Finch asked him across the table, "do you mean to say that you don't believe in platonic affection?"

"I never uttered such a heresy in my life," the novelist replied. "Of course I believe in it; I believe in it thoroughly—between husband and wife."

At this everyone laughed again, except Tristrem, who had not heard, and Mrs. Weldon, who had not understood. The latter, however, felt that Miss Finch was distinguishing herself, and she turned to Tristrem anew.

"I want you to make yourself very agreeable to her," she said. "She is just the girl for you. Don't you think so? Now promise that you will talk to her after dinner."

"Talk metaphysics to a bull, and the first thing you know—the first thing you know—I beg your pardon, Mrs. Weldon, I didn't mean to say that—I don't know how the stupid phrase got in my head or why I said it." He hesitated a moment, and seemed to think. "H'm," he went on, "I am a trifle tired, I fancy."

Mrs. Weldon looked suspiciously at the glasses at his side, but apparently they had not been so much as tasted; they were full to the rim. She turned again to the guest at her left. The dinner was almost done. She asked a few more questions, and then presently, in a general lull, she gave a glance about her. At that signal the women-folk rose in a body, the men rising also, to let them pass.

Tristrem had risen mechanically with the others, and when the ultimate flounce had disappeared he sat down again and busied himself with a cup of coffee. The other men had drawn their chairs together near him, and over the liqueurs were discussing topics of masculine interest and flavor. Tristrem was about to make some effort to join in the conversation, when from beyond there came the running scale that is the prelude to the cabaletta, Non più mesta, from Cenerentola. Then, abruptly, a voice rang out as though it vibrated through labyrinths of gold—a voice that charged the air with resonant accords—a voice prodigious and dominating, grave and fluid; a voice that descended into the caverns of sound, soared to the uttermost heights, scattering notes like showers of stars, evoking visions of flesh and dazzling steel, and in its precipitate flights and vertiginous descents disclosing landscapes riotous with flowers, rich with perfume, sentient with beauty, articulate with love; a voice voluptuous as an organ and languorous as the consonance of citherns and guitars.

Tristrem, as one led in leash, moved from the table and passed into the outer room. Miss Raritan was at the piano. Beyond, a group of women sat hushed and mute ; and still the resilient waves of song continued. One by one the men issued noiselessly from the inner room. And then, soon, the voice sank and died away like a chorus entering a crypt.

Miss Raritan rose from the piano. As she did so, Weldon, as it becomes a host, hastened to her. There was a confused hum, a murmur of applause, and above it rose a discreet and prolonged brava that must have come from the novelist. Weldon, seemingly, was urging her to sing again. The women had taken up anew some broken thread of gossip, but the men were at the piano, insisting too. Presently Miss Raritan resumed her seat, and the men moved back. Her fingers rippled over the keys like rain. She stayed them a second, and then, in a voice so low that it seemed hardly human, and yet so insistent that it would have filled a cathedral and scaled the dome, she began a ballad that breathed of Provence :

> "O Magali, ma bien aimée,
> Fuyons tous deux sous la ramée
> Au fond du bois silencieux. . . ."

When she had finished, Tristrem started. The earliest notes had sent the blood pulsing through his veins, thrilling him from finger-tips to the end of the spine, and then a lethargy enveloped him and he ceased to hear, and it was not until Miss Raritan stood up again from the piano that he was conscious that he had not been listening. He had sat near the entrance to the dining-room, and when the applause began afresh he passed out into the hall, found his coat and hat, and left the house.

As he walked down Irving Place he fell to wondering who it was that he had heard complain of being obliged to give up cigarettes, not on account of parental interference but because of a tournament. Yet, after all, what matter did it make? Certainly, he told himself, the Weldons seemed to live very well. Royal must be making money. Mrs. Weldon—Nanny, as Royal called her—was a nice little thing, somewhat—h'm, somewhat—well, not quite up to Royal. She looked like that girl in Munich, the girl that lived over the way, only Mrs. Weldon was prettier and dressed better, much better. Du hast die schönsten Augen. Munich wasn't a bad place, but what a hole Innsprück was. There was that Victoria Cross fellow; whatever became of him? He drank like a fish; it must have caught him by this time. H'm, he would give me the address of his shoemaker. I ought to have taken more from that man in Paris. Odd that the Cenerentola was the last thing I should have heard there. The buffo was good, so was the contralto. She sings much better. What a voice! what a voice! Now, which was the more perfect, the voice or the girl? Let me see, which is the better fulfilled, the odor of the lily or the lily itself? Tulips I never cared for. . . . That is it, then. I wonder, though——

Tristrem had reached the house in Waverley Place. He let himself in with a latchkey, and went to his room. There he sat a while, companioned only by his thoughts. Before he fell asleep, his patriotism was riveted. A land that could produce such a specimen of girlhood outvalued Europe, Asia, and Africa combined—aye, a thousand times—and topped and exceeded creation.

III.

Among the effects and symptoms of love, there is an involuntary action of the mind which, since the days of Stendhal, has been known as crystallization. When a man becomes interested in a woman, when he pictures her not as she really is, but as she seems to him—as she ought to be, in fact—he experiences, first, admiration; second, desire; third, hope; and, behold, love or its counterfeit is born.

This crystallization affects the individual according to his nature. If that nature be inexperienced, unworn—in a word, if it be virginal, its earliest effects are those of a malady. On the other hand, if the nature on which it operates has received the baptism of fire, its effect is that of a tonic. To the one it is a fever, to the other a bugle-call. In the first instance, admiration is pursued by self-depreciation, desire is pinioned before conventional obstacles, and hope falters beneath a weight of doubt. In the second, admiration, desire, and hope are fused into one sentiment, the charm of the chase, the delight of the prospective quarry. As an example, there is Werther, and there is also Don Juan.

Now Tristrem Varick had never known a mother, sisters he had none, the feminine had been absent from his life, but in his nature there was an untarnishable refinement. During his student-days at Harvard, and throughout his residence abroad, there had been nothing of that which the French have agreed to denominate as bonnes fortunes. Such things may have been in his path, waiting only to be gathered, but, in that case, certain it is that he had passed them by unheeded. To use the figurative phrase, he was incapable of stretching his hand to any woman who had not the power of awakening a lasting affection ; and during his wanderings, and despite, too, the example and easy morals of his comrades, no such woman having crossed his horizon, he had been innocent of even the most fugitive liaison. Nevertheless, the morning after the dinner in Gramercy Park, crystallization had done its work. He awoke with the surprise and wonder of an inexperienced sensation; he awoke with the consciousness of being in love, wholly, turbulently, absurdly in love with a girl to whom he had not addressed a single word.

The general opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, there are, after all, very few people who know what love really is. And among those that know, fewer there are that tell. A lexicographer, deservedly forgotten, has defined it as an exchange of fancies, the contact of two epiderms. Another, wiser if less epigrammatic, announced it as a something that no one knew what, coming no one knew whence, and ending no one knew how. But in whatever fashion it may be described, one thing is certain, it has been largely overrated.

In the case of Tristrem Varick it appeared in its most perfect form. The superlative is used advisedly. Love has a hundred aspects, a thousand toilets. It may come at first sight, in which event, if it be enduring, it is, as Balzac has put it, a resultant of that prescience which is known as second sight.

Or, it may come of the gradual fusion of two natures. It may come of propinquity, of curiosity, of sympathy, of hatred. It may come of the tremors of adolescence, the mutual attraction of one sex for the other ; and, again, it may come of natural selection, of the discernment which leads a man through mazes of women to one in particular, to the woman who to him is the one woman in the world and manacles him at her feet. If Tristrem Varick had not met Miss Raritan, it is more than probable that he never would have known the meaning of the word.

When the first surprise at the discovery waned, delight took its place. He saw her amber eyes, he recalled as she had crossed the room the indolent undulation of her hips, he breathed the atmosphere of health which she exhaled, and in his ears her voice still rang. The Non più mesta of her song seemed almost a promise, and the O Magali an invitation. He recalled the movement of her lips, and fell to wondering what her name might be. At first he fancied that it might be Stella ; but that, for some occult reason which only a lover would understand, he abandoned for Thyra, a name which pleasured him awhile and which he repeated aloud until it became sonorous as were it set in titles. But presently some defect presented itself, it sounded less apt, more suited to a blue-eyed daughter of a viking than to one so brune as she. Decidedly, Thyra did not suit her. And yet her name might be something utterly commonplace, such as Fanny, for instance, or Agnes, or Gertrude. But that was a possibility which he declined to entertain. When a girl is baptized, the mother, in choosing the name, should, he told himself, think of the lover who will one day pronounce it. And what had her mother chosen? It would be forethought indeed if she had selected Undine or even Iseult; but what mother was ever clairvoyant enough for that?

He thought this over awhile and was about to give the query up, when suddenly, without an effort on his part, he was visited by a name that announced her as the perfume announces the rose, a name that pictured and painted her, a name that suited her as did her gown of canary, a name that crowned her beauty and explained the melancholy of her lips. "It is Madeleine," he said, "it can be nothing else."

And into the syllables he threw the waving inflection of the French.

"It is Madeleine," he continued, "and when I see her I will tell in what way I divined it."

The possibility that she might be indifferent to such homage did not, for the moment, occur to him. He was loitering in the enchanted gardens of the imagination, which have been visited by us all. It was the improbable that fluttered his pulse.

Hitherto the life of Tristrem Varick had been that of a dilettante. There had been no reason why he should work. His education had unfitted him for labor, and his tastes, if artistic, were not sufficiently pronounced to act as incentives. He handled the brush well enough to know that he could never be a painter; he had a natural understanding of music, its value was clear to him, yet its composition was barred. The one talent that he possessed—a talent that grows rarer with the days—was that of appreciation, he could admire the masterpieces of others, but creation was not his. A few centuries ago he would have made an admirable knight-errant. In a material age like our own, his raison d'être was not obvious. In a word, he was just such an one as his father had intended he should be, one whose normal condition was that of chronic pluperfect subjunctive, and who, if thrown on his own resources, would be helpless indeed.

In some dim way he had been conscious of this before, and hitherto he had accepted it, as he had accepted his father's attitude, as one accepts the inevitable, and put it aside again as something against which, like death, or like life, it is useless to rebel. After all, there was nothing particularly dreadful about it. An inability to be Somebody was not a matter of which the District Attorney is obliged to take cognizance. At least he need do no harm, and he would have wealth enough to do much good. It was in thoughts like these that hitherto he had found consolation. But on this particular morning he looked for them anew, and the search was fruitless. Not one of the old consolations disclosed the slightest worth. He stood before himself naked in his nothingness. The true knowledge of his incompetence had never come home to him before—but now it closed round him in serried arguments, and in the closing shut out all hope of her. Who was he, indeed, to pretend to such a girl ?

To win her, he told himself, one must needs be a conqueror, one who has coped with dangers and could flaunt new triumphs as his lady's due. Some soldier bearing a marshal's baton back from war, some hero that had liberated an empire or stolen a republic for himself, some prince of literature or satrap of song, someone, in fact, who, booted and spurred, had entered the Temple of Fame, and claimed the dome as his. But he! What had he to offer? His name, however historical and respected, was an accident of birth. Of the wealth which he would one day possess he had not earned a groat. And, were it lost, the quadrature of the circle would not be more difficult than its restoration. And yet, and yet—though any man she could meet might be better and wiser and stronger than he, not one would care for her more. At least there was something in that, a tangible value, if ever there were one. There was every reason why she should turn her back, and that one reason, and that one only, why she should not. But that one reason, he told himself, was a force in itself. The resuscitation of hope was so sudden that the blood mounted to his temples and pulsated through his veins.

He left the bed in which his meditations had been passed. "They say everything comes to him who waits," he muttered, and then proceeded to dress. He took a tub and got himself, absent-mindedly, into a morning suit. "I don't believe it," he exclaimed, at last, "the world belongs to the impatient, and I am impatient of her."

Tristrem was in no sense a diplomatist. In his ways there was a candor that was as unusual as it is delightful; yet such is the power of love that, in its first assault, the victim is transformed. The miser turns prodigal, the coward brave, the genius becomes a simpleton, and in the simpleton there awakes a Machiavelli. Tristrem passed a forenoon in trying to unravel as cruel a problem as has ever been given a lover to solve—how, in a city like New York, to meet a girl of whom he knew absolutely nothing, and who was probably unaware of his own existence. He might have waited, it is true—chance holds many an odd trick—but he had decided to be impatient, and in his impatience he went to Gramercy Park and drank tea there, not once, but four afternoons in succession, an excess of civility which surprised Mrs. Weldon not a little.

That he should make an early visit of digestion was quite in the order of things, but when that visit was repeated again and again, Mrs. Weldon, with a commingling of complacency and alarm, told herself that, in her quality of married woman, such persistence should be discouraged. But the opportunity for such discouragement did not present itself, or rather, when it did the need of discouragement had passed. Tristrem drank tea with her several times, and then disappeared abruptly. "He must have known it was hopeless," she reflected, when a week went by unmarked by further enterprise on his part. And then, the intended discouragement notwithstanding, she felt vaguely vexed.

In the tea-drinking Tristrem's object, if not apparent to Mrs. Weldon, was perfectly clear to himself. He desired to learn something of Miss Raritan, and he knew, if the tea-drinking was continued with sufficient endurance, not only would he acquire, from a talkative lady like his hostess, information of the amplest kind, which after all was secondary, but that in the course of a week the girl herself must put in an appearance. A dinner call, if not obligatory to him, was obligatory to her, and on that obligation he counted.

To those who agree to be bound by what the Western press calls etiquette, there is nothing more inexorable than a social debt. A woman may contest her mantua-maker's bill with impunity, her antenuptial promises may go to protest and she remain unestopped; but let her leave a dinner-call overdue and unpaid, then is she shameless indeed. In this code Tristrem was necessarily learned. On returning to Fifth Avenue he had marvelled somewhat at noting that laws which applied to one sex did not always extend to the other, that civility was not exacted of men, that politeness was relegated to the tape-counter and out of place in a drawing-room ; in a word, that it was not good form to be courteous, and not ill-bred to be rude.

While the tea-drinking was in progress he managed without much difficulty to get Mrs. Weldon on the desired topic. There were spacious digressions in her information and abrupt excursions into irrelevant matter, and there were also interruptions by other visitors, and the consequent and tedious exchange of platitude and small-talk. But after the fourth visit Tristrem found himself in possession of a store of knowledge, the sum and substance of which amounted to this : Miss Raritan lived with her mother in the shady part of the Thirties, near Madison Avenue. Her father was dead. It had been rumored, but with what truth Mrs. Weldon was not prepared to affirm, that the girl had some intention of appearing on the lyric stage, which, if she carried out, would of course be the end of her socially. She had been very much run after on account of her voice, and at the Wainwarings the President had said that he had never heard anything like it, and asked her to come to Washington and be present at one of the diplomatic dinners. Personally Mrs. Weldon knew her very slightly, but she intimated that, inasmuch as the government had once sent Raritan père abroad as minister—in order probably to be rid of him—his daughter was inclined to look down on those whose fathers held less exalted positions—on Mrs. Weldon herself, for example.

It was with this little store of information that Tristrem left her on the Thursday succeeding the dinner. It was meagre indeed, and yet ample enough to afford him food for reflection. During the gleaning many people had come and gone, but of Miss Raritan he had as yet seen nothing. The next afternoon, however, as he was about to ascend Mrs. Weldon's stoop for the fifth time in five days, the door opened and the girl on whom his thoughts were centred was before him.

Throughout the week he had lived in the expectation of meeting her, it was the one thing that had brought zest to the day and dreams to the night; there was even a little speech which he had rehearsed, but for the moment he was dumb. He plucked absently at his cuff, to the palms of his hands there came a sudden moisture. In the vestibule above, a servant stood waiting for Miss Raritan to reach the pavement before closing the door, and abruptly, from a barrel-organ at the corner, a waltz was thrown out in jolts.

The girl descended the steps before Tristrem was able to master his emotion.

"Miss Raritan," he began, hastily, "I don't suppose you remember me. I am Mr. Varick. I heard you sing the other night. I have come here every day since in the hope of——; you see, I wanted to ask if I might not have the privilege of hearing you sing again?"

"If you consider it a privilege, certainly. On Sunday evening, though, I thought you seemed rather bored." She made this answer very graciously, with her head held like a bird's, a trifle to one side.

Tristrem gazed at her in a manner that would have mollified a tigress. "I was not bored. I had never heard anyone sing before."

"Yet your friend, Mr. Weldon, tells me that you are very fond of music."

"That is exactly what I mean."

At this speech of his she looked at him, musingly. "I wish I deserved that," she said.

Tristrem began again with new courage. "It is like anything else, I fancy. I doubt if anyone, ignorant of difficulties overcome, ever appreciates a masterpiece. A sonnet, if perfect, is only perfect to a sonneteer. The gallery may applaud a drama, it is the playwright who judges it at its worth. It is the sculptor that appreciates a Canova——"

They had reached the corner where the barrel-organ was in ambush. A woman dragging a child with Italy and dirt in its face followed them, her hand outstretched. Tristrem had an artful way of being rid of a beggar, and after the fumble of a moment he gave her some coin.

——"And the artist who appreciates rags," added Miss Raritan.

"Perhaps. I am not fond of rags myself, but I have often caught myself envying the simplicity which they sometimes conceal. That woman, now, she may be as pleased with my little gift as I am to be walking with you."

"I thought it was my voice you liked," Miss Raritan answered, demurely.

Tristrem experienced a mental start. A suspicion entered his mind which he chased indignantly. There was about the girl an aroma that was incompatible with coquetry.

"You would not, I am sure, have me think of you in the vox et præterea nihil style," he replied. "To be candid, I thought that very matter over the other night." He hesitated, as though waiting for some question, but she did not so much as look at him, and he continued unassisted. "I thought of a flower and its perfume, I wondered which was the more admirable, and—and—I decided that I did not care for tulips."

"But that you did care for me, I suppose?"

"Yes, I decided that."

Miss Raritan threw back her head with a movement indicative of impatience.

"I didn't mean to tell you," he added—"that is, not yet."

They had crossed Broadway and were entering Fifth Avenue. There the stream of carriages kept them a moment on the curb.

"I hope," Tristrem began again, "I hope you are not vexed."

"Vexed at what? No, I am not vexed. I am tired; every other man I meet—There, we can cross now. Besides, I am married. Don't get run over. I am going in that shop."

"You are not married!"

"Yes, I am; if I were a Harvard graduate I would say to Euterpe. As it is, Scales is more definite." She had led him to the door of a milliner, a portal which Tristrem knew was closed to him. "If you care to come and see me," she added, by way of congé, "my husband will probably be at home." And with that she opened the door and passed into the shop.

"I can imagine a husband," thought Tristrem, with a glimmer of that spirit of belated repartee which Thackeray called cab-wit, the brilliancy which comes to us when we are going home, "I can imagine a husband whose greatest merit is his wife."

IV.

The fact that few days elapsed before Tristrem Varick availed himself of Miss Raritan's invitation, and that thereafter he continued to avail himself of it with frequence and constancy, should surprise no one. During the earliest of these visits he met Miss Raritan's mother, and was unaccountably annoyed when he heard that lady address her daughter as Viola. He had been so sure that her baptismal name was Madeleine that the one by which he found she was called sounded false as an alias, and continued so to sound until he accustomed himself to the syllables and ended by preferring it to the Madeleine of his fancy. This, however, by the way. Mrs. Raritan was a woman who, in her youth, must have been very beautiful, and traces of that beauty she still preserved. When she spoke her voice endeared her to you, and in her manner there was that something which made you feel that she might be calumniated, as good women often are, but yet that she could never be the subject of gossip. She did not seem resolute, but she did seem warm of heart, and Tristrem felt at ease with her at once.

Of her he saw at first but little. In a city like New York it is difficult for anyone to become suddenly intimate in a household, however cordial and well-intentioned that household may be. And during those hours of the winter days when Miss Raritan was at home it was seldom that her mother was visible. But it was not long before Tristrem became an occasional guest at dinner, and it was in the process of breaking bread that a semblance of intimacy was established. And at last, when winter had gone and the green afternoons opposed the dusk, Tristrem now and then would drop in of an evening, and in the absence of Miss Raritan pass an hour with her mother. Truly she was not the rose, but did she not dwell at her side?

Meanwhile, Miss Raritan's attitude differed but little from the one which she had first adopted. She treated Tristrem with exasperating familiarity, and kept him at arm's length. She declined to see him when the seeing would have been easy, and summoned him when the summons was least to be expected. He was useful to her as a piece of furniture, and she utilized him as such. In the matter of flowers and theatres he was a convenience. And at routs and assemblies the attention of an heir apparent to seven million was a homage and a tribute which Miss Raritan saw no reason to forego.

In this Tristrem had no one but himself to blame. He had been, and was, almost canine in his demeanor to her. She saw it, knew it, felt it, and treated him accordingly. And he, with the cowardice of love, made little effort at revolt. Now and then he protested to Mrs. Raritan, to whom he had made no secret of his admiration for her daughter, and who consoled him as best she might; but that was all. And so the winter passed and the green afternoons turned sultry, and Tristrem was not a step further advanced than on the day when he had left the girl at the milliner's. On the infrequent occasions when he had ventured to say some word of that which was nearest his heart, she had listened with tantalizing composure, and when he had paused for encouragement or rebuke, she would make a remark of such inappositeness that anyone else would have planted her there and gone. But Tristrem was none other than himself; his nature commanded and he obeyed.

It so happened that one May morning a note was brought him, in which Miss Raritan said that her mother and herself were to leave in a day or two for the country, and could he not get her something to read on the way. Tristrem passed an hour selecting, with infinite and affectionate care, a small bundle of foreign literature. In the package he found room for Balzac's "Pierrette" and the "Curé de Tours," one of Mme. Craven's stupidities, a volume of platitude in rhyme by François Coppée, a copy of De Amicis' futile wanderings in Spain—a few samples, in fact, of the pueris virginibusque school. And that evening, with the bundle under his arm, he sought Miss Raritan.

The girl glanced at the titles and put the books aside. "When we get in order at Narragansett," she said, "I wish you would come up."

Had she kissed him, Tristrem could not have revelled more. "There are any number of hotels," she added, by way of douche.

"Certainly, if you wish it, but—but——"

"Well, but what?"

"I don't know. You see—well, it's this way: You know that I love you, and you know also that you care for me as for the snows of yester-year. There is no reason why you should do otherwise. I don't mean to complain. If I am unable to make you care, the fault is mine. I did think—h'm—no matter. What I wanted to say is this: there is no reason why you should care, and yet——. See here; take two slips of paper, write on one, I will marry you, and, on the other, Put a bullet through your head, and let me draw. I would take the chance so gladly. But that chance, of course, you will not give. Why should you, after all? Why should I give everything I own to the first beggar I meet? But why should you have any other feeling for me than that which you have? And yet, sometimes I think you don't understand. Any man you meet could be more attractive than I, and very easy he would find it to be so; but no one could care for you more—no one——"

Miss Raritan was sitting opposite to him, her feet crossed, her head thrown back, her eyes fixed on the ceiling. One arm lay along the back of the lounge which she occupied, the other was pendant at her side. And while he still addressed her, she arose with the indolence of a panther, crossed the room, picked up a miniature from a table, eyed it as though she had never seen it before and did not particularly care to see it again, and then, seating herself at the piano, she attacked the Il segreto per esser felice, the brindisi from "Lucrezia Borgia."

In the wonder of her voice Tristrem forgot the discourtesy of the action. He listened devoutly. And, as he listened, each note was an electric shock. Il segreto per esser felice, indeed! The secret of happiness was one which she alone of all others in the world could impart. And, as the measures of the song rose and fell, they brought him a transient exhilaration like to that which comes of champagne, dowering him with factitious force wherewith to strive anew. And so it happened that, when the ultimate note had rung out and the girl's fingers loitered on the keys, he went over to her with a face so eloquent that she needed but a glance at it to know what he was seeking to say.

With a gesture coercive as a bit, she lifted one hand from the keys and stayed his lips. Then, she stood up and faced him. "Tristrem," she began, "when I first saw you I told you that I was married to my art. And in an art such as mine there is no divorce. It may be that I shall go on the stage. After all, why should I not? Is society so alluring that I should sacrifice for it that which is to me infinitely preferable? If I have not done so already it is because of my mother. But should I decide to do so, there are years of study before me yet. In which case I could not marry, that is self-evident, not only because I would not marry a man who would suffer me to sing in public—don't interrupt—but also because—well, you told me that you understood the possibilities of the human voice, and you must know what the result would be. But even independent of that, you said a moment ago that I did not love you. Well, I don't. I don't love you. Tristrem, listen to me. I don't love you as you would have me. I wish I did. But I like you. I like you as I can like few other men. Tristrem, except my mother, I have not a friend in the world. Women never care for me, and men—well, save in the case of yourself, when their friendship has been worth the having, it belonged to someone else. Give me yours."

"It will be hard, very hard."

Miss Raritan moved from where she had been standing and glanced at the clock. "You must go now," she said, "but promise that you will try."

She held her hand to him, and Tristrem raised it to his lips and kissed the wrist. "You might as well ask me to increase my stature," he answered. And presently he dropped the hand which he held and left the house.

It was a perfect night. The moon hung like a yellow feather in the sky, and in the air was a balm that might have come from fields of tamaris and of thyme. The street itself was quiet, and as Tristrem walked on, something of the enchantment of the hour fell upon him. On leaving Miss Raritan, he had been irritated at himself. It seemed to him that when with her he was at his worst; that he stood before her dumb for love, awkward, embarrassed, and ineffectual of speech. It seemed to him that he lacked the tact of other men, and that, could she see him as he really was when unemotionalized by her presence, if the eloquence which came to him in solitude would visit him once at her side, if he could plead to her with the fervor with which he addressed the walls, full surely her answer would be other. She would make no proffer then of friendship, or if she did, it would be of that friendship which is born of love, and is better than love itself. But as he walked on the enchantment of the night encircled him. He declined to accept her reply; he told himself that in his eagerness he had been abrupt; that a girl who was worth the winning was slow of capture; that he had expected months to give him what only years could afford, and that Time, in which all things unroll, might yet hold this gift for him. He resolved to put his impatience aside like an unbecoming coat. He would pretend to be but a friend. As a friend he would be privileged to see her, and then, some day the force and persistence of his affection would do the rest. He smiled at his own cunning. It was puerile as a jack-straw, but it seemed shrewdness itself to him. Yes, that was the way. He had done wrong; he had unmasked his batteries too soon. And such batteries! But no matter, of his patience he was now assured. On the morrow he would go to her and begin the campaign anew.

He had reached the corner and was on the point of turning down the avenue, when a hansom rattled up and wheeled so suddenly into the street through which he had come, that he stepped back a little to let it pass. As he did so he looked in at the fare. The cab was beyond him in a second, but in the momentary glimpse which he caught of the occupant, he recognized Royal Weldon. And as he continued his way, he wondered where Royal Weldon could be going.

The following evening he went to dine at the Athenæum Club. The house in Waverley Place affected him as might an empty bier in a tomb. The bread that he broke there choked him. His father was as congenial as a spectre. He only appeared when dinner was announced, and after he had seated himself at the table he asked grace of God in a low, determined fashion, and that was the end of the conversation. Tristrem remembered that in the infrequent vacations of his school and college days, that was the way it always had been, and being tolerably convinced that that was the way it always would be, he preferred, when not expected elsewhere, to dine at the club.

On entering the Athenæum on this particular evening, he put his hat and coat in the vestiary and was about to order dinner, when he was accosted by Alphabet Jones.

"I say, Varick," the novelist exclaimed—(during the winter they had seen much of each other), "do you know who was the originator of the cloak-room? Of course you don't—I'll tell you; who do you suppose now? Give it up? Mrs. Potiphar! How's that? Good enough for Theodore Hook, eh? Let's dine together, and I'll tell you some more."

"Let's dine together" was a formula which Mr. Jones had adopted. Literally, it meant, I'll order and you pay. Tristrem was aware in what light the invitation should be viewed, he had heard it before; but, though the novelist was of the genus spongia, he was seldom tiresome, often entertaining, and moreover, Tristrem was one who would rather pay than not. As there were few of that category in the club, Mr. Jones made a special prey of him, and on this particular evening, when the ordering had been done and the dinner announced, he led him in triumph to the lift.

As they were about to step in, Weldon stepped out. He seemed hurried and would have passed on with a nod, but Tristrem caught him by the arm. Of late he had seen little of him, and it had seemed to Tristrem that the fault, if fault there were, must be his own.

"I caught a glimpse of you last night, didn't I, Royal?" he asked.

Weldon raised his eyebrows for all response. Evidently he was not in a conversational mood. But at once an idea seemed to strike him. "I dare say," he answered, "I roam about now and then like anyone else. By the way, where are you going to-night? Why not look in on my wife? She says you neglect her."

"I would like it, Royal, but the fact is I am going to make a call."

"In Thirty-ninth Street?"

Tristrem looked at him much as a yokel at a fair might look at a wizard. He was so astonished at Weldon's prescience that he merely nodded.

"You can save yourself the trouble then—I happened to meet Miss Raritan this afternoon. She is dining at the Wainwarings. Look in at Gramercy Park." And with that he turned on his heel and disappeared into the smoking-room.

"Didn't I hear Weldon mention Miss Raritan?" Jones asked, when he and Tristrem had finished the roast. "There's a girl I'd like to put in a book. She has hell in her eyes and heaven in her voice. What a heroine she would make!" he exclaimed, enthusiastically; and then in a complete change of key, in a tone that was pregnant with suggestion, he added, "and what a wife!"

"I don't understand you," said Tristrem, in a manner which, for him, was defiant.

Whether or not Jones was a good sailer is a matter of small moment. In any event he tacked at once.

"Bah! I am speaking in the first person. I don't believe in matrimony myself, I am too poor. And besides, I never heard of but one happy marriage, and that was between a blind man and a deaf-mute. Though even then it must have been difficult to know what the woman thought. Now, in regard to Miss Raritan, half the men in the city are after her, pour le bon motif, s'entend; but when a girl has had the dessus du panier at her feet, no fellow can afford to ask her to take a promenade with him down the aisle of Grace Church, unless he has the Chemical Bank in one pocket and the United States Trust Company in the other. Et avec ça!" And Jones waved his head as though not over-sure that the coffers of those institutions would suffice.

"I don't see what that has to do with it," Tristrem indignantly interjected.

"Isn't that odd now?" was Jones' sarcastic reply. "Dr. Holmes says that no fellow can be a thorough-going swell unless he has three generations in oil. And mind you, daguerreotypes won't do. There are any number of your ancestors strung along the walls of the Historical Society, and how many more you may have in that crypt of yours in Waverley Place, heaven only knows. Imprimis, if you accept Dr. Holmes as an authority, you are a thorough-going swell. In the second place, you look like a Greek shepherd. Third, you are the biggest catch in polite society. Certainly it's odd that with such possibilities you should see no reason for not marrying a girl who will want higher-stepping horses than Elisha's, and who, while there is a bandit of a dressmaker in Paris, will decline to imitate the lilies of the field. Certainly——"

"I never said anything about it, I never said anything about marrying or not marrying——"

"Oh, didn't you? I thought you did." And Jones leaned back in his chair and summoned a waiter with an upward movement of the chin. "Bring another pint of this, will you."

"I think I won't take anything more," said Tristrem, rising from the table as he spoke. "It's hot in here. I may see you down-stairs." And with that he left the room.

Mr. Alphabet Jones looked after him a second and nodded sagaciously to himself. "Another man overboard," he muttered, as he toyed with his empty glass. "Ah! jeunesse, jeunesse!"

V.

Tristrem descended the stair and hesitated a moment at the door of the smoking-room. Near-by, at a small table, two men were drinking brandy. He caught a fragment of their speech: it was about a woman. Beyond, another group was listening to that story of the eternal feminine which is everlastingly the same. Within, the air was lifeless and heavy with the odor of cigars, but in the hall there came through the wide portals of the entrance the irresistible breath of a night in May.

Tristrem turned and presently sauntered aimlessly out of the club and up the avenue. Before him, a man was loitering with a girl; his arm was in hers, and he was whispering in her ear. A cab passed, bearing a couple that sat waist-encircled devouring each other with insatiate eyes. And at Twenty-third Street, a few shop-girls, young and very pretty, that were laughing conspicuously together, were joined by some clerks, with whom they paired off and disappeared. At the corner, through the intersecting thoroughfares came couple after couple, silent for the most part, as though oppressed by the invitations of the night. Beyond, in the shadows of the Square, the benches were filled with youths and maidens, who sat hand-in-hand, oblivious to the crowd that circled in indolent coils about them. The moon had not yet risen, but a leash of stars that night had loosed glowed and trembled with desire. The air was sentient with murmurs, redolent with promise. The avenues and the adjacent streets seemed to have forgotten their toil and to swoon unhushed in the bewitchments of a dream of love.

Tristrem found himself straying through its mazes and convolutions. Whichever way he turned there was some monition of its presence. From a street-car which had stayed his passage he saw the conductor blow a kiss to a hurrying form, and through an open window of Delmonico's he saw a girl with summer in her eyes reach across the table at which she sat and give her companion's hand an abrupt yet deliberate caress.

Tristrem continued his way, oppressed. He was beset by an insidious duscholia. He felt as one does who witnesses a festival in which there is no part for him. The town reeked with love as a brewery reeks with beer. The stars, the air, the very pavements told of it. It was omnipresent, and yet there was none for him.

He tried to put it from him and think of other things. Of Jones, for instance. Why had he spoken of Viola? And then, in the flight of fancies which surged through his mind, there was one that he stayed and detained. It was that he must see her again before she left town. He looked at his watch: it lacked twenty minutes to ten, and on the impulse of the moment he hailed a passing 'bus. It was inexplicable to him that the night before she should have let him go without a word as to her movements. It seemed to be understood that he was to come again to wish her a pleasant journey. And when was he to come if not that very evening? Surely at the time she had forgotten this engagement with the Wainwarings, and some note had been left for him at the door. And if no note had been left, then why should he not ask for her mother or wait till she returned? A bell rang sharply through the vehicle and aroused him from his reverie. He glanced up, and saw the driver eyeing him through the machicoulis of glass. It was the fare he wanted, and as Tristrem deposited it in the box he noticed that the familiar street was reached.

In a few moments he was at the house. On the stoop a servant was occupied with the mat.

"Is, eh, did——"

"Yes, sir," the man answered, promptly. "Miss Raritan is in the parlor."

In the surprise at the unexpected, Tristrem left his hat and coat, and pushing aside the portière, he entered the room unannounced. At first he fancied that the servant had been mistaken. Miss Raritan was not at her accustomed place, and he stood at the door-way gazing about in uncertainty.

But in an instant, echoing from the room beyond, he caught the sound of her voice; yet in the voice was a tone which he had never heard before—a tone of smothered anger that carried with it the accent of hate.

Moved by unconscious springs, he left the door-way and looked into the adjoining room. A man whom at first he did not recognize was standing by a lounge from which he had presumably arisen. And before him, with both her small hands clinched and pendent, and in her exquisite face an expression of relentless indignation, stood Miss Raritan. Another might have thought them rehearsing a tableau for some theatricals of the melodramatic order, but not Tristrem. He felt vaguely alarmed: there came to him that premonition without which no misfortune ever occurs; and suddenly the alarm changed to bewilderment. The man had turned: it was Royal Weldon. Tristrem could not credit his senses. He raised his hand to his head: it did not seem possible that a felon could have told a more wanton lie than he had been told but little over an hour before; and yet the teller of that lie was his nearest friend. And still he did not understand ; surely there was some mistake. He would have spoken, but Weldon crossed the room to where he stood, and with set teeth and contracted muscles fronted him a second's space, and into his eyes he looked a defiance that was the more hideous in that it was mute. Then, with a gesture that almost tore the portière from its rings, he passed out into the hall and let the curtain fall behind him.

As he passed on Tristrem turned with the obedience of a subject under the influence of a mesmerist ; and when the curtain fell again he started as subjects do when they awake from their trance.

The fairest, truest, and best may be stricken in the flush of health ; yet after the grave has opened and closed again does not memory still subsist, and to the mourner may not the old dreams return ? However acute the grief may be, is it not often better to know that affection is safe in the keeping of the dead than to feel it at the mercy of the living ? We may prate as we will, but there are many things less endurable than the funeral of the best-beloved. Death is by no means the worst that can come.

Whoso discovers that affection reposed has been given to an illusory representation; to one not as he is, but as fancy pictured him; to a trickster that has cheated the heart—in fact, to a phantom that has no real existence outside of the imagination, must experience a sinking more sickening than any corpse can convey. At the moment, the crack of doom that is to herald an eternal silence cannot more appal.

Tristrem still stood gazing at the portière through which Weldon had disappeared. He heard the front door close, and the sound of feet on the pavement. And presently he was back at St. Paul's, hurrying from the Upper School to intercede with the master. It was bitterly cold that morning, but in the afternoon the weather had moderated, and they had both gone to skate. And then the day he first came. He remembered his good looks, his patronizing, precocious ways; everything, even to the shirt he wore—blue, striped with white—and the watch with the crest and the motto Well done, Weldon. No, it was ill done, Weldon, and the lie was ignoble. And why had he told it? Their friendship, seemingly, had been so stanch, so unmarred by disagreement, that this lie was as a dash of blood on a white wall—an ineffaceable stain.

If there are years that count double, there are moments in which the hour-glass is transfixed. The entire scene, from Tristrem's entrance to Weldon's departure, was compassed in less than a minute, yet during that fragment of time there had been enacted a drama in epitome—a drama humdrum and ordinary indeed, but in which Tristrem found himself bidding farewell to one whom he had never known.

He was broken in spirit, overwhelmed by the suddenness of the disaster, and presently, as though in search of sympathy, he turned to Miss Raritan. The girl had thrown herself in a chair, and sat, her face hidden in her hands. As Tristrem approached her she looked up. Her cheeks were blanched.

"He told me you were at the Wainwaring's," Tristrem began. "I don't see," he added, after a moment—"I don't understand why he should have done so. He knew you were here, yet he said——"

"Did you hear what he said to me?"

Tristrem for all response shook his head wonderingly.

The girl's cheeks from white had turned to flame.

"He has not been to you the friend you think," she said, and raising her arm to her face, she made a gesture as though to brush from her some distasteful thing.

"But what has he done? What did he say?"

"Don't ask me. Don't mention him to me." She buried her face again in her hands and was silent.

Tristrem turned uneasily and walked into the other room, and then back again to where she sat; but still she hid her face and was silent. And Tristrem left her and continued his walk, this time to the dining-room and then back to the parlor which he had first entered. And after a while Miss Raritan stood up from her seat, and as though impelled by the nervousness of her companion, she, too, began to pace the rooms, but in the contrary direction to that which Tristrem had chosen. At last she stopped, and when Tristrem approached her she beckoned him to her side.

"What did you say to me last night?" she asked.

"What did I say? I said—you asked me—I said it would be difficult."

"Do you think so still?"

"Always."

"Tristrem, I will be your wife."

A Cimmerian led out of darkness into sudden light could not marvel more at multicolored vistas than did Tristrem, at this promise. Truly they are most hopeless who have hoped the most. And Tristrem, as he paced the rooms, had told himself it was done. His hopes had scattered before him like last year's leaves. He had groped in shadows and had been conscious only of a blind alley, with a dead wall, somewhere, near at hand. But now, abruptly, the shadows had gone, the blind alley had changed into a radiant avenue, the dead wall had parted like a curtain, and beyond was a new horizon, gold-barred and blue, and landscapes of asphodels and beckoning palms. He was as one who, overtaken by sleep on the banks of the Styx, awakes in Arcadia.

His face was so eloquent with the bewitchments through which he roamed that, for the first time that evening, Miss Raritan smiled. She raised a finger warningly.

"Now, Tristrem, if you say anything ridiculous I will take it back."

But the warning was needless. Tristrem caught the finger, and kissed her hand with old-fashioned grace.

"Viola," he said, at last, "I thank you. I do not know what I can do to show how I appreciate this gift of gifts. But yet, if it is anything, if it can bring any happiness to a girl to know that she fills a heart to fulfilment itself, that she dwells in thought as the substance of thought, that she animates each fibre of another's being, that she enriches a life with living springs, and feels that it will be never otherwise, then you will be happy, for so you will always be to me."

The speech, if pardonably incoherent, was not awkwardly made, and it was delivered with a seriousness that befitted the occasion. In a tone as serious as his own, she answered:

"I will be true to you, Tristrem." That was all. But she looked in his face as she spoke.

They had been standing, but now they found seats near to each other. Tristrem would not release her hand, and she let it lie unrebellious in his own. And in this fashion they sat and mapped the chartless future. Had Tristrem been allowed his way the marriage would have been an immediate one. But to this, of course, Miss Raritan would not listen.

"Not before November," she said, with becoming decision.

"Why, that is five months off!"

"And months are short, and then——"

"But, Viola, think! Five months! It is a kalpa of time. And besides," he added, with the cogent egotism of an accepted lover, "what shall I do with myself in the meantime?"

"If you are good you may come to the Pier, and there we will talk edelweiss and myosotis, as all engaged people do." She said this so prettily that the sarcasm, if sarcasm there were, was lost.

To this programme Tristrem was obliged to subscribe.

"Well, then, afterward we will go abroad."

"Don't you like this country?" the girl asked, all the stars and stripes fluttering in her voice, and in a tone which one might use in reciting, "Breathes there the man, with soul so dead?"

"I think," he answered, apologetically, "that I do like this country. It is a great country. But New York is not a great city, at least not to my thinking. Collectively it is great, I admit, but individually not, and that is to me the precise difference between it and Paris. Collectively the French amount to little, individually it is otherwise."

"But you told me once that Paris was tiresome."

"I was not there with you. And should it become so when we are there together, we have the whole world to choose from. In Germany we can have the middle ages over again. In London we can get the flush of the nineteenth century. There is all of Italy, from the lakes to Naples. We can take a doge's palace in Venice, or a Cæsar's villa on the Baia. With a dahabieh we could float down into the dawn of history. You would look well in a dahabieh, Viola."

"As Aida?"

"Better. And that reminds me, Viola; tell me, you will give up all thought of the stage, will you not?"

"How foolish you are. Fancy Mrs. Tristrem Varick before the footlights. There are careers open to a girl that the acceptance of another's name must close. And the stage is one of them. I should have adopted it long ago, had it not been for mother. She seems to think that a Raritan—but there, you know what mothers are. Now, of course, I shall give it up. Besides, Italian opera is out of fashion. And even if it were otherwise, have I not now a lord, a master, whom I must obey?"

Her eyes looked anything but obedience, yet her voice was melodious with caresses.

And so they sat and talked and made their plans, until it was long past the conventional hour, and Tristrem felt that he should go. He had been afloat in unnavigated seas of happiness, but still in his heart he felt the burn of a red, round wound. The lie that Weldon had told smarted still, yet with serener spirit he thought there might be some unexplained excuse.

"Tell me," he asked, as he was about to leave, "what was it Weldon said?"

Miss Raritan looked at him, and hesitated before she spoke. Then catching his face in her two hands she drew it to her own.

"He said you were a goose," she whispered, and touched her lips to his.

With this answer Tristrem was fain to be content. And presently, when he left the house, he reeled as though he had drunk beaker after flagon of the headiest wine.

VI.

After a ten-mile pull on the river, a shandygaff of Bass and champagne is comforting to the oarsman. It is accounted pleasant to pay a patient creditor an outlawed debt. But a poet has held that the most pleasurable thing imaginable is to awake on a summer morning with the consciousness of being in love. Even in winter the sensation ought not to be disagreeable; yet when to the consciousness of being in love is added the belief that the love is returned, then the bleakest day of all the year must seem like a rose of June.

Tristrem passed the night in dreams that told of Her. He strayed through imperishable beauties, through dawns surrounded by candors of hope. The breath of brooks caressed him, he was enveloped in the sorceries of a sempiternal spring. The winds, articulate with song, choired to the skies ululations and messages of praise. Each vista held a promise. The horizon was a prayer fulfilled. He saw grief collapse and joy enthroned. From bird and blossom he caught the incommunicable words of love. And when from some new witchery he at last awoke, he smiled—the real was fairer than the dream.

For some time he loitered in the gardens which his fancy disclosed, spectacular-wise, for his own delight, until at last he bethought him of the new duties of his position and of the accompanying necessity of making those duties known to those to whom he was related. Then, after a breakfast of sliced oranges and coffee, he rang for the servant and told him to ask his father whether he could spare a moment that morning. In a few minutes the servant returned. "Mr. Varick will be happy to see you, sir," he said.

"What did he say?" Tristrem asked; "what were his exact words?"

"Well, sir, I said as how you presented your compliments, and could you see him, and he didn't say nothing; he was feeding the burd. But I could tell, sir; when Mr. Varick doesn't like a thing, he looks at you, and if he does, he doesn't."

"And he didn't look at you?"

"No, sir, he didn't turn his 'ead."

"H'm," said Tristrem to himself, as he descended the stairs, "I wonder, when I tell him, whether he will look at me." And the memory of his father's stare cast a shadow on his buoyant spirits.

On entering the room in which Mr. Varick passed his mornings, Tristrem found that gentleman seated at a table. In one hand he held a bronze-colored magazine, and in the other a silver knife. In the window was a gilt cage in which a bird was singing, and on the table was a profusion of roses—the room itself was vast and chill. One wall was lined, the entire length, with well-filled book-shelves. In a corner was a square pile of volumes, bound in pale sheep, which a lawyer would have recognized as belonging to the pleasant literature of his profession. And over the book-shelves was a row of Varicks, standing in the upright idleness which is peculiar to portraits in oil. It was many years since Tristrem had entered this room; yet now, save for the scent of flowers and the bird-cage, it was practically unchanged.

"Father," he began at once, "I would not have ventured to disturb you if—if—that is, unless I had something important to say." He was looking at his father, but his father was not looking at him. "It is this," he continued, irritated in spite of himself by the complete disinterestedness of one whose son he was; "I am engaged to be married."

At this announcement Mr. Varick fluttered the paper-knife, but said nothing.

"The young lady is Miss Raritan," he added, and then paused, amazed at the expression of his father's face. It was as though unseen hands were torturing it at will. The mouth, cheeks, and eyelids quivered and twitched, and then abruptly Mr. Varick raised the bronze-colored magazine, held it before his tormented features, and when he lowered it again his expression was as apathetic as before.

"You are ill!" Tristrem exclaimed, advancing to him.

But Mr. Varick shook his head, and motioned him back. "It is nothing," he answered. "Let me see, you were saying——?"

"I am engaged to Miss Raritan."

"The daughter of——"

"Her father was Roanoke Raritan. He was minister somewhere—to England or to France, I believe."

While Tristrem was giving this information Mr. Varick went to the window. He looked at the occupant of the gilt cage, and ran a thumb through the wires. The bird ruffled its feathers, cocked its head, and edged gingerly along the perch, reproving the intrusive finger with the scorn and glitter of two eyes of bead. But the anger of the canary was brief. In a moment Mr. Varick left the cage, and turned again to his son.

"Nothing you could do," he said, "would please me better."

"Thank you," Tristrem answered, "I——"

"Are you to be married at once?"

"Not before November, sir."

"I wish it were sooner. I do not approve of protracted engagements. But, of course, you know your own business best. If I remember rightly, the father of this young lady did not leave much of a fortune, did he?"

"Nothing to speak of, I believe."

"You have my best wishes. The match is very suitable, very suitable. I wish you would say as much, with my compliments, to the young lady's mother. I would do so myself, but, as you know, I am something of an invalid. You might add that, too—and —er—I don't mean to advise you, but I would endeavor to hasten the ceremony. In such matters, it is usual for the young lady to be coy, but it is for the man to be pressing and resolute. I only regret that her father could not know of it. In regard to money, your allowance will have to be increased—well, I will attend to that. There is nothing else, is there? Oh, do me the favor not to omit to say that I am much pleased. I knew Miss Raritan's father." Mr. Varick looked up at the ceiling, and put his hand to his mouth. It was difficult to say whether he was concealing a smile or a yawn. "He would be pleased, I know." And with that Mr. Varick resumed his former position, and took up again the magazine.

"It is very good of you," Tristrem began; "I didn't know, of course—you see, I knew that if you saw the young lady—but what am I calling her a young lady for?" he asked, in an aside, of himself—"Miss Raritan, I mean," he continued aloud, "you would think me fortunate as a king's cousin." He paused. "I am sure," he reflected, "I don't know what I am talking about. What I say is sheer imbecility. However," he continued, again, "I want to thank you. You have seen so little of me that I did not expect you would be particularly interested, I—I——"

He hesitated again, and then ceased speaking. He had been looking at his father, and something in his father's stare fascinated and disturbed his train of thought. For the moment he was puzzled. From his childhood he had felt that his father disliked him, though the reason of that dislike he had never understood. It was one of those things that you get so accustomed to that it is accepted, like baldness, as a matter of course, as a thing which had to be and could not be otherwise. To his grandfather, who was at once the most irascible and gentlest of men, and whom he had loved instinctively, from the first, with the unreasoning faith that children have—to him he had, in earlier days, spoken more than once of the singularity of his father's attitude. The old gentleman, however, had no explanation to give. Or, if he had one, he preferred to keep it to himself. But he petted the boy outrageously, with some idea of making up for it all, and of showing that he at least had love enough for two.

And now, as Tristrem gazed in his father's face, he seemed to decipher something that was not dislike—rather the contented look of one who learns of an enemy's disgrace, a compound of malice and of glee.

"That was all I had to say," Tristrem added, with his winning smile, as though apologizing for the lameness of the conclusion. And thereupon he left the room and went out to consult a jeweller and bear the tidings to other ears.

For some time he was absurdly happy. His grandfather received the announcement of the coming marriage with proper enthusiasm. He laughed sagaciously at Tristrem's glowing descriptions of the bride that was to be, and was for going to call on the mother and daughter at once, and was only prevented on learning that they had both left town.

"But I must write," he said, and write he did, two elaborate letters, couched in that phraseology at once recondite and simple which made our ancestors the delightful correspondents that they were. The letters were old-fashioned indeed. Some of the sentences were enlivened with the eccentricities of orthography which were in vogue in the days of the Spectator. The handwriting was infamous, and the signature on each was adorned with an enormous flourish. They were not models for a Perfect Letter Writer, but they were heartfelt and honest, and they served their purpose very well.

"And, Tristrem," the old gentleman said, when the addresses had been dried with a shower of sand and the letters despatched, "you must take her this, with my love. I gave it to your mother on her wedding day, and now it should go to her." From a little red case he took a diamond brooch, set in silver, which he polished reflectively on his sleeve. "She was very sweet, Tristrem, your mother was—a good girl, and a pretty one. Did I ever tell you about the time——"

And the old gentleman ran on with some anecdote of the dear dead days in which his heart was tombed. Tristrem listened with the interest of those that love. He had heard the story, and many others of a similar tenor, again and again, but, somehow, he never heard them too often. There was nothing wearisome to him in such chronicles; and as he sat listening, and now and then prompting with some forgotten detail, anyone who had happened on the scene would have accounted it pleasant to watch the young fellow and the old man talking together over the youth of her who had been mother to one and daughter to the other.

"See!" said Tristrem at last, when his grandfather had given the brooch into his keeping. "See! I have something for her too." And with that he displayed a ruby, unset, that was like a clot of blood. "I shall have it put in a ring," he explained, "but this might do for a bonnet-pin;" and then he produced a green stone, white-filmed, that had a heart of oscillating flame.

Mr. Van Norden had taken the ruby in his hand and held it off at arm's length, and then between two fingers, to the light, that he might the better judge of its beauty. But at the mention of the bonnet-pin he turned to look :

"Surely, Tristrem, you would not give her that ; it's an opal."

"And what if it is ?"

"But it is not lucky."

Tristrem smiled blithely, with the bravery that comes of nineteenth-century culture.

"It's a pearl with a soul," he answered, "that's what it is. And if Viola doesn't like it I'll send it to you."

"God forbid," Mr. Van Norden replied ; "if anyone sent me an opal I would swear so hard that if the devil heard me he'd go in a corner and cross himself."

At this threat Tristrem burst out laughing, and the old gentleman, amused in spite of himself at the fantasy of his own speech, burst out laughing too.

Then there was more chat, and more reminiscences, and much planning as to how Tristrem should best assume the rank and appanages of the married state. Tristrem dined with his grandfather that evening, and when Mr. Van Norden started out to his club for a game of whist, Tristrem accompanied him as far as the club door.

When they parted, Tristrem was in such spirits that he could have run up to Central Park and back again. "Divinities of Pindar," he kept exclaiming—a phrase that he had caught somewhere—"divinities of Pindar, she is mine."

Thereafter, for several days, he lived, as all true lovers do, on air and the best tenderloins he could obtain.

VII.

One morning Tristrem found the sliced oranges companied by a note from Her. It was not long, but he read it so often that it became lengthy in spite of the writer. The cottage, it informed him, which had been taken for the summer, was becoming habitable. As yet but one of the hotels, and that the worst, was prepared for guests. In a fortnight, however, the others would begin to open their doors, and meanwhile if, in the course of the week, he cared to run up, there was a room in the cottage at his disposal.

"In the course of the week," soliloquized Tristrem; "h'm—well, this afternoon is in the course of it, and this afternoon will I go."

Pleasured by the artfulness of his own sophistry, he procured a provision of langues dorées, a comestible of which she was fond, found at Tiffany's the ruby and opal set in accordance with orders already given, and at two o'clock boarded the Newport express.

The train reached New London before Tristrem had so much as glanced at a volume which he held in his hand. He had little need of anything to occupy his thoughts. His mind was a scenario in which he followed the changes and convolutions of an entertainment more alluring than any that romancer or playwright could convey. He was in that mood which we all of us have experienced, in which life seems not only worth living, but a fountain of delight as well. Were ever fields more green or sky more fair? And such a promise as the future held! In his hearing was a choir of thrushes, and on his spirit had been thrown a mantle so subtle, yet of texture so insistent, that no thought not wholly pure could pierce the woof or find a vantage-ground therein. He was in that mood in which one feels an ascension of virtues, the companionship of unviolated illusions, the pomp and purple of worship, a communion with all that is best, a repulsion of all that is base—that mood in which hymns mount unsummoned from the heart.

He was far away, but the Ideal was at his side. The past was a mirror, mirroring nothing save his own preparation and the dream of the coming of her. And now she had come, fairer than the fairest vision and desire that ever visited a poet starving in a garret. To be worthy of her, even in the slightest measure, what was there that he would leave undone? And as the train brought him to his journey's end, he repeated to himself, gravely and decorously, and with the earnestness and sincerity of the untried, the grave covenants of the marriage pact.

On descending at the station he remembered, for the first time, that he had omitted to send Miss Raritan an avant-courier in the shape of a telegram. It is one of the oddities of hazard that, in turning down one street instead of turning up another, a man's existence, and not his own alone, but that of others also, may seem to be wholly changed thereby. The term seem is used advisedly, for, with a better understanding of the interconnection of cause and effect, chance has been outlawed by science, and in the operations of consistent laws the axiom, "Whatever will be, Is," has passed to the kindergarten. Tristrem thought of this months afterward. He remembered then, that that morning he had started out with the intention of sending a telegram from the club, but on the way there he had thought of the chocolate which Viola preferred, and, after turning into Broadway to purchase it, he had drifted into Tiffany's, and from there he had returned to Waverley Place, the message unsent and forgotten. He recalled these incidents months later, but for the moment he merely felt a vague annoyance at his own neglect.

There was a negro at the station, the driver of a coach in whose care Tristrem placed himself, and presently the coach rattled over a road that skirted the sea, and drew up at the gate of a tiny villa. On the porch Mrs. Raritan was seated, and when she recognized her visitor she came down the path, exclaiming her pleasure and welcome. It was evident at once that she had been gratified by her daughter's choice.

"But we didn't expect you," she said. "Viola told me you would not come before Saturday. I am glad you did, though; as yet there's hardly a soul in the place. Viola has gone riding. It's after seven, isn't it? She ought to be back now. Why didn't you send us word? We would have met you at the train."

They had found seats on the porch. Tristrem explained his haste, apologizing for the neglect to wire. The haste seemed pardonable to Mrs. Raritan, and the attendant absent-mindedness easily understood. And so for some moments they talked together. Tristrem delivered his father's message, and learned that Mr. Van Norden's letters had been received. Some word was even said of the possibility of a September wedding. And then a little plot was concocted. Dinner would be served almost immediately, so soon, in fact, as Viola returned. Meanwhile, Tristrem would go to his room, Mrs. Raritan would say nothing of his arrival, but, when dinner was announced, a servant would come to his door, and then he was to appear and give Viola the treat and pleasure of a genuine surprise.

This plan was acted on at once. Tristrem was shown to the room which he was to occupy, and proceeded to get his things in order. From his shirt-box, which, with his valise, had already been brought upstairs, he took the ring, the brooch, the pin, and placed them on the mantel. Then he found other garments, and began to dress. In five minutes he was in readiness, but as yet he heard nothing indicative of Viola's return. He went to the window and looked out. Above the trees, in an adjacent property, there loomed a tower. The window was at the back of the house; he could not see the ocean, but he heard its resilient sibilants, and from the garden came the hum of insects. It had grown quite dark, but still there was no sign of Viola's return.

He took up the volume which he had brought with him in the cars. It was the Rime Nuove of Carducci, and with the fancies of that concettist of modern Rome he stayed his impatience for a while. There was one octave that had appealed to him before. He read it twice, and was about to endeavor to repeat the lines from memory, when through the open window he heard the clatter of horses' hoofs, the roll of wheels; it was evident that some conveyance had stopped at the gate of the villa. Then came the sound of hurrying feet, a murmur of voices, and abruptly the night was cut with the anguish of a woman's cry.

Tristrem rushed from the room and down the stairs. Through the open door beyond a trembling star was visible, and in the road a group of undistinguished forms.

"She's only fainted," someone was saying; "she was right enough a minute ago."

Before the sentence was completed, Tristrem was at the gate. Hatless, with one hand ungloved and the other clutching a broken whip, the habit rent from hem to girdle, dust-covered and dishevelled, the eyes closed, and in the face the pallor and contraction of mortal pain, Viola Raritan lay, waist-supported, in her mother's arms.

"Help me with her to the house," the mother moaned. Then noticing Tristrem at her side, "She's been thrown," she added; "I knew she would be—I knew it——"

And as Tristrem reached to aid her with the burden, the girl's eyes opened, "It's nothing." She raised her ungloved hand, "I—" and swooned again.

They bore her into a little sitting-room, and laid her down. Mrs. Raritan followed, distraught with fright. In her helplessness, words came from her unsequenced and obscure. But soon she seemed to feel the need of action. One servant she despatched for a physician, from another a restorative was obtained. And Tristrem, meanwhile, knelt at the girl's side, beating her hand with his. It had been scratched, he noticed, as by a briar, and under the nails were stains such as might come from plucking berries that are red.

As he tried to take from her the whip, that he might rub the hand that held it too, the girl recovered consciousness again. The swoon had lasted but a moment or so, yet to him who watched it had been unmeasured time. She drew away the hand he held, and raising herself she looked at him ; to her lips there came a tremulousness and her eyes filled.

"My darling," Mrs. Raritan sobbed, "are you hurt ? Tell me. How did it happen ? Did the horse run away with you. Oh, Viola, I knew there would be an accident. Where are you hurt ? Did the horse drag you ?"

The girl turned to her mother almost wonderingly. It seemed to Tristrem that she was not yet wholly herself.

"Yes," she answered ; "no, I mean—no, he didn't, it was an accident, he shied. Do get me upstairs." And with that her head fell again on the cushion.

Tristrem sought to raise her, but she motioned him back and caught her mother's hand, and rising with its assistance she let the arm circle her waist, and thus supported she suffered herself to be led away.

Tristrem followed them to the hall. On the porch a man loitered, hat in hand ; as Tristrem approached he rubbed the brim reflectively.

"I saw the horse as good as an hour ago," he said, "I was going to Caswell's." And with this information he crooked his arm and made a backward gesture. "It's down yonder on the way to the Point," he explained. "As I passed Hazard's I looked in the cross-road—I call it a road, but after you get on a bit it's nothing more than a cow-path, all bushes and suchlike. But just up the road I see'd the horse. He was nibbling grass as quiet as you please. I didn't pay no attention, I thought he was tied. Well, when I was coming back I looked again; he wasn't there, but just as I got to the turn I heard somebody holloaing, and I stopped. A man ran up and says to me, 'There's a lady hurt herself, can't you give her a lift?' 'Where?' says I. 'Down there,' he says, 'back of Hazard's; she's been thrown.' So I turned round, and sure enough there she was, by the fence, sort of dazed like. I says, 'Are you hurt, miss?' and she says, 'No,' but could I bring her here, and then I see'd that her dress was torn. She got in, and I asked her where her hat was, and she said it was back there, but it didn't make no difference, she wanted to get home. And when we were driving on here I told her as how I see'd the horse, and I asked if it wasn't one of White's, and she said, 'Yes, it was,' and I was a-going to ask where she was thrown, but she seemed sort of faint, and, sure enough, just as we got here away she went. I always says women-folk ought not to be let on horse-back, she might have broke her neck; like as not——"

"You have been very kind," Tristrem answered, "very kind, indeed."

During the entire scene he had not said a word. The spectacle of Viola fainting on the roadside, the fear that she might be maimed, the trouble at her pallor—these things had tied his tongue; and even now, as he spoke, his voice was not assured, and a hand with which he fumbled in his waistcoat trembled so that the roll of bills which he drew out fell on the porch at his feet. He stooped and picked it up.

"If Mrs. Raritan were here, she would thank you as I do," he continued. "I wish—" and he was about to make some present, but the man drew back.

"That's all right, I don't want no pay for that."

"I beg your pardon," Tristrem answered, "I know you do not. Tell me, are you married?"

The man laughed.

"Yes, I am, and I got the biggest boy you ever see. He's going on four years and he weighs a ton."

"I wish you would do me a favor. Let me make him a little present."

But even to this the man would not listen. He was reluctant to accept so much as thanks. Having done what good he could, he was anxious to go his way—the sort of man that one has to visit the seashore to find, and who, when found, is as refreshing as the breeze.

As he left the porch, he looked back. "Here's the doctor," he said, and passed on into the night.

While the physician visited the patient, Tristrem paced the sitting-room counting the minutes till he could have speech with him, himself. And when at last he heard the stairs creak, he was out in the hall, prepared to question and intercept. The physician was most reassuring. There was nothing at all the matter. By morning Miss Raritan would be up and about. She had had a shock, no doubt. She was upset, and a trifle nervous, but all she needed was a good night's rest, with a chop and a glass of claret to help her to it. If sleep were elusive, then a bromide. But that was all. If she had been seventy a tumble like that might have done for her, but at nineteen! And the doctor left the house, reflecting that were not educated people the most timorous of all, the emoluments of his profession would be slight.

Whether or not Miss Raritan found the chop and claret sufficient, or whether she partook of a bromide as well, is not a part of history. In a little while after the physician's departure a servant brought word to Tristrem that for the moment Mrs. Raritan was unable to leave her daughter, but if he would have his dinner then, Mrs. Raritan would see him later. Such was the revulsion of feeling that Tristrem, to whom, ten minutes before, the mere mention of food would have been distasteful, sat down, and ate like a wolf. The meal finished, he went out on the porch. There was no moon as yet, but the sky was brilliant with the lights of other worlds. Before him was the infinite, in the air was the scent of sea-weed, and beyond, the waves leaped up and fawned upon the bluffs. And as he stood and watched it all, the servant came to him with Mrs. Raritan's apologies. She thought it better, the maid explained, not to leave Miss Raritan just yet, and would Mr. Varick be good enough to excuse her for that evening?

"Wait a second," he answered, and went to his room. He found the jewels, and brought them down-stairs. "Take these to Miss Raritan," he said, and on a card he wrote some word of love, which he gave with the trinkets to the maid. "La parlate d'amor," he murmured, as the servant left to do his bidding, and then he went again to his room, and sat down at the window companioned only by the stars. From beyond, the boom and retreating wash of waves was still audible, and below in the garden he caught, now and then, the spark and glitter of a firefly gyrating in loops of gold, but the tower which he had noticed on arriving was lost in the night.

It was in that direction, he told himself, that the accident must have occurred. And what was it, after all? As yet he had not fully understood. Had the horse stumbled, or had he bolted and thrown her? If he had only been there! And as his fancy evoked the possibilities of that ride, he saw a terrified brute tearing along a deserted road, carrying the exquisite girl straight to some sudden death, and, just when the end was imminent, his own muscles hardened into steel, he had him by the bit and, though dragged by the impetus, at last he held him, and she was safe. She was in his arms, her own about his neck, and were he a knight-errant and she some gracious princess, what sweeter guerdon could he claim?

But one thing preoccupied him. In the vertiginous flight she had lost something—her whip, no, her hat—and it was incumbent on him to restore it to her. Very softly, then, that he might not disturb her, he opened the door. The house was hushed, and in a moment he was on the road. He could see the tower now; it was illuminated, and it seemed to him odd that he had not noticed the illumination before. It was that way, he knew, back of Hazard's, and he hurried along in the direction which the man had indicated. The insects had stilled their murmur, and the sky was more obscure, but the road was clear.

He hurried on, and as he hurried he heard steps behind him, hurrying too. He turned his head ; behind him was a woman running, and who, as she ran, cast a shadow that was monstrous. In the glimpse that he caught of her he saw that she was bare of foot and that her breast was uncovered. Her skirt was tattered and her hair was loose. He turned again, the face was hideous. The eyes squinted, lustreless and opaque, the nose was squat, the chin retreated, the forehead was seamed with scars, and the mouth, that stretched to the ears, was extended with laughter. As she ran she took her teeth out one by one, replacing them with either hand. And still she laughed, a silent laughter, her thin lips distorted as though she mocked the world.

Tristrem, overcome by the horror of that laughter, felt as agonized as a child pursued. There was a fence at hand, a vacant lot, and across it a light glimmered. Away he sped. In the field his foot caught in a bramble ; he fell, and could not rise, but he heard her coming and, with a great effort just as she was on him, he was up again, distancing her with ever-increasing space. The light was just beyond. He saw now it came from the tower ; there was another fence, he was over it ; the door was barred ; no, it opened ; he was safe !

In the middle of the room, circular as befits a tower, was a cradle, and in the cradle was a little boy. As Tristrem looked at him he smiled ; it was, he knew, the child of the man to whom he had spoken that evening. One hand was under the pillow, but the other, that lay on the coverlid, held Viola's hat. He bent over to examine it ; the fingers that held it were grimy and large, and, as he looked closer, he saw that it was not a child, but the man himself. Before he had an opportunity to account for the delusion he heard the gallop of feet and a thunder at the door. It was she ! He wheeled like a rat surprised. There was a lateral exit, through which he fled, and presently he found himself in a corridor that seemed endless in extension. The man evidently had left the cradle and preceded him, for Tristrem saw him putting on a great-coat some distance ahead. In his feverish fright he thought, could he but disguise himself with that, he might pass out unobserved, and he ran on to supplicate for an exchange of costume ; but when he reached the place where the man had stood he had gone, vanished through a dead wall, and down the corridor he heard her come. He could hear her bare feet patter on the stones. Oh, God, what did she wish of him ? And no escape, not one. He was in her power, immured with her forevermore. He called for help, and beat at the walls, and ever nearer she came, swifter than disease, and more appalling than death. His nails sank in his flesh, he raised a hand to stay the beating of his heart, and then at once she was upon him, felling him to the ground as a ruffian fells his mistress, her knees were on his arms, he was powerless, dumb with dread, and in his face was the fetor of her breath. Her eyes were no longer lustreless, they glittered like twin stars, and still she laughed, her naked breast heaving with the convulsions of her mirth. "I am Truth," she bawled, and laughed again. And with that Tristrem awoke, suffocating, quivering, and outwearied as though he had run a race and lost it.

He sat awhile, broken by the horror of the dream. The palms of his hands were not yet dry. But soon he bestirred himself, and went to the door; the lights had been extinguished; he closed it again, and, with the aid of some candles, he prepared for bed. He would have read a little, but he was fatigued, tired by the emotions of the day, and when at last he lay down it was an effort to rise again and put out the candle. How long he lay in darkness, a second, an hour, he could not afterward recall; it seemed to him that he had drowsed off at once, but suddenly he started, trembling from head to foot. He had heard Viola's voice soaring to its uttermost tension. "Coward," she had called. And then all was still. He listened, he even went to the door, but the house was wrapped in silence.

"Bah!" he muttered, "I am entertaining a procession of nightmares." And in a few moments he was again asleep.

VIII.

At dawn he awoke refreshed. The sun rose from the ocean like an indolent girl from a bath. Before the house was astir he was out of doors exploring the land. He strolled past the row of hotels that front the sea, and pausing a moment at the Casino, fragrant then, and free of the stench of drink that is the outcome of the later season, he wondered how it was that, given money, and possibly brains, it was necessary to make a building as awkward as was that. And then he strayed to the shore, past the tenantless bath-houses, and on through the glories of the morning to the untrodden beach beyond.

As he walked, the village faded in the haze. The tide was low and the sand firm and hard. The waves broke leisurely in films and fringes of white, gurgling an invitation to their roomy embrace. And when the hotels were lost in the distance and the solitude was murmurous with nature alone, Tristrem, captivated by the allurements of the sea, went down into the waves and clasped them to him as lovers clasp those they love.

The sun was well on its amble to the zenith before he returned to the cottage. His hostess, he found, had not yet appeared, and as breakfast seemed to be served in that pleasant fashion which necessitates nothing, not even an appetite, Tristrem drank his coffee in solitude. And as he idled over the meal he recalled the horrors of the night, and smiled. The air of the morning, the long and quiet stroll, the plunge in the sea, and the after-bath of sunlight that he had taken stretched full length on the sand, had dissipated the enervating emotions of dream and brought him in their stead a new invigoration. He was about to begin the dithyrambs of the day before, when the servant appeared, bearing a yellow envelope, and a book in which he was to put his name. He gave the receipt and opened the message, wonderingly.

"Please come to town," it ran, "your father is dying.—Robert Harris."

"Your father is dying," he repeated. "H'm. Robert Harris. I never knew before what the butler's first name was. But what has that to do with it? There are times when I am utterly imbecile. Your father is dying. Yes, of course, I must go at once. But it isn't possible. H'm. I remember. He looked ghastly when I saw him. I suppose—I ought to—good God, why should I attempt to feign a sorrow that I do not feel? It is his own fault. I would have— But there, what is the use?"

He bit his nail; he was perplexed at his absence of sensibility. "And yet," he mused, "in his way he has been kind to me. He has been kind; that is, if it be kindness in a father to let a son absolutely alone. After all, filial affection must be like patriotism, ingrained as an obligation, a thing to blush at if not possessed. Yet then, again, if a country acts like a step-mother to its children, if a father treats a son as a guardian might treat a ward, the ties are conventional; and on what shall affection subsist? It was he who called me into being, and, having done so, he assumed duties which he should not have shirked. It was not for him to make himself a stranger to me; it was for him to teach me to honor him so much, to love him so well that at his death my head would be bowed in prostrations of grief. I used to try to school myself to think that it was only his way; that, outwardly cold and undemonstrative, his heart was warm as another's. But—well, it may have been, it may have been. After all, if I can't grieve, I would cross the continent to spare him a moment's pain. It was he, I suppose, who told Harris to wire. Yes, I must hurry."

He called the servant to him. "Can you tell me, please, when the next train goes?" But the servant had no knowledge whereon to base a reply. She suggested, however, that information might be obtained at an inn which stood a short distance up the road. He scribbled a few lines on a card, and gave it to the woman. "Take that to Miss Raritan, please, will you?" he said, and left the house.

At the inn a very large individual sat on the stoop, coatless, a straw covering of a remoter summer far back on his head, and his feet turned in. He listened to Tristrem with surly indifference, and spat profusely. He didn't know; he reckoned the morning train had gone.

"Hay, Alf," he called out to the negro who had taken Tristrem from the station the night before, and who was then driving by, "when's the next train go?"

"'Bout ten minutes; I just took a party from Taylor's."

"Thank you," said Tristrem to the innkeeper, who spat again by way of acknowledgment. "Can you take me to the station?" he asked the negro; and on receiving an affirmative reply, he told him to stop at Mrs. Raritan's for his traps.

As Tristrem entered the gate he saw Viola's assistant of the preceding evening drive up, waving a hat.

"I got it," the man cried out, "here it is. First time it ever passed a night out of doors, I'll bet. And none the worse for it, either." He handed it over to Tristrem. "I dreamt about you last night," he added.

"That's odd," Tristrem answered, "I dreamed about you." The man laughed at this as had he never heard anything so droll. "Well, I swan!" he exclaimed, and cracked his whip with delight. His horse started. "Here," he said, "I near forgot.

Whoa, there, can't you. This goes with the hat." And he crumpled a handkerchief in his hand, and tossing it to Tristrem, he let the horse continue his way unchecked.

The hat which the man had found did not indeed look as though it had passed a night on the roadside. Save for an incidental speck or two it might have come fresh from a bandbox. Tristrem carried it into the cottage, and was placing it on the hall-table when Mrs. Raritan appeared.

"I am so sorry," she began, "Viola has told me ——"

"How is she? May I not see her?"

"She scarcely slept last night."

Tristrem looked in the lady's face. The lids of her eyes were red and swollen.

"But may I not see her? May I not, merely for a moment."

"She is sleeping now," Mrs. Raritan answered; "perhaps," she added, "it is better that you should not. The doctor has been here. He says that she should be quiet. But you will come back, will you not? Truly I sympathize with you."

Mrs. Raritan's eyes filled with tears, but to what they were due, who shall say? She seemed to Tristrem unaccountably nervous and distressed.

"There is nothing serious the matter, is there?" he asked, anxiously. And at the question, Mrs. Raritan almost choked. She shook her head, however, but Tristrem was not assured. "I must see her," he said, and he made as would he mount the stair.

"Mr. Varick! she is asleep. She has had a wretched night. When you are able to come back, it will be different. But if you care for her, let her be."

The protest was almost incoherent. Mrs. Raritan appeared beside herself with anxiety.

"Forgive me," said Tristrem, "I did not mean to vex you. Nor would I disturb her." He paused a second, dumbly and vaguely afflicted. "You will tell her, will you not?" he added; "tell her this, that I wanted to see her. Mrs. Raritan, my whole life is wrapped up in her." He hesitated again. "You are tired too, I can see. You were up with her last night, were you not?"

Mrs. Raritan bowed her head.

"You must forgive me," he repeated, "I did not understand. Tell me," he continued, "last night I awoke thinking that I heard her calling. Did she call?"

"Call what?"

"I thought—you see I was half, perhaps wholly asleep, but I thought I heard her voice. I was mistaken, was I not?"

"Yes, you must have been."

The negro had brought down the luggage, and stood waiting at the gate.

"You will tell her—Mrs. Raritan—I love her with all my heart and soul."

The lady's lips quivered. "She knows it, and so do I."

"You will ask her to write."

"Yes, I will do so."

Tristrem took her hand in his. "Tell her from me," he began, but words failed him, it was his face that completed the message. In a moment more he was in the coach on his way to the station.

There was a brisk drive along the sea, a curve was rounded, and the station stood in sight. And just as the turn was made Tristrem caught the shriek of a whistle.

"There she goes," the negro exclaimed, "you ought to have been spryer."

"Has the train gone?" Tristrem asked.

"Can't you see her? I knew you'd be late." The man was insolent in his familiarity, but Tristrem did not seem to notice it.

"I would have given much not to be," he said.

At this the negro became a trifle less uncivil. "Would you ree-ly like to catch that train?" he asked.

"I would indeed."

"Is it worth twenty-five dollars to you?"

Tristrem nodded.

"Well, boss, I tell you. That train stops at Peacedale, and at Wakefield she shunts off till the mail passes. Like as not the express is late. If I get you to Kingston before the Newport passes, will you give me twenty-five?"

"If I make the connection I will give you fifty."

"That's talking. You'll get there, boss. Just lay back and count your thumbs."

The negro snapped his whip, and soon Tristrem was jolted over one of the worst and fairest roads of New England, through a country for which nature has done her best, and where only the legislator is vile.

One hamlet after another was passed, and still the coach rolled on.

"We'll get there," the negro repeated from time to time, and to encourage his fare he lashed the horses to their utmost speed. Peacedale was in the distance; Wakefield was passed, and in a cloud of dust they tore through Kingston and reached the station just as the express steamed up.

"I told you I'd do it," the negro exclaimed, exultingly. "I'll get checks for your trunks."

A minute or two more, and the checks were obtained; the negro was counting a roll of bills, and in a drawing-room car Tristrem was being whirled to New York.

For several hours he sat looking out at the retreating uplands, villages, and valleys. But after a while he remembered the scantiness of his breakfast, and, summoning the porter, he obtained from him some food and drink. By this time the train had reached New Haven, and there Tristrem alighted to smoke a cigarette. He was, however, unable to finish it before the whistle warned him that he should be aboard again. The porter, who had been gratified by a tip, then told him that there was a smoking compartment in the car beyond the one in which he had sat, and, as the train moved on, Tristrem went forward in the direction indicated.

The compartment was small, with seats for two on one side, and for three, or for four at most, on the other. As Tristrem entered it he saw that the larger sofa was occupied by one man, who lay out on it, full length, his face turned to the partition. Tristrem took a seat opposite him, and lit a fresh cigarette. As he smoked he looked at the reclining form of his vis-à-vis. About the man's neck a silk handkerchief had been rolled, but one end had come undone and hung loosely on the cushion, and as Tristrem looked he noticed that on the neck was a wound, unhealed and fresh, a line of excoriation, that neither steel nor shot could have caused, but which might have come from a scratch. But, after all, what business was it of his? And he turned his attention again to the retreating uplands and to the villages that starred the route.

When the cigarette was done, he stood up to leave the compartment. But however quietly he had moved, he seemed to arouse his neighbor, who turned heavily, as though to change his position. As he did so, Tristrem saw that it was Royal Weldon, and that on his face was a bruise. He would have spoken, for Weldon was looking at him, but he recalled the wanton lie of the week before, and as he hesitated whether to speak or pass on, Weldon half rose. "Damn you," he said, "you are everywhere." Then he lay down, turning his face again to the wall, and Tristrem, without a word, went to the other car and found his former seat.

Two hours later he reached his home. He let himself in with a latch-key, and rang the bell. But when Harris appeared he knew at once, by the expression which the butler assumed, that he had come too late.

"When did it happen?" he asked.

"It was last evening, sir; he came in from his drive and inquired for you, sir. I said that you had gone out of town, and showed him the address you left. When I went to hannounce dinner, sir, he was sitting in his arm-chair with his hat on. I thought he was asleep. I sent for Dr. McMasters, sir, but it was no use. Dr. McMasters said it was the 'art, sir."

"You have notified my grandfather, have you not?"

"Yes, sir, I did, sir; Mr. Van Norden came in this morning, and left word as how he would like to see you when you got back, sir."

"Very good. Call Davis, and get my things from the cabman."

"Yes, sir; thank you, sir. I beg pardon, sir," he added, "would you wish some dinner? There's a nice fillet and a savory."

IX.

The morning after the funeral Tristrem received a letter from Mrs. Raritan, and a little later a small package by express. The letter was not long, and its transcription is unnecessary. It was to the effect that on maturer consideration Viola had decided that the engagement into which she had entered was untenable. To this decision Mrs. Raritan felt herself reluctantly obliged to concur. It was not that Mr. Varick was one whom she would be unwilling to welcome as her daughter's husband. On the contrary, he was in many respects precisely what she most desired. But Viola was young; she felt that she had a vocation to which marriage would be an obstacle, and in the circumstances Viola was the better judge. In any event, Mr. Varick was requested to consider the decision as irrevocable. Then followed a few words of sympathy and a line of condolence expressive of Mrs. Raritan's regret that the breaking of the engagement should occur at a time when Tristrem was in grievous affliction.

In the package were the jewels.

Tristrem read the letter as though he were reading some accusation of felony levelled at him in the public press. If it had been a meteor which had fallen at his feet he could not have wondered more. Indeed, it was surprise that he felt. It was not anger or indignation; they were after-comers. For the moment he was merely bewildered. It seemed to him incredible that such a thing could be. He read the letter again, and even examined the post-mark. At first he was for starting at once for Narragansett. If he could but see Viola! The excuse about a vocation was nonsense. Had he not told her that if she insisted on going on the stage, he would sit in the stalls and applaud. No, it was not that; it was because— After all, it was his own fault; if he had been unable to make himself beloved, why should the engagement continue? But had an opportunity been given him? He had not had speech with her since that evening when she had drawn his face to hers. No, it could not be that.

He bowed his head, and then Anger came and sat at his side. What had he done to Destiny that he should be to it the plaything that he was? But she; she was more voracious even than Fate. No, it was damnable. Why should she take his heart and torment it? Why, having given love, should she take it away? He was contented enough until he saw her. Why had she come to him as the one woman in the world, luring him on; yes, for she had lured him on? Why had she made him love her as he could never love again, and just when she placed her hand in his,—a mist, a phantom, a reproach? Why had she done so? Why was the engagement untenable? Untenable, indeed, why was it untenable? Why—why—why? And in the increasing exasperation of the moment, Tristrem did a thing that, with him, was unusual. He rang the bell, and bade the servant bring him drink.

It was on the afternoon of that day that he learned the tenor of his father's will. It affected him as a chill affects a man smitten with fever. He accepted it as a matter of course. It was not even the last drop; the cup was full as it stood. What was it to him that he had missed being one of the richest men in New York in comparison to the knowledge that even had he the mines of Ormuz and of Ind, the revenue would be as useless to him as the hands of the dead? Was she to be bought? Had she not taken herself away before the contents of the will were reported? He might be able to call the world his own, and it would avail him nothing.

The will left him strangely insensible, though, after all, one may wonder whether winter is severer than autumn to a flower once dead.

But if the will affected Tristrem but little, it stirred Dirck Van Norden to paroxysms of wrath. "He ought to have his ghost kicked," he said, in confidential allusion to Erastus Varick. "It's a thing that cries out to heaven. And don't you tell me, sir, that nothing can be done."

The lawyer with whom he happened to be in consultation said there were many things that could be done. Indeed, he was reassuringly fecund in resources. In the first place, the will was holographic. That, of course, mattered nothing; it only pointed a moral. Laymen should not draw up their own wills. For that matter, even professionals should be as wary of so doing as physicians are of doctoring themselves. And the lawyer instanced legal luminaries, judges whose obiter dicta and opinions in banco were cited and received with the greatest respect, and yet through whose wills, drawn up, mark you, by their own skilled hands, coaches and tandems had been driven full speed. In regard to the will of the deceased there was this to be said, it would not hold water. Chapter 360, Laws of 1860, declares that no person having a husband, wife, child, or parent, shall by his or her last will and testament, devise or bequeath to any benevolent, charitable, scientific, literary, religious, or missionary society, association, or corporation, in trust or otherwise, more than one-half part of his or her estate.

"But he devised the whole."

"Yes, so he did; but in devising it he overlooked that very wise law. My opinion in the matter is this. When, may I ask, was your grandson born?"

"He was born on the 10th of June, 1859."

"Exactly. The late Mr. Varick determined, on the birth of your grandson, that the property should go over. His reasons for so determining are immaterial. Rufus K. Taintor, the ablest man, sir, that ever sat on the bench or addressed it, drew up the will at that time in accordance with instructions received. Some years later, Taintor died of apoplexy, and he died, too, as you doubtless remember, after the delivery of that famous speech in the Besalul divorce case. Well, sir, what I make of the matter is this. The late Mr. Varick, relying on Taintor's ability, and possessing possibly some smattering of law of his own, recopied the will every time the fancy took him to make minor alterations in the general distribution of the trust. Consequently his last will and testament, having been made since the passage of the law of 1860, is nugatory and void as to one-half the bequest, and your grandson may still come in for a very pretty sum."

"He ought to have it all," said Mr. Van Norden, decidedly.

"I don't dispute that, sir, in the least—and my opinion is that he will get it. This will is dated five days previous to Mr. Varick's demise. Now, according to the law of 1848, Chapter 319, and, if I remember rightly, Section 6, no such bequest as the deceased's is valid in any will which shall not have been made and executed at least two months before the death of the testator. That, sir, I consider an extremely wise bit of legislation. The law of 1860, which I quoted, vitiates the will as to one-half the bequest; the law of 1848 does away with the will altogether. Practically speaking, your son-in-law might just as well have died intestate. Though, between ourselves, if Mr. Varick had not been ignorant of these laws, and had not, in consequence of his ignorance, made a disposition of certain private documents the contents of which are easily guessed, your grandson would have merely a prima facie right to have the will set aside; for, if you remember, these laws were passed only to provide for the possible interests of a surviving husband, wife, or child."

He emphasized the last word, and, as his meaning grew clear to Mr. Van Norden, that gentleman got very red in the face. He rang the bell.

"Thank you, sir," he said. "I shall be indebted if you will send me your account. And I shall be particularly indebted if you will send it at your very earliest convenience. Henry, get this—this—get this gentleman his hat and see him to the street."

Unfortunately for those that practise, there are a great many more lawyers in New York than one. And before the last will and testament of Erastus Varick came up for probate, Mr. Van Norden experienced slight difficulty in retaining another attorney to defend Tristrem's interests. The matter, of course, was set down for a hearing, and came up on the calendar three months later.

Of the result of that hearing the reader has been already informed, and then it was that Tristrem was taxed with old-world folly.

X.

In years gone by it had been Mr. Van Norden's custom to pass the heated term at Rockaway. But when Rockaway became a popular resort, Mr. Van Norden, like the sensible man that he was, discovered that his own house was more comfortable than a crowded hotel. This particular summer, therefore, he passed as usual in New York, and Tristrem, who had moved to his house, kept him company. June was not altogether disagreeable, but in July the city was visited by a heat at once insistent and enervating. In August it was cooler, as our Augusts are apt to be; yet the air was lifeless, and New York was not a nosegay. During these months Tristrem was as lifeless as the air. In his first need of sympathy he had gone to the irascible and kind-hearted old gentleman and told him of the breaking of the engagement, and, he might have added, of his heart, though in the telling he sought, with a lover's fealty, to palliate the grievousness of the cruelty to which he had been subjected.

"It is this way," he said; "Viola, I think, feels that she does not know me sufficiently well. After all, we have seen but little of each other, and if she accepted me, it was on the spur of the moment. Since then she has thought of it more seriously. It is for me to win her, not for her to throw herself in my arms. That is what she has thought. She may seem capricious; and what if she does? Your knowledge of women has, I am sure, made you indulgent."

"Not in the least," Mr. Van Norden answered. And then, for the time being, the subject was dropped.

It was this semi-consolatory view which Tristrem took of the matter after the effect of the first shock had lost its force. But when he received the bundle of letters, together with the Panama hat, which, through some splendid irony, had been devised to him in the only clause of the will in which his name was mentioned, it was as though a flash had rent the darkness and revealed in one quick glare an answer to the enigma in which he groped.

The letters were few in number—a dozen at most—and they were tied together with a bit of faded ribbon. They were all in the same hand, one and all contained protestations of passionate love, and each was signed in full, Roanoke Raritan. The envelope which held them was addressed to Mrs. Erastus Varick.

It was then that he saw the reason of his disinheritance, and it was then that he understood the cause of Viola's withdrawal. It was evident to him that Mrs. Raritan possessed either thorough knowledge of the facts, or else that she had some inkling of them which her feminine instinct had supplemented into evidence, and which had compelled her to forbid the banns. There were, however, certain things which he could not make clear to his mind. Why had Mrs. Raritan treated him with such consideration? She had known from the first that he loved her daughter. And after the engagement, if she wished it broken, why had she allowed Viola to invite him to the Pier?

These things were at first inexplicable to him. Afterward he fancied that it might be that Mrs. Raritan, originally uninformed, had become so only through the man whom he had believed was his father, after the announcement of the engagement had been made to him, and possibly through some communication which had only reached her after his sudden death. This explanation he was inclined to accept, and he was particularly inclined to do so on recalling the spasm which had agitated the deceased when he had come to him with the intelligence of the engagement, and the nervous excitement which Mrs. Raritan displayed on the morning when he left for town.

This explanation he accepted later—but in the horror of the situation in which he first found himself his mind declined to act. He had never known his mother, but her fame he had cherished as one cherishes that which is best and most perfect of all. And abruptly that fame was tarnished, as some fair picture might be sullied by a splash and splatter of mud. And as though that were insufficient, the letters which devastated his mother's honor brought him a hideous suspicion, and one which developed into certainty, that his father and the father of the girl whom he loved were one and the same.

It is not surprising, then, that during the summer months Tristrem was as lifeless as the air he breathed. His grandfather noticed the change—he would have been blind indeed had he not—and he urged him to leave New York. But at each remonstrance Tristrem shook his head with persistent apathy. What did it matter to him where he was? If New York, instead of being merely hot and uncomfortable, had been cholera-smitten, and the prey of pest, Tristrem's demeanor would not have altered. There are people whom calamity affects like a tonic, who rise from misfortune refreshed; there are others on whom disaster acts like a soporific, and he was one of the latter. For three months he did not open a book, the daily papers were taken from him unread, and if during that time he had lost his reason, it is probable that his insanity would have consisted in sitting always with eyes fixed, without laughing, weeping, or changing place.

But after the hearing in the Surrogate's Court there was a change of scene. The will was set aside, and the estate, of which Tristrem had taken absolutely no thought whatever, reverted to him. It was then that he made it over in its entirety to the institution to which it had been originally devised; and it was in connection with the disposal of the property, a disposal which he effected as a matter of course, and as the only right and proper thing for him to do, that he enjoyed a memorable interview with his grandfather.

He had not spoken to Mr. Van Norden about the letters, and the old gentleman, through some restraining sense of delicacy, had hesitated to question. Besides, he was confident that the estate would be Tristrem's, and thus assured, it seemed unnecessary to him to touch on a matter to which Tristrem had not alluded, and which was presumably distasteful to him. But when he learned what Tristrem had done, he looked upon the matter in a different light, and attacked him very aggressively the next day.

"I can understand perfectly," he said,

"that you should decline to hold property on what you seem to regard as a legal quibble. But I should be very much gratified to learn in what your judgment is superior to that of the Legislature, and why you should refuse that to which you had as clear and indefeasible a claim as I have to this fob on my waistcoat. I should be really very much gratified to learn——"

Tristrem looked at his grandfather very much as though he had been asked to open a wound. But he answered nothing. He got the letters and placed them in the old gentleman's hand.

Mr. Van Norden glanced at one, and then turned to Tristrem. It was evident that he was in the currents of conflicting and retroacting emotions. He made as though he would speak, yet for the time being the intensity of his feelings prevented him. He took up the letters again and eyed them, shaking his head as he did so with the anger of one enraged at the irreparable, and conscious of the futility of the wrath.

In the lives of most men and women there are moments in which they are pregnant with words. The necessity of speech is so great that until the parturition is accomplished they experience the throes of suffocation. If no listener be at hand, there are at least the walls. Mr. Van Norden was standing near to Tristrem, but that he might be the better assured of his attention, he caught him by the arm, and addressed him in abrupt, disjointed sentences, in a torrent of phrases, unconnected, as though others than himself beat their vocables from his mouth. His words were so tumultuous that they assailed the gates of speech, as spectators at the sight of flame crowd the exits of a hall, and issue, some as were they hurled from catapults, others, maimed, in disarray.

He was possessed of anger, and as sometimes happens off the stage, his anger was splendid and glorious to behold. And Tristrem, with the thirst of one who has drunk of thirst itself, caught the cascade of words, and found in them the waters and fountains of life.

"These letters—— But how is it possible? God in Heaven——! But can't you see?—the bare idea is an infamy. Your mother was as interested in Raritan as—as—— It's enough to make a mad dog blush. It was just a few months before you were born—— Bah! the imbecility of Erastus Varick would unnerve a pirate. I know he was always running there, Raritan was, but anyone with the brain of a wooden Indian would have understood—— Why, they were here—they came to me, all three of them, and because I knew her father—— And precious little thanks I got for my pains. He said he would see the girl in her grave first. He would have it that Raritan was after her for her money. It's true he hadn't a penny—but—what's that got to do with it? The mischief's done. She must have sent these letters to your mother to return to Raritan just before she married that idiot Wainwaring. Your mother was her most intimate friend—they were at school together at Pelham Priory. Raritan, I suppose, was away. Before he got back, your mother—you were born, you know, and she died. She had no chance to return them. That imbecile of a father of yours must have found the letters, and thought—— But how is such a thing possible? Good God! he ought to be dug up and cowhided. And it was for this he left you a Panama hat! And it was for this you have turned over millions to an institution for the shelter of vice! It was for this—— See here, since Christ was crucified, a greater stupidity, or one more iniquitous, has never been committed."

In the magnificence of his indignation, Mr. Van Norden stormed on until he lacked the strength to continue. But he stormed to ravished and indulgent ears. And when at last he did stop, Tristrem, who meanwhile had been silent as a mouse, went over to the arm-chair into which, in his exhaustion, he had thrown himself, and touched his shoulder.

"If he did not wish me to have the money," he said, "how could I keep it? How could I?" And before the honesty that was in his face the old man lowered his eyes to the ground. "I am gladder," Tristrem continued, "to know myself his son than to be the possessor of all New York. But when I thought that I was not his son, was that a reason why I should cease to be a gentleman. Though I lost everything else, what did it matter if I kept my self-respect ? "

He waited a moment for an answer, and then a very singular thing happened. From Dirck Van Norden's lowered eyes first one tear and then a second rolled down into the furrows of his cheek. From his throat came a sound that did not wholly resemble a sob and yet was not like to laughter, his mouth twitched, and he turned his head aside. "It's the first time since your mother died," he said at last, but what he meant by that absurd remark, who shall say ?

For some time Tristrem lingered, lost in thought. It was indeed as he had said. He was gladder to feel again that he was free to love and free to be loved in return than he would have been at holding all New York in fee. As he rose from the nightmare in which he suffocated he did not so much as pay the lost estate the compliment of a regret. It was not that which had debarred him from her, nor was it for that that she had once placed her hand in his. He was well rid of it all, since in the riddance the doors of his prison-house were unlocked. For three months his heart had been not dead but haunted, and now it was instinct with life and fluttered by the beckonings of hope. He had fronted sorrow. Pain had claimed him for its own, and in its intensity it had absorbed his tears. He had sunk to the uttermost depths of grief, and unbereft of reason, he had explored the horrors of the abyss. And now in the magic of the unforeseen he was transported to dazzling altitudes, to landscapes from which happiness, like the despot that it is, had routed sorrow and banished pain. He was like one who, overtaken by years and disease, suddenly finds his youth restored.

His plans were quickly made. He would go to Narragansett at once, and not leave until the engagement was renewed. He had even the cruelty to determine that his grandfather should come to the Pier himself, and argue with Mrs. Raritan, if argument were necessary.

"I have so much to say," he presently exclaimed, "that I don't know where to begin."

"Begin at the end," his grandfather suggested.

But Tristrem found it more convenient to begin in the middle. He led the old gentleman into the rhyme and reason of the rupture, he carried him forward and backward from old fancies to newer hopes. He explained how imperative it was that with the demolition of the obstacle which his father had erected the engagement should be at once renewed; he blamed himself for having even suggested that Viola was capricious; he mourned over the position in which she had been placed; he pictured Mrs. Raritan's relief when she learned of the error into which she had wandered; and after countless digressions wound up by commanding his grandfather to write an explanation which would serve him as a passport to renewed and uninterruptable favor.

"Certainly—certainly," Mr. Van Norden cried, with the impatience of one battling against a stream. "But even granting that your father wrote to Mrs. Raritan, which I doubt—although, to be sure, he was capable of anything—don't you see that you are in a very different position to-day than you would have been had you not—had you not——"

"You mean about the money?"

"Why, most assuredly I mean about the money," the old gentleman cried, aroused to new indignation by the wantonness of the question.

At this Tristrem, with the blithe confidence of a lover, shook his head. "You don't know Viola," he answered. "Besides, I can work. Other men do—why shouldn't I?"

"And be able to marry when you are ready for the grave. That's nonsense. Unless the young lady is a simpleton, and her mother a fit subject for Bedlam, don't tell them that you are going to work. And what would you work at, pray? No, no—that won't do. You are as fitted to go into business as I am to open a bake-shop."

"I might try stocks," said Tristrem, bravely.

"So you might, if you had the St. Nicholas money to start with. And even then you would have to lose two fortunes before you could learn how to make one. No, if you have not six or seven millions, you will, one of these days—and the later the day the better for me—you will have a few hundred thousand. It is paltry enough in comparison to the property which you threw out of the window, but, paltry or not, it's more than you deserve. Meanwhile, I will—— There, don't begin your nonsense again, sir. For the last three months you have done nothing but bother the soul out of me. Meanwhile, if you don't accept what I care to give, and accept it, what's more, with a devilish good grace, I'll—I'll disinherit you myself—begad I will. I'll leave everything I have to the St. Nicholas. It's a game that two can play at. You have set the fashion, and you can abide by it. And now I would be very much indebted if you would let me get some rest."

Therewith the fierce old gentleman looked Tristrem in the eyes, and grasping him by the shoulder, he held him to him for a second's space.

XI.

When Tristrem reached Narragansett he had himself driven to an hotel, where he removed the incidental traces of travel before venturing to present himself at the villa. It was a glorious forenoon, and as he dressed, the tonic that was blown to him through the open window affected his spirits like wine. The breeze promised victory. He had been idle and dilatory, he told himself; but he was older, the present was his, and he felt the strength to make it wholly to his use. The past would be forgotten and put aside; no, but utterly, as Nature forgets—and in the future, what things might be!

"O Magali, ma bien aimée, Fuyons tous deux, tous de—ux——"

The old song came back to him, and as he set out for the villa he hummed it gayly to himself. The villa was but the throw of a stone from the hotel, and in a moment he would be there. He was just a little bit nervous, and he walked rapidly. As he reached the gate his excitement increased. In his breast was a tightening sensation. And then at once he stopped short. On the door of the cottage hung a sign, bearing for legend, "To Let—Furnished."

"But it is impossible," he exclaimed; "they were to be here till October."

He went up and rang the bell. The front windows were closed and barred. The porch on which he stood was chairless. He listened, and heard no sound. He tried the door—it was locked.

"But it is impossible," he kept repeating. "H'm! 'To let—furnished; for particulars apply to J. F. Brown, at the Casino.' Most certainly, I will—most certainly," and monologuing in the fashion that was peculiar to him, he went down the road again, mindful only of his own perplexity.

On reaching the Casino he found that he would have no difficulty in seeing the agent. Mr. Brown, the door-keeper told him, was "right in there," and as he gave this information he pointed to a cramped little office which stood to the left of the entrance.

"Is this Mr. Brown?" Tristrem began. "Mr. Brown, I am sorry to trouble you. Would you be good enough to tell me about Mrs. Raritan's cottage. I——"

"For next summer? Nine hundred, payable in advance."

"I didn't mean about the price. I meant —I was told that Mrs. Raritan had taken it until October——"

"So she did. You can sublet for the balance of the season."

"Thank you—yes—but Mrs. Raritan hasn't gone away, has she?"

"She went weeks ago. There's nothing the matter with the cottage, however. Drainage excellent."

"I have no doubt. But can you tell me where Mrs. Raritan went to?"

"I haven't the remotest idea. Lenox, perhaps. If you want to look at the cottage I'll give you the key."

"I should think—— Really, I must apologize for troubling you. Didn't Mrs. Raritan leave her address?"

"If she did, it wasn't with me. When do you want the cottage for?"

Tristrem had not the courage to question more. He turned despondently from Mr. Brown, and passing on through the vestibule, reached the veranda that fronts the sea. In an angle a group of violinists were strumming an inanity of Strauss with perfect independence of one another. Beyond, on the narrow piazza, and on a division of the lawn that leaned to the road, were a number of small tables close-packed with girls in bright costumes and men in loose flannels and coats of diverting hues. At the open windows of the restaurant other groups were seated, dividing their attention between the food before them and the throng without. And through the crowd a number of Alsatians pushed their way, bearing concoctions to the thirstless. The hubbub was enervating, and in the air was a stench of liquor with which the sea-breeze coped in vain.

Tristrem hesitated a second, and would have fled. He was in one of those moods in which the noise and joviality of pleasure-seekers are jarring even to the best-disposed. While he hesitated he saw a figure rising and beckoning from a table on the lawn. And as he stood, uncertain whether or no the signals were intended for him, the figure crossed the intervening space, and he recognized Alphabet Jones.

"Come and have a drink," said that engaging individual. "You're as solemn as a comedian. I give you my word, I believe you are the only sober man in the place."

"Thank you," Tristrem answered; "I believe I do not care for anything. I only came to ask—— By the way, have you been here long?"

"Off and on all summer. It's a good place for points. You got my card, didn't you? I wanted to express my sympathy at your bereavement."

"You are very kind; I——"

"But what's this I hear about you? You've bloomed out into a celebrity. Everybody is talking about you—everybody, men, women, and children, particularly the girls. When a fellow gives away a fortune like that! Mais, tu sais, mon cher, c'est beau, c'est bien beau, ça." And to himself he added, "Et bien bête."

Already certain members of immediate groups had become interested in the new arrival, and it seemed to Tristrem that he heard his name circulating above the jangle of the waltz.

"I am going to the hotel," he said. "I wish you would walk back with me. I haven't spoken to a soul in an age. It would be an act of charity to tell me the gossip." Tristrem, as he made this invitation, marvelled at his own duplicity. For the time being, he cared for the society of Alphabet Jones as he cared for the companionship of a bum-bailiff. Yet still he lured him from the Casino and led him up the road, in the hope that perhaps without direct questioning he might gain some knowledge of Her.

As they walked on Jones descanted in the arbitrary didactic manner which is the privilege of men of letters whose letters are not in capitals, and moralized on a variety of topics, not with any covert intention of boring Tristrem, but merely from a habit he had of rehearsing ready-made phrases and noting their effect on a particular listener. This exercise he found beneficial. In airing his views he sometimes stumbled on a good thing which he had not thought of in private. And as he talked Tristrem listened, in the hope that he might say something which would permit him to lead up to the subject that was foremost in his mind. But nothing of such a nature was touched upon, and it was not until the cottage was reached that Tristrem spoke at all.

"The Raritans have gone, I see," he remarked, nodding at the cottage as he did so.

"Yes, I see by the papers that they sailed yesterday."

"You don't mean to say they have gone to Europe. I thought—I heard they were going to Lenox."

"If they were, they changed their plans. Miss Raritan didn't seem up to the mark when she was here. In some way she reminded me of a realized ideal—the charm had departed. She used to be enigmatical in her beauty, but this summer, though the beauty was still there, it was no longer enigmatical, it was like a problem solved. After all, it's the way with our girls. A winter or two in New York would take the color out of the cheeks of a Red Indian. Apropos de bottes, weren't you rather smitten in that direction?"

"And you say they have gone abroad?" Tristrem repeated, utterly unimpressed by the ornateness of the novelist's remarks.

"Yes, sir; and were it not that our beastly Government declines to give me the benefit of an international copyright, I should be able to go and do likewise. It's enough to turn an author into an anarchist. Why, you would be surprised——"

Jones rambled on, but Tristrem no longer listened. The position in which he found himself was more irritating than a dream. He was dumbly exasperated. It was his own inaction that was the cause of it all. If he had but bestirred himself sooner! Instead of struggling against that which every throb of his heart convinced him was false, he had dawdled with the impossible and toyed with apostils of grief. At the first obstacle he had turned aside. Where he should have been resolute, he had been weak. He had taken mists for barriers. A child frightened at its own shadow was never more absurd than he. And Viola—it was not surprising that the color had deserted her cheeks. It was no wonder that in his imbecile silence she had gone away. It was only surprising that she had not gone before. And if she had waited, might it not be that she waited expectant of some effort from him, hoping against hope, and when he had made no sign had believed in his defeat, and left him to it. There was no blame for her. And now, if he were free again, that very liberty was due not to his own persistence, but to chance. Surely she was right to go. Yet—yet—but, after all, it was not too late. Wherever she had gone he could follow. He would find her, and tell her, and hold her to him.

Already he smiled in scenes forecast. The exasperation had left him. Whether he came to Narragansett or journeyed to Paris, what matter did it make? The errand was identical, and the result would be the same. How foolish of him to be annoyed because he had not found her, in garlands of orange-blossoms, waiting on a balcony to greet his coming. The very fact of her absence added new weight to the import of his message. Yes, he would return to town at once, and the next steamer would bear him to her.

And then, unconsciously, through some obscure channel of memory, he was back where he had once been, in a Gasthof in the Bavarian Mountains. It was not yet dusk. Through the window came a choir of birds, and he could see the tender asparagus-green of neighborly trees. He was seated at a great, bare table of oak, and as he raised from it to his lips a stone measure of beer, his eyes rested on an engraving that hung on the wall. It represented a huntsman, galloping like mad, one steadying hand on the bridle and the other stretched forward to grasp a phantom that sped on before. Under the picture, in quaint German text, was the legend, The Chase after Happiness. "H'm," he mused, "I don't see why I should think of that."

"That's the gist of it all," Jones was saying. "It's the fashion to rail against critics. I remember telling one of the guild the other day not to read my books—they might prejudice him in my favor; but in comparison to certain publishers the average reviewer stands as a misdemeanant does to a burglar. No, I have said it before and I say it again, until that copyright law is passed, the Government is guilty of nothing less than compounding a felony."

Of what had gone before Tristrem had not heard a single word, and these ultimate phrases which reached him were as meaningless as church-steeples. He started as one does from a nap, with that shake of the head which is peculiar to the absent-minded. He was standing, he discovered, at the entrance to the hotel at which he lodged.

"Don't you agree with me?" Jones asked. "Come and lunch at the Casino. You will get nothing here. Narragansett cookery is as iniquitous as the legislature. Besides, at this hour they give you dinner. It is tragic, on my word, it is."

"Thank you," Tristrem answered, elusively. "I have an appointment with—with a train." And with this excuse he entered the hotel, and as soon after as was practicable he returned to town.

It was, he learned, as Jones had said. Mrs. Raritan and Miss Raritan were passengers on a steamer which had sailed two days before. It was then Friday. One of the swiftest Cunarders was to sail the following morning, and it seemed not improbable to Tristrem that he might reach the other side, if not simultaneously with, at least but a few hours after the arrival of the Wednesday boat. Such preparations, therefore, as were necessary he made without delay. As incidental thereto, he went to the house in Thirty-ninth Street. There he learned, from a squat little Irishwoman who came out from the area and eyed him with unmollifiable suspicion, that, like the Narragansett cottage, the house was to let. The only address which he could obtain from her was that of a real-estate agent in the lower part of the city. Thither he posted at once. Yet even there the information which he gleaned was meagre. The house was offered for a year. During that period, the agent understood, Mrs. Raritan proposed to complete her daughter's musical education abroad; where, the agent did not know. The rental accruing from the lease of the house was to be paid over to the East and West Trust Co. Further than that he could say nothing. Thereupon Tristrem trudged hopefully to Wall Street; but the secretary of the East and West was vaguer even than the agent. He knew nothing whatever on the subject of Mrs. Raritan's whereabouts, and from his tone it was apparent that he cared less. There is, however, an emollient in courtesy which has softened greater oafs than he, and that emollient Tristrem possessed. There was in his manner a penetrating and pervasive refinement, and at the gruffness with which he was received there came to his face an expression of such perplexity that the secretary, disarmed in spite of himself, turned from his busy idleness and told Tristrem that if Mrs. Raritan had not left her address with him she must certainly have given it to the lawyer who held the power of attorney to collect the rents and profits of her estate. The name of that lawyer was Meggs, and his office was in the Mills Building.

In the Mills Building Tristrem's success was little better. Mr. Meggs, the managing clerk announced, had left town an hour before and would not return until Monday. However, if there was anything he could do, he was entirely at Tristrem's disposal. And then Tristrem explained his errand anew, adding that he sailed on the morrow, and that it was important for him to have Mrs. Raritan's address before he left. The clerk regretted, but he did not know it. Could not Mr. Meggs send it to him ?

" He might cable it, might he not ?" Tristrem suggested. And as this plan seemed feasible, he gave the clerk a card with a London address scrawled on it, and therewith some coin. " I should be extremely indebted if you would beg Mr. Meggs to send me the address at once," he added ; and the clerk, who had read the name on the card and knew it to be that of the claimant and renouncer of a great estate, assured him that Mr. Meggs would take great pleasure in so doing.

After that there was nothing for Tristrem to do but to return to his grandfather's house and complete his preparations. He dined with Mr. Van Norden that evening, and a very pleasant dinner it was. Together they talked of those matters and memories that were most congenial to them ; Mr. Van Norden looking steadily in the past, and Tristrem straight into the future. And at last, at midnight, when the carriage came to take Tristrem to the wharf —for the ship was to sail at so early an hour in the morning that it was deemed expedient for the passengers to sleep on board—as Tristrem took leave of his grandfather, "Bring her back soon," the old gentleman said, " bring her back as soon as you can. And, Tristrem, you must take this to her once more, with an old man's love and blessing."

Whereupon he gave Tristrem again the diamond brooch that had belonged to his daughter.

XII.

THE journey over was precisely like any other, except in this, that, the tide of travel being in the contrary direction, the number of cabin passengers was limited. Among them there was no one whom Tristrem had met before; yet, after the second day out, there were few whom his appearance and manner had not attracted and coerced into some overture to better acquaintance. Of these his attention was particularly claimed by an Englishman who sat next to him at table, and a young lady who occupied the seat opposite to his own. In the eyes of the latter was the mischievous look of a precocious boy. She was extremely pretty; blonde, fair, with a mouth that said Kiss me —what the French call a frimousse frottée de champagne; and her speech was marked by great vivacity. She was accompanied by an elderly person who appeared at table but once, and who during the rest of the voyage remained bundled in shawls in the ladies' cabin, where refreshments were presumably brought her.

It was rumored that this young lady was an ex-star of the Gaiety, and more recently a member of a burlesque troupe that had disbanded in the States. It was added—but then, are not ill-natured things said about everybody? You, sir, and you, madam, who happen to read this page, have never, of course, been spoken of other than with the greatest respect, but what is said of your neighbor? and what have you said yourself?

Tristrem, unaffected by the gossip of the smoking-room, to which, indeed, he lent but an inattentive ear, allowed the young lady to march him up and down the deck, and, as was his wont, permitted himself to be generally made use of. Yet if the elderly person in the ladies' cabin had exacted of him similar attentions, the attentions would have been rendered with the same prompt and diligent willingness. He was not a good listener, although he seemed one, but there was a breeziness in the young lady's conversation which helped him not a little to forget the discomforts of ocean travel. He walked with her, in consequence, mile after mile, and when she wearied of that amusement, he got her comfortably seated and, until she needed him again, passed the time in the smoking-room.

It was there that he became acquainted with the Englishman who sat next to him at table. His name, he learned, was Ledyard Yorke. He was an artist by profession, and in the course of a symposium or two Tristrem discovered that he was a very cultivated fellow besides. He seemed to be well on in the thirties, and it was evident that there were few quarters of the globe with which he was not familiar. He was enthusiastic on the subject of French literature, but the manufactures of the pupils of the Beaux Arts he professed to abominate.

"The last time I was at the Salon," he said, one evening, "there were in those interminable halls over three thousand pictures. Of these, there were barely fifty worth looking at. The others were interesting as colored lithographs on a dead wall. There was a Manet or two, a Moreau, and a dozen or more excellent landscapes, but the rest represented the apotheosis of mediocrity. The pictures which Gérôme, Cabanel, Bouguereau, and the acolytes of those pastry-cooks exposed were stupid and sterile as church doors. What is art, after all, if it be not an imitation of nature? To my thinking, the greater the illusion, the nearer does the counterfeit approach the model. And look at the nymphs and dryads which those hair-dressers present. In the first place, nymphs and dryads are as overdone as the assumption of Virgins and the loves of Leda. Besides they were not modern, but even if they were, fancy a girl who lives in the open air in her birthday costume, and who, exposed to the sun, to say nothing of the wind, still preserves the pink and white skin of a baby—and a skin, mind you, that looks as though it had been polished and pinched by a masseur; however, place a dozen of them lolling in conventional attitudes in a glade, or represent them bathing in a pond, and although the sun shines on them through the foliage, be careful not to get so much as the criss-cross of a shadow on their bodies, smear the whole thing with cold cream, label one 'Arcadia,' and the other 'Nymphs surprised,' and you have what they call in France the faire distingué."

There was nothing particularly new in what Mr. Yorke had to say, and if, like the majority of men whose thoughts run in a particular channel, he was apt to be dogmatic in his views, he yet possessed that saving quality, which consists in treating the subject in hand not as were it a matter of life and death, but rather as one which is as unimportant as the gout of a distant relative. And it was in the companionship of this gentleman, and that of the young lady alluded to, that Tristrem passed the six days which separated him from the Irish coast.

On the day preceding the debarcation he was in great and expectant spirits, but as the sun sank in the ocean his light-heartedness sank with it. During dinner his charming vis-à-vis rallied him as best she might, but he remained unresponsive, answering only when civility made it necessary for him to do so. It is just possible that the young lady may have entertained original ideas of her own on the subject of his taciturnity, but, however that may be, it so happened that before the meal was done Tristrem went up on deck, and seeking the stern of the ship, leaned over the gunwale.

So far in the distance as his eyes could reach was a trail of glistening white. On either side were impenetrable wastes of black. In his ears was the sob of water displaced, the moan of tireless discontent, and therewith the flash and shimmer of phosphorus seemed to invite and tell of realms of enchanted rest beneath. And, as Tristrem watched and listened, the sibilants of the sea gurgled in sympathy with his thoughts, accompanying and accentuating them with murmurs of its own. Its breast was bared to him, it lay at his feet, open-armed as though waiting his coming, and conjuring him to haste. "There is nothing sweeter," it seemed to say, "nothing swifter, and naught more still. I feed my lovers on lotus and Lethe. There is no fairer couch in the world than mine. A sister's kiss is not more chaste. I am better than fame, serener than hope; I am more than love, I am peace. I am unforsakable, and I never forsake."

And as the great ship sped on in fright, it almost seemed to Tristrem that the sea, like an affianced bride, was rising up to claim and take him as her own. Many months later, he thought of the sensation that he then experienced, the query that came to his mind, he knew not how or whence, whether it were not better perhaps—and then the after-shudder as he started back, wondering could it be that for the moment he was mad, and telling himself that in a few hours, a few days at most, he would be with Her. And what had the sea to do with him? Many months after he thought of it.

And as he still gazed at the tempting waters, he felt a hand touch his own, rest on, and nestle in it. He looked around; it was his charming vis-à-vis who had sought him out and was now looking in his face. She did not speak; her eyes had lost their mischief, but her mouth framed its message as before. Awkwardly as men do such things, Tristrem disengaged his hand. The girl made one little effort to detain it, and for a moment her lips moved; but she said nothing, and when the hand had gone from her, she turned with a toss of the head and disappeared in the night.

Soon after, Tristrem turned, too, and found his way to the smoking-room. In some way the caress which he had eluded had left a balm. He was as hopeful as before, and he smiled in silent amusement at the ups and downs of his needless fears. In a corner of the room was Yorke.

"I have been looking at the sea," he said, as he took a seat at his side; "it is captious as wine."

"You are a poet, are you not?" Yorke spoke not as though he were paying a compliment, but in the matter-of-fact fashion in which one drummer will say "Dry goods?" to another.

"No; I wish I were. I have never written."

"It's a popular prejudice to suppose that a poet must write. The greatest of all never put pen to paper. What is there left to us of Linus and Musæus? Siddartha did not write, Valmiki did not know how. The parables of the Christ were voiced, not written. Besides, the poet feels—he does not spend a year, like Mallarmé, in polishing a sonnet. De Musset is certainly the best example of the poet that France has to offer; with him you always catch the footfall of the Muse—you feel, as he felt, the inspiration. And all the more clearly in that his verses limp. He never would have had time to express himself if he had tried to sand-paper his thoughts. Don't you suppose that Murillo was a poet? Don't you suppose that Guido was? Don't you think that anyone who is in love with beauty must be? I say beauty where I might say the ideal. That is the reason I thought you a poet. You have in your face that constant preoccupation which is distinctive of those who pursue the intangible."

"I am not pursuing the intangible, though," Tristrem answered, with a little sententious nod.

"Ah, who shall say? We all do. I am pursuing it myself, though not in the sense that I attribute to you. Did you ever read Flaubert's Tentation? No? Well, fancy the Sphinx crouching at sunset in the encroaching sand. In the background is a riot of color, and overhead a tender blue fading into salmon and the discreetest gray. Then add to that the impression of solitude and the most absolute silence. In the foreground flutters a Chimera, a bird with a dragon's tail and the rainbow wings of a giant butterfly. The Sphinx is staring at you, and yet through and beyond, as though her eyes rested on some inaccessible horizon. Cities crumble, nations rise and subside, and still that undeviating stare! And in her face the unroutable calm of fabulous beauty. I want those eyes, I want that face. You never heard the duo which Flaubert gives, did you? It runs somewhat this way: The motionless Sphinx calls: 'Here, Chimera, rest a while.'

"The Chimera answers: 'Rest? Not I.'

"The Sphinx. Whither goest thou in such haste?

"The Chimera. I gallop in the corridors of the labyrinth. I soar to the mountain-tops. I skim the waves. I yelp at the foot of precipices. I cling to the skirt of clouds. With my training tail I sweep the shores. The hills have taken their curve from the form of my shoulders. But thou—I find thee perpetually immobile, or else with the end of thy claw drawing alphabets in the sand.

"The Sphinx. I am guarding my secret, I calculate and I dream.

"The Chimera. I—I am joyous and light of heart. I discover to man resplendent perspectives, Utopias in the skies, and distant felicities. Into his soul I pour the eternal follies, projects of happiness, plans for the future, dreams of fame, and the vows of love and virtuous resolutions. I incite to perilous journeys, to great undertakings. It is I that chiselled the marvels of architecture. It is I that hung bells on the tomb of Porsenna, and surrounded with an orchalc wall the quays of the Atlantides. I seek new perfumes, larger flowers, and pleasures unenjoyed. If anywhere I perceive a man whose mind rests in wisdom, I drop from space and strangle him.

"The Sphinx. All those whom the desire of God torments, I have devoured."

Yorke had repeated these snatches from the duo in French. He had repeated them well, bringing out the harmony of the words in a manner which in our harsher tongue would have been impossible. And now he felt parched, and ordered some drink of the steward.

"It is the face of that Sphinx that I want," he continued. "If I were a composer I would put the duo itself to music. I know of no prose more admirable. I have the scene on canvas, all of it, that is, except the Sphinx's face, and that, of course, is the most important. I want a face that she alone could possess. I may find it, I may not. At all events, you see that just at present I too am in pursuit of the intangible. But there, tell me of the artist who is not. It is true, you go to the Academy, and in the Cleopatras and Psyches you recognize the same Mary Jane who the day before offered herself as model to you. My Sphinx, however, was not born in Clapham. Nor does she dwell in Pimlico. But, apropos to Pimlico, I have a fancy that that little friend of yours is on her way to St. John's Wood."

"What little friend?"

"Why, the girl that sits opposite. And what's more to the point, she's in love with you. Tous mes compliments, c'est un vrai morceau de roi."

At this Tristrem blushed in spite of himself. She might have been the Helen for whom the war of the world was fought; she might have been Mylitta or Venus Basilea, and still would she have left him unimpressed. He would not have recognized the divinity—he bowed but to one.

"You remind me," said Yorke, who had watched his expression—"you remind me of De Marsay, who did not know what he did to the women to make them all fall in love with him. There is nothing as fetching as that. And there is nothing, at least to my thinking, that compares with that charm which a woman in love exhales to her lover. It is small matter whether the woman is the daughter of an earl or whether she is a cocotte. There are, I know, people who like their claret in decanters, but so long as the wine is good, what does the bottle matter?

"'Aimer est le grand point, qu' importe la maitresse?
Qu' importe le flacon, pourvu qu'on ait l'ivresse?'"

"De Musset was drunk when he wrote that," said Tristrem. "But whether he was drunk or sober, I don't agree with him. I don't agree with him at all. It is the speech of a man who can think himself in love over and over again, and who discovers in the end that through all his affairs he has loved no one but himself."

All of which Mr. Yorke pooh-poohed in the civilest manner, and when Tristrem had finished his little speech, expounded the principles of love as they are formulated in the works of a German metaphysician, supporting them as he did so with such clarity and force of argument that Tristrem, vanquished but unconvinced, left him in disgust.

The next day they were at Liverpool. In the confusion that is incidental to every debarcation Tristrem had had no opportunity of exchanging a word with his vis-à-vis. But in the custom-house he caught sight of her, and went forward to bid her good-bye.

" Good-bye," she answered, when he had done so, and putting out her hand, she looked at him with mischievous eyes. " Good-bye," she repeated, lightly, and then, between her teeth, she added, " Imbecile that you are ! "

Though what she may have meant by that, Tristrem never understood.

XIII.

It was under cover of a fog of leprous brown striated with ochre and acrid with smoke that Tristrem entered London. In allusion to that most delightful of cities, someone has said somewhere that hell must be just such another place. If the epigrammatist be right, then indeed is it time that the rehabilitation of the lower regions began. London is subtle and cruel, perhaps, and to the meditative traveller it not infrequently appears like an invocation to suicide writ in stone. But whoso has once accustomed himself to its breath may live ever after in flowerful Arcadias and yet dream of its exhalations with regret. In Venice one may coquette with phantoms; Rome has ghosts and memories of her own; in Paris there is a sparkle that is headier than absinthe; Berlin resounds so well to the beat of drums that even the pusillanimous are brave; but London is the great enchantress. It is London alone that holds the secret of inspiring love and hatred as well.

Tristrem sniffed the fog with a sensation of that morbid pleasure which girls in their teens and women in travail experience when they crave and obtain repulsive food. Had he not hungered for it himself? and did she not breathe it too?

The journey from Euston Square to the hotel in Jermyn Street at which he proposed to put up, was to him a confusion of impatience and anticipation. He was sure of finding a cablegram from Mrs. Raritan's attorney, and was it not possible that he might see Viola that very night? In Jermyn Street, however, no message awaited him. Under the diligent supervision of a waiter who had the look and presence of a bishop he managed later to eat some dinner. But the evening was a blank: he passed it twirling his thumbs, dumbly irritated, incapable of action, and perplexed as he had never been before.

The next morning his Odyssey began. He cabled to Mr. Meggs, and saw the clerk put beneath the message the cabalistic letters A. P. And then, in an attempt to frighten Time, he had his measure taken in Saville Row and his hair cut in Bond Street. But in vain—the day dragged as though its wheels were clogged. By noon he had exhausted every possible resource. Another, perhaps, might have beguiled the tedium with drink, or cultivated what Balzac has called the gastronomy of the eye, and which consists in idling in the streets. But unfortunately for Tristrem, he was none other than himself. The mere smell of liquor was distasteful to him, and he was too nervous to be actively inactive. Moreover, as in September there are never more than four million people in London, his chance of encountering an acquaintance was slight. Those that he possessed were among the absent ten thousand. They were in the country, among the mountains, at the seaside, on the Continent—anywhere, in fact, except in the neighborhood of Pall Mall. And even had it been otherwise, Tristrem was not in a mood to suffer entertainment. He had not the slightest wish to be amused. Wagner might have come to Covent Garden from the grave to conduct Parsifal in person and Tristrem would not have so much as bought a stall. He wanted Miss Raritan's address, and until he got it a comet that bridged the horizon would have left him incurious as the dead.

On the morrow, with his coffee, there came to him a yellow envelope. The message was brief, though not precisely to the point. "Uninformed of Mrs. Raritan's address," it ran, and the signature was Meggs.

For the first time it occurred to Tristrem that Fate was conspiring against him. It had been idiocy on his part to leave New York before he had obtained the address; and now that he was in London, it would be irrational to write to any of her friends—the Wainwarings, for instance—and hope to get it. He knew the Wainwarings just well enough to attend a reception if they gave one, and a slighter acquaintance than that it were idle to describe.

Other friends the girl had in plenty, but to Tristrem they were little more than shadows. There seemed to be no one to whom he could turn. Indeed he was sorely perplexed. Since the hour in which he learned that his father and Viola's were not the same he had been possessed of but one thought—to see her and kneel at her feet; and in the haste he had not shown the slightest forethought—he had been too feverishly energetic to so much as wait till he got her address; and now in the helter-skelter he had run into a cul-de-sac where he could absolutely do nothing except sit and bite his thumb. The enforced inactivity was torturesome as suspense. In his restlessness he determined to retrace his steps; he would return to New York, he told himself, learn of her whereabouts, and start afresh. Already he began to calculate the number of days which that course of action would necessitate, and then suddenly, as he saw himself once more on Fifth Avenue, he bethought him of Alphabet Jones. What man was there that commanded larger sources of social information than he? He would cable to him at once, and on the morrow he would have the address.

The morrow dawned, and succeeding morrows—a week went by, and still no word from Jones. A second week passed, and when a third was drawing to a close and Tristrem, outwearied and enervated, had secured a berth on a returning steamer, at last the answer came—an answer in four words—"Brown Shipley, Founders Court." That was all, but to Tristrem, in his overwrought condition, they were as barbs of flame. "My own bankers!" he cried; "oh, thrice triple fool! why did I not think of them before?" He was so annoyed at his stupidity that on his way to the city his irritation counterbalanced the satisfaction which the message brought. "Three whole weeks have I waited," he kept telling himself—"three whole weeks! H'm! Jones might better have written. No, I might better have shown some common-sense. Three whole weeks!"

He was out of the cab before it had fairly stopped, and breathless when he reached the desk of the clerk whose duty it was to receive and forward the letters of those who banked with the house.

"I want Mrs. Raritan's address," he said—"Mrs. R. F. Raritan, please."

The clerk fumbled a moment over some papers. "Care of Munroe, Rue Scribe," he answered.

"Thank God!" Tristrem exclaimed; "and thank you. Send my letters there also."

That evening he started for Paris, and the next morning he was asking in the Rue Scribe the same question which he had asked the previous afternoon in Founders' Court. There he learned that Mrs. Raritan had sent word, the day before, that all letters should be held for her until further notice. She had been stopping with her daughter at the Hôtel du Rhin, but whether or not she was still there the clerk did not know. The Rue Scribe is not far from the Place Vendôme, in which the Hôtel du Rhin is situated, and it took Tristrem a little less than five minutes to get there. The concierge was lounging in her cubby-hole.

"Madame Raritan?" Tristrem began.

"Partie, m'sieu, partie d'puis hier—"

And then from Tristrem new questions came thick and fast. The concierge, encouraged by what is known as a white piece, and of which the value is five francs in current coin, became very communicative. Disentangled from layers of voluble digression, the kernel of her information amounted to this: Mrs. Raritan and her daughter had taken the Orient Express the day before. On the subject of their destination she declared herself ignorant. Suppositions she had in plenty, but actual knowledge none, and she took evident pleasure in losing herself in extravagant conjectures. "Bien le bonjour," she said when Tristrem, passably disheartened, turned to leave—"Bien le bonjour, m'sieu; si j'ose m'exprimer ainsi."

The Orient Express, as Tristrem knew, goes through Southern Germany into Austria, thence down to Buda-Pest and on to Constantinople. That Viola and her mother had any intention of going farther than Vienna was a thing which he declined to consider. On the way to Vienna was Stuttgart and Munich. In Munich there was Wagner every other night. In Stuttgart there was a conservatory of music, and at Vienna was not the Opera world-renowned? "They have gone to one of those three cities," he told himself. "Viola must have determined to relinquish the Italian school for the German. H'm," he mused, "I'll soon put a stop to that. As to finding her, all I have to do is go to the police. They keep an eye on strangers to some purpose. Let me see—I can get to Stuttgart by to-morrow noon. If she is not there I will go to Munich. I rather like the idea of a stroll on the Maximilien Strasse. It would be odd if I met her in the street. Well, if she isn't in Munich she is sure to be in Vienna." And as he entered the Grand Hôtel he smiled anew in dreams forecast.

Tristrem carried out his programme to the end. But not in Stuttgart, not in Munich, nor in Vienna either, could he obtain the slightest intelligence of her. In the latter city he was overtaken by a low fever, which detained him for a month, and from which he arose enfeebled but with clearer mind. He wrote to Viola two letters, and two also to her mother. One of each he sent to the Rue Scribe, the others to Founders' Court. When ten days went by, and no answer came, he understood for the first time what the fable of Tantalus might mean, and that of Sisyphus too. He wrote at length to his grandfather, describing his Odyssey, his perplexities, and asking advice. He even wrote to Jones—though much more guardedly, of course—thanking him for his cable, and inquiring in a postscriptum whether he had heard anything further on the subject of the Raritans' whereabouts. These letters were barely despatched when he was visited by a luminous thought. The idea that Viola intended to relinquish Italian music for that of Wagner had never seemed to him other than an incongruity. "Idiot that I am!" he exclaimed; "she came abroad to study at Milan, and there is where she is. She must have left the Orient Express at Munich and gone straight down through the Tyrol." And in the visitation of this comforting thought Tantalus and Sisyphus went back into the night from which they had come; in their place came again the blue-eyed divinity whose name is Hope.

It is not an easy journey, nor a comfortable one, from Vienna to Milan, but Hope aiding, it can be accomplished without loss of life or reason. And Hope aided Tristrem to his destination, and there disappeared. In all Milan no intelligence of Viola could be obtained. He wrote again to her. The result was the same. "I am as one accursed," he thought, and that night he saw himself in dream stopping passers in the street, asking them with lifted hat had they seen a girl wonderfully fair, with amber eyes. He asked the question in French, in German, in Italian, according to the nationality of those he encountered, and once, to a little old woman, he spoke in a jargon of his own invention. But she laughed, and seemed to understand, and gave him the address of a lupanar.

He idled awhile in Milan, and then went to Florence, and to Rome, and to Naples, crossing over, even, to Palermo; and then retracing his steps, he visited the smaller cities and outlying, unfrequented towns. Something there was which kept telling him that she was near at hand, waiting, like the enchanted princess, for his coming. And he hunted and searched, outwearied at times, and refreshed again by resuscitations of hope, and intussusceptions of her presence. But in the search his nights were white. It was rare for him to get any sleep before the dawn had come.

Early in spring he reached Milan again. He had written from Bergamo to the Rue Scribe, asking that his letters should be forwarded to that place, and among the communications that were given him on his arrival was a cablegram from New York. Come back, it ran; she is here. It was from his grandfather, Dirck Van Norden, and as Tristrem read it he trembled from head to foot. It was on a Tuesday that this occurred, and he reflected that he would just about be able to get to Havre in time for the Saturday steamer. An hour later he was in the train bound for Desenzano, from which place he proposed to go by boat to Riva, and thence up to Munich, where he could catch the Orient Express on its returning trip to France.

XIV.

When the boat entered the harbor it was already night. Tristrem was tired, but his fatigue was pleasant to him. His Odyssey was done. New York, it is true, was many days away, but he was no longer to wander feverishly from town to town. If he was weary, at least his mind was at rest. Riva is on the Austrian frontier, and while the luggage was being examined Tristrem hummed contentedly to himself. He would get some dinner at the hotel, for he was hungry as he had not been in months. At last he would have a good night's rest; there would be no insomnia now. In the magic of a cablegram that succube had been exorcised forever. On the morrow he would start afresh, and neither stop nor stay till the goal was reached. It was no longer vague and intangible—it was full in sight. And so, while the officers were busy with his traps, he hummed the unforgotten air, O Magali, ma bien aimée.

The hotel to which he presently had himself conveyed stands in a large garden that leans to the lake. It is a roomy structure, built quadrangularwise. On one side is a little châlet. Above, to the right and left, precipitous cliffs and trellised mountains loom like battlements of Titan homes. The air is very sweet, and at that season of the year almost overweighted with the scent of flowers. In spite of the night, the sky was visibly blue, and high up in the heavens the moon glittered with the glint of sulphur.

As the carriage drew up at the door there was a clang of bells; an individual in a costume that was brilliant as the uniform of a field-officer hastened to greet the guest; at the threshold was the Oberkellner; a few steps behind him the manager stood bowing persuasively; and as Tristrem entered, the waiters, hastily marshalled, ranged themselves on either side of the hall.

"Vorrei," Tristrem began, and then remembering that he was no longer in Italy, continued in German.

The answer came in the promptest English.

"Yes, my lord; will your lordship dine at table d'hôte? Du, Konrad, schnell, die Speise-karte."

Tristrem examined the bill of fare which was then brought him, and while he studied the contents he heard himself called by name. He looked up, and recognized Ledyard Yorke, his companion of months before on the outward-bound Cunarder, who welcomed him with much warmth and cordiality.

"And whatever became of Miss Tippityfitchet? You don't mean to say you did not see her again? Fancy that! It was through no fault of hers, then. But there, in spite of your promise, you didn't so much as look me up. I am just in from a tramp to Mori; suppose we brush up a bit and have dinner together?" He turned to the waiter. "Konrad, wir speisen draussen; verschaffen Sie 'was Monkenkloster."

"Zu Befehl, Herr Baron."

Half an hour later, when the brushing up was done and the Monkenkloster was uncorked, Tristrem and Yorke seated themselves in an arbor that overhung the lake.

"It's ever so much better here than at table d'hôte," Yorke began. "I hate that sort of business—don't you? I have been here over two months, but after a week or so of it I gave up promiscuous feeding. Since then, whenever I have been able, I have dined out here. I don't care to have every dish I eat seasoned with the twaddle of cheap-trippers. To be sure, few of them get here. Riva is well out of the beaten track. But one table d'hôte is just like another, and they are all of them wearying to the spirit and fatiguing to digestion. Look at that water, will you. It's almost Venice, isn't it? I can tell you, I have done some good work in this place. But what have you been doing yourself?"

"Nothing to speak of," Tristrem answered. "I have been roaming from pillar to post. It's the second time I have been over the Continent, and now I am on my way home. I am tired of it; I shall be glad to be back."

"Yes, you were the last person I expected to meet. If I remember rightly, you said on the steamer that you were to be on this side but a short time. It's always the unexpected that occurs, isn't it? By the way, I have got my sphinx."

"What sphinx?"

"I thought I told you. I have been looking for years for a certain face. I wanted one that I could give to a sphinx. The accessories were nothing. I put them on canvas long ago, but the face I never could grasp. Not one of all that I tried suited me. I had almost given it up; but I got it—I got it at last. I'll show it to you to-morrow."

"I am afraid —— You see, I leave very early."

"I'll show it to you to-night, then; you must see it. If I had had it made to order it could not suit me better. It came about in such an odd way. All winter I have been at work in Munich. I intended to remain until June, but the spring there is bleaker than your own New England. One morning I said to myself, Why not take a run down to Italy? Two days later, I was on my way. But at Mori, instead of pushing straight on to Verona, I drove over here, thinking it would be pleasanter to take the boat. I arrived here at midnight. The next morning I looked out of the window, and there, right in front of me, in that châlet, was my sphinx. Well, the upshot of it was, I have been here ever since. I repainted the entire picture—the old one wasn't good enough."

"I should like to see it very much," said Tristrem, less from interest than civility.

"I wish you had come in time to see the original. She never suspected that she had posed as a model, and though her window was just opposite mine, I believe she did not so much as pay me the compliment of being aware of my existence. There were days when she sat hour after hour looking out at the lake, almost motionless, in the very attitude that I wanted. It was just as though she were repeating the phrase that Flaubert puts in the Sphinx's mouth, 'I am guarding my secret—I calculate and I dream.' Wasn't it odd, after all, that I should have found her in that haphazard way?"

"It was odd," Tristrem answered; "who was she?"

"I don't know. French, I fancy. Her name was Dupont, or Duflot—something utterly bourgeois. There was an old lady with her, her mother, I suppose. I remember, at table d'hôte one evening, a Russian woman, with an 'itch' in her name, said she did not think she was comme il faut. 'She is comme il m'en faut,' I answered, and mentally I added, 'which is a deuced sight more than I can say of you, who are comme il n'en faut pas.' The Russian woman was indignant at her, I presume, because she did not come to the public table. You know that feeling, 'If it's good enough for me, it's good enough for you.' But my sphinx not only did not appear at table d'hôte, she did not put her foot outside of the châlet. One bright morning she disappeared from the window, and a few days later I heard that she had been confined. Shortly after she went away. It did not matter, though, I had her face. Let me give you another glass of Monkenkloster."

"She was married, then?"

"Yes, her husband was probably some brute that did not know how to appreciate her. I don't mean, though, that she looked unhappy. She looked impassible, she looked exactly the way I wanted to have her look. If you have finished your coffee, come up to my little atelier. I wish you could see the picture by daylight, but you may be able to get an idea of it from the candles." And as Mr. Yorke led the way, he added, confidentially, "I should really like to have your opinion."

The atelier to which Yorke had alluded as "little" was, so well as Tristrem could discern in the darkness, rather spacious than otherwise. He loitered in the doorway until his companion had lighted and arranged the candles, and then, under his guidance, went forward to admire. The picture, which stood on an easel, was really excellent; so good, in fact, that Tristrem no sooner saw the face of the sphinx than to his ears came the hum of insects, the murmur of distant waters. It was Viola Raritan to the life.

"She guarded her secret, indeed," he muttered, huskily. And when Yorke, surprised at such a criticism, turned to him for an explanation, he had just time to break his fall. Tristrem had fallen like a log.

As he groped back through a roar and turmoil to consciousness again, he thought that he was dead and that this was the tomb. "That Monkenkloster must have been too much for him," he heard Yorke say, in German, and then some answer came to him in sympathetic gutturals. He opened his eyes ever so little, and then let the lids close down. Had he been in a nightmare, he wondered, or was it Viola? "He's coming too," he heard Yorke say. "Yes, I am quite right now," he answered, and he raised himself on his elbow. "I think," he continued, "that I had better get to my room."

"Nonsense. You must lie still awhile."

For the moment Tristrem was too weak to rebel, and he fell back again on the lounge on which he had been placed, and from which he had half arisen. Was it a dream, or was it the real? "There, I am better now," he said at last; "I wonder, I—— Would you mind ordering me a glass of brandy?"

"Why, there's a carafon of it here. I thought you had had too much of that wine."

Some drink was then brought him, which he swallowed at a gulp. Under its influence his strength returned.

"I am sorry to have put you to so much trouble," he said collectedly to Yorke and to a waiter who had been summoned to his assistance; "I am quite myself now." He stood up again and the waiter, seeing that he was fully restored, withdrew. When the door closed behind him, Tristrem went boldly back to the picture.

It was as Yorke had described it. In the background was a sunset made of cymbal strokes of vermilion, splattered with gold, and seamed with fantasies of red. In the foreground fluttered a chimera, so artfully done that one almost heard the whir of its wings. And beneath it crouched the Sphinx. From the eyrie of the years the ages had passed unmarked, unnoticed. The sphinx brooded, motionless and dumb.

With patient, scrutinizing attention Tristrem looked in her eyes and at her face. There was no mistake, it was Viola. Was there ever another girl in the world such as she? And this was her secret! Or was there a secret, after all, and might he not have misunderstood?

"Tell me," he said—"I will not praise your picture; in many respects it is above praise—but tell me, is what you said true?"

"Is what true?"

"What you said of the model."

"About her being in the châlet? Of course it is. Why do you ask?"

"No, not that, tell me—Mr. Yorke, I do not mean to be tragic; if I seem so, forgive me and overlook it. But as you love honor, tell me, is it true that she had a child in this place?"

"Yes, so I heard."

"And you say her name was——"

"Madame Dubois—Dupont—I have forgotten; they can tell you at the bureau. But it seems to me——"

"Thank you," Tristrem answered. "Thank you," he repeated. He hesitated a second and then, with an abrupt good-night, he hurried from the atelier and down the corridor till he reached his room.

Through the open window, the sulphur moon poured in. He looked out in the garden. Beyond, half concealed in the shadows, he could see the outline of the châlet. And it was there she had hid! He pressed his hands to his forehead ; he could not understand. For the moment he felt that if he could lose his reason it would be a grateful release. If only some light would come! He drew a handkerchief from his pocket and mopped his face. And then suddenly, as he did so, he caught a spark of that for which he groped. The room turned round, and he sank into a chair.

Yes, he remembered, it was at Bergamo, no, at Bologna. Yes, it was at Bergamo, he remembered perfectly well. He had taken from one of his trunks a coat that he had not worn since he went into mourning. It had been warm that day, and he wanted some thinner clothing. He remembered at the time congratulating himself that he had had the forethought to bring it. And later in the day he had taken from the pocket a handkerchief of a smaller size than that which he habitually used. He had looked at it, and in the corner he had found the Weldon crest. As to how it had come in his possession, he had at the time given no thought. Weldon, in one of his visits, might have left it at Waverley Place, or he himself might have borrowed it when dining at Weldon's house. He was absent-minded, he knew, and apt to be forgetful, and so at the time he had given the matter no further thought. After all, what incident could be more trivial? But now the handkerchief, like a magician's rug, carried him back to Narragansett. As well as he could remember, the last occasion on which he wore that coat was the day on which the butler's telegram had summoned him to town. Then, on learning of his father's death, he had put on other things, of sombrer hue. Harris, without rummaging in the pockets, had folded the coat and put it away. And it had remained folded ever since till the other day at Bologna—no, at Bergamo.

That morning at Narragansett, when he was hurrying into the cottage, the man who had aided Viola home the preceding evening drove up with her hat, with this very handkerchief, and the story of a dream. Aye, and his own dream. So this was Truth. She had pursued him, indeed. He could feel her knees on his arms, her fetid breath in his face. But this time it was not a nightmare. It was the real.

Yes, it was that. One by one he recalled the incidents of the past—incidents on which his mind loathed to dwell, rebelling against its own testimony until he coerced the shuddering memories to his will. There were the numberless times in which he had encountered Weldon coming in or leaving her house, almost haunting it with his presence. There was that wanton lie, and the unexplained and interrupted scene between them. It was then, perhaps, that he had first shown the demon that was in him. And then, afterward, was that meeting on the cars—he with a bruise on his cheek and a gash on his neck. Why was Viola's whip broken, if it were not that she had broken it on his face? Why did the nails of her ungloved hand look as though they had been stained with the juice of berries? Why, indeed, if it were not that she had sunk them in his flesh. Why had he heard her calling "Coward" to the night? It was for this, then, that the engagement had been broken; it was for this that she had hidden herself abroad.

For the first time since his boyhood, he threw himself on the bed and sobbed aloud.

To stifle his grief he buried his face in the pillow, and bit it with his teeth. It was more than grief, it was anguish, and it refused to be choked. But presently it did leave him. It left him quivering from head to foot, and in its place came another visitor. An obsession, from which he shrank, surged suddenly, and claimed him for its own. In a combat, of which his heart was the one dumb witness, he battled with it. He struggled with it in a conflict that outlasted hours; but presumably he coped in vain. The next morning his face was set as a captive's. In a fortnight he was in New York.

XV.

The return journey was unmarked by incident or adventure. Nothing less than a smash-up on the railway or the wrecking of the ship would have had the power to distract his thoughts. It may even be that his mind was unoccupied, empty as is a vacant bier, and yet haunted by an overmastering obsession. The ordinary functions of the traveller he performed mechanically, with the air and manner of a subject acting under hypnotic suggestion. One who crossed the ocean with him has since said that the better part of the time the expression of his face was that of utter vacuity. He would remain crouched for hours, in the same position, a finger just separating the lips, and then he would start with the tremor of one awakening from a debauch.

Mrs. Manhattan, who was returning with spoils from the Rue de la Paix, asked him one afternoon, as he happened to descend the cabin-stair in her company, where he had passed the winter.

"Yes, indeed," Tristrem answered, and went his way unconcernedly.

Mrs. Manhattan complained of this conduct to Nicholas, her husband, alleging that the young man was fatuous in his impertinence.

"My dear," returned that wise habitué of the Athenæum, "when a man gives away seven million, it is because he has forgotten how to be conventional."

It was on a Sunday that the ship reached New York, and it was late in the afternoon before the passengers were able to disembark. Tristrem had his luggage passed, and expressed to his grandfather's house, and then, despite the aggressive solicitations of a crew of bandits, started up-town on foot. In the breast-pocket of his coat he carried a purchase which he had made in Naples, a fantastic article which he had bought, not because he wanted it, but because the peddler who pestered him with wares and offers happened to be the best-looking and most unrebuffably good-natured scoundrel that he had ever encountered. And now, at intervals, as he walked along, he put his hand to the pocket to assure himself that it was still in place. Presently he reached Broadway. That thoroughfare, which on earlier Sundays was wont to be one of the sedatest avenues of the city, was starred with globes of azure light, and its quiet was broken by the passing of orange-colored cars. On the corner he stopped and looked at his watch. It was after seven. Then, instead of continuing his way up-town, he turned down in the direction of the Battery. His head was slightly bent, and as he walked he had the appearance of one perplexed. It was a delightful evening. The sky was as blue as the eyes of a girl beloved. The air was warm, and had the street been less noisy, less garish, and a trifle cleaner it might have been an agreeable promenade. But to Tristrem the noise, the dirt, the glare, the sky itself were part and parcel of the non-existent. He neither saw nor heeded, and, though the air was warm, now and then he shivered.

It seemed to him impossible that he should do this thing. And yet, since that night at Riva, his mind had been as a stage in which it was in uninterrupted rehearsal. If it were unsuccessful, then come what sorrow could. But even though its success were assured, might not the success be worse than failure, and viler to him than the most ignoble defeat? Meditatively he looked at his hand; it was slight as a girl's.

"I cannot," he said, and even as he said it he knew that he would. Had he not said it ten thousand times of times before? It was not what he willed, it was what he must. He was in the lap of a necessity from which, struggle as he might, he could not set himself free. He might make what resolutions he chose, but the force which acted on him and in him snuffed them out like candles. And yet, what had he done to fate that it should impel him to this? Why had he been used as he had? What wrong had he committed? For the past twelvemonth his life had been a continuous torture. Truly, he could have said, "no one save myself, in all the world, has learned the acuity of pain. I alone am its depository."

"And yet," he mused, "perhaps it is right. Long ago, when I was comparing my nothingness to her beauty, did I not know that to win her I must show myself worthy of the prize? She will think that I am when I tell her. Yes, she must think so when it is done. But will it be done? O God, I cannot."

For the instant he felt as though he must turn to the passers and claim their protection from himself. He had stopped again, and was standing under a great pole that supported an electric light. In the globe was a dim, round ball of red, and suddenly it flared up into a flame of the palest lemon, edged with blue. "It is my courage," he said, "I have done with hesitation now."

He hailed and boarded a passing car. "Hesitation, indeed!" he repeated. "As if I had not known all through that when the time came there would be none!" He put his hand again to his breast-pocket; it was there.

He had taken the seat nearest to the door, absently, as he would have taken any other, and the conductor found it necessary to touch him on the shoulder before he could extract the fare. He had no American money, he discovered, and would have left the car had not the conductor finally agreed to take his chances with a small piece of foreign gold, though not, however, until he had bit it tentatively with his teeth. It was evident that he viewed Tristrem with suspicion.

At Twentieth Street Tristrem swung himself from the moving vehicle, and turned into Gramercy Park. He declined to think; the rehearsals were over, he did not even try to recall the rôle. He had had a set speech, but it was gone from him as the indecision had gone before. Now he was to act.

He hurried up the stoop of Weldon's house and rang the bell, and as there seemed to him some unnecessary delay, he rang again, not violently, but with the assurance of a creditor who has come to be paid. But when at last the door was opened, he learned that Weldon was not at home.

As he went down the steps again there came to him a great gust and rush of joy. He would go now, he had been fully prepared, he had tried his best. If Weldon had been visible, he would not have hesitated. But he had not been; that one chance had been left them both, and now, with a certitude that had never visited his former indecisions, he felt it was written that that deed should never be done. He gasped as one gasps who has been nearly stifled. The obsession was gone. He was free.

In the street he raised his arms to testify to his liberty reconquered. Yet, even as they fell again, he knew that he was tricking himself. A tremor beset him, and to steady himself he clutched at an area-rail. Whether he stood there one minute or one hour he could not afterward recall. He remembered only that while he loitered Weldon had rounded the corner, and that as he saw him approach, jauntily, in evening dress, a light coat on his arm, his strength returned.

"Royal," he exclaimed, for the man was passing him without recognition. "Royal," he repeated, and Weldon stopped. "I have come to have a word with you."

The voice in which he spoke was so unlike his own, so rasping and defiant, that Weldon, with the dread which every respectable householder has of a scene at his own front door, motioned him up the steps. "Come in," he said, mellifluously, "I am glad to see you."

"I will," Tristrem answered, in a tone as arrogant as before.

"I am sorry," Weldon continued, "Nanny——"

"I did not come to see your wife; you know it."

Weldon had unlatched the door, and the two men passed into the sitting-room. There Weldon, with his hat unremoved, dropped in a chair, and eyed his visitor with affected curiosity.

"I say, Trissy, you're drunk."

"I am come," Tristrem continued, and this time as he spoke his voice seemed to recover something of its former gentleness, "I am come to ask whether, in the purlieus of your heart, there is nothing to tell you how base you are."

Weldon stretched himself languidly, took off his hat, stood up, and lit a cigarette. "Have an Egyptian?" he asked.

"Do you remember," Tristrem went on, "the last time I saw you?"

Weldon tossed the match into an ash-receiver, and, with the cigarette between his teeth, sprawled himself out on a sofa. "Well, what of it?"

"When I saw you, you had just contracted a debt. And now you can liquidate that debt either by throwing yourself in the river or——"

"Charming, Triss, charming! You have made a bon mot. I will get that off. Liquidate a debt with water is really good. There's the advantage of foreign travel for you."

"Do you know what became of your victim? Do you know? She went abroad and hid herself. Shall I give you details?"

For the first time Weldon scowled.

"Would you like the details?" Tristrem repeated.

Weldon mastered his scowl. "No," he answered, negligently. "I am not a midwife. Obstetrics do not interest me. On the contra——"

That word he never finished. Something exploded in his brain, he saw one fleeting flash, and he was dead. Even as he spoke, Tristrem had whipped an instrument from his pocket, and before Weldon was aware of his purpose, a knife, thin as a darning-needle and long as a pencil—a knife which it had taken the splendid wickedness of mediæval Rome to devise—had sunk into his heart, and was out again, leaving behind it a pin's puncture through the linen, one infinitesimal bluish-gray spot on the skin, and death.

Tristrem looked at him. The shirt was not even rumpled. If he had so much as quivered, the quiver had been imperceptible, and on the knife there was no trace of blood. It fell from his fingers; he stooped to pick it up, but his hand trembled so that, on recovering it, he could not insert the point into the narrow sheath that belonged to it, and, throwing the bit of embroidered leather in a corner, he put the weapon in his pocket.

"It was easier than I thought," he mused. "I suppose—h'm—I seem to be nervous. It's odd. I feared that afterward I should collapse like an omelette soufflée. And to think that it is done!"

He turned suspiciously, and looked at the body again. No, he could see it was really done. "And so, this is afterward," he continued. "And to think that it was here I first saw her. She came in that door there. I remember I thought of a garden of lilies."

From the dining-room beyond he caught the glimmer of a lamp. He crossed the intervening space, and on the sideboard he found some decanters. He selected one, and pouring a little of its contents into a tumbler he drank it off. Then he poured another portion, and when he had drunk that too, he went out, not through the sitting-room, but through the hall, and, picking up the hat which on entering he had thrown on the table, he left the house.

XVI.

SEVERAL thousand years ago a thinker defined virtue as the agreement of the will and the conscience. If the will were coercible the definition would be matchless. Unfortunately it is not. Will declines to be reasoned with ; it insists, and in its insistence conscience, horrified or charmed, stands a witness to its acts.

For a fortnight Tristrem had been married to an impulse against which his finer nature rebelled. It was not that the killing of such a one as Weldon was unjustifiable ; on the contrary, it was rather praiseworthy than otherwise. His crime was one for which the noose is too good. But to Weldon, in earlier days, he had felt as to a brother ; and though affection may die, does it not leave behind it a memory which should thereafter serve as a protecting shield ? It had been the bonds of former attachment, bonds long loosened, it is true, but of which the old impress still lingered, that seemed to Tristrem to tie his hands. Then, too, was the horror of such a thing.

There is nothing, a Scandinavian poet has said, more beautiful than a beautiful revenge; yet when a man is so tender of heart that if it be raining he will hesitate to shoo a persistent fly out of the window, it is difficult for that man, however great the aggravation, to take another's life. Besides, the impulse which had acted in Tristrem was not one of revenge. He had not the slightest wish to take the law into his own hands. The glaive of atonement was not one which he felt himself called upon to wield. That which possessed him was the idea that until the world was rid of Weldon there was a girl somewhere who could not look her own mother in the face. And that girl was the girl whom he loved, a girl who apparently had no other protector than himself.

In the rehearsals, it was this that had strung his nerves to acting pitch. When it was done he proposed to go to her with a reverence even greater than before, with a sympathy unspoken yet sentiable, and leave her with the knowledge that the injury had been obliterated and the shame effaced. For himself, whatever he may have hoped, he determined to ask for nothing. It was for her he defied the law; he was her agent, one whom she might recompense or not with her lithe white arms, but one to whom she would at least be grateful. And how beautiful her gratitude might be! Though she gave him nothing else, would not the thanks of her eyes be reward enough? And then, as he worked himself up with the thought of these things to acting pitch, then would come the horror of it all, the necessity of taking the life of one who had been his nearest friend, the dread of the remorse which attaches to death, the soiling of his own hands. It was in this fashion that he had wavered between indecision and determination, until, at last, stung by the cynicism of Weldon's speech, there had come to him a force such as he had never possessed before, and suddenly the deed had been done.

The possible arraignment that might follow the inquest, he had never considered. It is said that the art of killing has been lost. The tribunals, assizes, and general sessions have doubtless led somewhat to its discouragement, and yet it must be admitted that the office of police justice in one way resembles that of lover in the tropics—it is not exactly a sinecure. Perhaps, nowadays, it is only the blunderers that are detected; yet, however numerous they may or may not be, Tristrem, without giving a single thought as to how such a thing should be done and remain undetected, had had such chances in his favor that Vidocq himself might have tried in vain to fasten the death of Weldon on him. No one had seen him enter the house, no one had seen him leave it. Even the instrument which he had used, and which he had bought hap-hazard, as one buys a knick-knack, had served his end as cleanly as a paralysis of the heart. It had not spilled a drop of blood.

As Tristrem walked on, he did not think of these things; the possibility of detection had not troubled him, and now the probability that Weldon's death would be attributed to natural causes brought him no satisfaction. Of himself he gave no thought. He had wondered, indeed, that his presence of mind had not deserted him; he had marvelled at his own calm. But now his thoughts were wholly with Viola, and when he reached Fifth Avenue he determined to go to her at once.

A vagabond hansom was loitering near, and with its assistance he presently reached her door. Even as he entered, it was evident that she was not alone. On putting his hat down in the hall he noticed two others, and through the portière came the sound of voices. But he pushed the curtain aside, and entered the room with the air of one to whom the conventional has lost its significance. Yet, as he did so, he felt that he was wrong. If he wished to see Viola, would it not have been more courteous to her to get into evening dress than to appear among her guests in a costume suitable only for the afternoon? Society he knew to be a despot. Though it has no dungeons, at least it can banish, and to those that have been brought up in its court there are no laws rigider than its customs. Besides, was he in a mood to thrust himself among those whose chiefest ambition was to be ornate? He was aware of his mistake at once, but not until it was too late to recede.

Among those present he recognized a man who, though well on in life, devoted his entire time to matters appertaining to the amusements of the selectest circles. He was talking to a girl who, moist as to the lips and eyes, looked as had she just issued from a vapor-bath. Near to her was Mrs. Raritan. Tristrem noticed that her hair had turned almost white. And a little beyond, a young man with a retreating forehead and a Pall Mall accent sat, splendidly attired, talking to Viola.

Mrs. Raritan was the first to greet him, and she did so in the motherly fashion that was her own. And as she spoke Viola came forward, said some simple word, and went back to her former place.

"Come with me," said Mrs. Raritan, and she led him to an S in upholstery, in which they both found seats. "And now tell me about yourself," she added. "And where have you been?"

Truly it was pitiful. She looked ten years older. From a handsome, well-preserved woman she had in a twelvemonth been overtaken by age.

"I have been in Europe, you know," Tristrem answered; "I wrote to you from Vienna, and again from Rome."

"I am sorry," Mrs. Raritan replied; "the bankers are so negligent. There were many letters that must have gone astray. Were you—you had a pleasant winter, of course. And how is your grandfather?"

"I have not seen him. I am just off the ship."

At this announcement Mrs. Weldon looked perplexed.

"Is it possible that you only arrived this evening?" she asked.

"Yes, I wanted to see Viola. You know it is almost a year since—since—I tried to find you both in Europe, but——"

"Mr. Varick, did I hear you say that you arrived from Europe to-day?" It was the gentleman who devoted himself to the interests of society that was speaking.

"Yes, I came on the Bourgogne."

"Was Mrs. Manhattan on board?"

Tristrem answered that she was, and then the gentleman in question entered into an elaborate discourse on the subject of Mrs. Manhattan's summer plans. While he was still speaking a servant informed the vaporous maiden that her maid and carriage had arrived, and presently that young lady left the room. Soon after the society agent disappeared, and a little later the youth that had been conversing with Miss Raritan took his splendor away.

As yet Tristrem had had no opportunity of exchanging a word with Viola. To his hostess he had talked with feverish animation on the subject of nothing at all; but as the adolescent who had been engaging Viola's attention came to Mrs. Raritan to bid that lady good-night, Tristrem left the upholstered S and crossed the room to where the girl was seated.

"Viola," he began, but she stayed his speech with a gesture.

The young man was leaving the room, and it was evident from Mrs. Raritan's attitude that it was her intention to leave it also.

"I am tired," that lady said, as the front door closed; "you won't mind?" And Tristrem, who had arisen when he saw her standing, went forward and bowed over her hand, and then preceded her to the portière, which he drew aside that she might pass.

"Good-night, Mrs. Raritan," he said; "good-night, and pleasant dreams."

Then he turned to the girl. She, too, looked older, or, perhaps, it would be more exact to say she looked more mature. Something of the early fragrance had left her face, but she was as beautiful as before.

Her gold eyes were brilliant as high noon, and her cheeks bore an unwonted color. She was dressed in white, her girdle was red with roses, and her arms and neck were bare.

As Mrs. Raritan passed from the room, Tristrem let the portière fall again, and stood a moment feasting his famished eyes in hers. At last he spoke.

"He is dead, Viola."

The words came from him very gravely, and when he had uttered them he looked down at the rug.

"Dead! Who is dead? What do you mean?"

"He is dead," he repeated, but still he kept his eyes lowered.

"He! What he? What are you talking about?" She had left her seat and fronted him.

"Royal Weldon," he made answer, and as he did so he looked up at her.

Her hands fluttered like falling leaves. An increased color mounted to her cheeks, and disappearing, left them white. Her lips trembled.

"I do not understand," she gasped. And then, as her dilated eyes stared into his own, he saw that she understood at last. Her fluttering hands had gone to her throat, as though to tear away some invisible clutch. Her lips had grown gray. She was livid.

"It is better so, is it not?" he asked, and searched her face for some trace of the symptoms of joy. As he gazed at her, she retreated. Her hands had left her throat, her forehead was pinioned in their grasp, and in her eyes the expression of terrified wonder was seamed and obscured by another that resembled hate.

"And it was you," she stammered, "it was you?"

"Yes," he answered, with an air of wonder that equalled her own; "yes——"

"You tell me that Royal Weldon is dead, and that you—that you——"

"It was this way," he began, impelled, in his own surprise, to some form of explanation. "It was this way—you see—well, I went to Riva. That man that brought back your hat—— Good God, Viola, are you not glad?"

She had fallen into a chair, and he was at her feet.

"Are you not glad?" he insisted. "Now, it will be—— " But whatever he intended to say, the speech remained uncompleted. The girl had drawn from him as from an adder unfanged.

"Assassin!" she hissed. "Assassin!" she hissed again. "What curse——"

"Viola, it was for your sake."

She clinched her hand as though she sought the strength wherewith to strike. And then the fingers loosened again. She moved still farther away. The hatred left her eyes, as the wonder had done before. With the majesty which Mary Stuart must have shown when she bade farewell to England, to the sceptre, and to life, Viola Raritan turned to him again:

"I loved him," she muttered, yet so faintly that she had left the room before Tristrem, who still crouched by the chair which she had vacated, fully caught the import of her words.

"Viola!" he called. But she had gone. "Viola! No, no; it is impossible. It is impossible," he repeated, as he rose up again; "it is impossible."

He staggered to the door and let himself out. And then, as the night-air affects one who has loitered over the wine, he reeled.

In a vision such as is said to visit the ultimate consciousness of they that drown, a riot of long-forgotten incidents surged to his mind. He battled with them in vain; they were trivial, indeed, but in their onslaught he saw that the impossible was truth.

With the aimlessness of a somnambulist, and reasoning with himself the while, he walked down through Madison Avenue until he reached the square. There, turning into Lexington, he entered Gramercy Park. Presently he found himself standing at Weldon's door. "But what am I doing here?" he mused. For a little time, he leaned against the rail, endeavoring to collect his thoughts. Then, as an individual, coated in blue and glistening as to his buttons, sauntered by, he seemed to understand. He left the railing at which he had stood, and, circling the park, set out in the direction of the river. As he reached Second Avenue, a train of the elevated railway flamed about an adjacent corner, and swept like a dragon in mid-air, on, beyond, and out of sight. To the right was a great factory, and as Tristrem continued his way through the unfamiliar street he wondered what the people in the train, what the factory-hands, and the dwellers in the neighborhood would say if they could surmise his errand. The river was yet some distance away. It was such a pity, he told himself, such a pity, that he had not accepted the invitation of the sea. That would have been so much better, so much surer, and so much more discreet. And then he fell to wondering about his grandfather, and his heart was filled with anguish. He would have done anything to save that old man from pain. But it was too late now. A gas-jet that lighted a wide and open door attracted his attention; he looked in, the building seemed empty as a lecture-hall. After all, he decided, perhaps that would be best.

Half an hour later, Tristrem Varick was the occupant of a room that was not as large as one of the closets in his grandfather's house. The furniture consisted of a wooden bench. The sole fixture was an apparatus for drawing water. The floor was tiled and the upper part of the walls was white; the lower, red. The room itself was very clean. There was no window, and the door, which was of grated iron, had been locked from without. From an adjoining cell, a drunken harlot rent the night with the strain of a maudlin ditty.

XVII.

It was some little time before the powers that are could be convinced that Tristrem Varick was guilty of the self-accused murder. It was not that murders are rare, but a murder such as that was tolerably uncommon. The sergeant who presided over the police-station in which Tristrem had delivered himself up was a mild-mannered man, gentle of voice, and sceptical as a rag-picker. He received Tristrem's statement without turning a hair.

"What did you do it for?" he asked, and when Tristrem declined to enter into any explanation, he smiled with affable incredulity. "I can, if you insist," he said, "accommodate you with a night's lodging." And he was as good as his word; but the cell which Tristrem subsequently occupied was not opened for him until the sergeant was convinced that death had really visited the precinct.

Concerning the form in which that death had come, there was at first no doubt. Weldon had been found stretched lifeless on a sofa. The physician who was then summoned made a cursory examination, and declared that death was due to disease of the heart. Had Tristrem held his tongue, that verdict, in all probability, would never have been questioned; indeed, it was not until the minuter autopsy which Tristrem's statement instigated that the real cause was discovered.

It was then that it began to be admitted that violence had been used, but as to whether that violence was accidental or intentional, and if intentional, whether or not it was premeditated, was a matter which, according to our archaic law, twelve men in a pen could alone decide. The case was further complicated by a question of sanity. Granting that some form of manslaughter had been committed, was it the act of one in full possession of his faculties, or was it the act of one bereft of his senses?

Generally speaking, public opinion inclined to the latter solution. Indeed, there seemed to be but one other in any way tenable, and that was, that the blow was self-inflicted. This theory had many partisans. The records, if not choked, are well filled with the trials of individuals who have confessed to crimes of which they were utterly guiltless. It was discovered that a recent slump in Wall Street had seriously affected Weldon's credit. It was known that his manner of living had compelled his wife to return to her father's house, and it was shown that she had begun an action for divorce. It seemed, therefore, possible that he had taken his own life in Tristrem's presence, and that Tristrem, in the horror of the spectacle, had become mentally unhinged.

In addition to this, there was against Tristrem—aside, of course, from the confession—barely a scintilla of evidence. The very instrument which was found on his person, and with which he declared the murder had been committed, was said not to belong to him. A servant of Weldon's thought she had once seen it in the possession of her late master. And it was argued that Tristrem had caught it up when it fell from the hand of the dead, and, in the consternation of the moment, had thrust it in his own pocket. Moreover, as suicides go, there was in Weldon's case a tangible excuse. He was on the edge of bankruptcy, and his matrimonial venture was evidently infelicitous. His life was an apparent failure. Many other men have taken their own lives for causes much minor.

The theory of suicide was therefore not untenable, and those who preferred to believe that a murder had been really committed were at a loss for a motive. Tristrem and Weldon were known to have been on terms of intimacy. Tristrem had been absent from the country a number of months, while Weldon had steadfastly remained in New York. During the intervening period it was impossible to conjecture the slightest cause of disagreement. And yet, no sooner did the two men have the opportunity of meeting, than one fell dead, and the other gave himself up as his murderer. And if that murder had been really committed, then what was the motive ?

This was the point that particularly perplexed the District Attorney. It could not have been money. Tristrem had never speculated, and his financial relations with Weldon were confined to certain loans made to the latter, and long since repaid. Nor, through the whole affair, could the sharpest ear detect so much as the rustle of a petticoat. Inasmuch, then, as neither of the two great motor forces, woman and gold, was discernible, it is small wonder that the District Attorney was perplexed. To that gentleman the case was one of peculiar importance. His term of office had nearly expired, and he ardently desired re-election. Two wealthy misdemeanants had recently slipped through his fingers—not through any fault of his own, but they had slipped, none the less—and some rhetoric had been employed to show that there was a law for the poor and a more elastic one for the rich. Now Tristrem's conviction would be the finest plume he could stick in his hat. The possessor of an historic name, a member of what is known as the best society, an habitué of exclusive clubs—a representative, in fact, of everything that is most hateful to the mob—and yet a murderer. No, such a prize as that must not be allowed to escape. The District Attorney felt that, did such a thing occur, he might bid an eternal farewell to greatness and the bench.

But what was the motive of the crime? Long before that question, which eventually assumed the proportions of a pyramid, was seriously examined, it had been demonstrated that the wound from which Weldon had died was not one that could have been self-inflicted. The theory of suicide was thereupon and at once abandoned. And those who had been most vehement in its favor now asserted that Tristrem was insane. What better evidence of insanity could there be than the giving away of seven millions? But apart from that, there were a number of people willing to testify that on shipboard Tristrem's demeanor was that of a lunatic—moreover, did he not insist that he was perfectly sane, and where was the lunatic that ever admitted himself to be demented? Of course he was insane.

A committee, however, composed of a lawyer, a layman, and a physician, visited Tristrem, and announced exactly the contrary. According to their report, he was as sane as the law allows, and, although that honorable committee did not seem to suspect it, it may be that he was even a trifle saner. One of the committee—the layman—started out on his visit with no inconsiderable trepidation. In after-conversation, he said that it had never been his privilege to exchange speech with one gentler and more courteous than that self-accused murderer.

Yet still the motive was elusive. In this particular, Tristrem hindered everybody to the best of his ability. He was resolutely mute.

The attorney who was retained for the defence—not, however, through any wish of Tristrem's—could make nothing of his client. "It is pathetic," he said; "he keeps telling me that he is guilty, that he is sane, that he is infinitely indebted for my kindness and sympathy, but that he does not wish to be defended. Sane? He is no more sane than the King of Bavaria. Who ever heard of an inmate of the Tombs that did not want to be defended? Isn't that evidence enough?"

It was possible, of course, to impugn the testimony of the committee, but the attorney in this instance deemed it wiser to let it go for what it was worth, while showing that Tristrem, if sane at the time of the committee's examination, was insane at the time the crime, if crime there were, was committed. It was his settled conviction that if Tristrem would only explain the motive, it would be of such a nature that the chances of acquittal would be in his favor. In this, presumably, he was correct. But, in default of any explanation, he determined that the only adoptable line of defence was the one already formulated; to wit, that in slaying Weldon his client was temporarily deranged.

Meanwhile he expressed his conviction to the grief-stricken old man by whom he had been retained, and who himself had tried, unavailingly, to learn the cause. Whether he divined, or not, what it really was, is a matter of relative unimportance. In any event, he had discovered that on leaving Weldon's house Tristrem, instead of giving himself up at once, which he would have done had he at the time intended to do so at all, had gone directly to Miss Raritan.

And one day he, too, went to her. "You can save him," he said.

He might as well have asked alms of a statue. He went again, but the result was the same. And then a third time he went to her, and on his knees, with clasped and trembling hands, in a voice broken and quavering, he besought her to save his grandson from the gallows. "Come to court," he pleaded; "if you will only come to court!"

"I will come," the girl at last made answer, "I will come to see him sentenced."

Such is the truth about Tristrem Varick. In metropolitan drawing-rooms it was noticed that since Miss Raritan's return from Europe the quality of her voice had deteriorated. Mrs. Manhattan said that for her part she did not approve of the French method.

VANITY SQUARE

"We authors," Disraeli is rumoured to have remarked in the course of a conversation with V. R.; and though the plural was singular, it is rumoured, too, that with it he flattered her basely. It is rumoured also that nothing ever flattered her more except when he made her Empress of India. These rumours are repeated for what they are worth. One of them relates to an incident that occurred a long time ago, and may not have occurred at all. Even so, and even otherwise a point remains. Titles appeal to women. They are highly decorative, very becoming, serviceable in more ways than one. They may not perhaps lessen the length of the ears, but the attendant tiaras conceal it. C'est déjà beaucoup. The taste is not limited to women either. There are men who would not know how to get along without them. They secure credit from tradesmen and attention from heiresses. What more could the heart desire? In the circumstances a bill submitted to the Italian Parliament merits consideration.

The measure provides that in exchange for coin titles may be transmuted. After all, why not? The difference between mister and monseigneur is not of a nature to weigh with a sturdy American, but in New York it tickles the girls. Every one of them loves a lord, though it is not every one of them who has a lord to love.

The bill, then, is sufficiently praiseworthy. What it lacks is utility. Since the beginning of years and the beginning of things titles have been purchasable in Italy. They could be had in the Rome of the Cæsars as well as in the Rome of the Saints. There are at this minute a hundred princes who for a hundred dollars are not only able but anxious to supply them. The process, legally catalogued as adoption, has been performed again and again. For that matter a New York woman, who shall be nameless, secured, for causes that shall be nameless also, a divorce and journeyed abroad. Whether or not she collaborated in a theory we have long entertained, to the effect that a woman who marries a second time does not deserve to have lost her first husband, is immaterial. The point is that, discovering the name she bore—at arm's length—had its disadvantages, she purchased the right to be known and addressed as Princess. Principessa della Luna Bianca, let us say. A year passed. Two perhaps. Ultimately it fell about that at some function or other a man who had been introduced gazed musingly at her and asked if he had not had the pleasure of meeting her somewhere before. The Princess smiled and tapped him with her fan. "Why, yes, indeed; don't you remember? You used to be my husband."

The story has a moral, as all proper stories should have. Titles ought to be purchasable here. Such an arrangement would enable women to dispense with husbands. That in itself is enough to commend it. Society would be delightful were women all married and all men single. But the idea has another charm. It would check the export of heiresses. The latter are at a premium. Commercially speaking, the demand exceeds the supply. There are not enough to go around. As a consequence, in the absence of a measure such as we have suggested, we see no good and valid reason why another should not be passed inhibiting their abduction. A bill of this kind would not interfere with the tariff, and might increase the revenue. It would be a protective measure of the proper sort. The open door is all very well, but not where our girls are concerned.

Girls, though, are so constituted that there is no arguing with them. They believe in free trade. From certain statistics and studies we are enabled to infer that they believe in titles also. And very logically. A title can be divided. A duke makes a duchess, whereas a man of brains cannot share his intellect with a fool. Were it otherwise strawberry leaves might cease to appeal.

Yet were things otherwise than as they are life might be fair as a dream. Obviously, it is just the reverse. A woman's heart, for instance, —or, more exactly, the heart of a pretty woman —is a bonbon wrapped in riddles. A fool may stop to solve, but a wise man nibbles away. And very good it tastes, too, until indigestion ensues, and he turns to other fare. For the devil of it is that no man can subsist on one dish. However delicious the dish may be the hour comes when it palls. Muhammad probably understood this fact when he promised to the faithful throughout all eternity a fresh houri every day. Every day is perhaps excessive. Moreover, an eternal feast might prove as distressing as an eternal fast. Yet we assume there was to be nothing compulsory in the matter and that the faithful could diet if they chose. "Not too much of anything," said a profound epicure; and whether served with riddles or without, a variety of bonbons, even in courses, even in Paradise, must become as indigestible as the repetition of one particular sweet.

This is not right. It is not right that man should be so constituted that he needs must weary, not merely of one dish, but of all. But against this sorry scheme of things novelists without number and poets without publishers have spawned copy by the ton. Quite unavailingly, too. Nobody by taking pen and paper can add a charm to a statue. Life is just about as hard. The scheme is indeed sorry, particularly when you consider that the world is filled with charming people whom we never meet—except in a few memoirs that are out of print and a few operas that are out of date. Ballets, indeed, occasionally present them, especially the variety known to foreigners as féeries, which are delightful comminglings of fair faces, lips of silk, incandescent eyes, skirts of tulle, shuttled with clinging measures, sudden caresses, startling flowers, auroras, and apotheoses. Representations of this order are really consolatory. They fascinate the eye, release the imagination, and send it vagabonding afar through the marvels of lands where dreams come true.

"O Paradis," the tenor sings in the last act of "L'Africaine," "O Paradis, sorti de l'onde." There it is, and without the nuisance, too, of assisting at the soprano's demise under an upas-tree. In these lands there is nothing of that kind — at most the spectacle of a faithless favourite sewn in a sack and tossed by your hurrying eunuchs into the deep and indifferent sea. That, though, is a sight very dreamlike and agreeable to contemplate. So, too, are the caravans of Circassians, the swaying palanquins, the sombre and splendid bazaars. The turbans of the merchants that pass are heavy with sequins and secrets. The pale mouths of the blue-bellied fish that rise from the sleeping waters are aglow with gems. In courtyards curtained with cashmeres chimeras and hippogriffs await your approach. In the air is the odour of spices, the scent of the wines of Schiraz. The silence is threaded with the hum of harps, with the murmur of kisses and flutes. The days are grooved with alternating delights; they detain, indeed, but the nights enthral. There are a thousand and one of them, and they are the preludes to the Pays des Songes.

Before entering a mosque the Moslem leaves his slippers at the door. Before entering fairyland leave stocks in the Street, perplexities behind, and with them the usual collection of unhallowed ruminations. These things are as sacrilegious as automobiles would be. They are out of place in a land where the palace of the White Cat rears its enchanted turrets to the sky, where at any moment you may stumble over the Belle au Bois Dormant, find Cinderella's little foot in your hand, encounter the seduction of sylphs, the witchery of the willis, feel the April of their lips on yours, taste the rapture of life as it ought to be, the savour of immaculate joy.

Before Tahiti was vulgarised by Loti, and Bora Bora took to moral corsets, it is possible that the savour was apprehensible there. It is possible that in some of the untrotted islands of the South Seas an illusion of it still subsists. But elsewhere it has gone. Even the ballet does not produce it any more. It has vacated the earth as beauty will do. Progress is too utilitarian for either. What progress does not need it lops. It has made it easy to travel and nowhere to travel to. Enchantments have evaporated, hippogriffs are no more. The sky has changed and colours with it. There are scenes as there are sorceries that have gone from us for ever. There are advertisements where there were witcheries, commerce where there were caprices, patent medicines in lieu of enthralments, the shriek of steam where sylphs have strayed. The one place in which the past and the poetry of it persevere is the neighbourhood of thrones. There is the ideal's last refuge. There, too, is the Mecca of Vanity Square.

Americans who want to get there, and cannot, catalogue as snobbish those who can and do. Everything being possible, the cataloguing may be exact. But snobbishness is not appreciated at its worth. It is something very commendable. Snobbish people are always trying to appear other than what they are, and the effort is certainly virtuous. Contentment is a very degraded condition. It is bovine. Discontent is a most reassuring sign. People are always discontented when they are trying to improve. The desire for improvement is an aspiration, and what aspiration more praiseworthy can there be than the ambition to look down on your neighbour? Call it snobbish if you will, but recognise that snobbishness has its merits.

Courts, too, have theirs. Yet if we may believe what we hear, and that is always such a pleasure, they are not what they were. Those who frequent them take a succulent satisfaction in relating the disillusions they have met. Even so, apart from the ballet, they are the sole resorts capable of suggesting fairyland now. It is unfortunate that Mr Cook is not in a position to supply round-trip tickets to them, but, progress aiding, no doubt that enterprise will come. Meanwhile, one of the easiest passports being a title, it is only natural that the latter should appeal.

There are, though, titles and titles. A year or two ago the Revue des Revues demonstrated that those promenaded by members of the Jockey, the Pommes de Terre, and the Cercle de la Rue Royale were not worth the cards on which they were printed; that there was not an authentic noble in the lot. The demonstration was denounced as unpatriotic. We saw it alleged that it was calculated to throw a scare into the hearts of American girls, who, being heavy consumers, had largely increased the national wealth. At the time this argument did not seem to appeal to our friend and brother-in-letters, M. Henri Rochefort. "Should it occur," he declared, "should the hour come when our sprigs of nobility are no longer purchased by exotic quails, I, for one, would not weep for grief." And M. Rochefort added: "The idle descendant of a Crusader is a sucking pig. The female Yankee is a peacock. What good can such a couple work? There may have been unions between them which have not turned out badly, yet in that case the parties have been more lucky than wise."

M. Rochefort is quite right. It was, of course, very rude of him to call our heiresses names. Besides, admitting them to be quails, they can't be peacocks also. That is impossible. Ornithology is unacquainted with any such fowl. But he scored a point. To us as to him the heiress is a rara avis. Hence the beauty of the measures which we have suggested. Hence the pro bono publicanism of them, too. Though we have lost our bisons let us preserve our birds — from Frenchmen at least—and while we are at it, from all other foreigners as well. Russians especially, though very taking, should be admired with circumspection and avoided with care. They are all princes, and we know what the Bible says about them. If we have our facts correctly—and if not it would not surprise us—their prevalence is due to some old ruffian of a Tsar who in a drunken fit ordered every hereditary title, save those appertaining to his own family, to be abolished and the documents relating to them destroyed. These titles some successor or other restored, but as the original grants were no longer in existence everybody who possessed the energy was free to put in a claim. From the results we should judge that the number of persons possessing that energy must have been inordinate.

German titles are not advantageous either. When authentic they are awkward, and American purchasers are not in favour in Berlin. The Kaiser calls them gemeine Amerikanerinnen. English titles, though they come higher, provide more for the money. They are, perhaps, the best. But though the best, we cannot regard them as desirable for our girls. When obtained, certain results have occasionally ensued. In these instances the party of the second part is usually a duke who in other circumstances would prefer to follow a fashion set by his ancestors and get a bride from among the nobility of his land. But the nobility is poor, the castle is crumbling, the moat is choked, sheriffs are passing over the drawbridge, there are no warders to guard it any more. In short, there are ways and means to be considered, and who can supply them so well as a nice little American girl?

That little girl is not merely nice; she is charming. She never omits to have in her that which will make a duchess worthy of the strawberry leaves. And so quickly does she assimilate the conditions of her new existence that no one suspects her origin, no one dreams that she once had a twang, that she lived in a land of savages and dressed in feathers and beads. No; no one knows it except the duke, and he is too ducal to tell, too considerate to let anyone suppose that, among the redskins where he found her, had she not had bag upon bag of wampum he would have rubbed noses and passed on his way. And he is very sweet to that little girl, very loving, very thoughtful, very courteous, until it occurs to him that there are other women in the land, that a duke acknowledges to himself but one law — his pleasure, and to his duchess but one duty — neglect. And presently in the castle, rebuilt now and rewardered, yet so far from the long grass and palm-trees of home, that little girl will sit and weep, and if she is a good little girl, as all nice little American girls are supposed to be, she will sit and weep alone.

The tableau is affecting, yet hardly emulative. But, then, arrangements of this kind do not always turn out so badly. On the contrary, they turn out worse. The parties to them yawn in each other's face.

Such are the conditions in Vanity Square. When those who dwell there are not up to some devilishness they are bound to be alarmingly dull.

II

THE GOLDEN FOLD

SAID a man to us once: "I have a big income, I have a big house. I want to get into society. How can I do it?" "Bite by bite," we replied. He took the tip. Everybody with whom he had so much as a bowing acquaintance he asked, re-asked and asked again to dine. Some accepted Some went so far as to be decently civil in return. Before he moved to another and, we assume, a higher sphere, you could have read his name in the papers every day of your life. That is social success.

Coincidentally, a woman of wealth approached us with a cognate query. "Leave a lot of p. p. c.'s and go abroad," we told her. The advice was taken. The lady left cards on everyone she knew not yet longed to, migrated to Mayfair, consorted with countesses, returned to Manhattan, where, received at first as a distant cousin, ultimately she succeeded in dying in an odour of perfect gentility. What more could the heart desire?

These are magnificent instances. But they occurred in an epoch when New York was closer-fisted and more open-armed than now. To-day, barring the court circles of Vienna and the region known in mythography as the Faubourg Saint-Germain, there is no society in which the line is drawn tighter.

That line is not the clothes-line. In Manhattan you behold coronets on republican cambrics, crowns on democratic heads, and débutantes in three-thousand-dollar frocks. These things are very beautiful. So, too, is the taste of the exponents. C'est le monde ou l'on s'en fiche.

The line is not drawn at birthmarks either. The latter are essential in Vienna. But nowhere else. To be hoffähig there you must have a bushel of quarterings. You need not necessarily have anything more. They suffice. But in their absence you possess nothing which represents, however remotely, a recognisable existence. Your dimensions become microscopic. You are a minim, a molecule, a mite.

The Faubourg Saint-Germain is assumed to be equally fastidious. The assumption is erroneous. The Faubourg is more exacting. There your quarterings are important but so also is the quality of your intelligence. Descent from a problematic Crusader is a prime prerequisite. But, incidentally, you must be negative. Anything that savours of originality is distinctly common—rasta, to use a localism of the realm. C'est le monde où l'on s'ennuie.

Manhattan is more liberal. Birth is not a requisite. If it were, the golden fold would be composed of young people still in their teens. Society, as at present organised, had no existence twenty years ago. The men and women who moved and had their social being then have been lost and submerged in the plutocratic flood. Here and there a few ultimate survivors linger on. But their condition is quasi-phantasmal. At an affair that occurred during the winter, a woman said to us: "Who is that man over there who does not seem to know anyone?" "An old New Yorker," we replied.

Brains are not a requisite either. In that Manhattan has modelled itself after the Faubourg. But, unlike the Faubourg, in and about Manhattan originality counts. It not merely counts, it consists in devising new ways of being dull. In a society at once so polished and so ornate that is quite as it should be. The result, too, is commendable. Society toils and spins yarns, but it does not read. That is not because it does not know how. It is because it has a fine contempt for literature—yet a contempt which, though fine, is hardly that which familiarity breeds.

Though birth is not a requisite, or brains either, genealogy is. The statement being complex, illustrations may clarify it. In London you begin by being smart and end by going into trade. In New York you begin by going into trade and end by being stupid. The process is not identical, but the result is the same. With this difference, however. In London the smartness of smart people, whether in trade or out, is due to genealogical memories. In New York smartness is derived from genealogical manufacturers.

And quite naturally. It is related of a Turk that, being shown over the country seat of an English gentleman, he mused at the pictures of the incumbent's progenitors. "You paint them?" he asked of the housekeeper. The woman replied that she did not know how to paint. "You try," he added, "and you paint better."

On Fifth Avenue housekeepers are spared such sarcasm. There are a dozen houses we wot of in which the pictures of the owners' ancestors are works of the highest art. No art, indeed, could be higher. For while the people depicted in the English portraits once lived, however hideously, the people whom the pictures on Fifth Avenue represent never lived at all. There is triumphant democracy.

There is surprising magic, too. Endearing examples of similar witchcraft reside in the archives of the local biographical society, which, during its incubatory incorporation, excited the hilarity of the impolite. It used to be a jest in Europe that we imported our nobility. This institution has done away with that slur. Statistics in hand, it has shown that we produce enough not only for home consumption but for export purposes to boot. According to the statistics cited, we have already succeeded in raising a regiment of descendants of Alfred the Great and an army of descendants of other and yet greater sovereigns.

After all, why not? Yet precisely as in an occasional newspaper article you read of a prince running a lift here, of another serving as waiter there, of a third who has set up as shoemaker somewhere else, and, all of them, the world forgetting by the world forgot, so does New York society ignore those who are merely princely and nothing else. As one may see, its line is by no means lax.

In spite of an absurd idea to the contrary, that line is not wholly auriferous. Nine months out of twelve the hotels of New York are congested with Crœsuses, with whom even the clerks will not condescend to converse. Apart from these hobo millionaires, the town is packed with plutocrats, of whose existence we learn only through hearing that they are dead. Occasionally, as in a recent case, they have to be murdered to attract our attention.

These poor devils come from the pampas, the savannahs, the mines, the lakes, from the Lord knows where else besides. They come, allured by the phantasmagoria of the mirage projected from Upper Fifth Avenue, drawn by newspaper reports of famous functions, dazzled by the glamour of the golden fold. The sheen of the spangles of glittering gaieties entrances such wives and daughters as they have managed to accumulate. It magnetises the loot of their hazardous days. Then, too, knowing the country is free, believing that one man is as good as another, certain that they have the coin, convinced that that talisman is a sesame, urged by the females of their clan, propelled by their own ambitions, excited by such imagination as they possess, in dreams forecast and in leaded type they behold the announcement of their presence among the gala gangs behind the gilded gates. Whereupon the poor devils conclude that, since the dream is blissful, the realisation must be Paradise.

In the thousand and one nights that were less astronomic than our own Paradise was a definite resort. It was very neighbourly. It was just overhead. Since then it has tumbled down. What is worse, there is nothing to take its place. You cannot go to Elysium. It is out of date. There is no use getting a guide-book and looking up Valhalla. It has fallen to pieces. It does not pay to hunt for lodgings in the Orient either. Devachan is a fiction and Nirvana a fraud. The Star of Ormuzd has burned out in the sky. The Lotus of Azure has vanished.

These plaisances were so many synonyms for happiness. In their disappearance it is but natural that the mind of the ordinary man should cast about for a substitute. The mind of the ordinary man is an engaging collection of zeros. An ordinary woman has the mind of a hen. The latter appreciation is not our own.

It was expressed by Confucius, who considerately added that an extraordinary woman has the mind of two hens.

To a conjunction of intelligences of this order society appeals as Paradise did in nights less astronomic. But because society appeals to them it by no means follows that they appeal to society. On the contrary. Along Fifth Avenue they have the substance of shadows on glass. There the tramp millionaires, whom we have been considering, discover, very greatly to their own amazement, and without any assistance whatever from idealistic philosophy, that, in spite of their coin, they do not exist: that they are not even the perceptions of a perceiver. Then it is quite one to them whether they are murdered or not. Dreams are true while they last. The dreams of these poor devils do not linger long after they have crossed the ferry.

Yet what could be more logical? There are people who compose cantatas. They have the gift for that sort of thing. There are others who can tell what will not happen to you six months hence. They have the faculty for such clairvoyance. There are women who, on not a dollar more than twenty-four thousand a year, manage to look like angels. Only, of course, much better dressed. It is an art of theirs. There are novelists whose produce sells by the ton. They have a charm that appeals to chambermaids.

It is the same way with New York society. To belong to it birth is not necessary. It is not, as vagrant plutocrats fancy, a question of bank accounts. Brains have nothing to do with it, breeding less. It is wholly and solely a matter of temperament.

In Paris it is a platitude that a man is born an Academician as he is born a prelate or a bore. He may, if it pleases him, abuse the Academy continuously, and be elected none the less; but three hundred masterpieces, recognised as such by the genuflections of an adoring universe, and even by the Academy itself, will not aid him to open its doors unless he be predestined.

Society is quite like the Academy. If destiny has given you the temperament it is a mere detail who and what you are. Your mother may have been a cook and your grandfather a crook —you will get there. But if you lack the temperament, then, though you descend from Charlemagne, though you have the manners of a Chesterfield, the genius of Cæsar, and the coin of Crœsus, you might as well try your hand at cantatas, at clairvoyance, at seraphising on small sums, at charming chambermaids with stupidities, as attempt to get in. Yet if, through accident, attraction, or affiliation, you should do so, you will not remain. It will not be because you are urged to go. It will be because you do not care to stop. The temperament will be lacking.

Given the temperament, and, in an atmosphere of orris, you will discover women talking about nothing at all to men who have devoted their lives to the subject. In sittings limited in spaciousness, but unlimited in splendour, you will encounter the prettiest girls in the world; heiresses of the first water, the deliciousness of ruedelapaixian confections, the aroma of Manhattan mingling with the accents of Mayfair.

You will observe, too, the same piaffe as in Paris; the same veneer that Vienna displays. You will miss, though, the grace and seduction of manner, the desire, coupled with the design, to please, which is noticeable there. But then, as you will be necessarily aware, the local young person has been so cracked up that she fancies herself top of the heap, dispensed as such from any effort.

In health, colouring, spirits, and general je m'en fichisme she is indeed a little dear, and the fact that she has not been schooled to charm has, as all things else have, an explanation. In European circles women have nothing to do but that, and they do it to perfection. They put flowers in your heart, to which, years after, you may turn and find fresh and unfaded still. With legerdemain of that kind the breeziness of our climate interferes. Girls here have other allurements, tricks worth two of that. They are disquietingly candid and delectably serene. Moreover, like all objets de luxe, they are a pleasure to behold. It is their conversation that is less enticing. On the subject of that which it is colloquial to term Who's What, and Why, the immaturest among them could give a lexicographer points. But that aria at an end, the rest of their repertoire detains only those who have the temperament to withstand it.

Aristocracy, an old chemist announced, should be composed of equal parts of beauty and of brains. In the pharmacy of American plutocracy brains are put up homeopathically. The entertainments of the gilded gang provide you with everything that eye and stomach can decently require. There is the beauty and the bowl.

Il y a, comme aux beaux jours d'antan, des franches repues et des vastes lippées. Yet always by way of interlude are there illustrations in the gymnastics of yawning.

Save among the decrepit and the kids, there is rarely the rumour of a flirtation. Of scandal, this year, there has been barely a breath. In Europe, autre guitare. But over there women, being sure of their position, do not bother themselves with it, while in New York they are too busy with what they call their status to go poaching on one another's preserves. The tone is therefore quite edifying, and very dull. It resembles that of a club of millionaires in which few of the members think and none have emotions.

This is not right. These people should do nothing but sin and sparkle. They should be forced to amuse us, if only in return for the attention with which they are gratified by the country at large. Time was when they did. It is not so long ago that they treated the world to a series of splendid wickednesses, to stunning treacheries, to superb betrayals, and therewith to an arrogance so medieval that in certain cases occurring in our private practice we saw mortification morbus set in and death ensue. It was like living in a novel to move among these people, and not a three-volume English affair either, nor yet in the dollar and fifty cents' worth of truck which American authors serve, but a novel such as d'Annunzio could write and the authorities would seize.

For never, perhaps, except in the Rome of the Cæsars, has there been gathered together in one city a set so rich, so idle, so profoundly uninterested in anything save themselves. No wonder there are proletarians. There is no debt as faithfully acquitted as contempt, and the disdain of these delightful people for the outer world, for the world that is outside of Burke and their own Libro d'Oro, is a point for the future psychologist, a nut, too, for those wastrels to crack who emerge and emigrate from the Lord knows where, with the dream, absurd in its pathos, of being welcomed in the golden fold.

III

THE GILDED GANG

SOCIETY we once defined as the paradise of the plebeian. We are frequently in error, and we were then. Morality we coincidentally defined as consisting in improper thoughts of other people. There, too, we were in error. But little mistakes of this nature have never disturbed our conscience. To err is highly literary. Besides, a man who is always right is a bore. If he does not send you to sleep he makes you feel ignorant, and either proceeding is very vulgar.

The awakening to our errors is due to an eruption, quite volcanic, which not long ago convulsed the press and reverberated through the small talk of the land. In the light of it we beheld society as we had never beheld it before. We learned that the gilded gang, which is indifferently known as the Smart Set and the Upper Four, is an aristocracy without a pedigree, whose Newport morality is a zero from which the periphery has gone.

All of which, in correcting our errors, interested us very much. It disclosed vistas of gaiety which we had not discerned before. It disclosed originality also. Personally, we have never found either at Newport. There, as in the metropolitan crush, the gilded gang has seemed to us ornamental and inept. In other climes and epochs society was livelier. According to history, it used to sin and sparkle. According to observation, to-day it sins and yawns.

That may be progress, but it is not right—the yawning at least. The sinning is another guitar, on which we will presently strum. Besides, assuming that sinning there be, it has a precedent to back it up. What more could the censorious require? Unless we are again in error, and it would not surprise us if we were, Antisthenes described the jeunesse dorée of Athens as the cosmetics of sin, an expression which so pleased Juvenal—or if not Juvenal, then some other chap—that he, or whoever it may have been, handed it out in Rome. It will be seen that we have no pseudo-erudition to display. But there are certain things we remember. Among others, the inkstand which Luther flung at Satan and his pomps. That is entirely too lovely to forget. So also is the farandole which Diderot, Voltaire, et al., executed on the follies of fine folk, and from which a revolution ensued. And look at Mr Dooley! All these cynics have shown up society quite as thoroughly as the press has talked it down. As a result, progress is manifest. Where it sparkled, now it yawns. Only the sinning remains.

For sinning there is, though it be but in taste, of which society has so much, and all of it so bad. Yet, no; there we are in error again. Not all of it, but a good deal. A good deal is more than enough. "Not too much of anything," said Epictetus, whom society never reads, not, of course, because it does not know how, but because it does not consider it smart to read anything. And why should it? In these days of emetic fiction there is nothing fit to read. Then, too, it is so much more delightful to live novels. In which respect, if we may believe everything we hear, the existence of the gilded gang is comparable, as already noted, to a romance that d'Annunzio might write, and which if he did the authorities would seize.

Let us see about that. To see it the better place aux dames. Among them we have beheld not a few who resembled nothing so much as figurines of Fragonard retouched by Félix. They are adorably constructed and constructed to be adored. What is quite as appetising is the fact that they dress with a deliciousness that never anywhere, at any time, has been exceeded. Whether they digress with equal effect is a matter which we will reach later on. Meanwhile it is worth noting that the beauty of the raiment of the young empresses of old Byzance is not in it with them. A dream, a delight, and a desire, is the briefest form in which their millinery can be expressed.

In addition, even during the Régence—had you had the good fortune to have lived in that fortunate time—you could not have dined more admirably than you may at their tables. The service is impeccable. At Windsor V. R. was served with greater pomp but not with greater perfection. The tables, too, are set in homes far more satisfactory and infinitely less uncomfortable than many a royal palace. And about those tables you will see stones by comparison to the glare of which there are crown jewels that are lack-lustre.

The bank accounts are as gorgeous as the gems. Since the days when Caligula got away with a sum equal to four hundred millions of our money, and in so doing succeeded, to his delight and to ours, in turning himself into a bankrupt god, an emperor without a copper, since those fair days, and the fairer ones still, in which Heliogabalus declined to touch the same garments, the same shoes, the same jewels, the same dishes, the same lips twice, there has been nothing like unto it—financially, that is—no, not even when Hertford, Hamilton, and De Grammont-Caderousse startled Europe with the splendid uproar of their orgies.

Add that all up and you will find that there is more money represented in the gilded gang than in any other society however famous or infamous. You will find also that among these people there are better opportunities for prodigality than have been enjoyed by any society however distinguished or extinguished. And not merely for prodigality profuse and perverse, but for wickedness magnificent and majestic. Since the Medici vacated the planet and the Sun Kings of France followed their excellent example, never has there been such a chance.

Yet that chance which is there, seated at their tables, careering in their automobiles, scudding in their yachts, accompanying them to the links, tiptoeing along their halls, plucking at their sleeve, whispering to them: "Behold me!" they ignore.

Is not that a shame? Indeed it is. It is regrettable also. It is deplorable that from settings such as these, from halls so spacious and lingerie so divine, succession of stunning scandals do not burst like bombs.

But they do not burst. We regret it, and our regret, if not poignant, at least is ethical. The splendour of billionaires and millionairesses should be manifest in Sardanapalian luxury, in super-Babylonian magnificence, in Belsarazzurian festivals, in Assyrian disdain of the prejudices of the herd. What are they here for, if not to entertain us? Yet were they to go about it in any such fashion we would affect to be shocked, of course, for that is our endearing custom. But, privately, how we should revel!

A succession of such things, a beautiful string of bombs bursting to an accompaniment of fanfares in the monotony of the eternal blue of our sky, a profusion of stunning scandals tossed off like Roman candles in the azure of our nights, a cascade of devilry and gorgeousness combined, a high projection of incandescent loveliness and licence exploding to the hum of harps and the kiss of flutes, would do us all a world of good.

Yes, indeed, it would heighten us in our own esteem. It would show Europe that in the diversions of our gilded gang we have nothing to envy its royal circles. There is patriotism, is it not? Of course, the press would rail and the pulpit fulminate. Yet, what of it? It is only through sheer excesses that man can in any way approach the ideal which Nature in her divine prodigalities herself has set. It is only through the higher emotions and their transcendant aspirations that man can so much as attempt to clutch some fringe of her mantle of stars. Therein are the ethics of our regret.

The gilded gang does not look at it in that light. Now and then behind their gates there will occur a romance unpretentious as one of Chopin's, now and then the waltz from "Faust" is heard, now and again the Ernani involame warbles from dog-collared throats. But the romanze and the arias are never very palpitant. They are usually without conviction and generally in minor keys.

That is not right. When Louise of Belgium wanted to sing she sang at the top of her voice. It is true she was declared insane, but if every princess of similar lungs were treated in that fashion the asylums of Europe would have to be enlarged. And look at that other princess, an American this time, who executed a fugue with a fiddler. She made no bones about it whatever. And consider the bedrabbled ermine in the various courts over the way, including those of bankruptcy, Saxony, and divorce.

Consider, too, the men. There is Leopold, for instance. This gentleman is now too advanced in years to perform any more fantasias, and his neighbours, the last King of Holland and the Prince of Orange—Lemons to the ladies of the ballet—are dead, damned, too, for all we know to the contrary, bien qu'ils soient morts en hommes qui savent vivre. Yet these people, together with their cousins throughout Europe, are the very ones whom the gilded gang do their best, though not their worst, to imitate, and in no way succeed at all. The day is not distant, que dis-je—what are we saying?—it is here, when the giving of automobiles and polo ponies by way of cotillon favours, will, with little games of pillows and keys and other nursery romps, satisfy, and amply, their conceptions of What's What.

A condition of things such as this cries, if not to heaven, at least to us all. It is a matter that narrowly escapes being personal. Many of us, it is true, possess only such acquaintance with the gilded gang as seeing their name in the paper affords. Many of us, it is also true, are no better off than the law allows. Yet though we live on a hundred dollars a day we can always dream of a million. Moreover, in a land so well supplied with bumper crops as this is, nobody can tell what spoiled old men of Fortune the poorest of us may yet become. In addition, the gilded gang being an aristocracy without a pedigree, we are not obliged to regret any more than they do that the best part of us is not underground.

But the point is that we are all interested in them. As a nation we are simply splendid. We are a righteous, self-respecting, God-fearing lot. We have no cant or hypocrisy or pretence about us. We never have stood, and never will stand, for snobbery of any kind. In spite of which, or, perhaps, precisely on that account, entrance to the gilded gang is the goal of every ambition.

A very laudable ambition it is. Entrance there enables you to take your proper place. It fortifies the consciousness of your merit. It throws your neighbour into spasms of indignation. That is quite as it should be. Yet, the circle being restricted, few are chosen and many left. Do you know what happens to the latter? Some affect a lofty indifference. Some succumb to mortification morbus. Some become hydrophobiac. We have beheld splendid specimens foaming at the mouth. We have understood that retention from functions kept their wives awake. We have been told that it gave their daughters nightmares.

Quite unavailing, too. Indifference does not appeal to the smart set. Hydrophobia, insomnia, and nightmares do not either. There are but two things that do. The first is money; the second is push. Given these little things, and in no time you are in the thick of it. Without them, then, though you descend from Charlemagne and have the soul of Chopin, you will never get there. Jamais, nunca, niemals, never.

To be modish you must have money; tons of it. You must have push; acres, and more to spare. In modesty there is not a bit of merit. In genteel poverty there is no gentility now. The worship of what clergymen call the fatted calf—or is it the golden one?—never was more ardent. That calf has Nebuchadnezzared the country. His fleece is as admired in society as his fleecing is loved in the Street. Yet, has a calf a fleece? No matter. The simile is there, and behind it is the gilded gang.

These premises accepted, it follows that since admission to it is the dream of every right-thinking citizen and his wife it would be nicer were the gang remoulded more in accordance with our heart's desire. It would not only be nicer, it would be gayer, and if it in any way resembled descriptions which we have encountered, it would be ideal.

These descriptions represent it as composed of vicious, sinful, and wicked people. But was anybody ever really wicked? Has there ever been anything in human nature beyond—or below—egotism, curiosity, the love of power, and the faculty of being bored? Psychology rather doubts it. Even otherwise, an abhorrence, real or affected, for what Mr Swinburne calls the roses and raptures of vice, is distinctly bourgeois. Quite so. As for sin, what is it, except what we think it, and does not what we think it depend on where we live?

Conceptions of sin vary with geography, occasionally with the weather, very often with the times. It is not so long ago that the hoop skirt was regarded as an invention of the devil. Next year or the year after it will be the fashion again. It is not so long ago that a man, when walking with a woman, offered her his arm. Now the woman would be considered indecent if she took it. It used to be the custom to drink claret after dinner. Now there is no claret fit to drink. But there are men who still offer an arm to women, precisely as there are others who drink chemistry and see no sinfulness in it.

The subject therefore, however considered, resolves itself into the point of view. Yet though a criterion escape, and with it a synonym, an autonym we possess. Catalogued as morality, we once, as already noted, defined it as consisting in improper thoughts of other people. In so defining it we have fancied ourselves wrong. But we won't any longer. For it is in those thoughts that sin resides. The most and the worst to be gathered concerning it is obtainable only from the small talk of the pure.

Purity being rumoured to be infrequent in society, it follows that there can be precious little sinfulness there. Apart from occasional lapses of taste there really is not much. For that matter, barring the nursery romps to which we have referred—barring, too, the uncertain arias from "Ernani" and "Faust"; barring, also, the golden calf, the perfection of millinery, the perfection of push, the perfection of cooks —there is not much of anything. Instead of being splendidly sinful the gilded gang is amazingly dull.

Yet, from afar, how it glitters! In view of which—in view, too, of the fact that admission to it is the dream of every imbecile—we know of no good and valid reason why, since we have reconciled ourselves to one definition, we should not reconcile ourselves to another, and again sum up society as the paradise of the pleb.

IV

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING AN EPICURE

There is a story, presumably untrue, and therefore all the more delightful, of an epicure who never went anywhere except to bed and the Maison Dorée. He got up, as a gentleman should, at four o'clock in the afternoon, proceeded to the Maison Dorée, and there, in devout meditation, prepared for the serious business of life—which is dining.

Whether or not the story be problematic, neither he nor any one else shall longer observe these rites. The Maison Dorée, the anti-penultimate resort of the gourmet, has fallen.

There is another story, one for the truth of which we can vouch, and which, therefore, is less inspiring, of a lady who went to Paris on her honeymoon, and who, returning there ages later, remarked that it had altered. "Yes, indeed," the poor thing added, with a sigh; "On ne suit plus les femmes."

That little amusement of the idler, together with the serious business of the epicure, used to constitute the supreme Parisian attractions. Over the subsidence of the amusement we have no tears to shed. The point is that the business is menaced. Long since the Frères Provençeaux departed. Vachette has gone. Véfour has vanished. Only in memory does Véry survive. Presently the Café Anglais will close, then Voisin will pass, and the last sanctuary of the high and radiant Muse of Savarin and of Brisse will have crumbled. Then, precisely as sculpture, painting, and the bel canto have declined, so will the art of cookery.

The contingency may seem unimportant. It is the reverse. In the art of cookery is the fate of nations.

For that aphorism we are indebted, not to our inner consciousness, but to President Loubet. In the course of a recent address M. Loubet remarked that the destinies of France were involved in the supremacy of her cooks. In default of a text he had a pretext: Germany has conquered France twice. First with her bayonets; latterly with her beer. The result being that, in the restaurants of Paris, where the high muse once reigned supreme, you to-day need an interpreter to tell you whether the dishes are Bavarian or Berlinese.

That is all wrong. Gastronomy is essentially eclectic. It admits every system, adopts every method, accepts every school, assimilates every theory. It is at once symbolist, Parnassian, romantic, and classic. Art has no frontiers. Gastronomy is, primarily, cosmopolitan. It may be French, Italian, Chinese, Russian, occasionally Spanish, but German — never! Never Bavarian. Never Berlinese.

German cookery is bad when it does not happen to be worse. In which respect it resembles our own. Yet that, perhaps, is libel. There is nothing viler than good, plain American fare.

No, nothing. A poet once sneered at us and said that we have a hundred religions, and but a single sauce—inferior at that, he might have added, and probably would have, had he thought. The oddity of it is that we did not get the sauce from Germany. Yet, from her refinements, and the lack of them, there is a hint that could be advantageously absorbed.

At the court of Hanover — to-day extinct — the king was graciously pleased to command that on the royal menus there should appear, conjointly with the dishes, the names of the artists by whom the dishes had been composed.

The king struck the proper note. Anonymity is advantageous to the critic, to the criminal, and to the cook. But not to the cordon bleu. A masterpiece should be signed.

A perfect dinner should resemble a concert. As the morceaux succeed each other, so, too, should the names of the composers. You may not care particularly to know what their names are, but they think you do. The idea gratifies them. It heightens their maestria, improves their technique, encourages them in the efforts of conception. It stimulates in them that noble pride which induced the immortal tragedy of the kitchen — the suicide of Vatel, unable to survive the dishonour of a plat manqué.

Those were the good old days. At one particularly delectable banquet there was produced a representation in wax work of the labour of a queen and the birth of a prince. At another Mount Ætna was served, with fireworks going off from the crater. For another there was prepared a middle dish of gods and goddesses eighteen feet high, yet which, to the righteous scorn of the artist, could not be set, because as he put it: "Monseigneur refused to have the ceiling heightened!"

These things were not, of course, intended to be eaten. The genius who had delighted your palate devised them to charm your eye. They were due perhaps, as all things are, to reminiscence. In days not better, but elder and more orgiac, the courses were served on platters so wide that they covered the tables. On these platters you encountered dormice cooked in honey, sea wolves flavoured with cinnamon, and occasionally a beautiful boar, from which, when carved, hot quinces fell and live thrushes flew.

There was magic in that. Or, perhaps, it would be more exact to say that there was a cheerful disregard of expense. The art of dining then was rather elaborate. Vitellius did not consider excessive for one meal a sum equivalent to fifteen thousand dollars. In four months Cæsar ran up a supper bill of twenty-five millions. We are not inventing that. It is all down somewhere. So, too, is the fact that the guests whom Heliogabalus entertained had set before them loaves of silver, puddings of gold. Before them, too, was a menu embroidered on the cloth—not a mere list of dishes, but pictures, drawn with the needle, of the dishes themselves, and, presently, when the precious jest in metal had been enjoyed, you were served with camels' heels, combs torn from living cocks, flamingoes' brains, nightingales' tongues, peas and amber, fig-peckers peppered with pearl dust, jewels in jelly. For napkins there were boys in whose curly hair you wiped your hands. For tobacco there were perfumes. For middle dishes there were live lions, properly secured, of course, but sometimes a stupid guest, not knowing that, fainted from fright. When the dinner was done panels in the ceiling opened and flowers fell, so many that now and then guests that had fainted were smothered.

Charles Lamb maintained that no woman who led a pure life would refuse an apple dumpling. Between the table of an emperor and the table talk of an essayist there is a gap which, if you please, we will bridge in a moment. The art of dining, as of writing, consists in graceful transitions. It is general ignorance of both which makes our literature so savour-less and our cooks so bad. So bad, that the late Mr Travers, on seeing, newly hung in his dining-room, the legend: "God Bless Our Home," exclaimed with enthusiasm, "Yes, indeed. God bless our home, and damn our cook." The latter, it is agreeable to assume, had produced an apple dumpling.

That is a dish for which, in epicurean Rome, a caitiff of a cook would not have been cursed merely, but crucified. The art of the entremets sucré was known in that sybarite city, and its traditions are still preserved by a few—a very few—Neapolitan chefs. But nowadays no one so much as sees sweets—real sweets, that is—except in the Orient and the eyes of their best beloved. The only other variety that can be comfortably assimilated is flattery. Of that the least among us can never have enough.

Other forms should be abolished. In their stead a little extravagance would be acceptable. A lot of it, for that matter. The more the merrier. Extravagance is highly poetic. So also is originality. Metropolitan dinners display neither. The dishes are the same. So also is the talk. Both are abysmally commonplace, utterly pot-au-feu. During these solemnities no hostess, however smart, has ever been witty enough to introduce a pig.

Why not? In all the wide realm of art there is nothing more ideally voluptuous. A pig, a properly nurtured pig, a pig whose parents have been fed on vipers and who has been bathed in tepid water twice a day, a pig, young, tender, and shy, is of delicacies the most chastely sensuous that has been given mortals to revere. To the perfect pig, particularly to the little pink darlings of the Montaches nursery, the table is but a second cradle, and to the epicure a sheer joy—a joy serene, equable, sedate, a joy wholly suave, quasi-paternal, a joy interpretable only by the hum of harps.

In lieu of which there is the inevitable redhead, or else the tiresome canvas-back that is appropriate but for junketing royalty, yet never the abiding beatitude that this little angel provides, and which, to the hum of harps, it not merely provides, but distils. Lacking the harps, the cherub should be served to the kiss of flutes, or better perhaps, to the accompaniment of the tenor's aria from the last act of "Lucia."

Then you have something fit.

For variation, the seraphic suckling may be replaced by a poularde truffée. It is not up to it. Yet, properly prepared by a poet, there you have a dish that should be eaten with genuflections. It is sacrosanct. The true epicure rises and bows to it. Then in silent emotion he begins. If he thinks of anything earthly it is of the preliminaries and transitions that have lifted him to this bliss.

In regard to anterior courses, we have, in our private practice, obtained excellent results from a potage crême d'Almond. You are requested not to read crême d'Amant. A spoonful or two of that passing into emptiness is like a rug of silk thrown on a naked floor. Then not terrapin — that horrid little mud-turtle, with its nasty sauce, is, like canvas-back, fit only for touring grand dukes—but a silver eel.

For entrée, we have found nothing the matter with truffles. Not the black, but the white. Brought, hermetically sealed in glass, from Piedmont, stewed for fifteen minutes in Sillery, then for fifteen more in Clos de Vougeot, and served like potatoes, in napkins, these things transport you to Devachan.

For relevé, a simple fillet of reindeer a trifle decomposed. Or, if that be impracticable, an amourette—pretty word, isn't it?—of lambkin to the tune, not of mint, which is ignoble, but of violets, which is divine.

There you have a nice little dinner.

In it there is, perhaps, a trace—the very faintest—of originality. There is, perhaps, a symptom or two of prodigality as well. Perhaps, also, there is just a suggestion of art. These condiments are essential. If you are not prodigal you may lead a pure life, but you will remain a poor host. If you are not original you may be a commendable citizen, but you will be always a bore. If you are not artistic you may be a devoted husband, yet never an epicure. It is highly important to be that. At the table of the epicure is the radiant presence of the muse.

Yet here, if you please, a hint may be serviceable. It takes two to eat a good dinner—the dinner and yourself. The number may be increased. But not indefinitely. A big dinner is a bad dinner. The bigger the dinner the worse it is. At a perfect dinner there should be an air of home. When more than twelve are gathered together that air evaporates. Eight is better. Four better yet. To four agreeably assorted people a perfect dinner resolves into the ideal. Here endeth the first lesson.

Here is the second: "Not too much of anything," said Epicurus, and, however prodigal you may naturally be, you must remember that. Lavishness should be manifest in the service, in the appointments, in the surprises of the chef, in the orchestras and aviaries behind the screens, but never in vulgar plenty. Leave all that to ignorant millionaires. The distinction of the gourmet resides in virtuosity, not in abundance. His table never groans. It chants canticles en sourdine, in the lilt of which you join. Provided, however, and on condition, that Eros be absent.

Eros and the muse never have, and never will, hit it off. The muse is jealous, and Eros distracting. The most agreeable men and women to have about you are those that have loved and are over it. To that end married couples are indicated. But in matters epicurean there is but one safe course: Se défier de l'amour en général et des femmes en cabinet particulier. Here endeth the second lesson.

The third concerns the wines. Among smart folk there is an abominable custom of serving nothing but champagne. Champagne is not a wine. It is a beverage, lighter indeed than brandy and soda, but, like cologne, fit only for demi-reps. Among smart folk you may, if you prefer, have mineral water instead. But not the best. Not Eau de Vals, for instance, or Rhenser, which is superior. But to the gourmet these indecencies do not matter. The gourmet does not drink at dinner. He does not drink before dinner. No gourmet has ever touched that nastiness that is called a cocktail. The cocktail poisons the palate. The epicure perfumes it.

The hour for that sacred rite arrives when the cloth has gone. Then there should be different wines. There is no harm in them whatever. There is an idea to the contrary, but in all matters stupidity is very generally diffused. The harm is not in different but in indifferent wines. In mistaking medicine for Madeira, for instance, or chemistry for claret.

"Claret for boys, port for men, but brandy for heroes," shouted Johnson, who was merely a boor. There is no port in any storm nowadays. There are no heroes either. But there is yet Rousillon, there is yet Château du Pape. There is also Rosenwein, which is the king of all wines and of which bastard varieties are presented with sonorous titles — Johannisberger, Yellow Seal — or Blue — from the Imperial Cellars, und so weiter etcetera, and so forth.

Of such syrupy turpitudes the epicure steers clear. But of Rousillon and of Rosenwein he will take a glass, two glasses, three perhaps, not more. Yet to further perfume the palate he may, if he can get it, gargle a thimble of Tokai Princesse, or, failing that, half a petit verre of mandarin liqueur. But nothing else. Niente, nada, nichts, rien. Nothing whatever. For he remembers Epicurus, whose life was one long hymn to asceticism, and he has forgotten the prayer: "O Lord, reliver us," for his own liver, at any age, is as good as Methuselah's must have been.

These rites accomplished, he rises not a drunken loon but a fighting cock, inspirited and prepared, if necessary, to administer the the affairs of state, to elevate humanity, and benefit man.

President Loubet is, therefore, quite right. His address contains a hint which we need. The supremacy of French cooks is, perhaps, nonsense. But there is no nonsense about the relation between destiny and gastronomics. If more were thought of the latter not only would more be thought, but thought would be less parochial.

Are we wrong, Vatel? Shade of Carême, have we erred?

V

THE SEVENTH DEVIL OF OUR LADY

WOMEN who neglected certain proprieties used to be stoned. For that matter, they are still. But more often than not the stones come from Bond Street. Then, too, the proprieties are not what they were. Originally they must have been quite simple. To-day conceptions of them are tolerably mixed. They vary with the latitude and even with the architecture. In Mayfair and along Fifth Avenue observance of them is an afterthought. In the slums they are a compromise with the police. The Middle Classes are rumoured to have lumped them into a fetish which they call Etiquette.

What that may mean we do not know and refuse to be informed. Erudition is not in our line. But, summarily, the proprieties may be taken as representing that which you expect from your neighbour. Yet, of course, not that which your neighbour is permitted to expect from you. Otherwise everybody would be of the same mind on the subject, and we should all know What's What.

The fact that we do not all know is sufficiently obvious and equally deplorable as well. But it has its excuse. The proprieties lack a criterion. There is no solvent by which an action can be resolved into right or wrong. Guizot tried to find one and failed. In the course of solemn platitudes spawned through interminable pages he stated with perfect philistinism that the obligations to avoid wrong and cleave to right were laws as much acknowledged by man in his proper nature as are the laws of logic. Yet though he had the gift of producing phraseology as nauseous as that, for the life of him he could not devise a distinction. To give him his due, though, the difficulty that he omitted to remove he was tidy enough to conceal.

Aristotle was quite as circumspect. He stated that it does not depend on ourselves to be good or wicked. The information may be consoling, but it is hardly helpful. Neither is the scholastic corollary that every being acts according to his essence. It is the same idea divested of its clarity. Nor are we aided by repetitions of the Goethean aria: "Du bist am Ende was du bist." For there we get it again in German. On lines such as these the test is obscure. They promise but do not fulfil. Every silver lining has its cloud.

Here, though, is a break in it. Descartes, who, if we may believe all that we hear, taught of two substances, mind and matter, precisely as if he had seen and counted them, could, Madame de Staël has said, distinguish between right and wrong as readily as between blue and yellow. But is abuse evidence? Besides, women are sad gossips. Hell is paved with their tongues. Moreover, when the remark was made Descartes was too dead to defend himself against any accusation of omniscience.

Yet everything being possible, and assuming that the lady told the truth, in what did this power exist? Surely it was not Madame de Staël's intention to represent Descartes as being so wise that he knew, did he go home late and intoxicated, he would set a bad example to his baby sister, for common-sense could have told him that. Nor could she have meant that Descartes' ability to discriminate consisted in believing that whatever he said was right and whoever disagreed with him was wrong, for there is nothing unique in that: it is what we all do. Oui, monsieur, vous aussi.

Perhaps, then, what the lady meant—presupposing that she meant anything and also that she told the truth—was that Descartes knew What's What. If this supposition be correct we have only to inquire what is what, and at once the distinction between right and wrong becomes approachable and the mystery of the proprieties is dissolved.

To do that we have but to determine what attracts, what repels, and then co-ordinate their contradictories. Nothing could be simpler. But here a loop is needful.

Clergymen to whom it has been our privilege to listen have, according to their fervour and grammar, denounced with more or less ability this vice and that, forgetful, or perhaps unaware, that the root of all evil is not original sin but commonplace jealousy. Beside that seventh devil the others that were projected into the swine of the Gadarenes must have been beneficent sprites. Eliminate it from the scheme of things and war would lapse, greed as well, discord ditto, and harmony reign. In lieu of the rivalries and strikes, divorces and dances, libels and races; instead of the failures and festivities and all the seductions, surprises, and general surreptitiousness that we read about in the papers, there would be nothing to read about at all, and society, through sheer calm, would develop obesity of the mind.

However satisfactory that might be, jealousy is not to be eliminated. It is part and parcel of human nature. Regarded in the abstract it is the woof of every crime. Regarded in the concrete it is a tribute to our virtues. Specifically considered it is the Seventh Devil of Our Lady.

In cataloguing it as such studies and statistics have necessarily made us aware that a jealous woman can be very tiresome to a man. But statistics and studies have made us equally aware that when she is not jealous it is of the man she is tired.

Jealousy is the barometer of a woman's heart. When its manifestations subside her temperature is falling. When it departs she is packing her boxes, she is preparing to follow. For it is the corollary of her love to doubt, to doubt always, to doubt in certainty, to doubt in conviction, to doubt with every possible evidence of constancy under her nose. The heart has logic that logic does not recognise. Then also, though constancy may be obvious, fidelity is not necessarily so clear. Constancy may demonstrate nothing more than lack of opportunity, but fidelity always demonstrates a lack of imagination. And of the vagaries of the imagination a lady may be, and indeed should be, more jealous than of anything else. Faces fade, but dreams abide.

There is, though, jealousy and jealousy. There is a jealousy that comes of a lack of confidence in another. There is a jealousy far more discreet and infinitely more delicate that comes of a lack of confidence in oneself. To the student of pathology either form is interesting, but on condition that the patient is in skirts. A male patient may, of course, be interesting also, but not more so than any other dog in the manger. The story of Othello and Desdemona is a case in point.

There was a couple admirably mated. The one had no manners and the other no small talk.

In spite of which, or perhaps precisely on that account, their adventures are quite endearing. According to Shakespeare, Othello, not content with being a blackamoor, made a fuss, raised the roof, and smothered Desdemona with it. Shakespeare described the lady as entirely immaculate. Even had she been otherwise, the proceeding was, to say the least, in bad taste. A man of decent breeding never sees or hears anything that is not intended for him. Moreover, had any smothering seemed necessary, it was himself he should have asphyxiated. Yet bad taste always leads to crime, and to such vulgar forms of it at that. Nowadays, of course, men do not murder their wives, at anyrate in polite society. But some of them do worse. They institute uncivil proceedings. There are, though, others of finer sensibilities who collaborate with their dear departed in an effort to observe the amenities of life, while agreeing that individual tastes shall suffer no interference. C'est d'un pur.

Shakespeare to the contrary, we have reason to suspect that Othello was a man of just that highmindedness. Shakespeare, it will be remembered, made the brute a Moor. Personally, we do not know much about Moors, but for purposes dramatic we assume that anything, even to goodness, may, at a pinch, be expected of them. It now appears that Othello was not a Moor but a patrician. Indifference is a patrician trait. Of that, however, more by-and-by. The point is the sudden discovery that Othello was less black than he was painted. Les Maures vont vite.

The discovery came about in this fashion. Recently a palace situated in that quarter of Venice, known as the San Maria Formosa, was demolished. From the rafters documents fell. Collected and collated, it was found that they contained a chronicle of the final years of Venetian dominion over Candia. It was found, too, that in them Don Othello was mentioned as the last governor of the island. It was found, also, that he was a man of rank. The documents, continuing, showed that after his marriage to Desdemona they proceeded to Candia; that later, the island being besieged by the Turks, Desdemona returned alone to Venice; that there she met another, a dearer one yet, a third, perhaps a fourth; that in each instance sa forte fut sa faiblesse; that ultimately, Candia having fallen also, Othello supervened; that undonesquely he beat her, subsequently concluded to die, and that for years thereafter the consolable Desdemona resided in that casa on the Grand Canal which to-day every gondolier points out with an "Ecco!"

These facts, disencumbered for the purposes of the present paper from layers of detail, were not long since given to the world by the official who in Italy occupies the position of Minister of Instruction. Although they are too good to be true, we will assume that they are exact—all, indeed, except the undonesque greeting which Desdemona received, for that, if the other facts be accepted, seems highly problematic. Our reasons for so regarding it are brief.

The gossip about Desdemona originally appeared in a now forgotten novel. Cinthio, the author of it, was an early Bourget, an earlier Balzac. For literary purposes he went about here and there collecting scandals, which he set up in black and white. In default of linen from his neighbour sometimes he washed his own. In a pretty woman he saw not her eyes but a plot, and from her heart he proceeded to dig it. It was in the observance of this process that the story of Desdemona appeared. That the author was acquainted with her husband is presumable, but whether he collaborated with the young woman in any of her inconsequences we may surmise yet never know. According to his story, however, Othello was a brave young soldier of colour, the glitter of whose exploits awoke Desdemona's love and won for him the command of the Candian troops. The two are married and embark for the post. With them go an ensign and a corporal. The ensign makes up to the lady. He is repulsed. The emotions she has inspired addle into rage. The ensign recites to Othello that his bride is an abandoned creature and that the corporal is assisting in her abandon. Othello bribes him to kill the corporal. The ensign slashes the poor devil in the leg. Then Othello takes a hand; he takes a sand-bag, too, and pounds the lady with it until she gives up the ghost.

Barring the climax, which we assume to be literary, the rest of the story coincides tolerably well with the documents recently found. But here is the objection. Cinthio's novel appeared in 1565. Shakespeare's rendition of it was produced in 1604. The capture of Candia occurred in 1669. As a consequence, if, as we assume, the facts produced by the Minister of Instruction are exact, Othello on his return from Candia could not have been less than one hundred and twenty-five, and Desdemona must have been at least a hundred and ten. At an age so mature one may fancy that all her wild oats had been sown, and, even otherwise, Othello must have been too feeble to beat her and too indifferent to care.

Indifference is a great aid to the maintenance of the proprieties. It is more conducive to harmony than anything we can cite. It is, as we have noted, a trait quite patrician. Obviously then, however young or old the Othello recently discovered may have been, he would have patricianly neglected to see or hear anything that was not intended for him, and by the same token he would have omitted to raise the roof. In order to induce him to do so both novelist and playwright were forced to twist him into a Moor, and as such capable of jealousy that a patrician might feel but not exhibit. Jealousy is the basis of every affection, whether maternal, paternal, filial, sororal, connubial, or even patrician. It is, therefore, a natural emotion. In the case of a woman it is not merely natural, it is occasionally attractive. But emotions that may be attractive in women are always repellent in men.

Here then, at once, if our illustrations have been serviceable, we are back again in the contradictories from which we started. The deductions that ensue follow almost of themselves. For it must be patent that, whether or not Desdemona was lacking in certain circumspections, whether or not Othello was jealous; whether, indeed, as may have been and probably was the case, the lady herself was possessed of the seventh devil and through the process of its manifestations drove Othello first to drink and then to derision, in any event, their reciprocal attitudes were not conducive to harmony.

Harmony is that which always has appealed and always will appeal to civilisation. It is Nature's first law, the truest of her vocables. In the form of Beauty, which is its outward and visible sign, it has been an object of worship since worship began. Its exponents were singers and seers. It was Harmony that Hermes taught, it was beauty that the Buddha preached. Civilisation is in love with it and at odds with discord.

If, therefore, our deductions be worth a row of pins, it follows that the test of an action is its beauty or the lack of it, that according as it conduces to harmony or discord, according as it is capable of attracting or repelling, so is it moral or the reverse. In view of these premises it becomes permissible to transfer virtue from ethics to esthetics and to regard the proprieties as functions of art.

And why not? Life, as conducted to-day, is at its best either ridiculously vulgar or snobbishly absurd. Society, which used to sin and sparkle, now simply sins. There is modern progress for you, and a progress induced wholly by a misunderstanding of What's What, complicated by the presence of that seventh devil, from which all evil proceeds.

VI

DE L'AMOUR

It is said of somebody somewhere that he became Poet Laureate because he lived on very good terms with his wife. That is certainly poetic. So also is the result. It constitutes a fine case of what a boulevardier might—if he thought of it—describe as lauriat mediocritas. Moreover, it shows, or seems to show, that connubial virtues are more estimable than literary sins. That is quite as it should be. But the converse of the proposition is equally true. Domestic difficulties are preferable to halting hexameters. The world is filled with good husbands. Good verse is more scant. For that matter, the better the verse the worse the husband. An ideal spouse would be both a perfect lover and a perfect poet. But no mere mortal has succeeded in being both, for any length of time at least; and very naturally too. The Muse is highly jealous. The task of serving two masters is nothing to having two mistresses on your hands.

These views have, we fear, a false air of originality. But we claim no copyright on them. They have been running about the bookshelves ever since books were shelved. Said Michelangelo: "Art is wife enough for me." Said Flaubert: "However refractory the Muse may be, she is better than any woman." Said Bacon: "Matrimony is an impediment to great enterprises." Kant, Newton, Beethoven, Descartes, Spinoza, Leibnitz, Gibbon, Macaulay, Handel, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Camoëns, Voltaire, Cavour, and Mr Dooley appear to have agreed with him. In such fine company we may not presume to intrude. But we are quite sure that there are plenty of people who long for heaven, if for no other reason than because there is no marrying or giving in marriage there. We have not a doubt but that while Mrs Carlyle was among us she felt pretty much that way too. We have not a doubt but that Mrs Donizetti did also. For Donizetti used to get very indignant at that lady, which was not philosophic, and occasionally beat her, which was certainly not polite. Even so, the exercise must have been good for him. One day, five minutes after laying her out, he composed the "Tu che a Dio," an aria which a seraph might envy—the most bewitching in the entire Italian repertory, and which anyone who has heard the last act of "Lucia" will recall. Exercise of a similar nature Byron took with his little Guiccioli, and with proper poetic results. One of the liveliest scenes in "Les Trois Mousquetaires" was evolved by Dumas just after he had torn hair by the handful from the head of a young person who honoured him with her affection. "Were her tears but pearls," he announced, "I would make a necklace of them."

These incidents happened a long time ago, and fail to stir us very deeply. They do not demonstrate much, either, and what they do it would not be honest to print. But, in conjunction with others, they lead us to assume a few little things; for instance, that had Petrarch got as close to Laura as he wished, he would have maltreated her, or the Muse would have maltreated him. We assume, with equal ease, that had Beatrice been a reality instead of a dream, the world would be minus a volume or two of good verse. We assume, with equal readiness, that had the affairs of Ariosto been as immaterial, the world would be plus a volume or two which it lacks.

"The position of lover," said Byron, "is not a sinecure." Nor is it. There are times and occasions when it is hard labour. It is a position suited only to the mentally idle. In the life known as cerebral it stultifies when it does not wreck. Consider Sappho. Because a little mucker preferred another mouth to hers she killed herself. And consider Antony. Because of a viper of the Nile he flung away the sovereignty of half the world. Abélard should have known better than to behave as he did. On the other hand, had he omitted to, his name would be the echo of nothing and that of Héloïse be lost. Such is fame.

Such, too, is the fame of Tasso. His verse is less interesting than his woes. The latter were quite poignant. Goethe wrote a play about them, Donizetti an opera, and Delacroix added a picture. The picture represents the poet in prison. That is a fine place for a gentleman. But Tasso, instead of confining himself, as he should have done, to the raising of anapests and rime amorose, found, in the wide leisures of the court of Ferrara, nothing better to do than to make up to Leonore of Este. The lady did not object. On the contrary. But her brother, the Duke of Ferrara, did. By way of putting a stop to the proceedings he had Tasso tossed into a madhouse. Whether or not the honour of the lady was at stake is a detail, immaterial at that. There are women who discredit virtue in affecting to possess it. We have not a doubt that Leonore was one of them. Even so, and even otherwise, we do not blame the duke. We have noted before, and perhaps may be permitted to note again, that there is nothing so perversive as a young poet, except an old one.

How perversive Tasso succeeded in becoming we may surmise and never know. What we do know is that he got what he deserved. He ought to have left all that sort of thing to her. In the case of an ordinary individual we should, of course, strum a different guitar. Ordinary individuals are free to do as they like, and be hanged to them. But the thinker has a mission. For the furtherance of that mission every extraneous desire and each subsidiary whim should be locked in cages, where, for the fun of the thing, now and then he may be permitted to go and see how they are. Women should be to him the joujoux they used to be and not the objets de luxe they have become. Better still, he should have everything, even to sex, in his brain.

Seraglios are delightful to read about and particularly to write about, but to live in them must be deadly dull. Personally, we have never tried it. It is true we have lacked the opportunity. Otherwise we should doubtless jump at the chance. But then, thank the Lord, we have no mission. It is a great thing to be an ordinary individual. Le métier de poëte laisse à désirer. Just how much the business of poet leaves to be desired it would take the ghost of Tasso to tell, of de Musset, too, of Byron as well. There are three whom the love of woman has led from deserts of disgust into oases of ennui. There are three whose genius women have slaughtered. It is only that we may not seem to know more than we do that we refrain from citing three hundred. Yet, while we are at it, there is a case so pertinent, so recent, and so picturesque, that it would be a shame to let it go. Here it is.

During the Third Empire a young man appeared at the Tuileries. Eugénie kissed him, and in the process declared him to be the handsomest prince in the world. At the compliment the young man blushed, and blushed still more at the embrace. His name was Ludwig. By profession he was king. In addition, he followed the entirely genteel avocation of lover. But en amateur merely. He had yet to learn that the art of loving and the art of being loved are separate and distinct. It was his cousin who taught him. This young woman, afterwards Duchesse d'Alençon, lived in the heart of a Bavarian forest. A poet who chanced to encounter her there has related that he mistook her for a sylph—one of those enchanting apparitions that dwelt in dim green woods and long German ballads, and whom princes used to woo. Ludwig mistook her for a saint. To err, poets and princes are liable alike.

There is, a thinker announced, as much mud in the upper classes as in the lower, only, he added, in the former it is gilded. In the case of the young woman Ludwig appears to have discovered the mud, but with the gilt off and the guilt on. Yet not, of course, at once. Meanwhile the girl intended no wrong, and that, perhaps, because she never would have considered wrong anything she wished to do. Moreover, she was very pretty, and pretty girls have more incentives than those who are not. Then, too, she had another excuse. It had been predicted that she would be burned alive. No one believes much in predictions unless Time comes along and verifies them. In her case Time did. A few years ago she was caught in the fire that occurred in the Paris Bazaar. With a fate such as that before her it may be she tried to make the most of the worst. If the supposition be correct, her success was remarkable. She ruined her life and that of her lover as well.

Ludwig looked as if he had stepped from a fairy tale. As he looked he acted. He charmed peasants and empresses. He suggested romance incarnate and enthroned. These suggestions his cousin lived to see him change into realities. She lived to see him dot the country he ruled with palaces of enchantment. She lived, too, to see him hide himself in them. She lived to see the handsomest prince in the world change into a bloated sot. She lived to realise that it was her work, and, so realising, perhaps was glad to die. For, if not a saint, at least she was human. When ultimately, in cups of champagne strained through violets, he tried to drown his reason, she lost her own. Subsequently, as noted, she lost her life. It may be that it was fate that felled her, yet in that case it is a pity that fate was so slow. Had it but throttled her in the cradle, or smothered her in the green and quiet of the slumbrous wood, Europe might have enjoyed the spectacle of an ideal king reigning ideally. But the discovery that the girl who had imparadised his heart was no better than the law allows transformed Lohengrin into Hamlet. He turned his back on her, and incidentally on the world. There developed within him a horror of being seen. At Munich a mechanical device enabled him to be served by invisible hands. When he drove it was at night. Now and again he disappeared entirely. No one knew where he was. Infrequently he received at dinner. The guest whom he preferred was Louis XIV. With him he was quite at home. The royal phantom came and went at his bidding. Yet that which pleased him most was to stroll, crowned and sceptred, through the splendidly lighted halls of Herrenchiemsee and people the empty rooms with the great poets and princes of the past. With these, too, he was at home and every inch the king, King of the Kingdom of Beauty and of Dreams—of Chastity, too, for never once was the mystic music with which he flooded those mystic halls broken by the discord of a woman's voice. His cousin had cured him of that. Et voilà ce que c'est que l'Amour.

After the episode with this lady the life of Ludwig of Bavaria was a long anachronism, but a very beautiful one, marred only by the insanity that overtook him in the end. That insanity was in the family. His brother is mad as a hatter, and his grandfather lost over Lola Montez the few wits that he had. Behind these people, back through the chronicles of the House of Wittelsbach, there are chapters choked with crime, scenes smeared with sin, a story of calamity singularly straight, one in which other descendants, notably the Empress of Austria and her son Rudolph, had their undoubted share. For the purposes of this paragraph it would be convenient to assume that there is a curse on the clan. And if there be, that curse is love. In any event, it is the cause of their dementia. But then, apart from gold, is not love the cause of every folly that has occurred since the days when, for Helen's sake, the war of the world was fought? Truly, when you come to sit down and think it over, or even, as we do, stand up and dictate, the panorama of unhallowed disasters that unrolls does not make one much in love with love.

Yet though, like gold, it has its defects; like gold, too, it has its charms. Every reputable writer has denounced it and disreputably enjoyed all he could get. To say one thing and mean something else happens to all, even to the best. But the main point about it, and which, as such, we have left to the last, is the fact that concerning it doctors disagree. That, however, is natural enough. Love has a hundred symptoms, a thousand phases. It may come at first sight—which does not mean second sight. It may come from propinquity and also from the lack of it. The less we see of people the more delightful they appear. It may come of curiosity, which is the instinct of self-improvement. It may come of sympathy, which is the pleasure we take in the unhappiness of someone else. It may come of antipathy, for in every affection there is the germ of hate. It may come of mutual attraction. That is very common. It may come of natural selection. That is very rare.

Natural selection presupposes a discernment that leads a man through mazes of women to one woman in particular, to the woman who to him is the one woman in all the world, to the woman who has been awaiting him and who recognises him when he comes. And it is just because the process is exceptional that doctors disagree, husbands and wives also, sweethearts and swains as well, poets and princesses too. Therein lies the root of the disasters that it has given us a real pleasure to relate. It is, indeed, a pleasant subject. But it is one that would have perplexed Euclid, and for all we know to the contrary, doubtless did. The more abundantly it is written about the more abundant does ignorance appear. For love is one of those phenomena which elude exact knowledge. A huckster of phrases thought he summed it up in defining it as the Why and Wherefore of Creation. Another huckster nauseatingly labelled it the sweetest shape of pain.

Everything being possible, it may be either and even both. Yet studies and statistics have rather inclined us to the theory that, apart from pathological conditions, love is either the affection of somebody else or else the fusion of two egotisms, the contact of two epiderms, the tragedy of those that lack it, the boredom of those that don't, and in this country the prime incentive to matrimony, which also studies and statistics have led us to regard as three months of adoration, three months of introspection, and thirty years of toleration, with the children to begin it all over anew. Et voilà ce que c'est que l'Amour.

VII

THE TOILET OF VENUS

BRUMMEL liked his smartness unperfumed. "The linen of a man of fashion smells, sir," said he, "but of the open." The remark, a paradox then, has become a platitude since. As with men of fashion, so with women. Cologne water has been abandoned to ladies' maids and extracts double-distilled to shop-girls. To-day the most modish perfume is health. The next best is a suspicion of orris. Occasionally one encounters a suggestion of lilacs that are far away. The farther away the better. In smart life these represent the gamut. Anything more florid jars. In Brummel's day, and during its many morrows, the use which fine people made of patchouli was nothing less than dissolute. They had a love for millefleurs which we can only qualify as depraved. The epoch has gone, thank fortune, and may it never return. It was a matter of taste, no doubt, but it was all so bad. The farther back memory wanders the worse it gets.

Consider the lilies of the field! There is a spectacle simple and sedate. Its elements do not figure in the perfumery of Judæa. Said Solomon: "My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of Engedi." A cluster being insufficient, he added a mountain of myrrh, a hill of frankincense, an orchard of pomegranates, spikenard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon. The beloved became a conservatory—sultry, sticky, and soporific at that, and yet, we assume, entirely symbolic. Even so the beloved was alluring beside the vision which Muhammad evoked.

Hell is certainly paved with women's tongues. But Paradise, as mapped in the Koran, is floored with musk. It is with musk that houris are garmented. That, however unnatural, is natural enough. Muhammad, afflicted with hysteria muscularis—the only disease, parenthetically, which ever founded a religion—intercepted in his hallucinatory trances, and afterward detained, reminiscences of anterior worship. In days when the world went slower the young altars of the old gods were splendid with aromatics. At the shrines of long ago, in the temples of Bel, in the crypts of Memphis, in the sanctuaries of Jerusalem, everything sacred was scented. Perfumes, it was believed, not merely pleasured the gods; it was believed that they were tokens of their presence. Witness Aphrodite. However humid her breast may be with the salt of the sea, always she brings with her a whiff of ambrosia. So it was with Isis. The atmosphere in which she dwelt was charged by her divinity with fragrance. In appealing to her perfume and prayer mounted conjointly, and the more readily because of the conjunction.

The circumstance is worth noting. It elucidates obscurities of Muhammad, of Solomon, too, and helps to an understanding of the real significance of perfumes. But we will come to that in a minute. Meanwhile we may offer a conundrum: What were the charms of Circe? Ovid told, but his work, like many another, was turned into palimpsests. There let it rest. We have something as good. It is a treatise by Apollonius, a historian of whom we know so little that it is idle to attempt to know less. Yet what we don't know of him he knew of Circe. The witcheries of the wicked enchantress were entirely apothecary. It was the old lady's habit to apply to each part of the body a different variety of unguent. The effect, novel in itself, delighted Ulysses, and, surviving the years, became fashionable in less legendary life.

Smart Athenians perfumed the hair with marjoram and the brows with an essence of apples. The arms were rubbed with mint, the knees with ground ivy. Baccaris, an extract of crocus, was put on the soles of the feet, and rhubarb on the fingers. They used these things, others as well. They painted the face with white lead, the lips with alkanet, the eyelids with kohl, and the nails with henna. The recipes, regarded as common property, were inscribed on marble in the temples of Æsculapius. The custom is citable. Fine folk wished not merely to look fine; they wished everybody to look fine also.

The wish was not limited to them. It preoccupied the legislature.

At that time a woman who presumed to be out of the fashion, whose peplon, for instance, did not hang right in the back, or whose general appearance was not modish, there and then became a disturber of the peace, and as such liable to a fine, which varied, with degrees of slatternliness, from ten to a thousand drachmæ. Those, indeed, were the good old days.

There were others, however, particularly in Rome, where individual smartness was loved as never before and, except sporadically, as never since. Perfumes there were not limited to the person. The tunics of men of fashion were elaborately scented. So, also, were their baths, their beds, their horses, their dogs, and the walls of their houses. Melinum was one of the odours most in favour. Made of quinces, it came in three forms—liquid, solid, and powdered. There were yet richer perfumes. One much affected in high life consisted of twenty-seven ingredients, and cost, in our money, about a hundred dollars a pound. Nothing earthly would induce us to have a grain of it about us.

Another scent was saffron. As an essence it streamed through entertainments. At dinners where guests lay, fanned by boys whose curly hair they used for napkins, a preparation of it was found serviceable in neutralising the fumes of wine. Perfumes then offered possibilities in debauches, in cruelty, too, with which, unhappily, we are unacquainted. Caligula spent a fortune on unguents. He waded in them. Such was the joy of Nero at the death of his wife that he had more incense burned than Arabia could reproduce in a decade. Heliogabalus asked a lot of people to dinner, and from panels in the ceiling had such masses of aromatics fall on them that before they could escape they were smothered. We are not making this up. The carouse is down in Lampridus. It is true. he may have invented it; but that we doubt. Lampridus was not imaginative, and Heliogabalus was. That painted boy, who looked like a dissolute girl, and who, to the Romans, contrived to be both emperor and empress, had perfumes that were poisons. He got them from the curious East, whence he came.

The odour of one of them perverted the imagination, stained the thoughts, and depraved the mind. It turned conceptions of wrong into right and made the unholy adorable. It set men mad and made women hide themselves in the Tiber. It smelled as purple looks. In certain seraglios and ceremonies of the Orient it is rumoured to be detectable still. But we must not believe every thing we hear. In any event, it is not used on Fifth Avenue. That, though, is a detail. The point is that there never was a place so scented as the splendid city of the Cæsars. Not merely did men, women, and animals come in for their share, but the victorious standards of the victorious legions, which dripped with blood, dripped, too, with perfume. The purple sails of the jewelled galleys were perfumed. In the colossal delight of the amphitheatre, where, beneath a canopy of spangled silk, a thousand musicians answered the roar of beasts and the cries of the multitude with the kiss of flutes, the hum of harps, and the blare of brass, at stated intervals there rained from the terraces showers of saffron, of cinnamon, and myrrh. Those, too, may be catalogued among the good old days.

It was during them that Venus managed to be, if not at her best, not quite at her worst. In years subsequent and sedater her toilet became more substantial, yet we entertain a suspicion that what it gained in texture it lost in grace. The perfumes that she trailed through Rome were not lasting. They faded with the click-clack of her sandals. It took the Moors to detain them. The Moors invented a number of things—how to whip Spain, how to make rhymes, how to play checkers, how to give serenades, how to do algebra, how to set clocks, and how to extract and preserve perfumes by means of distillation.

The process was performed with an alembic, which means a still. But that bit of erudition need not alarm. It has a false air of learning which is not in our line. We have no pedantic familiarity with this subject or, for that matter, with any other. We are able, at most, to recall that perfumery, as understood to-day, began just about then, and that the fragrance of it was first noticed when Salahaddin flooded the floor of Omar's mosque with rose-water.

The odour passed with the Crusaders through Europe. Its vogue was immediate. Venus promptly utilised it in her finger-bowl, where it must have been serviceable, for the fork had not yet come, and when it did was regarded as a piece of great foppery. But that, too, has a false air of learning which we despise. In order that we may not seem to know more than we do, we will just note that so grew the daintiness of the lady that presently she had perfumed gloves, perfumed candles, perfumed bellows, perfumed pillows, and with them, we take it, perfumed dreams. If the latter resembled the rest of her batterie de cuisine, they must have been nasty enough. They must have been heavy, cloying, and bitterly sweet. Perfumery she had, but not perfumes. Even so, she was better off than she had been for a long time past.

In those dismal ages society stank vilely. The very select used balsams instead of baths. The less select used neither. In "Much Ado About Nothing" Pedro says of Benedick: "Nay, he rubs himself with civet." And the deduction follows: "The sweet youth's in love."

This, of course, occurred in days semi-fabulous and wholly barbaric. In a later and more neighbourly epoch taste ran to what was called the essence pot—"amber, musk, and bergamot, eau de chypre, eau de luce, sanspareil, and citron juice." The taste became a subject of legislation. A trifle over a century ago an Act of Parliament declared that "all women, of whatever age, rank, profession, or degree, that shall impose, seduce, and betray into matrimony any of His Majesty's subjects by the use of paint, false hair, false teeth, iron stays, bolstered hips, or scents, shall incur the penalty of the law in force against witchcraft and like misdemeanours, and the marriage, upon conviction, shall stand null and void."

And quite right, too. Divorce we have always regarded as the mother-in-law of invention, and we can imagine no better ground for separation than the use of scents. Beside them iron stays and bolstered hips are charmful. In the hair of the Beloved—not Solomon's, but ours—there is a fetching freshness. We like it best when blown by the wind of the ocean. The smell on her of brine and of seaweed is more captious to us than was musk to Muhammad. When from the woodlands she returns, her frock redolent of the breath of brooks, of the odour of acorns, and the clean, cool smell of under-grass grown overgreen, we could sit down and write—and even stand up and dictate—a sonnet.

The smoke of the small black shavings that come, or are supposed to come, from the Vuelta Abajo, endears her to us also. A pretty mouth seems to us a pretty place for a cigarette. The use of it by no means betokens the fast woman. Fast women try so hard to appear respectable that they would not smell of tobacco for a farm. It is a mistaken idea to the contrary which preserves middle-class femininity from its lure. We hope this paper will not enlighten them. We are not here to educate their taste. To pass from them to the Beloved: most does she imparadise the heart when on the saddle she has managed to accumulate the emanations of the fields and hedges over which she has shot. Beside her, then, a nosegay of the essences that bloom on Bond Street seem cheap and meretricious. On such occasions she suggests nothing so much as a human flower—a jasmine in flesh and blood.

That is what we call perfume in its perfection. It has but one higher stage. Before entering it a prelude may be of use.

There are a baker's dozen of problems, all of which look very simple, and which it is conveniently supposed were solved long ago. So they were. But the solutions have not a leg to stand on. For instance there is the toilet of Venus. Ask any scientist why it is that with every evocation of the goddess come gusts of ambrosia, and if you pin him down he will give it up. Scholars are readier. They can cite Homer. But Homer is descriptive, not explanatory. Yet for every effect there is a cause. This is not an exception. Solomon intercepted it. So, too, did Muhammad. We who are less agile know Elysium, Heaven, and Paradise to be the same place with a different name. Ideas of it vary with peoples and prophets. But though creeds confuse, though they change, too, as climates do, there is one conception common to all. It is that humanity has fallen from a higher estate and that ideals are but reminiscences of what we once beheld when we were other than what we are.

Assuming the conception to be correct, we enter with it into a more intimate understanding of the toilet of Venus than science and scholarship have been able to provide. For with it, hand in hand, comes a clue to the problem of perfumes. However much the latter may be out of fashion now, they have their reason and their rhyme. Everything has. The purpose of centipedes and critics is not entirely clear. The purpose of jellyfish and bores is not obvious either. But they were not put here without an object. As with them, so with the rose. Its patent of nobility is to be useless. It charms, indeed, but it seems to have no other scheme of existence. In the lap of nature it lolls, lovely and enigmatic. But Solomon, who was a seer, and Muhammad, who was a medium, divined its meaning. Their joint love of perfume was due to an intuition that in the ethereal hereafter it is on the odours of flowers that spirits subsist.

It is for this reason that the young altars of the old gods were splendid with aromatics. It is for this reason that everything sacred was scented. It is for this reason, because, like ideals, perfumes are reminiscences of the divine. In an ancient geography it is written that beyond Astomia dwell beings who live on the scent of the rose. Astomia should not be confounded with the Astoria. Beyond it means beyond the tomb. Even so, the customs of the next world are not suited to the Waldorf. When society was more primitive, and consequently nearer its anterior state, perfumes, however pungent, were permissible, and, for that matter, praiseworthy, too. To-day the Beloved no longer suggests a cluster of camphire. From Aphrodite, as she deigns to appear to us, every trace of ambrosia has gone. She smells of fresh cambric and fresh air. She is pretty as a peach and, parenthetically, just about as witty, but she doesn't go to the apothecary for unguents now. She perfumes, herself with health, occasionally with virtue. She leaves essences to maids, extracts to shop-ladies, and, unless she had a dictionary handy, she could not spell patchouli to save her life.

So do customs change, fashions, too, and with them the Toilet of Venus.

THE QUEST OF PARADISE

THERE are people who charm at sight. There are others who produce sites that charm. There are even some who do both. Dr Lucas is one of them. We never heard of him before, and already we have learned to love him. Dr Lucas is an associate of the Geological Survey. As such he has announced a grand discovery. He has succeeded in locating the Garden of Eden. For reasons sufficient to him, and therefore good enough for anybody, he designates Luzon as the spot. Here, or rather there, is the First Family's Midway Plaisance. Here, too, is not merely a grand discovery but a sort of national thanksgiving. In acquiring the Philippines we have annexed Paradise. What have the anti-imperialists to say to that?

The discovery is of a nature to interest them precisely as it must interest everybody; yet particularly, perhaps, Mr Thomas Cook and Mr

Baedeker. Should the site be accepted as exact, we assume without effort that one of these gentlemen will prepare round-trip tickets, and the other the obvious guide-book. The Story of the Fall, which Mr Baedeker is sure to intercalate among the usual Hints to Travellers, will, for many, have the force and flavour of a new scandal. The doctrine of Original Sin, expounded in the appendix, all conscientious Sunday editors will seize upon as a feature. It will be new to them also.

Yet the delights of the guide-book, however manifold, will pale beside the pleasures in store for the tourist. Fancy the sensations which the most satiated of globe trotters will experience on beholding a tree which is certified to be that of Good and Evil! Fancy, too, the travellers' tales of those who have vacated the Gates! Possibilities such as these are too good to be true. According to Moses, or, more exactly, according to scholastic interpretations of his statements on the subject, Paradise was situated in a garden of gold, of bdellium, and of onyx. Arminius put it in a clear conscience. Villon in the eyes of the well-beloved. Dr Lucas has put it on the map. There is the ideal, or rather, there is progress.

Others, though, have been as progressive. Consider, for instance, the Canaries. Kennst du das Land wo die Citronen blumen? There it is. According to ancient, yet not standard authorities, there, too, was Paradise. The Canaries are the Fortunate Isles, Iambulus says, or is said to have said, for really we have not read him, and probably could not if we tried, and would not bother to, anyway—however, Iambulus is reported to have stated that these islands were inhabited by a set of people who had elastic bones, bifurcated tongues, whose lives were a succession of sweetnesses, and who, when overtaken by age, lay on a perfumed grass that produced a voluptuous death. That must have been a long time ago. Perhaps, too, the story is not true. In any event, nothing of the kind is encounterable there now. Yet we might just as well have had these islands as the Philippines. Everything being possible, it may be that some day we shall. In which case those whom Dr Lucas' discovery does not satisfy may betake themselves to the Canaries instead.

Then, also, there is Venezuela. From the Gulf of Paria Columbus wrote loyally to Ferdinand and Isabella that just beyond was Paradise. He wrote not merely loyally, but logically. In the neighbourhood were the enchantments of El Dorado. A trifle to the north were Bimini's Waters of Youth, and, more remotely, stretched Tlapallan, the Land of Colours.

That land of colours is Yucatan to-day. The enchantments of El Dorado have dissolved in the sultriness of Trinidad, and Bimini's Waters of Youth Ponce de Leon sought and failed to find in Florida. The latter we have, and many of us a few Palm Beach hotel bills by way of reminder. Over the others ultimately our flag will flaunt. In the quest of Paradise, therefore, we are by no means limited to Luzon. Yet though there is a trust in the matter there is no monopoly. Others have been quite free to pick and choose.

Some old chaps selected Avalon, where rapture was such that a year was a minute. We have not an idea where it can be, otherwise the location would not be withheld from our readers. But it is somewhere. So, also, is Ceylon, where a good bishop said every prospect pleases and only man is vile. So, too, is the Kingdom of Prester John, just beyond which other old chaps declared Paradise to be. Nor is this all. Theologians have placed Eden in Mesopotamia, travellers in Central Africa, ethnologists in Atlantis, mythologists in Limuria, philosophers in Utopia, and litterateurs at the Pole—which, to be as cosmopolitan as the rest of them, constitutes, we think, a real embarrassment of choice.

Even so, it did not embarrass Sven Hedin. Last year—or was it the year before?—he dismissed them all, and, quite as definitely as Dr Lucas put his finger on Luzon, this gentleman indicated Janaidar.

Janaidar is a city in the uplands of Asia, to which the Kirghiz look and pray as they pass. Perched on a peak of the Pamirs, provided with flowers that never wither, with delights that never end, with songs that never cease, it surges above the barren plains a mirage of terrestrial bliss. Dr Hedin tried to ascend the height on which it is set. Being mortal, he failed. It is as well, perhaps. He has an illusion left. So have we. Always and everywhere there is an abode of bliss. But on condition that it is treated as the Kirghiz treat Janaidar, that it is looked up to, prayed to, and then passed by.

Through an inability to imitate the Kirghiz, or, perhaps, because they never heard of them, others have attempted artificial ascents. Among these is Baudelaire. With nothing but haschisch for ladder the ascent was effected; he was there, living in uninterrupted delights, listening to harmonies no mortal ever heard before, contemplating landscapes of amber and emerald, perspectives the colour of dream, and with them, perhaps, the lost arcana, the secrets of the enigmæ of the universe, the science that Plutonian cataclysms engulfed, the recitals of the genesis and metamorphosis of the supernal, the chronicles of the forgotten relations of nature and man.

Another was De Quincey. In the hallucinations of the glass of "laudanum negus, warm, without sugar," which he used for ascent, there were infinite cavalcades, the undulations of tumults, the catastrophes of mighty dramas, choruses of passion, trepidations of innumerable fugitives, tempests of features, forms, and farewells, shuttled by sudden lambiencies, by the consonance of citterns and clavichords, by Æolian intonations, by revelations of power and beauty, by pomps and glories, until a vault, opening in the zenith of the far blue sky, showed a shaft of light that ran up for ever through millennia, through æons; and up that shaft his spirit mounted, mounted, mounted ever farther yet, until peace slept upon him as dawn upon the sea.

In addition to haschish and opium other ladders have been used. Among them mescal is citable—not the agave preparation, but a plant which yields a substance brown and bitter, and of which the effects resemble Indian hemp.

Mescal is much in vogue among the Tarahumari, a tribe of Mexican Indians, to whom the plant is a god, approachable only after fastidious rites, the body perfumed with cophal, the heart entirely devout. And no wonder. For, properly placated, the god conducts the worshipper to a series of visions in which he is beckoned into Paradise and then shown out — provided he has absorbed the proper dose.

That dose we have personally lacked the opportunity to absorb, but if we may believe everything we hear—and we are always most anxious to—Mr Havelock Ellis has. With it he encountered a vast field of golden jewels, perfumes also, on which flowerful shapes convoluted into gorgeous butterflies, gyrated in loops of flame, and performed skirt dances before him, providing him with living pictures, or, rather, what he, with perhaps a higher conception of the possibilities of language, calls "living arabesques." In the background were, he noted, architectural sweetmeats in the Maori style—whatever style that may be—enhanced "with the moucharabieh work of Cairo."

This sort of thing continued for hours, until, indeed, Mr Ellis went to bed, when he became, as he expresses it, greatly impressed by the "red, scaly, bronzed, and pigmented appearance of his limbs," particularly—and strange to say—whenever he was not gazing directly at them.

Dissatisfied with the result, he experimented on a friend, to whom he amicably distributed an overdose, and who with some pathos relates that thereupon he had a series of paroxysms which made him feel as if he were about to give up the ghost. He enjoyed a sense of speedy dissolution, accompanied, and presumably accentuated, by an entire inability to resist, yet quickly followed by an acuter apprehension that one of his eyes had turned into a pool of dirty water in which millions and millions of minute tadpoles were afloat. Then he, too, was gratified with a skirt dance of arabesques that arose, descended, palpitated, and slid, for which, however, he was presently punished by a procession of sudden frights. His left leg became solid, his body immaterial, his arms impalpable, the back of his head emitted flames, to his mouth came the burn of fire, to his ears the buzz of bees, interrupted by the impression of skin disappearing from the brow, of dead flesh, of hot chills, and, finally, of a grinning skull.

It is into such byways that the quest of Paradise may lead one. Yet there are others, notably those disclosed by drink. Byron used that guide, so did Poe, so did de Musset. Under the influence of the Yellow Fay, whose name is Eau de Vie and should be Au Delà, they left the world, crossed the frontiers of the possible, and in a swift pursuit of larger flowers, rarer perfumes, pleasures unenjoyed, passed from new horizons into visions brutally beautiful, wholly solid, dreamless and real, where, fairer than the desire of a fallen god, the Muse stood, her arms outstretched.

It is a wonderful journey, but the landscapes it unveils are not suited to common clay. There are colours there to which the rest of us are blind, melodies to which we are deaf, the white assumption of realised ideals. Such things are not for ordinary man. The summit scaled, or even attempted, instead of resplendent perspectives, instead of the pulsations of higher hopes, the savours of life unto life, the odours and foretastes of immaculate joy, there is stupor when there is not horror, delirium when there is not death, Purgatory instead of Paradise. It is a great place, though, for men who want to drown their sorrows, and always will be until they learn that sorrows know how to swim.

In an effort to forget, or, rather, not to remember, that the end of life is darkness and the font of it pain, persons more fastidious have turned to love. But that also has its defects. In the smart set it is a game, and a very pretty one too, only when you are old enough to play it properly you are too old to play it at all. In which respect it is inferior to bridge whist. Platonism is much better. The trouble, though, with that arrangement is that either the party of the first part loses her head or the party of the second part loses his temper. Neither result is conducive to happiness, and happiness is but a synonym for Paradise.

Happiness is what we think it is, but only when what we think it is what we have not got. Love is refreshing and wealth delightful. But they do not bring happiness. Even golf may fail. Matrimony too, for that matter. The happiness of matrimony is not, however, a subject that may be lightly talked away. There are and have been, and presumably always will be, a number of marriages that are delicious. Yet none is perfect. But, then, does perfection exist?

Personally, we have heard matrimony defined as one woman more and one man less. The definition seemed to us inadequate. Then, too, it is a long time since the noose matrimonial ceased to be news. Yet that noose we have heard praised for the opportunities which it affords for the development of the emotions known as unselfish. Certainly it is highly chastening. But chastened people have no individuality. The big bugs of history were thorough-paced egotists. Cæsar at the Rubicon, Napoleon at Marengo, Carnegie at the Steel deal, did not care a rap for a soul save themselves. Do we not honour them for it? It is of such stuff that greatness comes. But, like matrimony, like golf, and bridge whist, greatness is not happiness. When Alexander was tramping India in search of the sight that Dr Lucas has found in Luzon, an ordinary person presumed to tell him that he was on the wrong road. "The right way," said the person, "is humility." We have tried the path and discovered, just as Columbus discovered in the Gulf of Paria, that Paradise lay beyond.

"We are all born in Arcadia," said Schiller, who omitted to add that we emigrated at once. But the idea is sound. We are born with a belief in Paradise. The quest of it fills our dreams. The delays in getting there furnish our nightmares. Yet of all those who have sought it, nobody has ever got there after the age of forty, or, we may hasten to add, before.

Beautiful as an uncommitted sin, it stretches far away, too far, indeed, for laggard steps like ours. It is not in Luzon, as Dr Lucas has announced. It is not in the Fortunate Isles, as the ancients thought. The artificial substitute does not pay, the Biblical Plaisance has ceased to be. In the twentieth century there is no such place.

These premises admitted, there should be something to take its place, and there is. An epicure provided it. He called it Contentment. Given that, and the possessor can dispense with Paradise every day in the year. The factors are twofold. The first is health; the second indifference. The conjunction of these little things does not produce Elysium, but it steers one clear of Hades. Anyone who expects more than that is too good for the good things, and particularly for the bad things—which are often better—with which this world is bestrewn.

TRUFFLES AND TOKAY

LITERATURE used to be a battlefield. To-day it is a restaurant. A virtuous writer no longer pinks a rival; he caters to the public. The food is cheap, easy of digestion and as easily prepared. The equipment necessary for its production is readily acquired, and profitable when obtained. All the cook needs is an absence of imagination and a fountain pen. Given these condiments, success is sure.

That is natural. One touch of stupidity makes the world kin. Considered as a nation, we are, of course, perfectly splendid. The glory that was Greece, and the grandeur that was Rome, are not in it with us. We have only to look at the papers to be convinced of that. The pæans of our progress are as deafening as leaded type can make them. The celerity with which we breed plutocrats is exceeded only by the servility with which we cultivate them. In the export of heiresses the manufactories of Europe cannot touch us. Before our professional beauties the Peris of Paradise slink abashed. We produce everything, including panics, and raise all things except masterpieces.

That, also, is natural. We are, perhaps, masterful, certainly mercenary, but not metrical. The land of the free is the home of progress, yet not of poets. In years when the world went slower poets were regarded as butlers of the gods. Their ambrosia was received with genuflections. In their nectar was the divine afflatus. The custom has been abrogated. Barring Mammon, the gods have gone. There is not a trace of the afflatus left. Our climate does not agree with it. Our climate does not agree with poets either. It induces in them radiating chloroformania. Instead of genuflections they are greeted with yawns. Their nectar obtains every kind of reception except consumption. Their titles have been examined. It has been found that in descending the years they have degenerated from butlers into apothecaries. Their ambrosia is a drug on the market. In a wide-awake, democratic country like this that sort of thing doesn't do. The vocation, as a consequence, creates not yawns and ridicule merely, but indignation. "Who is that chap?" a man in some misery asked us recently. "He is a young poet," we answered. "I hate young poets," was his reply. And yet, as Gautier, with a charming affectation of naïvete, remarked, an inability to write in verse can scarcely be considered as constituting a special talent.

Perhaps, however, it may. An inability to write anything but cheques is the smart thing here. A pilgrim from Paris noted that we have developed a hundred religions and but a single sauce. That sauce, surmounting our kitchens, has assimilated our flummeries, our festivities, our frescoes, and fiction. Here and there the sameness of it is relieved by a touch of originality. But the touch is sporadic. The blue ribbon is scarce. Hence the rarity of masterpieces.

The cuisine of the latter differs from current cookery. In Milan the education of a ballet girl begins at the age of six. Until she effects her debut she works ten hours a day. The young of both sexes who aspire to be cordons bleu should begin a little earlier and work harder yet. By way of batterie de cuisine there is the dictionary. Spelling they may leave to their problematic proof-reader; grammar too. No grammarian ever wrote a thing that was fit to read. They need not bother with style either; geniuses often write badly, and so much the better for them. Besides, style is easy enough to manipulate when you know how, and seems easier still when you don't. But to the chef en herbe words must have no secrets. He must know how to toss them as a juggler throws knives. He must be able to plant them in such fashion that they will explode like bombs before the reader's eyes. If necessary, they must enable him to have an attack of hysterics on paper.

After the conquest of the dictionary, the scullion who has anything to fricassee will know how to prepare it. Yet then should an idea, however complex, a vision, however apocalyptic, surprise him without words to convey it, he may just as well take off his apron. He lacks, not necessarily the elements of success—on the contrary—but the gastronomics that distinguish the first-class cook. He may stew succotash by the pail, yet never truffles and tokay. On the other hand, should chance enable him to catch Inspiration in the dark, should fortune assist him in throwing her down, and talent aid him in filching a masterpiece from her glittering corsage, he may be intimately convinced that it was the wrong party he met should that masterpiece prove popular. A book that pleases no one may be poor. The book that pleases everyone is detestable.

To young ladies of cognate aspirations the same course of sprouts is requisite. But with no matrimony in it. An authoress should not wed unless she can marry a publisher. A publisher is a handy person to have about the house. Failing the chance at one, in no circumstances should she even for a moment consider the possibility of taking any form of husband not equally serviceable and quite as lack-lustre. Look at Marie Corelli. The heroes of whom she has delivered herself would fill a ten-acre lot. And yet for the hand of that delicious, bareback, sawdusted circus-rider of the fountain pen, princes have wooed unavailingly. And look at Ouida. The types of manhood that she has produced are quasi-divine; and yet, though wooed too, neither has she been won. Then there is, or rather there was, George Sand. Through an early page of her career there wandered the dissolute Greuze of literature, whose name is Alfred de Musset. Through a later chapter there passed the Apollo of impeccable accords, whose name is Chopin. As neither happened to be in the publishing business she used them both for copy, and married a philistine.

These statistics are not voluminous, but they have the superior merit of luminousness. They show that princesses of the pen who do not remain single prefer commonplace consorts. And that, after many vigils and much communion, we regard as quite right. It is an axiom in law that fighting cocks should be kept apart. It is an axiom in letters that epigrams from the other end of the table are provoking. It is an axiom in lyrics that, however delightful the exchange of repartee and kisses may be, neither is conducive to the production of fiction, trite or thrilling.

Young gentlewomen have, then, a choice between living novels and writing them. The former condition is to be preferred. The revels of romance may be roseate, or the reverse, but matrimony is no child's play. Besides, young gentlewomen should, perhaps, content themselves with continuing to be. The moment they cease to shirk every duty in that sphere of life to which it pleased God to call them, their charm becomes so pernicious that they incite to bigamy—a crime of which the penalties have been summarised as two mothers-in-law, or at-law, in the discretion of the judge. But as the subject is momentous, let us consult the authorities. Here, for instance, is Nietzsche. According to him, man should be reared for the vocation of warrior and woman for the warrior's recreation. Now, if she work, how can she be recreative? And here is Dr Watts: "Satan," he says, "finds some mischief still for idle hands to do." The conversation of a lady who lacks the leisure to be mischievous is bound to be very dull. Then, also, wives that write have not time to argue with their husbands, and when a woman ceases to quarrel she ceases to love. In view of all which, it seems to follow that girls cannot combine matrimony and masterpieces—at the same time at least—and young gentlemen cannot either. Eagles, poets, and kings must—and will—circle alone. By the same token, all dealers in the ideal are better off by themselves, or, at a pinch, less worse off with transient flirtations than permanent families.

There are reasons for all things. We have several for this, and may find another. Matrimony presupposes happiness. It usually takes it out at that. But there is the general theory. Assuming it to be valid, happiness dulls the brain. As such, it is to be avoided. It is only when authors are absolutely miserable that the wretches can do themselves justice. And even were matrimony, through its chastening effects, to induce that result, it is open to a yet graver objection.

To stir the wits, to make ink flow in floods and the pen acrobatic, there is nothing like solitude. No one not in the business can understand how populous it is. No one not in the trade can understand how loquacious its phantoms become. They have their defects. They poison you for the realities of life. None the less, to be worth his syndicate an author must evoke them. He must play with hallucinations as Mithridates did with drugs. But he must play alone.

Literature—when not a restaurant—is a divinity, and a jealous one. She suffers no other worship. She forces you to shut every extraneous desire, ambition, and inclination into cages where, now and then, for the distraction of the thing, you may go and see how they are. But you must go alone. Take a companion in the shape of a wife or, worse yet, a husband, and there is an end to the high hallucinatory fever that she provides. There also is a farewell to that untrammelled freedom which is the pundit's natural heath. The lives of great sages all remind us that in their sagacity they were too sagacious to marry. The lives of great poets all remind us that, uniformly married, they uniformly wished they were not.

These are the reasons that we promised. Here is the other that we didn't. Should matrimony occur, the party of the second part, being a mere mortal, will, like other mere mortals, love society, will affect to say, as others have, that it is a bore to be in it, and feel, as others do and will, that it is a tragedy not to.

Yet in society how many dealers in the ideal are there? There is the Duchess of Sutherland. There is the Queen of Roumania. But these ladies are superior women, and superior women, being always long-winded, are able to do double duty. Apart from them, magnificent examples are few. They exist, however, yet not on the list of smart people. The latter are charming, but they do not read; and, as for writing, good Lord! possessing, as they do, the ability to write cheques, they fancy that therein is all the law and most of the profits. What is worse, they are right. In the way of literature anything further would be a surfeit.

Society is hard labour. So also is fiction. It is, an old troubadour remarked, a toil at which galley-slaves would balk. One form of hard labour is supersufficient. An added variety would do up a football team. Hence it is that society is not literary, and the literary are not social. Of all pursuits this is the most difficult. The sculptor has his chisel, the musician his piano, the painter his brush. The novelist has but his brain. The sculptor, the musician, the painter have instruments to second them. The novelist is the instrument and the instrumentalist. He chisels the impalpable, attunes the inaudible, and paints the unseen. Or at least he did before he was submerged in the swirl of succotash that gushes from the sculleries of the department stores.

What will become of that deliciousness, and of anterior messes quite as delightful, the giant library now in process of construction on Fifth Avenue one of these days will tell. If we may believe all we hear—and that is not always a pleasure—this library is to be a very fine place. In some splendour and entire spaciousness Error will sleep there side by side with Truth. How much of the one and how little of the other its galleries will contain, speculative spiders may decide. But one thing is certain. The best books will not be there. Precisely as the prettiest women are always those whom we have yet to meet, so are literature's most fascinating productions still unwritten.

If, as is generally suspected, the value of a work consists more in what it suggests than in what it says, the most uplifting books will not be in that library either. There is, for instance, the Book of Nature, a treatise that all philosophers begin and none of them finish. There is also the Book of Destiny, which all thinkers consult and none can construe. Then there is the Book of Love, whose scroll age cannot scan and youth cannot fathom. Finally, there is the Book of Life, of which the pages vanish as you turn them.

These books will not be found on Fifth Avenue. In their stead there will be an acre of information on everything that it is easiest to forget, another acre of everything that it is useless to remember, ton after ton of rubbish that none but the authors and their enemies could be hired to look at, ton after ton of solemn lies that have survived only because Death has ignored them, ton after ton of defunct theories, of demised ideas, of deceased lore, and derelict science—with here and there a few baskets of truffles, a few bottles of tokay, a few flowers of real literature, of which the wit and wisdom can never die.

For the rest of the cemetery our hopes are slim. We foresee dimly, yet surely, an hour when Posterity will dump the lot in a dust-bin and put a Hic jacet on it all—put it, we say, yet providing, of course, that she takes the trouble, and that in moments of faithlessness we rather doubt. And the reason, if complex, is clear. In the last fifty years, particularly in the last twenty, and more especially in the last five, literature has held a continuous show. Authors have spawned copy, publishers have belched books, and novelists have pyramided, remorselessly.

The entertainment has been diverting, but to call it enduring is another guitar. According to statistics there are produced in the United States sixty books a day, or two and a half every hour, and what more could anyone ask? Except, indeed, those who are ambitious to be known. For in that flood is the bankruptcy of Fame. So many claims has the lady on her that she needs must fail through sheer inability to pay her debts.

Without pretending to know more than we do, it is easy to predict that this sort of thing cannot go on for ever. The production of succotash is not a misdemeanour. The love of light yet heavy reading no jurist has codified into crime. The sale of stupidities under the name of stories is at best, or at worst, but a question of taste, however poor that taste may be. Yet nothing is constant but change. Across this swirl of dish-water there is passing a transverse stream.

We lack the space, which is a detail, for we also lack the art, to picture that stream as it deserves. But two aspects of it we may indicate. One consists in the fact that those of us whose lives are not devoted to fame are devoted to fun. Another lies in the multiplication of telephones, the increasing facility of communication, the coming abolition of time, and the sequestration of space.

It has been the absence of these very things that in the leisurely past has been most conducive to the production of poppycock. People nowadays have not so much time to spare. In the future they will have less. In the next generation, what with air-ships, telectroscopes, and interplanetary news, they will have none—or rather none for the light yet heavy reading of to-day.

Literature then will be electric. Instead of fat books stuffed with nauseous phraseology there will be brief pages of brilliant ideas. Instead of padding their wares authors will aim to say as much as possible in the fewest possible words. When that day comes the models of literary excellence will not be the long and windy sentences of accredited bores, but ample brevities, such as the "N" on Napoleon's tomb, in which, in less than a syllable, an epoch, and the glory of it, is resumed. That is the kind of cutlet the restaurant of the future will provide, and Fame will halo those who serve it quickest with truffles and tokay.

X

THE ENCHANTED CARPET

THE beauty of Az Zahra a congress of poets in active collaboration would be impotent to depict. Az Zahra was the palace of the Caliphs of Cordova. Forty thousand men worked at it ceaselessly for forty years. To-day not a trace of its enchantments remains.

There have been other bewilderments almost yet not quite as witching. Nero devised a residence so ineffably charming that on the day of reckoning may it outbalance a few of his sins! About it were shimmering porticos, glittering avenues, green savannahs, forest reaches, the call of bird and deer. Within were domes of sapphire, floors of malachite, crystal columns, and red-gold walls. It has crumbled.

Before the peacock throne of the Great Mogul there was an inscription that ran: "There is a Paradise. And it is this. And it is this." Of that paradise the legend alone endures. The enticements of Dar Sargenu are rumoured to have exceeded those of Eden. They have evaporated. Trumpets of triumph woke Sardanapalus from the splendour of dreams to settings yet more splendid. Like the dreams, the settings have faded. Beneath Cyclopean arches, in matchless magnificence, Belsarazzur lounged and laughed. The arches have fallen, the magnificence has gone. At any evocation of Bel's Home of the Height the pens of archæologists have spluttered. Bel has vacated the skies, his earthly tenement has fallen. The sumptuousness in which Semiramis dwelt exceeds the powers of prose. The lady has dwindled into myth and the sumptuousness with her. Mounting upward with the stream of life and light the memory of the imperial palace at Byzance surges—a gorgeous vision. By comparison Versailles becomes an eyesore and Windsor a blur.

For sheer loveliness Az Zahra beat all these places hollow. It was a fairyland that would have thrown the architects of the Great Mogul's peacock paradise into stupors of admiration. Beside it Nero's surprising construction would have looked quite squalid. If a surmise be worth a line of type, we may assume that even the gorgeous vision of Byzance would have slunk from it outdazzled. And there, one day, or it may be one night, a caliph stood and smiled.

Well he might. Before him was one of those jasmines in flesh and blood which used to grow on the Guadalquivir. And smiling, he lassoed the girl again and again with rope after rope of pearl. But even in fairyland, even in Az Zahra, caliphs had counsellors. This prince had his. They were prudent persons, and they represented to him that the lassoing was too lavish. These representations the caliph treated as cobwebs. "You are just like everyone else," he remonstrated; "you put a lot of value on things that have none." Then he mused a moment. "Tell me," he continued, "what are pearls good for except to punctuate the prettiness of a pretty girl?"

The syllogism, propounded in unanswerable Arabic, the counsellors were insufficiently casuistic to refute. Moreover, they were perhaps struck by the profundity or the truth it contained. The pearl is sacred to prettiness. Personally, we prefer the opal. The opal is a pearl with a soul. But opals are not jeune-fillesque. The pearl is. Vishnu could find nothing better for his daughter. Cæsar ransacked Britannia to find enough for the long line of young women whom he had on his list. Nero was less thoughtful. He used to toss them—the pearls, not the young women—about the room. Heliogabalus liked them best powdered into pepper. Cleopatra preferred hers in a cocktail.

The possibility of that entirely vulgar performance has been doubted. But the dissolution of a pearl can be effected, though the flavour is reported to be less appetising than vermouth. And naturally. The pearl is a disease. A mortal one, too, in this respect, that it dies. It is only the jewel that does die. Diamonds, for instance, live for ever. One might say they have always lived. They count, like light, among the first created things. Generated in flame before the earth was cool, they preceded the primal monera. Pearls, on the other hand, are charming accidents, and, parenthetically, the only ornament that nowadays a man can decently wear. Balzac understood that fact very thoroughly. Previously, Buckingham had dripped jewels in a promenade through the Louvre. Previously, too, Richelieu had dazzled Vienna with a satrap's suite. Previously, as well, les grands seigneurs made themselves multi-coloured as quetzals. Adornment has been the fashion. But in Balzac's day fashion had changed. It was much simpler, yet not entirely severe. Then it so fell about that one evening Balzac appeared at the opera with a stick, of which the handle blazed with gems. The glare of it drew the attention of the entire house. It was barbaric. It was more—it was unique. It was something else, too—it was a lesson. Apart from the stick Balzac was not adorned. The other men present were. On the morrow they stripped the jewels from their fingers and the trinkets from their shirts. Anteriorly gentlemen had been known by their dress; since then they have been known by their address. That is quite as it should be, were it not that in speech, as in costume, they have, in forcing the note, become entirely lack-lustre. There is modern progress.

We have not a word against it. But if our summary has been serviceable it will have shown that splendour has departed. This we regret. We prefer silk to flannels, velvet to tweed. Had fortune sufficiently favoured us we would wade in jewels. We see nothing distressing in Buckingham's promenade through the Louvre. Were we able we would eclipse Richelieu's entry into Vienna. Merely for the manner in which Nero lodged himself we forgive every crime he committed. Sardanapalus is our patron saint. It may be—though we doubt it—that he was wickeder than Heliogabalus; but what of it? He was magnificence made man. Byzance is rumoured to have been the sewer of every sin, yet such was its beauty that it is the canker of our heart that we could not have lived there. By way of compensation we are treated to certain conveniences and equally certain ugliness. Cities grow less uncomfortable and more hideous day by day. We live in a land of ready-made clothes, in an epoch that cant has sterilised and snobbery debauched. The stage is as mediocre as life. Even the Muse has fled. In lieu of the glare of genius there are antiseptic preparations, and automobiles instead of art. Only in Nature and the convulsions of her does splendour endure.

Nature, though convulsive, is curiously cautious. She possesses a sort of a stock in trade of which her supply is uniform. That stock is energy. She transforms it, transmutes it, and transposes it. But never does she suffer a speck of it to get away. She may store it in microbe or man, in sporules or stars, but on to it all she holds very tight.

These premises accepted, it follows that if splendour has vacated this neighbourhood it must be somewhere else. The pity is we cannot stalk it. And yet, why not? In the Arabian Nights there is a story about an enchanted rug. You had but to get on it, and presto! it carried you wheresoever you willed. That rug has been regarded as fabulous. It was, perhaps, woven of the imagination, but imagination can do as well to-day. All it needs is a foothold. Lacking that, a footnote. Here is one about Mars. It says that we can see the canals there, and sooner or later we shall see the streets.

Seeing is one thing, hearing is another. But recent experiments have induced the idea that we shall not merely see the streets but talk with the citizens. The idea may seem fantastic, yet it is the charm of certain ideas that beginning as fancies they end as facts. In this instance the idea is to telephone along a shaft of light. That is simple enough. Sound that can be projected a mile can be projected a million miles. It can be projected to the ends of space, if ends there are. Assuming, then, the possibility of such projection, and there is the enchanted rug.

On it we may proceed after splendour, and presently we shall stalk it, too. Mars is many a kalpa our senior. In science and sapience, manners and modes, she is, as such, in a position to give us points. There must be forces she has mastered of which we know nothing, senses she has cultivated of which we are unaware, problems she has solved which to us are mysteries, and with them refinements and ideals unimagined here.

Granting, then, the possibility of communication, and there would be not merely the pleasure but the profit of learning from her pundits the history of time, of receiving from her erudites the charts of space and of flirting through the telescope with her pretty little girls. And who knows but that in putting two heads, or rather two worlds, together, interplanetary communication may result in interplanetary trips, that we shall visit Mars, that the Maritians will visit us, that there will be transsidereal elopements, marriages, divorces, and, in their triple train, romances and tragedies such as no local mortal ever dared to dream before.

That possibility, however suggestive, is trivial beside another it evokes. Mars, though our senior, is an inferior planet. The superiority of planets and of their inhabitants is in direct proportion to their distance from the sun.

In accordance with this proposition—which all self-respecting novelists have adopted—the inhabitants of Mercury may be represented as human hyenas, those of Venus as commonplace brutes, the inhabitants of this world as uninteresting prisoners, those of Mars interesting poets, while the denizens of the distant spheres possess attributes of increasing perfection and enjoy conditions of supernal delight.

If then we, in our inferiority, are once able to ring up Mars, it will be found that long since Mars has been able to connect with Jupiter, the latter with Saturn, and so on to the Postmortem; and there is the circuit complete. Given, then, communication, and the romances and tragedies that may result sink into nothingness beside the opulence to be.

We shall know then, not merely where our early splendour has gone, but what splendour really is. Everything being possible, we may discover that it consists not in the manipulation of magnificence, the multiplication of masterpieces, the sumptuousness of settings, the thrones and diadems of the elect, but in the spectacle of other worlds and the junkets we shall take there.

This idea has a false appearance of originality which we hasten to disclaim. It is old as the Sphinx. It is older. We know to-day that that monstrous curiosity was disinterred ages ago from beneath masses of sand under which it must have brooded interminably. But the meaning of it was so clear that Egypt adopted it for a crest. The claws of a reptile, the wings of a bird, the body of a beast, a human head, and there, before Darwin, before history, by a civilisation that has left no other souvenir, in traits great and grave the descent of man was told.

There remained his ascent. Above the Sphinx Egypt sent circling the Phœnix. The one expounded the mystery of life, the other the secret of death. That secret is reincarnation. "Shall I believe in it?" a youngster asked Voltaire. "Believe in it?" the ogre shouted, "believe in it by all means. There is nothing more poetic." Nor is there. It has a defect, however. It explains everything. It explains why some of us are rich and some are poor, why some are smart and many are not. It explains the reason of joys and sorrows, the cause of smiles and tears. It explains these things, others too, and very simply, on the ground that this life, which is the refuse of many deaths, has acquired merits and demerits, in accordance with which are punishments and rewards. It explains everything so fully that it leaves you nothing to do but to bore yourself to extinction. That is its defect. Here is its charm. It sends the reincarnated junketing to spheres where life is larger than it can be here. It does more. In weaving a garland of migrations that stretches throughout the universe it sows our seed in every world and marries our memoirs with that of the sky.

There is the enchanted rug again, and therewith a quality of splendour so resplendent that beside it the witcheries of Az Zahra are reduced to mud pies. The main difficulty about it consists in the obvious fact that it is all too devilish good to be true. Any entertainment of it is comparable only to fancying that an uncle whom you never had has left you a billion he never possessed. Dreams are exhilarating, but not exact.

Yet if splendour be not stalkable in other spheres it is not to be quarried here. This world has done with it. It is one of the platitudes of philosophy that history repeats itself; history does nothing of the kind. The one deduction deducible from its divagations proves that nothing is constant but change.

In the change of things the world has deteriorated. Artistically it is bankrupt. Ethically it is nothing to boast of. Ambitions have veered, tendencies altered. Heredity, environment—the influence of snobbery and its sister cant—have modified manners and sugared speech. But appetites have been left unaffected. Eliminate the penal code and we should be assisting now at the frank freedom the past beheld—with the difference that the settings would be less sumptuous and the architecture more trite. In but one thing has the world improved. One is a great many. Scientifically there has been a quintuple discount on everything that was. There is no telling how far science may advance nor yet into what wonderlands its enchanted rug may take us. In order, then, that we may not seem to know more than we do we will not attempt to prophesy. Besides, there is an old adage that the future sits in the lap of the gods. Or does it not lie there? As often as not it has promised most falsely.

It may be, therefore, that science, on which we all count so much, may turn and cheat us. It may be that our most intoxicating dreams, reincarnation, and interstellar trips, will be recognised as delirium. But if our proposition be sound, and nothing is constant but change, then from the coil of things other perspectives will beckon. Said Baudelaire: "Pour trouver du nouveau plongeons dans le néant." The rug is more convenient. Borne on its arabesques, a condition of affairs is disclosed in which love will be regarded as a disease; wealth as a disaster; beauty as a horror; genius as stupidity; magnificence, madness, and originality vulgar. It will be wicked to be witty; righteous to be dull. The aim of life will be the attainment of complete colourlessness, and the ideal entire nullity.

The perspective may seem remote. From our rug it looks very neighbourly. The sun of splendour set long since. The dawn of nullity is breaking.

Salvation, if salvation there be, lies solely in extraneous succour. Precisely as dynasties are rejuvenated by fresher blood, so may humanity yet be reclaimed by superterrestrial conceptions. On the possibility of these conceptions we have already touched, yet theoretically merely, for the sake of their dreamlike beauty. To their support Mr Tesla not long since brought something more substantial. He brought a fact. Mr Tesla announced that he had been favoured with a message from another sphere. Personally, we did not presume to doubt him. But his brother scientists assumed an attitude of incredulity more or less impolite. That was to be expected. In the announcement of any novelty there is something curiously insulting to those labouring in the vineyards where that novelty, or the announcement of it, appears.

Yet we need not bother over that. Since Mr Tesla has received a message there is no reason, why he should not reply, no reason either, why communication should not result, nor yet why we should not learn what fashions are in vogue in the upper circles of the universe, and what customs the smart sets of the best planets observe. Thereupon society, being innately snobbish, will proceed to follow suit, the dawn of nullity will break to pieces, and an era of such general gorgeousness ensue as shall make Sardanapalus hide his diminished ghost. In short, even in the limits of this paper there are no limits to the joys in store — provided, of course, that the message to Mr Tesla did not reach him when journeying on an enchanted rug.

THE GOLDEN CALF

Ninon de l'Enclos wore her wrinkles on her heels. How she managed it she never told. The secret of her smartness evaporated with her. The secret of contemporary smartness is less clever and more clear.

It consists of three things. One is youth. There are belles and beaux who are no longer young. They are belles and beaux in their own imagination. Imagination is not a prerequisite. Youth is—so, too, is coin—and there is another little thing, entirely atmospheric, which is as difficult to acquire as it is to describe We have heard a rumour that in Bloomsbury it is known as the je ne sais quoi. The meaning of the phrase is beyond us. That may be due to the accent. In Belgravia, though the accent is encounterable, the phrase never is. People there either possess the little thing or they don't. When they don't they are bounders. Returning now to that which a certain familiarity with the classics enables us to call our muttons: given youth and money, no one need despair of the other. Old people, however rich, can't acquire it. Poor people, however young, can't either. The two things must beat as one. The high regard in which they are held, a certain familiarity with archæology enables us to catalogue as antediluvian. Always has youth been adored, always has money been worshipped. Between them they have managed to monopolise the attention of every drawing-room, prehistoric, pagan, and polite. Beauty and brains may be — and have been — talked away, but never money. However obtained, it is holy. Virtue and vice have been — and always will be — climatic, geographic, relative at that, but youth is unquestionable. There it is, and where it is there, too, is a great stirring of the affections.

Affections are just like fashions: they come and go. By the same token, what is smart to-day will be shabby genteel to-morrow. The only things for ever modish are youth and money. To the list we might add death. Death, though, has its disadvantages. So, alas, has life. Uncertain as Wall Street and false as an obituary, its obvious defect is its brevity. But the obvious is misleading. It is not life that is brief, it is youth. And what is youth without money?

A page once put to himself that question. Quite young, equally impudent and abominably good-looking, one day, or rather one night, across the wide leisures and rigid ceremonial of the Court of Spain, a princess smiled at him and beckoned. That was enough. There and then he was sent to another world, to a better one—to the tropics which Columbus had found. He landed at Hayti, or rather at Hispaniola, as the island was then more musically named and, with easy gallantry, assisted in eliminating the natives.

Cæsar used to create a solitude and call it Peace. Spain used to do the same thing and call it Civilisation. In furthering her designs, the young chap learned that a neighbouring island was a mine of gold. It occurred to him that if he got enough of it he might get the princess also. Through processes with which it is idle to encumber this paragraph, he succeeded. When he left that island, which to-day is known as Puerto Rico, he had gold to melt.

Between the foregoing sentences there are years. There are torrents of blood. There are all the civilising influences of Spain. Incidentally, the young chap had grown old. Whether he remembered the princess in problematic. That he missed his good looks is clear.

Here the plot thickens. Meanwhile he had heard that a little to the north was a land on which spouted a fountain whose waters effaced old age. To recover his youth he sailed that way. Were we writing fiction we should so arrange as to let him find the fountain, find his youth, find the princess tender and true, or better, perhaps, in view of his rejuvenation, find her daughter, and even her granddaughter, more to his taste. But this is not fiction. It is the history of Ponce de Leon—not the hotel at St Augustine, but the adventurer after whom it was named. The fountain was not found by him, but Florida was, and with it, not youth but fame.

The fountain which he sought represents the quintessence of a dream which many smart people have shared. It hallucinated the great Alexander. He tramped over India in search of it. Bacon was visited by it. He tried to produce its waters in a still. They represented to him not youth merely, but gold besides. His still produced nothing so important, but if we may believe everything we hear—and we are always most anxious to—there are other alembics which created both.

Of these the most ample was the property of a man who made himself a contemporary of the Pompadour. At the time he was quite young—or appeared to be. But people quite old remembered him as still quite young when they were very youthful. Different people remembered him under different names. The Danish Ambassador remembered him as the Vicomte de Bellamye, whom he had met, three or four decenniæ back, in Venice. The Baron Stoch had dined with him in Lisbon, where he was known as the Duc de Betmar. That, too, was a couple of generations back. An antiquity, in recalling the red-heeled days of the Regency, recalled that he was then the Marquis de Montferrat. When, later, he made himself a contemporary of the Pompadour, he made himself also Count de Saint-Germain. Apparently nothing was easier.

Meanwhile, though his titles had changed, his looks had not. The circumstance is not as surprising as it otherwise might be. According to his own account, he had assisted at the Council of Trent. Other accounts which he gave of himself were equally conciliatory. He had supped with Pilate and thrown dice with Faustine. These accounts, while admired, were not always accepted. In smart circles his origin was regarded as fantastic, but not fabulous. He was said to be the son of a lackey and a queen. In the antitheses of "Ruy Blas" the story is told. It is told so well that it would be an impertinence to repeat it. "Don't touch the dead of Dante," shouted Foscolo; "they frighten the living." The grave of Hugo's dead shall be to us as sacred.

To pass from it to the gay, the Count de Saint-Germain wore corsets. Behind them was a stone wrapped in flesh. In spite of which, or, perhaps, precisely on that account, he kept mothers awake and brought their daughters dreams. He had other accomplishments. He played on the violin so deliciously that he might have been born with one in his mouth. He was good at chemistry and good at quoits. His conversation was jewelled. Voltaire was not wittier, Diderot not more learned. His familiarity with the past was such that it enabled him to speak of King Arthur as though he were his first cousin, and of Charlemagne as though they had been jilted by the same woman.

His resources were as enigmatic as his age. Without anything so material as a rent roll, he lived magnificently, entertained royally, and always paid cash. When he gambled he had the tact to lose. He had the tact and, what is more, the ability to please. The mystery of him bewitched a monarch. But that was child's play. He bewitched gems. He made little diamonds big. He bewitched women. He made dowagers demoiselles.

A man lives as long as he desires, a women lives as long as she is desirable. A princess whose desirability was declining asked his aid. He gave it in a phial, the contents of which he told her to drink on the morrow. The princess took the phial home, remarked to Radegonde, her maid—a respectable person of forty—that it contained a remedy for cramps, and went to bed. During the night Radegonde, who had supped on lobster, and who, in consequence, was somewhat incommoded, turned to the phial for relief. In the morning, when she appeared to dress my lady's hair, the princess cursed her, as only a princess can curse, and rang for Radegonde. "But I am Radegonde," the poor thing expostulated; and, as a matter of fact, so she was, only, instead of being a respectable person of forty, the cramp remedy had turned her into a soubrette of sixteen.

The Gazette de France states that all Paris exclaimed at the miracle. The Gazette adds: "Mais M. le Comte de Saint-Germain était parti." We won't attempt to follow him. It would take too long. We won't attempt to explain. It would take too long also. Besides, we lack the ability. The point is that thirty years later, when he concluded to die—and for no other reason, apparently, than, as he said, because he was tired of living—the Landgrave of Hesse, whose guest he had been, took his papers, which he punctiliously and privately destroyed. Among them was the secret. It had come from Flamel.

Flamel was a scrivener, poor as a rat, but much more honest. His table was set between the pillars of the Church of Saint-Jacques. For the privilege he paid eight sols parisis a year. The amount, though small, was hard to make. To enlarge his business he set up a book-shop. There, presently, a stranger appeared with a manuscript. It was beautifully illuminated and profoundly abstruse. Flamel, unable to make head or tail of it, bought it just for that reason. He not merely bought it, he paid for it.

A man who buys a book which he can't read is a bibliophile. A man who buys a book and omits to pay for it is a bibliofilou. These definitions help to a better understanding of Flamel. The understanding will be improved when it is added that every leisure moment he gave to a study of the manuscript. For years he devoted himself to it. First the tail appeared, then a glimmer of comprehension; finally, when, after inordinate vigils, the full light was his, precisely as Monte Cristo he could have cried: "The world is mine!"

Flamel had discovered how to get rich and, incidentally, how to grow young. In the "Traité des Lavures," a work which he left, and which is still on view at the Bibliothèque Nationale, he expresses his pleasure as follows: "It was about noon, on a Monday, that I succeeded. But truly I tell here a secret which thou shalt find rarely written. Yet please God that all may make gold and youth at will, and, after the fashion of the sainted patriarchs, lead fat cattle to pasture."

That is all very well as far as it goes. But it does not go far enough. It never gets to the secret. Yet there was one. There must have been one. After that Monday noon Flamel, whom the payment of eight sols had previously burdened, became prodigal in philanthropy. He established fourteen hospitals, laid out seven cemeteries, endowed a dozen churches, and built as many chapels. Some of them are Objects of Interest still. More than that, their origin and endowments are matters of record. What is yet more interesting is the fact that, several centuries later, just previous to the apparition of Saint-Germain, it was currently reported and generally believed that Flamel, amazingly young, outrageously rich, yet no longer philanthropic, was filling other cities with the uproar of his debauches. Whether or not it was he who, under the name of the Vicomte de Bellamye, erupted in Venice and, as the Duc de Betmar, entertained Baron Stoch at Lisbon, is a detail. Were we writing fiction we should assume it to be a fact. The point is that he really did have a secret which others succeeded in sharing. There was Talbot, for instance; there was Lascaris; and, last and least, Cagliostro.

These people all knew a little more than the rest of us. Among other things, Talbot knew how to forge, but not how to do so undetectedly. As a result, he hid in a Welsh hamlet. The innkeeper there showed him a bit of parchment and an ivory ball. Both had been taken from the tomb of a bishop. The latter had been suspected of being rich. He was suspected, too, of having concealed his riches in his shroud. As a result, the tomb was rifled. Only the parchment and the ball were found. This booty the innkeeper had acquired in exchange for a mug of ale. Talbot offered a guinea. Already he had discovered that the parchment was a recipe for the manufacture of money. The guinea accepted, Talbot, who had his reasons for avoiding London, got to Germany, got to work, and, what is more notable, got gold. He projected it as a hose projects water. He waded in it. Everyone who came near him did likewise. He turned pebbles into coin as readily as we turn paper into copy. But it was the contents of the ivory ball, a white powder, that did the trick. Though he could read the recipe he could not compound it. When the powder gave out so did his money.

But no matter. There was another and a more capable person about just then. Who he was and what he was never have been and, now, never will be known. He did not float. He was not fluid. But he appeared, disappeared, reappeared, changing in these changes everything, even to his appearance. Without age, without identity, his presence, more often suspected than perceived, persisted for a century. He had as many names as Vishnu, perhaps as many avatars. Of his names the most certain is Lascaris. Of his avatars the most palpable is prelacy. He entered history clothed with the dignities of a Lesbian Archimandrite. Whether he brought with him gusts of those songs which blew through Mitylene one may surmise and never know. But this is clear: The multiple and sufficiently attested transmutations which he effected were accomplished either through the medium of previously trained adepts, or, when personally conducted, were produced for purposes entirely altruistic.

In a village at nightfall a stranger appears. He has come unawaited, as death and thieves do. He enters the poorest home, asks for old iron, turns it into gold, and evaporates. It was his custom and his poetry. Someone who knew what poetry was said: "On the morrow he was sought, but he had vanished like the holy apparitions which sometimes visit the heart of man."

The apparition that succeeded him was more tangible, more brilliant, more real. Carlyle used his worst ink to dirty it. But Time has its revenges. Carlyle is handsomely bound and never read. The memory of Cagliostro is immortal. Born without scruples, he omitted to acquire any. A cheerful disdain of righteousness is highly conducive to fame. People more censorious than ourselves regard that disdain as conducive to infamy. It may be so. But in the spaciousness of the perspectives of history you can't tell t'other from which. In lieu of scruples Cagliostro had charms, which is more than can be said of Carlyle. He knew all languages, including the latter's dialect, which was a feat in itself, and including silence, too, for silence is a language also. He had other accomplishments more surprising still. He knew how to make his clients believe anything they wished. He knew how to make the dead appear in mirrors and the quick in carafes. He knew how to turn ugliness into beauty, age into youth, hemp into silk, and lead into gold. He knew how to be two thousand years old. He knew how to hide beneath the plumage of a peacock the beak and talons of a bird of prey.

Charming and cruel, he could captivate and coerce. One of his conquests was Louis XVI. By royal edict it was treasonable to speak ill of him. A greater conquest was Paris. Released from the Bastile, where he had been put because of that tiresome old story of the diamond necklace, festivals were given, streets were illuminated, Paris went mad. Boulogne did, too. When he took ship there five thousand people implored his benediction on their knees. His release was felt to be a blessing, his departure a curse. The multitude called him the Benefactor of Mankind—big words, which he rewarded by foretelling the fall of the Bastile. He foretold what would occur the following week, the following month, the ensuing year, or ten years later in Madrid, in Vienna, in Pekin. He foretold everything, except, indeed, that the Seer of Chelsea should write him down and we should write him up.

Clairvoyance has its limits; so, too, has cheek. Cagliostro possessed both, and with them a secret—that of not having any, and yet appearing to have one. It is the greatest of all. His predecessors, Flamel and Co., were more inventive. Their discoveries are lost, thank fortune, yet—barring the probable—everything being possible, science may find them again, and perhaps, too, the ability to radiate that atmospheric seduction which Bloomsbury calls the je ne sais quoi.

We hope not. Smartness, restricted to the few, now disturbs the many. With a different kettle of fish the words of Flamel would be fulfilled. The possession of youth and gold would be universal, the pasturing of cattle ditto. That is not a consummation to be wished. Though smartness and its appanages would then be common, human nature, being invariable, would remain unchanged. People would want, as people have ever wanted, just what they have not got. Instead of trying to be smart everybody would succeed in being stupid. Youth and its loveliness would no longer allure and poverty be the world's desire.

FASHIONS IN POISONS

Poisons may be toxicolloquially catalogued as triply fascinating. First, because of the mystery of them; second, because behind the mystery loom the great figures of the Borgias and the Brinvilliers; and, finally, because they involve the whole subject of murder considered as an art.

The term "art" is used for the reason that De Quincey so labelled it. He had a pretext. Had he wished he could have had a text.

Once upon a time people who got in the way were dosed with hemlock. Death came very agreeably. It neither convulsed nor distorted. It left the beauty of the victim unmarred, the features uncontracted, the mouth half closed. It left no trace either. There is art. Whoso says art says Greece. In Greece poisoners were artists. That is, a number of centuries ago.

In the days that succeeded them art persisted but methods changed. Occasionally people who were in the way did not wait to be killed, but killed themselves. That simplified matters. Occasionally, too, they were urged to die. It was the young emperors of old Rome who did the urging. Yet sometimes they did not bother. A lady named Locusta discovered a way of cooking mushrooms which was found to be very serviceable. Nero served it to his brother Britannicus. Agrippina set it before her husband, Claudian. Domitian administered it first to his father, Vespasian; next to his brother, Titus. They were all in the way. The mushroom stew dispersed them. What the ingredients were we may surmise and never know. It was an imperial dish, however, and, as such, reserved for the purple. Patricians, in their inability to obtain it, invented a needle and a ring.

Lampridus, or Spartian, or whoever the brute may have been that abridged a chronicle in the "Scriptores Historæ Augustæ," describes the needle. It had a poisoned tip. Those who liked gave a little prick to those they did not like, and the latter fell dead. This performance usually occurred in the Forum, where the crowd was such that the assassin could lose himself in it.

Samples of the rings, recovered from the ruins of Pompeii, any one may examine at Naples. They suggest nothing so much as vipers of gold. A receptacle, moved by a spring, contained poison which exuded at a touch. At table, in the animation of small talk, the assassin made but a gesture. On the food of his neighbour a drop would fall. The deed was done.

There also was art—too precious perhaps to be lost. It is rumoured that Naples is not now the sole depository of these playthings. In New York, a few years ago, a death occurred which a jewelled snake, resting for a second on a glass of champagne, is believed to have occasioned. The belief may be unfounded, yet the possibilities in it are splendidly ornate.

Possibilities not similar but cognate were thoroughly appreciated during the Renaissance. That was the age when murder really flourished. There were sixty recognised modes of eliminating, without fuss or scandal, such people as got in the way. It would be fastidious to describe them all. The most fashionable was Aqua Toffana, which remained in vogue up to the beginning of the last century, and of which to-day we know only that, presumably a preparation of arsenic, it was without colour, taste, or odour. But it was very effective. Adepts smeared it on one side of the blade of a golden knife, with which they then cut a peach, and after giving the poisoned half to the lady who had incurred their jealousy, ate the other half in her presence. It is difficult to regard that as otherwise than artistic, too. But there was another preparation still more so. It acted not at once, but years later. The victim became toothless, bald, and dessicated, expiring after an agony relentless and prolonged. Artistic and ingenious as well were the poisoned candles, poisoned gloves, and poisoned flowers, with which, under the Borgias, death was distributed in Italy, and which the Medici introduced into France. These things left no traces. Not that it would have mattered much if they had. The Medici cared nothing for the existence which they led in the minds of other people. The Borgias cared less. For that matter, the Borgian mode of life is to-day untellable except in Latin—the one language, parenthetically, which is suited to love, to religion, and to crime. But the callousness of the clan, a callousness legendary in Lucretia and accentuated in Alexander, culminates in Cesare.

In history's caverns there are monsters more masterful than he, but none more cold-blooded. A galley-slave in Mars is as familiar with the sonnets of Petrarch as he was with shame. The term had no meaning for him. Without heart, without nerves, without sensibilities of any kind, he turned sin into a system, crime into a code, and thus equipped, trusting no one and assassinating those who trusted him, cleared his way almost to the pontificate.

Alexander, his father, exhaled death. He had cups, perfumes, and even eucharists which produced it. And this pontiff, from whose presence poison emanated, trembled before his son. It was as well, perhaps. But perhaps, too, he trembled insufficiently. For presently, together they planned the elimination of five cardinals. Then, through what jugglery is less uncertain than clear, the wine intended for the prelates, and which had been studiously blended with cantarella—the household drug—father and son drank instead. Alexander tumbled over. He was dead. But Cesare, who knew what he was about, had himself placed in the carcass of a bull, from which, either by virtue of an old superstition, or else because of antitoxic properties which the carcasses of bulls do not possess to-day, he emerged subtle as a serpent that has discarded its skin.

Among poisoners anterior and subsequent Cesare Borgia is princeps. The champion of the lot, he was a pestilence in flesh and blood.

Beside him those whom it remains to consider may seem rather trite. This we regret. If only for the purposes known as literary, we should like to present a crescendo of crime. Yet in the career of Madame de Brinvilliers we find some consolation. Though less spacious than his, it is almost as fine.

The Marchioness of Brinvilliers, née — not Retroussé, as someone somewhere amusingly noted, but—D'Aubray, was the daughter of a Frenchman of note. According to an account which she was conscientious enough to provide, her childhood was remarkable only for its perversity, and her conduct, while yet a girl, left more to be desired than even she found it convenient to express. By way of offset, she charmed on sight. Extremely pretty, fetchingly slight, she had the face of an angel, the smile of a seraph, the attitude of a saint, and a voice which was silken in its sweetness. Fancy a demon masquerading as Psyche and her portrait is done. At the age of twenty she became the wife of De Brinvilliers, a young nobleman of wealth. The wealth came to him through his mother from Gobelin, founder of the tapestry looms. In the halls to which he took his bride the number of these tapestries which must have been needed surpasses belief. In any event, a few of them are required to drape this story. For the marchioness promptly interested herself elsewhere, and the marquis followed suit. The immediate object of this lady's fancy was a lieutenant named Sainte-Croix. Though her husband did not mind, her father did. He had Sainte-Croix thrown into the Bastile, from which ultimately the lieutenant issued. But meanwhile two things had occurred. The marchioness had accumulated an intense hatred of her father, and the officer had acquired a thorough familiarity with arsenic. When finally he was released, the dance began.

In the guise of a sister of charity, the marchioness proceeded to promenade through hospital wards. To the ill and ailing she brought words of comfort and delicate food. But those to whom she ministered died, in great agony at that. The marchioness, however, was merely experimenting with poison which she had got from Sainte-Croix. When she was assured that its effects were not suspected, the experiments were complete. At this juncture her father invited her to visit him. As a result she ministered, too, to him. For eight months she caressed him with one hand and dosed him with the other. After poisoning him twenty-eight times vainly, she doubled the dose, and he died.

That death slaked her hate. It enriched her also. But she had brothers and sisters whom, unfortunately for them, it enriched besides. During all this time the marchioness and her husband were leading the life which befits people of rank. Such a life requires money. To obtain more she poisoned her two brothers, and planned to eliminate her sisters as well. Meanwhile, to keep her hand in, she distributed arsenic right and left. She fed it to her servants because they were awkward; to her daughter because she was stupid; to her husband because he was in the way. The marquis was highly accommodating, but he continued to be, and that prevented her from marrying Sainte-Croix. But Sainte-Croix, who had no desire whatever of becoming the mate of this reptile, fed De Brinvilliers with antidotes, and the poor chap, poisoned one day, was counterpoisoned the next. How he enjoyed what was going on within him is a detail, the point is that enterprises so amusing ended as all things must. In the thick of them all it occurred to Sainte-Croix to die, and in dying to leave behind various documents and confessions so compromising that the marchioness was arrested, tried, convicted, beheaded, her body burned, and the ashes dispersed.

It is said that her end was highly edifying. We have not a doubt of it. But so, too, was the fashion which she set. Paris, and more particularly Versailles, became powdered with poison. Even the king got a pinch or two. That he merited it is clear. The fourteenth Louis of France was not a good man, he was not even a good-looking man, but as kings go, he was very imposing, quite august, and not unreasonably royal.

Among his caprices was Louise de la Vallière, a human flower that exhaled everything which is sweet—and sad. The charm of her was too delicate to last, too delicate at least for the peppered palate of the monarch, too delicate in any event to withstand the splendour of the sunburst projected by the Montespan. In the glare of it the girl withered. Her rival then became Queen of the Court of France. Royally beautiful, regally robed, sovereign in manner, and sumptuous in magnificence, Madame de Montespan, in lieu of charming, coerced. To use a localism of the land, she made the rain and the fine weather. She did more, she made her children "princes of the blood."

A lady so resourceful does not abdicate readily. At the first suspicion of a possible successor she bethought herself of the powders which Sainte-Croix had dispensed. The effort to obtain them led her into strange company and stranger halls —into cellars where life was an article of commerce, into dens where hags compounded philtres, into chapels where the Black Mass was held, into orgies sacrilegious, necromantic, and obscene. From one such excursion she returned with a mixture of bat's blood and honey, a remedy which was regarded as highly efficacious for the restoration of alienated affection.

In a recent work concerning the lady, M. Funck-Brentano says that this brew made the king deadly ill. The point to note is that when he recovered the new star waned; only, however, to be succeeded by another. The latter, Angélique de Fontanges, a very pretty maid of honour, so entranced the volatile heart of Louis that the prestige of the favourite was menaced as never before. In her rage she determined to kill them both, and at once she was back in those cellars, haunting those dens, consulting with artists in death, making her plans, and expending in the preliminaries nearly a million of money.

From these attentions Louis, of course, escaped, but Angélique died. Then the details of the plot, obtained by the secret service, were, together with the confessions of the various artists and assistants, submitted to the king. What happened to the accomplices is unimportant. Some of them were promptly broken on the wheel; others lived for years—one of them for forty—chained by the foot in subterranean cells. With Madame de Montespan, mother of children of the house of France, nothing very serious could be done. She was thanked for her good offices and invited to retire into a convent, where ultimately she died, quite like a saint.

Meanwhile the taste for poisons increased. There was barely a woman of rank who was not suspected of trying to get her husband out of the way. Many grandes dames were tried; some were convicted; others, including the Duchesse de Bouillon, were requested to amuse themselves elsewhere. But while the taste increased the mode improved. Powders ceased to be fashionable. It was no longer considered elegant to put arsenic in food. A drinking-cup was devised which turned wine into venom. Modern science has denied that such a cup could be. Another invention was a looking-glass. Its properties were such that anybody who looked in one fell dead. Modern science has denied the possibility of that magic. Modern science is very sceptical. It has routed many a beautiful legend. By way of compensation, it has produced toxics which would have thrown the dilettanti of the Renaissance into stupors of admiration.

Consider, for instance, the micro-organisms which cause disease. Speaking relatively, it is but the day before yesterday that science made their acquaintance. We all know now that the cause of this complaint and that is an insidious yet infinitesimal germ which, removed from the patient, can lead a separate and potentially virulent existence until, introduced into other circles, it infects anew. Given any of these terrific little things and a modern Medici could distribute viaticums as indetectably as Fate.

Within the bit of lignum vitæ which served Caracalla for heart there were concentrated the cruelty and the guile of a wilderness of tiger-cats. When the pretorians eliminated him they found in his luggage poisons supersufficient for the destruction of all the legions that he led. What fresh turpitudes he was devising history has omitted to relate. But this is clear: could he have foreseen the possibilities in microbes which we have suggested, mountains of poisons would have seemed to him paltry.

Apart from these possibilities, any physician to-day who happened to be artistically inclined could adapt penalties to persons. In a lady, for instance, who had become superfluous, he could induce consumption. Consumption is a very ladylike disease. No gentlewoman, however sensitive, would be ashamed to die of it. Then there is gout. Gout is a highly aristocratic complaint. Any self-respecting snob in whom it was induced would succumb to it with thanksgiving.

Of possibilities and powers such as these the past knew nothing. By way of compensation it possessed poisons that were perfumes. Their odour perverted the imagination and stained the thoughts. They turned conceptions of right into wrong and made the unholy adorable. They drove matrons mad and senators madder.

Long since, these perfumes have evaporated. In their stead are corrosives just as coercive. Catalogued as libel and slander, they are quite as convenient as the cantarella of the Borgias and even more maleficent than microbes. These are the poisons that are modish to-day. Such is modern progress.

CLARET AND CREAM

THE British Academy of Letters has, we learn, become a fact. We learn, also, that its object is uncertain. To others, perhaps, yet not to us. In the cannibal South Seas old people are knocked on the head. That is quite as it should be. Old people are tenacious of their ideas. In killing them off progress is facilitated. England is eminently conservative. Instead of filling cemeteries with the decrepit she furnishes an academy for them. So are the just rewarded; so, too, is conservatism maintained.

In the circumstances there is no good and valid reason why we should not have an academy in the States—but on different lines; for that matter, on lines so ample that the clothes-line would not be omitted from them.

What we require are not the arrière-pensées of age but the frank enthusiasms of beauty. It is only from the young that one really learns, and one learns best from those who are gracious. Highways are trodden and sterile. It is in the pampas, the savannahs, the forest primeval, in lands that are virgin and minds fresh as they, that Nature gives utterance to her thoughts.

We cannot listen to her too often. She has always something new to say, or, if not new, then something so old that it seems quite novel. But it is only to the young that she says it. In default of her, let us listen to them, and, with that object, form an academy of those who have done nothing.

There are plenty of them. From the tons of manuscript—unsolicited and with stamps enclosed—which we see daily dumped on editorial desks, we think it safe to assume that out of the wilderness light shall come. In any event, it is clear that there are enough amateurs in our midst to stock academies by the cityful.

They have, indeed, done nothing yet. But therein is their charm. An academy composed of young people who have done nothing yet would be more alluring than one made up of fossils who are unable to do anything more.

Such an academy would be ideal and its establishment easy. Any one of the multitudinous millionairesses whom we behold floating about could usher it into being with but the wave of a cheque. Then, quite like Sappho at Mitylene, she could beckon about her clusters of fair young women, who, from kissable lips would instruct the world in the arts of love and life.

What more could the heart desire? Those kissable lips would tell us what we have long since learned to forget—that we all make a great fuss over things which are not worth bothering about; that constancy, for instance, which we always exact and never accord, is the result of nothing more than an absence of imagination. That would be very good for the first lesson; for there is nothing so tiresome as a woman without imagination, except a woman who has too much.

Those kissable lips, in dilating on the subject, would cite apposite examples, among others, a recent case perhaps, in which a pistol shot, fired in the dead of night, reverberated through the small talk of the land. The echoes, subsiding, dwindled, it is true, into the nothing from which they had sprung. But, assuming that a shot there had been, what an endearing homily could be drawn on the tastefulness and tactfulness of those who, for bagatelles such as this, do their worst to raise the roof. "Il fait beau aujourd'hui," a French caricaturist made one English lord say to another, "allons tuer quelque chose." There are people who are just as eager the moment the domestic sky is obscured.

A fine rebuke they would get from fair women, and fine applause, too, would be bestowed on the gentleman who, discovered behind the curtains of a boudoir, and being noisily asked by the husband what he was doing there, answered, with an assurance entirely Apollonian: "I am taking a walk."

In this way we should acquire instruction, not merely in manners, but in repartee. As a people we need it. As a people we are, of course, delightful; but we are neither witty nor well bred. By way of compensation we are highly moral, or think ourselves so, which amounts to quite the same thing. Our novels are padded with purity and scenery and our newspapers with hypocrisy and cant. Were proof of our morality required, there it is. But through some defect of the climate—unless it be of the schools—we lack the higher morality which was inculcated by Epicurus, by Epictetus, by one of the popes, Boniface VIII., and which consists in accepting with gaiety and indulgence such accidents as we cannot avoid. But not a bit of it. We make the mistake of taking ourselves seriously when there is nothing earthly worth taking seriously at all—except, indeed, the quality of the champagne which we drink and the giving and the acceptance of invitations to dine.

Apropos whereto those fair women would have a word or two for the metropolitan hostess. They would tell her that, of all forms of iniquity, dining is the most barbarous. In primitive days people fed in common through fear of being attacked. As often as not the fear was justified. Nowadays people feed in common through the more dreadful fear of being bored, and succeed very perfectly in becoming so. "Venez messieurs," said a numbered Louis of France, "allons nous ennuyer ensemble." That is the way modern invitations read. Yet, since such things must be, those who love righteousness without abhorring mammon should throw out the sweets. In this sanitary age flattery is the only variety that can be hygienically assimilated. Of that the least among us can never have enough.

In discussing our modes, caprices, passions, and disillusions — which is about all we can call our very own, except, indeed, our further charm—the fact, as Goethe noted, that we are all of us capable of crime—though it be but that of bad taste, which is assuredly the worst of all—in discussing these things those fair women would pass from grave to gay and display for us the bewilderments and witcheries of life as it is.

They would show us that it is a continuous catastrophe. They would show us that, whether it be that of an individual or of a nation, life is but a diffusion of stupidity and vulgarity. The showing would not be cheerful, but it would have the merit of being exact.

They would not stop there either. From the premises advanced it would be logical and agreeable to assume that life on earth is a sort of leprosy, the result, perhaps, of a morbid secretion from which healthy planets are immune.

And, after all, why not? Sir Robert Ball, not long since, informed us that, within the relatively narrow sphere to which observation is confined, there are not less than three hundred million worlds. Beyond the uttermost of these worlds there are other planets, other systems, other suns. Wherever imagination, in its weariness, would set a limit, there is space begun.

In view of which, and of more, too, it becomes humorous to suppose that the vulgarity and stupidity on exhibition here are indefinitely repeated throughout space. On the moon life there may be. The moon was once part of the earth. It may, in consequence, have been infected with the original complaint. It is possible, also, that, through atmospheric and aqueous affinities, Mars has been exposed to the same disease. From Venus and Mercury science has discovered that such affinities have been withheld. But of the other worlds and systems we know so little that it is idle to attempt to know less.

Yet, though one and all of these worlds move in a mystery which is due to our ignorance, we may pierce it with the hope that they have been preserved from the bewilderments and witcheries of which life on this planet is the cause.

In displaying these things the cluster of fair young women would indicate the forethought of Providence, which has provided us with ample compensations. For there are compensations. There are two of them—and two is a good many.

The first is evil. We do not appreciate evil at its worth. It is the handicraft of Satan. We do not appreciate him as we should. He is a great artificer. He is more; he is a great artist. It was he who created this compensation, which is a jewel, a luxury, and a necessity in one. And naturally. Evil is the counterpart of excellence. Both have their roots in nature. One could not be destroyed without the other. For every shape of evil there is a corresponding form of good. Virtue would be meaningless were it not for vice. Beauty would have no charm were it not for ugliness. Genius would have no message were it not for bores.

Evil is, therefore, a jewel, and highly salutary at that. Were it eliminated from the scheme of things life would have no savour and joy no delight. Existence would provide the monotony of silence. Happiness and unhappiness would be synonymous states.

The other jewel which Providence has set in our tiara is superstition. What would we do without that? A superstition is a hope. Besides, is it not nicer to be wrong in a given belief than not to have it at all? Of course it is. We believe what we wish, never what we should.

It is fortunate that we can. Were it otherwise, the vitriol which science has thrown at faith would have set society mad. But not a bit of it. Society turned its back. The attitude is commendable, for it is on superstition that we all subsist—superstition by day, dreams at night.

Superstition covers a multitude of stupidities. But it is ductile and plastic. It lends itself to combinations which are as marvellous as they are enchanting. We are indebted to it for the masterpieces of art, for the splendour of cathedrals, for the seductions of song, for real literature and good verse. We owe to it everything, even to the amenities of life. Superstition is the essential ingredient of everything that is charming. It is the basis of ethics and the foundation of beauty. It has decorated life and robbed death of its grotesqueness. It is, therefore, in accordance with the order of things and the necessities of man.

Truth, on the other hand, is vicious. We may sigh for it, but it is best that we should sigh in vain. Truth is hard. It is rigid. It is not ductile nor is it plastic. It does not yield. It is vicious, and, being vicious, it bites. Get in its way, and, unless you have had the forethought to antisepticise yourself with indifference, it will cause a hydrophobia for which the only Pasteur Institute is time.

Superstition is just the reverse. It is amiable and consolatory. It is, indeed, a jewel. We should hold fast to it. We should hold fast to what we may and not try to prove anything.

From maxims of this fastidious morality deductions follow. It will be seen that life is not all that fancy might paint it. It will be suspected that its compensations are not as compensatory as they look. From these premises it will be argued that there must be an error somewhere, a big mistake, a stitch dropped from the original scheme of things, a blunder, extending back, perhaps, to the parturitions of the primal protoplasm.

Such argument is entirely valid. We esteem ourselves at a value which we do not possess; for no reason other than innate conceit we fancy ourselves advanced. That fancy is so comforting that with it we have developed an idolatry of the most amusing kind. We have developed the worship of self. The unction of that worship is so thick that through it we fail to see how stupid we look. We fail to see that the most gracious and indulgent sentiment which we can have for ourselves is not esteem but contempt. We have not advanced; we have deviated. It is not from apes that we should have descended, though better, perhaps, apes than reptiles; yet, had evolution had us really in its charge, instead of being superior animals we should be human butterflies, subsisting on dew and desire, with youth, winged and beautiful, for the crown and conclusion of life.

A life such as that, untroubled by dentists, unburdened by tailors, untrammelled by bills, unencumbered by bores, a life free, volatile, and quasi-divine, a life passed among flowers and suave perfumes, a life of sheer poetry which, but for some archaic error, might have been ours—a life such as that, however fantastic, would, to say the least, be more agreeable than one such as this, in which we do little of more importance than assist with the passivity which good breeding requires at the loss of our illusions, our umbrellas, and our hair.

Et voilà, et cetera, and so forth.

It is cups of claret and cream of this order that, in the ideal academy which we advocate, clusters of fair women would convey, and, in conveying, uplift.

For women, particularly when pretty, are the natural instructors of man. Their intuitions are more valuable than the certainties of mathematics, their insight surer than the demonstrations which logic provides. They are abundantly lacking in sense, it is true. But when has reason governed the world? It is by the heart-strings alone that men can be pulled, and it is only women that can do it. In addition, they have the immense advantage of being all alike, in that they are, every one of them, different. And a cluster of them delivering the messages of nature, to whom, through that weakness which is their strength, they are nearer than man, would constitute not merely an ideal academy, but give the world fresh conceptions of beauty and therewith a taste, as yet uncultivated, for claret and cream.

HUMAN HYENAS

The lives of good men are handsomely bound and never read—by ourselves at least—though no doubt there are people to whom they constitute a source of severe satisfaction. Conversely the lives of bad men have yet to appear. When they do, the fascination of their charm will be that which attaches to the abnormal. For though hyenas alarm they also attract. In history as in romance it is the shudder that tells. In menageries and zoos it is the wildest beast that obtains the best attention.

Quite naturally too. There are so few beasts now that are not entirely tame. By the same token shudders were never more scarce. Contemporaneous crime is very commonplace. But occasionally, by accident, something out of the ordinary will occur, and then even the virtuous take to reading about it. Particularly if there be a woman in the case. Yet it is only, in addition to petticoats, when murder and mystery are agreeably fused that you feel you are getting your money's worth.

That, too, is natural. There is nothing so comforting as a good old-fashioned murder. There is nothing so poetic either. For behind it is an effort to outwit destiny, the attempt to change the course of events, and to change them after the fashion of fate, indetectably.

The idea of being able to do all that is highly poetic. But it is also primitive. Primitive man had three or four ideas. Civilised man has not many more. With this difference, however. Primitive man, disturbed in his ideas, vanished. In his place there sprang a beast. That beast civilised man has quelled. But not exterminated. The brute is among us still. Yet so tame that the majority of us forget that he is about. It takes a murder to remind us of him.

Murder is neozoic. It shows a relapse of nature. The murderer may have in his appearance nothing resembling the cave-dweller, yet behind appearances—always illusory—is the troglodyte. Through causes generally reducible to crises of the emotions the creature's few ideas become disturbed. Then abruptly the being apparently civilised evaporates. He has gone. In his place is the hyena. There is a shriek.

A silence. The next morning the papers are full of it.

That is the ordinary case. There are others. There are crimes in which there is no atavism. There are murders incidental to the abstract sciences; felonies of the professional order. These are accidents. According to statistics—and what should we do without them?—in the Benighted States there occurred last year nearly nine thousand cases appertaining to this and to the former variety. That is a nice showing. In addition, there are murders effected by men who are not professional or primitive, but wise. Concerning these we have no data. They leave none. They leave nothing except now and again a death which is attributed to natural causes. These people are not hyenas. They are men of ability. They are very interesting. There is another class more interesting still. They form the coterie of criminals who are above the law. We will get to them in a minute.

Meanwhile, in ordinary cases, just prior to the shriek, to the silence, and to the headlines in the papers, there occur, almost invariably, certain phenomena which are perhaps worth noting.

First is a condition of irritability induced by a disturbance of ideas. From this condition paralysis of memory results. The patient forgets the past and its lessons, the present and its penalties. In his mind there is a complete obliteration of all knowledge, except the fact that some particular person is offensively occupied in continuing to be. That fact, increasing the irritation, induces a state quasi-somnambulistic. Of all the cells of the brain there is but one that is awake. Over the others sleep has slipped. But in that cell is an incitement inciting the patient to kill.

Then it is that there ensues the shriek and the succeeding silence. But before the reporters get to work other phenomena have occurred. Paralysis subsides. Somnambulism ceases. There is an immediate awakening of the entire brain. The past with its lessons returns. On its heels the present and its penalties troop. In their sudden rush the troglodyte dematerialises. Civilised man reappears. The patient sees what he has done, and, seeing, it seems to him that another must have done it.

He is right. The mind has many a cellar. In them strange tenants prowl. Beneath the brain are the caves of subconsciousness. There, influences that we know nothing of, impulses which the majority of us never feel, watch and wait. Our individuality is dual. Half our being is unaware what the other half is about. In normal condition man is a bundle of ideas and sensations arranged in order and sequence. But in certain crises of the emotions the orderly arrangement gets twisted, ideas and sensations become displaced, and from the individual, ordinarily normal, emerges the human hyena.

Usually the beast is subordinated, controlled, but never banished. It is there crouching in the caves of the soul. A distinguishing trait of the gentleman is that he never betrays its presence. A thinker is too philosophic. Hence the value of blue blood. Hence, also, the beauty of sound logic. But when in pathological conditions, induced by causes as yet obscure, the other, the simian, the secreted self, breaks loose, then there is the devil to pay and something to read about in the papers.

That, perhaps, is the psychology of every night murder. Among savans there is nothing of this. A trick merely with clogged dice. Among professionals there is some of the first and much of the latter. In the criminals who are above the law both elements are present with power added.

Power consists in having a million bayonets behind you. Its diffusion is not general. But there are people who possess it. For one, the German Kaiser. Not long since somebody or other diagnosed in him the habitual criminal. We doubt that he is that. But we suspect that, were it not for the press, he would show more of primitive man than he has thus far thought judicious.

Tsi An, the Empress Regent of China, has been less circumspect. As you may remember, a few summers ago, this lady succeeded in throwing us all into fits. Subsequently we derived much pleasure from an article by Lombroso, in which he catalogued her foremost among historic beasts. The naïvete of that seemed to us refreshing.

The lady is not, perhaps, one whom we should care to meet in the dark, but there are corridors in which we have encountered a number of people beside whom she is quite an engaging person. Take, for instance, Caligula. There you have an artist in blood, a connoisseur in crime, a ruler to whom general fiendishness was both a governmental necessity and a personal delight. And take Caracalla. A thinker has said that no mortal is wholly vile. Caracalla was.

He had not a taste, not a vice that was not washed and rewashed in blood. Beside a savage such as he and a saurian such as Caligula the old woman in China looks rather cheap.

There are others! In particular, there is Attila. Where he passed, the earth remained for ages bare. The whirlwind that he loosed swept civilisation like a broom. In the echoes of his passage you catch but the crash of falling cities, the cries of the vanquished, the death-rattle of nations, the surge and roar of seas of blood. In their reverberations Attila looms, dragging the desert after him, tossing it like a pall on the face of the world. In the fury with which he pounced on antiquity there is the impersonality of a cyclone. By comparison with the havoc which he wrought, the contortions of Caracalla become unimportant caprices. Beside this human avalanche Caligula dwindles ridiculously. "But who are you:" a startled prelate found the strength to gasp. Said Attila, "I am the Scourge of God."

Another fine fiend was Tamerlane. In the menagerie of history he is thoroughly red—red with what Marlowe called war's rich livery. It was part of him. When he was born his hands were full of blood. Subsequently, when he did not wade in it, it formed his usual bath. In his career is the monotony of the infernal regions. It is made up of groans. Yet then he knew but one thing—how to kill. He came, saw, slaughtered, and departed. When he had gone he left nothing—"at most," an old writer says, "a dumb sound like a drum beaten under a blanket." Beside that sound what are the tom-toms of Tsi An?

For that matter, what are they beside the timbrels of the Tsar Ivan, who, though quite demoniac, fancied himself divine. "I am your god," he announced to some wretches for whom he was preparing a hurried execution. "I am your god, as God is mine." Whether the announcement consoled them is immaterial. The theory of it delighted him. At Novgorod, for no reason whatever other than the exercise of his divinity, he began a leisurely massacre that outlasted a month. Every noon, from five hundred to a thousand people were driven before him and poignantly despatched. Occasionally he lent a hand, running his subjects through and through, killing them like so many vermin, laughing mightily at the stupidity of their agony, and, when his wrist wearied, ordering them off to tall gibbets, to seething vats, or, more expeditiously, drowning them wholesale in the river. Sometimes a mob of people were strung up by the heels. Sometimes they were hacked to pieces. Sometimes they were first strung up a bit, then hacked a little, and, finally, tossed into the vats. Sometimes also a pack of hounds was unleashed, and as Ivan eyed the fight of men and dogs the hyena within awoke, his own fangs glistened, and with a roar he would bury them in a subject's throat. Nor was he without humour. An envoy of the King of Poland presumed to appear before him with his hat on. By way of rebuke he had that hat nailed to the envoy's head.

The rebuke was not perhaps what we call epigrammatic. But at least it was to the point. It made up in irony what it lacked in paradox. Tamerlane would have enjoyed it. So, too, would Cesare Borgia.

There is another hyena. Ivan was human. He had his weaknesses. Among them were seven wives. In Cesare Borgia there was nothing human. The caverns of history hold monsters more masterful than he, but none more cold-blooded. To every hyena there come moments of repletion and fatigue. With these moments come a desire for rest. When the beast is fed he is at peace with the world. Cesare Borgia was never fed. As we have elsewhere noted, he was never weary. He was without nerves, without heart, without weaknesses of any kind. Beside him other fiends, including the Empress Tsi An, look rather vulgar.

The candle which that woman holds to Philip II. is not much of a dip either. That demon who presided over the better part of the globe, over an entire eclipse of the intellect as well, who made it blasphemous to think, and who, squatting in the Escorial, dissolved into a mass of mud, knew no pleasure—save that of motioning people out of existence—and never smiled, save at the human fireworks which the auto-da-fés flared for him on holidays.

In the perspectives of chronicles Philip, Ivan, Tamerlane, and the rest loom like ogres in a fairy tale. They affright, but they detain. There is nothing commonplace about them. They are the antithesis of the humdrum, homicidal maniacs, with death for delirium and the world for cell, the real hyenas, unmatchable, without lineage, whose successors shall never be. For the present at least. The times are too trite. There are none like them any more. By comparison Tsi An is but a vicious child. Much as we otherwise admire the lady, we cannot connive at Lombroso's effort to boost her to where they stand.

Seen through contemporaneous records Tsi An is a bad woman. But women, however bad, are never as bad as bad men. They may have the desire, but they lack the nerve. Tsi An could not face the allies.

The feminine in her took fright. A male hyena would have stood his ground, only to lose it perhaps, and his head as well. Yet, though he fell, it would have been in the roar of cannon, in the shriek of shell, defiant and hyenaesque to the last. It is of such stuff as this that fiends and heroes are made. They are not afraid. Tsi An was not either. Except of danger. It is that exception which debars her from mounting to the glorious menagerie where the other beasts are.

"What is glory?" a young barbarian asked an old Roman. "To create splendour," the latter replied, "or to destroy it." To-day destructive ability is lacking. Power, even when backed by bayonets, is powerless before the press. There you have the great deterrent. The press is not destructive. It stands for nothing that is. It is for this reason that crime, though continuous, is commonplace. In descending the centuries it has degenerated into a condition sometimes interesting, occasionally exciting, but symptomatic of a disease, for which, in the advance of therapeutics, a prophylactic some day or other will be devised.

When that day comes — when it does — the triteness that the morning papers will display makes us yawn in advance.

THE COURTS OF LOVE

THE 'varsities are changing their chairs. It is high time. When we went to school we were taught everything it was easiest to forget. Our curriculum comprised the largest possible number of subjects of which the least possible use could be made. No doubt they were designed for our good. Yet we are unable to conjecture what difference it would have made had they been intended for our harm. We are unable to recall a single one of them.

Now, however, things are looking up. Oxford, for instance, is throwing out Greek. In the States generally, instead of the mummeries of the classics there are modern tongues and history in lieu of calculus. That is all very well. But the change is susceptible of improvement.

Learning is not fashionable. Society has a great contempt for it. If you do not believe us go and see. You will find it stupid to be wise all alone. For alone you will be. The more you know the more diligently you will be avoided. And very naturally. When your Red Badge of Culture does not put your hostess to sleep, it makes her feel ignorant. Neither proceeding is societyfied.

No, indeed. A knowledge of history, however superficial, will not bring you invitations to dinner. It is the same with languages. You may develop into a polyglot and die a bounder. The majority of us want to see our names in the papers. The ambition is quite noble, and highly American. But an acquaintance with Cicero, and even with Carnegie, won't help you to it.

It is for this reason that the change in chairs is susceptible of improvement. The better advancement and future prospects of the youth of the land demand that universities shall throw out history and languages as already they are throwing classics and calculus, and in their stead provide courses on What's What. And what is there but love and lucre?

These two little things are the motor forces of society. Beside them, barring the fashions and the charm of médisance—we say médisance because it sounds so much more cosmopolitan than tittle-tattle—nothing counts. No, nothing. Moreover, they are as potent and disintegrating as radium. Then, too, instruction regarding them is really diverting. Students who take them up will not merely learn something, they will remember it.

To be rich, for instance, seems complex. It is very simple. In an educational magazine, not long ago, Professor Carnegie, Professor Depew, and other savans indicated the process. According to Professor Carnegie you must push. Manners do not make the millionaire. Professor Depew advocated economy. A dollar in the bank is worth two on a margin. Professor Mills advised not more than eight hours' sleep. The other fellow must not catch you napping. Professor Morgan recommended investments. We believe that he has a few to unload. Now add all that up, and wealth, which looked complex, becomes easy as ping-pong.

Love is different. To love and to be loved seems simple. It is an art in itself. An art did we say? It is a philosophy, a theosophy, a pansophy in one. It is a science whereby the world, the flesh and the devil, the solar system, the universe—including what little we know of it and all that we do not—are reduced to a single being.

Sometimes to two beings. Occasionally to three. But though that number is odd there is no luck in it. It is dangerous in addition to being inconvenient. You never have a spare moment, and are obliged to lie like a thief. Two are less exasperating. Even with one carefully selected being your hands are apt to be pretty full. When that being is legally your very own you will find it advantageous to confine your attentions to her. Anyway, it is generally admitted that it is better to have loved your wife than never to have loved at all.

These remarks, of course, are purely ethical. Love is not that by a long shot. Love is a vicious little chap. He is essentially selfish, and, though little, the biggest tyrant out. A statue is not more callous. A hyena is less cruel. Personally, we should prefer a cobra about the house. A cobra you can elude. But not a bore —with civility at least—and when that little chap is not sticking pins in you he rivals our best selling novelists in the art of boring you stiff.

These observations have a false air of originality which, as is our duty, we hasten to disclaim. They have all history for support. Out of mythology,—and even there apart from the account which Apuleius gave of Cupid and Pysche,—there is not a single story of happily begun and happily ending love. No, not one. As pages turn and faces emerge, always when they are not weeping they are yawning.

Why? Because love is not merely a philosophy. It is a poem whose strophes age cannot construe and youth cannot scan. Because of all subjects it is the most discussed and the least understood. Because it consists in the affection of someone else. Because affections are like slippers, they will wear out. Because the angel who at twenty appeals at thirty has been known to appal.

At the opera now and then you may, if you are in luck, hear Cherubino ask the ladies who stand about to tell him what love is. The ladies make no answer. Not because they are rude. Still less because they are ignorant. But because Mozart did not care to have them disturb the innocence of the lad with an aria to the effect that love is the fusion of two egotisms. Truth should be charming or else withheld.

Truth is the residuum of the sciences known as exact. Among these sciences love, once upon a time, just escaped admittance. By way of compensation it was codified. What is more to the point, the code became law. Judgments in accordance therewith were rendered in courts open and plenary.

In 1907 these courts are to be revived. They are to be revived for the pleasure, it may be, but certainly for the instruction, of visitors to an exposition which is to be then held in Milan. You may have wondered what we were driving at. There is the reason of these remarks. There, too, is a tip for St Louis. There also, perhaps, is the model of the schooling which the youth of our country lack.

We inject that "perhaps" because we are sceptical by trade. But we live in hopes. Meanwhile, Milan being remote, 1907 far away, and St Louis uncertain, a summary of the instruction may contain a few hints.

The elements of this instruction are rumoured to have originated in Broceliande, a country which, as everybody knows, lies somewhere within the confines of the Arthurian myth. By whom they were evolved is undetermined. But it has been authoritatively suspected that they were cradled in the manuals of pure courtesy with which chivalry was familiar and which society has forgot. Anyway, they once existed, and existing filtered into Provence, where a parliament of peeresses did them over into a pandect, of which the statutes survive. Here are some of them. By way of commentary we may note that licit means lawful, and illicit the reverse. There is nothing like making things clear. But oyez:

It is illicit to kiss and tell.

It is illicit to love anyone whom it would be illicit to marry.

It is illicit to love two at a time.

It is licit to be loved by two, by three, by any number.

It is illicit to be open-armed and close-fisted.

It is licit for a woman to love her husband—if she can.

It is illicit for a lover to do aught that might displease his lady.

It is licit for a lady to be less circumspect. Et cetera, and so forth.

These statutes, always candid, sometimes are profound. They disclose an understanding of the heart and its subtleties. It was over matters of this delicate nature that the Courts of Love claimed—and exercised—jurisdiction. The judges were dames of high degree. At the time, in cases of tort and even of felony, the lord of a fief possessed the right of justice, high and low. But there are crimes now which the law cannot reach. It was the same way then. There were, and are, contentions which no mere male, however enfieffed, may adjust. It was to remedy this defect that the wives of the seigneurs erected tribunals of their own. Their strength was their weakness. They were pretty, and that appealed. They were patrician, and that appeased. They took themselves seriously too, and that must have been very satisfactory. Moreover, if not always clement, occasionally they were quaint.

Here is an instance. A confidant charged by a friend with messages of love found the young person so much to his taste that he addressed her in his own behalf. Instead of being repulsed his advances were encouraged. Whereupon the injured party brought suit. The prothonotary of the court relates that the plaintiff, having humbly prayed that the fraud be submitted to the Countess of Champagne, the latter, sitting in banco with sixty dames, heard the complaint, and after due deliberation handed down the following decision:—"It is ordered that the defendants be henceforth debarred from the frequentation of honest people."

Here is another case. A knight was commanded by his lady not to say or do anything publicly in her praise. It so fell about that her name was lightly taken. The knight challenged the defamer. Thereupon the lady contended that he had forfeited all claim to her regard. Action having been brought the court decided that the defence of a lady is never illicit, and it was ordered that the knight be rehabilitated in favour and reinstated in grace. Which, the prothonotary avers, was done.

But how? There is the beautiful part of it. To the Courts of Love no sheriffs were attached. Judgments were enforced not by a constabulary but by the community. Disregard of a decision entailed not loss of liberty but loss of caste. In the case of a man there was exclusion from the field. Entrance was denied him at the tournaments. In the case of a woman the drawbridges were up. Throughout the land there was no one to receive her. As a result the delinquent was rare. So, too, was contempt of the jurists.

Such were the Courts of Love. Women then did more or less as they saw fit, and it was in order that they might do what was fittest that those tribunals were established. They had another purpose. In guiding the affections they educated them. Women were admonished to love and instructed how to. They were taught, we will assume, that they who please generally fail to please profoundly. They were further taught, we will also assume, that to please profoundly a woman should never let herself be wholly known. Even in her kisses there should be mystery. Moreover, they were taught, or ought to have been, that when to mystery there be added uncertainty, and the two be sufficiently fused, then the party of the second part is not merely profoundly pleased but confoundedly perplexed. The poor devil does not know where he is at.

For of all things mystery and perplexity disturb the imagination most. Of all factors in an enduring affection the most potent is imagination. The woman who leaves a man nothing to bother about leaves him nothing to dread. Inconstancy is the result. The brute turns to pastures new.

But the woman of whom a man is never sure has him crazy about her for the rest of his wretched career. He feels that he could cut his throat for her. When a man does not feel that way he has no feeling at all.

Maxims of this fastidious morality were, we assume without effort, handed out in the Courts of Love. But pupils, however diligent, make mistakes. Though the decisions, decretals, and mandates of the courts were highly ethical, equitable also and instructive as well, occasionally misadventures occurred. Of these one which has been disinterred from a medieval manuscript may serve as instance. It runs as follows:—

"My Lord Raymond of Roussillon was a brave baron. His wife, the Lady Marguerite, was the fairest woman in the land, the most gifted and serene. It happened that William of Cabstaing, a poor knight's son, came to the court of my Lord Raymond and asked that he be received as varlet there. My Lord Raymond, seeing that he was handsome and hardy, welcomed him and told him that he might remain. William did so, and comported himself so well that my lord made him page to my lady. Now it so fell about that one day the page composed for the Lady Marguerite the song which says:

"'Sweet are the thoughts
Which love awakes in me.'

"When Raymond of Roussillon heard that song he sent for William, led him far from the castle, cut off his head, put it in a basket, cut his heart out, and put it in the basket too. Then Raymond returned to the castle. He had the heart roasted and served at table to his wife, and made her eat it without knowing what it was. When the meal was over, Raymond stood up and told his wife that what she had eaten was the heart of the Knight William, and fetched and showed her the head, and asked her if the heart had tasted well. She understood what he said. She saw and recognised the head of the Knight William and, answering, she replied that the heart had been so good and appetising that never other food or other drink should take from her mouth the savour which it had left there. Raymond ran at her with his sword. She fled away, threw herself from a balcony, and broke her skull.

"All this was told throughout the realm of Aragon. The King Alphonse and all his barons and all his counts had great grief at the death of the knight and of the lady whom Raymond had so abominably destroyed. They made war on him, and having taken him and his castle, and slain him there, the King Alphonse erected at Perpignan a monument to William and to Marguerite, and all perfect lovers prayed for their souls."

A gentleman never sees or hears anything that was not intended for him. The lesson in pure courtesy which Raymond got from Alphonse was well deserved. But it was insufficient. He should have had his ghost kicked. At the same time, if episodes such as that are to be given in the revival of the Courts of Love, we would not miss it for a farm.

BLUEBEARD

In the music-maddened nights of a generation ago there was imported for the benefit of old New Yorkers, who then were young, a little dish. The importation was effected, and served too perhaps, by way of finish to the banquets of delight which the opera seria provided. The dish was "Barbe Bleue." In was light and palatable. It suggested nothing so much as cream beaten with champagne into an ethereal foam. It left none of the after taste of truffles and red pepper which the more gorgeous fare produced. It expressed, as music should, that which cannot be told and concerning which it is impossible to be silent. Yet, though it charmed, it did not satisfy. It surprised and evoked. For who was this chimerically-bearded prince, who sang so deliciously and behaved so ill, who married and murdered so melodiously? From what land did he come? And was it all real or was it romance?

These problems shuttled the score. At this late date we can hardly look back and swear that they kept us awake, but with due regard to that love of truth which is our main consolation we may conscientiously affirm that, in the pauses of later interludes, they returned, as problems will return, demanding solution, exacting research, until, now, here at last, they are to have their way.

For Bluebeard was no more a creation of Offenbach—or for that matter of Perrault—than Don Juan was a creation of Mozart or even of Molière. These two great figures really lived, yet Bluebeard the more astonishingly. According to the documents contained in what is technically known as his procès-verbal—on which, parenthetically, our friend and brother-in-letters, J. K. Huysmans, some time since laid violent hands — his name was Gilles de Retz, and, at a period contemporaneous to the apparition of Jeanne d'Arc, he was seigneur of the domain of Tiffauges and, therewith, seigneur de lieux dont j'ignore le compte.

The domain of Tiffauges squats in an edge of Brittany. The manor is still there. Its towers have tottered, the moat is choked, the drawbridge has crumbled. But the massive wings of the keep—festooned with lichens and astragaled with moss—extend intact. The interior rhymes with the walls. There are high baronial halls, contracted cells, narrow corridors, a stairway which cavalry could mount, other stairs precipitately spiral, a circular gallery where the guard was stationed, a chapel in which a choir sang, a silence which you can feel, an odour of ruin, a sensation of chill, a savour of things dead and damned, an impression of space, of shapes of sin, of monstrous crimes, of sacrilege and sorcery.

To-day the castle is a skeleton. Yet in the days that were it must have been sumptuously if strangely splendid, a succession of elaborate suites hung with exquisite tapestries, furnished with that art which only the fifteenth century knew, set with combinations of woods, colours, leathers, silks, and metals, decorated with amazing frescoes, with scenes of pagan love and pastoral affections. There, amid the blare of fanfares and the swirl of plumes, Gilles de Retz held court and, while he was about it, other things too.

The chronicles of the day unite in describing him as insolently rich and alarmingly good-looking, a fine chap, a brave soldier, unfathomably devout, serving featly his God and loyally his king—so loyally that at the tolerably adolescent age of twenty-five Charles VII. created him Marshal of France. The point to be noted, though, is that devoutness. At the time an epidemic of mysticism, induced by the occurrences connected with Jeanne d'Arc—with whom, by the way, he had assisted at the siege of Orleans — infected the doct. It infected Gilles. The fever of it accentuated his fervour. He surrounded himself with prelates, enlarged his choir, alternated between mass and meditation, aspired to union with the supersensible, imitated the inimitable life.

Existence then was not what it had been before or what it had since become. For noblesse oblige read noblesse neglige. The lords and gentry were lack-lustre brutes, ignorant as carps, without other aims than dice, without other ambitions than brawls. Gilles de Retz had as much in common with them as they had with him. He was a scholar, a musician, and a poet. In an age in which no one read he wrote. In an age in which the best music was the click of swords he preferred the hum of harps. In an age in which the foremost diversion was drink he collected curious missals, startling gems, and surprising birds. Within the moat pink flamingoes brooded and about it white peacocks flocked. He delighted in the conversation of thinkers, in the observations of artists, in the subtleties of metaphysicians. In his large and splendid castle he entertained magnificently all who came, providing not merely open house, but the spectacle of a great noble living nobly, a prince properly presented, one who had his own men-at-arms, his own garrison, and therewith pages, squires, knights, deans, vicars, choristers, and, above and beyond these, the right of justice high and low.

To-day the castle crouches sullenly. In the meagre hamlet at its base there are women who cross themselves at mention of its former lord. To them he is Barbe Bleue. Not the Bluebeard of the lyric stage nor yet the Bluebeard of the fairy tale, but the monster who maltreated and murdered.

It is the opinion of thinkers that the conscious gratification of the senses is an unconscious flight toward the ideal, that the most poignant excesses are engendered by a desire for the impossible, by aspirations for that felicity which is superterrestrial and divine. These premises accepted, it may be then that the gulf of blood which Gilles proceeded to undike is susceptible of explanation. But what was his own excuse? Or rather, by what sudden steps was the mystic converted into a reptile? The question seems complex. The answer is simple. It will be found in the limitations of wealth. During the progress of the war for which he had furnished troops, during the leisures of court, where in his quality of great noble he had advanced sums more or less imposing, and during the prodigalities at Tiffauges, where he resided in a fashion entirely regal, his patrimony had become tolerably fluid.

In an effort to maintain the splendour to which he was accustomed, he mortgaged fiefs, bartered farms, alienated domains, and even put jewels in pawn. His heirs took fright. Charles was petitioned to interfere. As a result, by letters patent Gilles de Retz was inhibited from further disposing of his property, and there suddenly was this sumptuous individual literally without a copper.

In epochs more modern and recent, individuals less sumptuous, perhaps, but equally prodigal, have found themselves in a similar plight. To remedy it some have taken to trade, some have taken to stocks. None of these avenues was open to Bluebeard. But at the time there was another and a wider one, an immense highway descending from the remotest past, but which latterly had dwindled into a blind alley with a dead wall at the end. In it was a group of savans, a congress of the wise men and charlatans of the day. Gilles joined them. Or, to be exact, those whom he could he lured to Tiffauges.

These people were called hermetics. They were in search of the alkahest which Hermes discovered and which had enabled the satraps of eld to create enchantments which the world no longer knows, to erect at will cities fairer than the uplands of dream, palaces more luminous than the twelve signs of the zodiac, and with them shimmering retrospects of paradise. The escaping memories of that alkahest Caligula had tried in vain to detain. Bacon sought them in alembics, Thomas Aquinas in ink.

Experiments not similar, but cognate, had resulted in the theory that at that later day success was impossible without the intervention and direct assistance of the Very Low. The secret had escaped too far, memories of it had been too long ablated, to be rebeckoned by natural means. For the recovery of the evaporated arcana it was necessary that Satan should be evoked.

Satan at that time was very real. The atmosphere was so heavy with his legions that spitting was an act of worship. In the gloom of the abbeys legates of his shouted tauntingly at the cowering monks: "Thou art damned!" In the cathedrals, through shudders of song, his voice had been heard inviting maidens to swell the red quadrilles of hell. From encountering him at every turn society had become used to his ways, and had imagined that pact whereby, in exchange for the soul, Satan agrees to furnish whatever is wanted.

For the sake of gold into that pact Gilles presently prepared to enter. The crucibles, retorts, aludels, and furnaces which the alchemists unpacked at Tiffauges cooked nothing which savoured, however slightly, of the alkahest. They were repacked, the alchemists dismissed, and, from the confines of the Sabbat, into the manor magicians trooped. Either the Very Low was then evoked or else they lied basely. It will be said that they lied. But may not the evocation of Satan consist less in actual apparition than in suffering evil to enter the heart, in suffering it to batten there until it has gnawed the finer fibres away, until it has made us as base as we have conceived Satan to be?

Something of that kind must have occurred in this horrible keep. Gilles De Retz became really possessed. Alchemy failing, the soul of the mystic turned a somersault, and where the saint had been the vampire emerged.

"There is," he announced, "no one on the planet who has dared what I have done." We believe him. It was under his hand that the real massacre of the innocents occurred. Satan was supposed to enjoy the blood of the young, and to minister to that taste Gilles killed boys and girls, stalking them as another stalks game. In eight years he bagged eight hundred. More perhaps, for he had not kept tally.

Meanwhile the country was devastated. Whereever he passed shepherds vanished and schoolgirls disappeared. His first victim was a little boy, whose heart he extracted, whose wrists he severed, whose eyes he dug out, and with whose blood he wrote an invocation to Satan. Then the list elongated immeasurably. That lair of his echoed with cries, dripped with gore, shuddered with sobs. The subterranean passages were turned into cemeteries, the high walls reeked with the odour of burning bones, and through them Bluebeard prowled, a virtuoso and vampire in one, conjecturing how he might destroy not merely bodies but souls, inventing fresh repasts of flesh, devising new tortures, savouring tears as yet unshed, and with them the spectacle of helpless agony, of unutterable fear, the contortions of little limbs, simultaneously subjected to hot irons and cold steel. It is said that some of the children cried very little but that the colour passed from their eyes.

There is a limit to all things earthly. Precisely as no one may attain perfection, so has sin its bounds. There are depths beneath which there is nothing deeper. To their ultimate plane Gilles de Retz descended. There, smitten perhaps with terror, he considered the possibility of groping back through penitent acts, pious endowments, and nights of prayer.

It was too late, however. The echo of the cries with which the castle rang had reverberated beyond. The odour of the calcinated had filtered through the land. The anguish of parents fused with these things, and so insistently that the conjunction of clamours and stenches reached Nantes, with, for result, the besieging of Tiffauges, the taking of Gilles, his arrest, imprisonment, public confession—a confession so monstrous that women fainted of fright, and a priest, rising in horror, veiled the face on a crucifix which hung from the wall—a confession followed by excommunication and the stake. Et ainsi fini l'histoire de Barbe Bleue.

Yet where in this super-Neronian history is Barbe Bleue? Surely Gilles de Retz is not the charming prince who married and murdered so melodiously? Surely he is not the Bluebeard whom we met in the nursery and who warned his wife not to see anything which was not intended for her; surely, in spite of certain vagaries, that noble hero was not this ignoble hyena.

And yet he was. Legend takes strange licences. Sometimes he will so smear a seraph that he will look like a fiend, and again it will make a villain look highly virtuous. Tiberius, we are convinced, never dreamed of the infamies which are imputed to him, and had the ghost of Washington any sense of humour, which is doubtful, it would be rather amused at the veneration in which his memory is held.

It was much the same thing with Gilles de Retz. The legend regarding him fattened on frescoes instead of on facts. Some years ago, in a Breton church which dates from the thirteenth century, there was found a series of mural paintings. In one you behold the marriage of a noble demoiselle to an equally noble seigneur. In the next there is the same seigneur. He is leaving his castle, and as he goes he entrusts to his wife a little key. The scenes which follow represent the lady peering into a room from the rafters of which six women hang. Then come the return of the lord, his questioning and menacing glance, the tears of the lady, her prayers to her sister, the alarm of the latter, the interruption of her brothers, and her rescue from sudden death.

The story which the frescoes tell still endures in Brittany. There is many another like it. One and all have Gilles de Retz for hero. Yet for the honour of his race, instead of his name, that of Bluebeard has been given.

So, at least, says Michelet. Michelet usually knew what he was talking about. He devoted forty years to his history of France. When he finished it he sighed and said: "I have swallowed too many vipers, too many kings."

Gilles de Retz must have been one of the former. In any event, Michelet had at his disposal texts which we lack. Lacking the texts, we lack also pretexts for differing with him. We assume, therefore, that it is as he has explained it. Moreover, other historians, otherwise competent, have stated that Gilles, after marrying Catherine de Thouars, one of the great heiresses of the day, subsequently and successively became the husband of six other women — a circumstance which, the frescoes aiding, doubtless suggested to Perrault the tale with which we are all familiar and from which Offenbach wove his enchanting score.

Yet whether he murdered those women, or whether they just died of delight, we have now no means of knowing. What we do know is that this vampire really lived, and that his lair any tourist may visit.

In considering it, even the indifferent must wonder how such a contradiction could be, how it is possible that a man could alternately charm and torture, pray, and deprave. The complexity, however, is common enough. It is due to what novelists call heredity, what psychologists term dual personality, and plain people the Old Adam. More or less, and generally more than less, it exists in us all. Its home is the brain. In the majority of civilised beings it is, through one factor or another, subordinated and controlled, sometimes forgotten, more often ignored. But it is there. And when, through the shock of atoms, the play of destiny, excess of fatigue or cerebral commotion, the other, the inherited, the secreted self appears, then from the individual ordinarily normal emerges the human reptile.

Such is Bluebeard's case. Such, too, perhaps is the meaning of the archaic allegory which symbolised the struggle between Darkness and Light.

THE KNIGHTS OF THE GOLDEN FLEECE

THE Golden Fleece is just like the Garter. It has none of the confounded nonsense of merit about it. Medieval and magnificent, it was originated by Philip of Burgundy. Why he originated it no one knows. A German tried to find out. He devoted the whole of his wretched life to the subject. On his death-bed he chattered "Eureka." It had driven him insane.

Students less pertinacious, and possibly better equipped, have assumed that the motive was wholly gallant. Philip, to his eternal glory be it recorded, paid what we think we have seen described as addresses to twenty-four young women at once. Then came the twenty-fifth. The latter was Ysabel of Portugal. Meanwhile, from each of the others he had obtained coils of hair. These he had his coiffeur braid together into a sort of conglomerate souvenir. Through it there straggled an amber curl; it had come from the bright blonde locks of Marie of Rumbrugge. The sheen of it delighted him. From it, from that girl's empty head, the idea of the Golden Fleece emerged. On the occasion of his marriage to Ysabel thirty knights were chosen. Whether he required that, like himself, they should be sans pudeur et avec reproches, we may surmise yet never know.

What we do know is that self-chosen knights of a different order with the same name have been parading about ever since. In philosophic circles their order is generally, if figuratively, regarded as the insignia of the carpet highwaymen and other adventurers with whom the great capitals of this little globe abound.

High on the list of them is Lauzun. Insolent, indigent, and illiterate, the son of a nonentity at that, he yet managed to make himself Marshal of France and the husband of the Grande Mademoiselle. And not merely her husband, but her master, ordering that princess, who was the cousin of one king and the granddaughter of another, to pull off his boots, and beating her when she refused. The story of his career would read as a romance were it not that from it the probable is absent. Men do not dream any more as that man lived. Emerging obscurely from an obscure hamlet, the high road led him to Versailles, and chance into the presence of the king.

There he made himself so entertaining that the fourteenth Louis raised the adventurer from one grade to another, and so monumentally, that one day, angered at the withdrawal of a promised promotion, he whipped out his sword, broke it across his knee, and tossing it with a fine clatter at the feet of the king, bawled loudly that it was disgraceful to serve a monarch who could not keep his word.

Woman admire the brave, but they prefer the audacious. Some women at least, and Mademoiselle de Montpensier was one of them. The melodrama of the proceeding delighted her. Archroyal and super-rich, possessed in her own right of twenty million and four duchies, she was then thirty and passably disillusioned. By reason of her birth and wealth she had expected to be queen. She had had her eye on the Dauphin, another on the King of Spain, both on the Emperor Ferdinand III. Yet none whatever for Charles II., who, in his exile, had asked, and who, because of that exile, had been refused.

Heights appeal to women, so do extremes

Failing a throne, the Grande Mademoiselle resolved to accept a footstool. Lauzun appealed to her as even the closed crown of state had not. The adventurer understood it thoroughly. But at every step she made toward him he retreated two. He could have asked and it would have been given. He preferred to be asked and to accord. Finally he did. So also did Louis. At the formal request of the lady he consented to the mesalliance, and there was this nobody almost lifted into royalty—almost, yet not quite. For reasons which we won't bother over, the king withdrew his consent. Lauzun was thrown into prison, whence he issued years later, and then only because of the supplications of the princess whom he had bewitched, who then became his wife, whom he ordered to pull off his boots, and who, annoyed perhaps at the beatings which she got, gathered her millions and her duchies and left him to twirl his thumbs. There you have a true picture of the untrue knight.

An instance more modern and rather more modest is that of Baron Harden-Hickey. Born in San Francisco, the son of eminently respectable yet perfectly plain people, he evolved, entirely to their astonishment, and perhaps a little to his own, a dream of monarchy. His title astonished also. Where he got it no one knew and, except the police, no one, to our knowledge, ever asked. It may be that the Comte de Chambord, whose henchman he had been, gave it to him, or, as is more likely, it may be that it was self-bestowed. After all, why not? In any event, a dozen years ago he acquired, in addition to the title, the formidable reputation of being one of the wittiest men in Paris and the crack duellist of France. A poet at his hours and always a scholar, he was doubly dangerous. His pen stung as promptly as did his sword. As a consequence he was well supplied with enemies. He had more than he knew by sight. But their quality was superior. A stranger to them, he was a stranger to his friends, a stranger to himself, yet most conspicuously a stranger to his epoch. He was at odds with it. In an age less complex he would have been a pirate, and a very good pirate too. He was a survival, as lost on the boulevards as a corsair would be. He had beliefs in an epoch which had dissipated them and faiths in a land from which they have gone. Therewith he was antithesis made man. He edited a comic paper and wrote a book on metaphysics. He looked like a musketeer, acted like a debutante, talked like Aristophanes, and lived like a sage.

That was a long time ago. Presently from Catholic he turned Buddhist. At Andilly, a Parisian suburb, where he had a country house which he called a castle, he built a temple, decorated it with the lotus, installed the wheel of prayers, and entertained Colonel Olcott. After Buddha he took to Voltaire. Restless as a panther, haunted by the past, pursued by visions of Chambord, he needed a cause or a flag. It was the inability to find either which brought to him the dream of founding a monarchy for himself. "There is nothing worth living for," he once confided to the deponent, "and, what is worse, nothing worth dying for either." But that, too, is a long time ago. It was on a journey to the United States that he met a young heiress, who subsequently became his wife. Then, out of idleness, or perhaps to amuse his bride, he wrote a tract on suicide. Hardly had it issued from the press before an idea of a monarchy was hatched. He proposed to establish a kingdom at Trinidad—a speck of an island off the coast of Brazil—and proposed also to establish himself there as king. Entirely opera bouffe, he entered into the scheme with a seriousness which impressed even himself. He had a chancellerie in New York, another in London. Then the Powers intervened, or he said they did, and he turned an eye on Hawaii. But at this juncture annexation occurred; there was not a possible throne in sight, and like a true Knight of the Fleece, he shot himself.

But he shot himself too soon. It is one of the disadvantages of death that it prevents the departed from participating in the possibilities of life. Had he waited he might have been king. There was a throne then vacant, a throne ramshackle, remote, and ridiculous, yet none the less a throne, one that had been founded by just such another, by an adventurer who began by being French, ended by being German, and who managed to make himself an American monarch in between—a South American monarch indeed, yet still a monarch, monarch of Araucania, a land which he ruled under the style and title of Aurelius I.

Who he was, how he got there, above all, why he wanted to be, and in what fashion he succeeded in becoming, king, are matters that have been, and now always will be, problematic. It is known that his name was De Tonniens, but other data are scarce. It is rumoured, however, that in the early sixties he set sail from Havre for Peru. With him went a cargo of umbrellas. As it never rains in Peru, what he did with the umbrellas is conjectural in the extreme. Perhaps he took them to Chili. In any event, ultimately he reached Araucania. That is the one stretch of territory on this hemisphere which neither Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, nor English have ever been able to subdue. A portion of it Chili has gobbled, but the larger part is independent still. Whether the umbrellas appealed to the fantasy of the Araucos, and whether because of them they allowed De Tonniens to constitute himself king, is immaterial. But that king he became is history. It is history, too, that as a means of livelihood he instituted a series of titles and decorations, which he took to Europe and peddled about. The supply of these things being greater than the demand, poverty overtook him and he died. Meanwhile, he had not neglected to establish a court. According to a recent explorer —M. Henri le Baux—the Court of Araucania still exists. What is more, the throne, though vacant, exists as well. There would be a chance for Harden-Hickey. There yet is a chance for any other knight.

Examples such as the foregoing are useful if for no other reason than because they show the relativeness of things. To be born, as Lauzun was, a nobody and to marry a princess, predicates charm. To be born, as Harden-Hickey was, a plain American, and to dream of being king, predicates romance. To be born, as De Tonniens was, a bourgeois, and to develop into a monarch, predicates enterprise. But to be born a slave and to become an emperor shows originality.

Solouque did that. He began life with a dust-pan and ended it with a sceptre. At the age of fifty he was a valet, very fat, very black, ignorant as a carp, unable to read, unable to write. But though unable to write he could make his mark—and did. Caught on the crest of a Haytian revolution, he flung himself from it into power. On his return after some sable Marengo the president of the local senate capped him with a crown of pasteboard and saluted him Faustin I.

Solouque sent to Paris for a real crown, sent for two—the second for the drab who was his consort; and, while he was about it, sent for thrones, for robes of ermine—all the tra-la-la of state. Therewith he instituted a civil list, a series of decorations, and created Knights of the Ebon Fleece. The court chamberlain was the Duc de Bonbon; the lords-in-waiting, three in number, were gratified respectively with the titles of Prince of Watermelon, Marquis of Lemonade, and Viscount of Ice Cream. Their share in the budget was placed at a hundred gourds per annum. When they asked for it this Philip of Hayti had them shot. If open-handed he was close-fisted. One day he held a review of his grenadiers. Georges d'Alaux, a writer who was there at the time and who has left a book on this Offenbach monarchy, states that the helmets of the guard glittered with plaques, on which was inscribed: "Sardines à l'huile, Barton et Cie, Marseilles." Like the emperor, the grenadiers were unable to read. Presently it was discovered that they were unable to fight. Projected against neighbours by whom they were demolished, Solouque said it was good riddance. Thereat, to while away the time, he created more decorations, more nobility, parodied the coronation of Napoleon, ordered a general massacre, abdicated, fled away and died, full of years and dishonours, grotesque to the end.

Of an order quite as grotesque, yet a trifle more recent, was De Rougemont, a Frenchman who spoke English with a German accent, and who, after an alleged thirty-year residence on the Sea of Timor, turned up not long ago in the columns of a magazine. According to his own account he must have been born with an honest imagination and a love of misadventure, for, according to that same account, fate conducted him to a coral reef and left him there with but a dog and a New Testament. The former he appears to have preferred to any human being he ever met, while the theological difficulties which he encountered in the latter seem to have fully occupied his leisure. For amusement he rode turtles, steering them with kicks in the eye, built a house of pearl shells, made a hammock of shark's hide, and played pirate with pelicans, whom he robbed of their fish. For visitors he had parrots, for almanacs, stones. And so the years fell by. Ultimately savages appeared, who, on beholding him, fancied that they were all dead and that he was the Great Spirit. If that is not an example of honest imagination, one may wonder what is. Yet here is more. Conducted by the aborigines to the mainland, he there became king of the tribe, rescued white girls from black men, discovered gullies of gold and ditches of diamonds, conciliated recalcitrant cannibals by throwing handsprings and somersaults, found a newspaper, read in it that the deputies of Alsace had refused to vote in the German Parliament, marvelled thereat, for he knew nothing of the war of 1870, and, as much perplexed by political enigmas as he had been by theological difficulties, left sceptre, diamonds, gold, and girls behind, made for Melbourne, shipped for London before the mast, and turned up safe and sound in the office of an English magazine.

Everything being possible, it was conjectured that the story might all be true. The north-western corner of Australia, where, as king, he had resided, is a region still unexplored. Moreover, was not Bruce disbelieved and Du Chaillu flouted? The eccentricity of the story consisted in the fact that a gentleman who reached Melbourne with such first-class copy in his head should have been compelled to work his way to London. Mais nul n'est prophete. The story of R. Crusoe de Rougemont-Munchausen was at least entertaining enough to find favour in the eyes of the British Association, and his hand-spring device for charming the enemy may, with entire deference, still be commended to Lord Roberts for future use at the front.

Meanwhile, it is pleasant to note that in a subsequent issue of the periodical in which Mr Alice de Rougemont first told of his adventures in wonderland there appeared a caveat to the effect that the editors no longer vouched for his veracity. It were difficult to be more circumspect and less rude. Elsewhere he was labelled Psalmanazar. But the label, though meant to be fierce, was merely stupid. De Rougemont gulled the British Association. Psalmanazar gulled Great Britain. By the press at large De Rougemont was received with cheerful incredulity. The learned reviews swallowed Psalmanazar whole. De Rougemont produced a new edition of the Australian Nights, Psalmanazar produced a new language, a literature, and a religion. To this day nobody knows what Psalmanazar's real name was. What is De Rougemont's real name nobody cares.

Psalmanazar represented himself as a Japanese from Formosa. He published a book which contained an alphabet of his own manufacture, portraits of false gods, pictures of fictitious people, and with them engravings of imaginary shrines. It was accepted as gospel. In his memoirs Psalmanazar says: "I was but twenty and I deceived all England." The Bishop of London became his patron. He lectured at Oxford, took orders, and everything else he could get. But then, a century and a half ago, in the good old days when he lived and lied, knowledge was limited and the earth was not. Had De Rougemont come then his success might have been proportionate, and yet again it might not. Success is an uncertain quantity. One never knows whom it will visit and whom avoid. Keely is a case in point. A moralist recommended that nothing but good should be said of the dead. The advice is excellent. We have no intention of disregarding it. An ex-waiter who, with nothing more complicated than a half-dozen neologisms and as many concealed tubes, could extract five million out of the pockets of his fellow-citizens deserves something better than abuse. He deserves enrolment among the Knights of the Fleece. He deserves even, what we lack the space to give him, a full biographical page. In days when speech was more abstruse he would have been called a thaumaturge. Thaumaturgy is at once simple and complex. It consists in making a stranger feel at home and then in taking that home away. There are a number of books about it. Of these the best bear big names. They are signed by Albertus Magnus, by Nostradamus, and by Paracelsus. They are not uninteresting either. They tell of the great secret which is the philosopher's stone and how, with it, metals cannot be transmuted but how pocket-books may. More or less, and generally more than less, every Knight of the Fleece knows its charms. Apollonius of Tyana knew them thoroughly. He knew other things as well. He knew all languages, including that of Silence, for silence is a language too. It was in the latter that Keely conversed. So subtle was his use of it that nobody understood. He eluded comprehension. There was his secret. It is the great secret of all. It is the secret of not having any, and yet in appearing to, which constitutes the philosopher's stone. With it Keely charmed experts. But who are so foolish as wise men? Had Keely come a few centuries earlier, by the wise men of the day he would have been deified. Such is luck, or rather, such is destiny.

For the Gates of Life are double. On the one stands written Too Late. On the other Too Soon. Between them chaps like these get strangled.

THE UPPER CIRCLES

THE Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has decided that a belief in spiritualism does not predicate insanity.

It would be curious if it did. In this country there are millions who believe in it. In Europe there are others. In Asia there are more. For all we know to the contrary there are a lot in Africa. If not, there ought to be. It was in Africa that spiritualism originated.

Moses found it there. He found it in the crypts of Memphis. These crypts were difficult to enter. But Moses, whose real name, by the way, was Hosarisph, happened to be a nephew of old Rameses. The relationship was a pull. It opened for him doors which otherwise would have been closed. Behind them he heard all about spiritualism.

It will not pay you to hunt for evidence of this in that part of the Bible which is associated with him. The evidence is not there. Nor in it, either, is there any doctrine of a future life. These things were not given to everybody. They were reserved for the few.

Among the latter were the priests. The priests had three ways of expressing a given idea. The first was ordinary and simple, the second complex and symbolic, the third hieroglyphic and abstruse. Any term used by them had, therefore, a triple signification. It could be construed naturally, figuratively, or transcendentally.

It was in their language that the Mosaic views were originally expressed. When, later, they were put into Phœnician; when, from that, they were turned into Chaldaic; and when, subsequently, the latter was translated into Greek, the original meaning had gone. There had been too many cooks. St Jerome, who knew pretty much all that was going and a good deal that was not, said of the residue that it contained as many secrets as words, and that each word held several. It is for this reason that the Pentateuch nowhere exhibits any evidence of spiritualism—any evidence, either, of a doctrine of a future life.

These things were secret things, and secret things, Moses expressly declared, belong to the Lord.

In Egypt, where he found them, crouched the Sphinx. Above was the Phœnix. In the one was the key to things terrestrial. In the other was a clue to things divine. The Sphinx expounded the mystery of life. The Phœnix explained the enigma of death.

Moses took them both. But he did not display them. In their perspectives were heights and abysses. On the heights were immensities; in the abysses, worlds. They held categories greater than the average mind may comfortably contemplate. As a consequence the doctrine, withheld from the many, was reserved for the few.

The reconstruction of the doctrine—a reconstruction relatively recent—is due to causes so opposed that they laugh in each other's faces. The first is criticism higher than that which is known as high; the second is experimental psychology. The former has conducted us behind the accepted meaning of phrases; the latter has led us to the threshold of another sphere.

Through the highest criticism obscurities have become limpid. Through experimental psychology a door has been thrown open on the invisible and the respectability of atheism shocked.

We fail to see why. Demonstrations, however surprising, ought not to shock. Only ignorance should. Yet if it hurt, too, how many there are that would yell. Besides, though it may be more cheerful to be wrong in your beliefs than not to have them at all, it is perhaps a mistake to regard errors as assets.

But far be it from us to seem to even wish to convert. The spirit of proselytism is not in us. At present writing only the desire to show the sanity of spiritualism is. That sanity has for basis premises major and minor, with a deduction for astragal.

Here are the premises: First is the cautiousness of nature. Nature neither adds nor subtracts. She does not increase her possessions. She does not diminish them. She puts them up, pulls them down, and does them over anew. But on to the lot she holds very tight.

It is for this reason that what seems to us to constitute death is to nature but the constituent of a change. It is for this reason, because nothing dies. Because when what is called death occurs there ensues not a cessation of energy but a liberation of it. A tenement has crumbled and a tenant gone forth. Though just where is the puzzle.

It would be convenient to say that that puzzle was solved long ago. It would be convenient, but inexact. Myriads of people who like to have others do their thinking have pinned their faith on a residence right overhead. The existence and accessibility of that residence they have regarded as a universal belief.

It is not a universal belief. Even if it were the fact would prove nothing. Every universal belief is erroneous. Public opinion is the stupidity of one multiplied by the stupidity of all. The majority is always cocksure and dead wrong. The belief in that residence is a case in point.

Primitive fabulists erected an edifice of dream, which they catalogued Creation. It was composed of a cellar, a groundfloor, and a roof garden. On the groundfloor man lived, moved, and had his being. Then, according to his behaviour, he was tossed into the cellar or shoved into a lift and shot to the roof.

The idea had its charms and also its deceptions. It was simple, but not scientific. Science has shown that the earth stands to creation as a drop of water does to the sea. It has shown that within the relatively narrow sphere to which observation is at present confined there are not less than three hundred million worlds. These worlds we may assume do not revolve there just for the fun they may get out of their own gymnastics. We may further assume that the energy loosed among them cannot be dissimilar to that which is recognisable here. By way of corollary we may also assume that there, too, are sentient beings.

There are the premises. They hold, we hope, nothing not sane. For that matter, nothing, we hope, that can in any way be construed into originality. They are but the platitudes of logic. Now for the deduction.

If the premises be accepted, and with them the theorem, that man has not fallen from loftier estate, but is rising to one, it follows, or seems to follow, that not the dwellers on this planet alone, but those strewn throughout the universe, are en route for higher things. In which event it is advantageous to know what our individual chances are of reaching them. That knowledge spiritualism supplies.

Spiritualism has been much abused. The abuse is righteous. As often as otherwise when spiritualism is not perfect rot it is fraudulent commercialism. Yet commerce is not conducted solely by cheats. There are honest men everywhere, even in jail. Even in spiritualism there are scientists. Their statements may be derided. But so were the initial statements concerning the telephone. So was the proclamation of wireless telegraphy. Such derision is helpful. It is a bountiful Providence that has enabled us to despise whatever we do not understand. And spiritualism, even to its believers, perhaps particularly to its believers, leaves a good deal in the dark. That also is a dispensation of Providence. Were spiritualism able to solve every problem, we who cogitate for the distraction which cogitation affords would have nothing left to do but to bore ourselves stiff.

Anything of that kind would be very distressing.

Meanwhile, general distrust of spiritualism has been due not merely to the puerility and trickery of its manifestations but to the fact that the majority of us believe like brutes in the reality of things.

Of all illusions reality is the greatest. Everybody knows, for instance, that flowers grow, but nobody has ever heard them at it. That is only because our ears are not adapted to receive the vibrations. Were they so adapted the noise of growing flowers would be thunderous. Yet because we are not deaf we do not believe it. None the less the vibrations are. In the same way, because we are not blind we imagine that there can be nothing which is not obvious. It is the obvious only that is illusory.

"Ghosts!" cried Carlyle. "Nigh a thousand million of them walk the earth at noontide." Ocular evidence of the promenade being lacking we could wish a little proof. That proof spiritualism supplies. It is voluminously provided in the reports of the Society for Psychical Research. But, though voluminous, it is not always luminous. The facts displayed are appallingly trite. Yet they are facts all the same, and though trite, so, too, were the rotting logs which once upon a time Columbus beheld. Beyond those logs was another world.

From the world which spiritualism is approaching already one discovery is announced. One is a great many. In the present condition of things it is even enormous. For in this discovery — a discovery rigorously examined, patiently tested, and scientifically indorsed—is the assurance, positive and unequivocal, that human personality persists beyond the tomb.

A discovery of that magnitude and certainty means something. Moreover, in it there are others. Or, rather, from it data depend. For though the persistence of personality is shown, as yet nothing has been adduced which confirms accepted ideas of heaven, nothing in support of any existing creed.

That seems odd. But where all is marvellous the marvellous disappears. The phenomena detected defy explanation. They defy refutation as well. There is, though, nothing odd in that. The phenomena of thought do the same. The latter are so common and familiar that we give them no heed. Yet the human being has never lived who understood them. That is pretty much the way it is with psychic phenomena. Because we cannot understand them it does not in the least follow that they cannot be.

On the contrary. Moreover, in reference to them Sir William Crookes has spoken thusly: "I do not say that such things may be. I say that such things are."

Sir William is not a crank. He is not a poet. He is passionless as algebra, precise as calculus, and the foremost chemist going. He is somebody. In the course of explorations conducted by him along the frontier of the other world he has officially announced that he has been the percipient of direct communications, the beholder of phantom forms. One of the latter, a young woman, decorated his coat with a rose, gave him a lock of her hair, allowed him to snapshoot her, and sat in his lap. It were difficult to be more sociable.

Instances similar, cognate, and still more curious you may fish from the reports by the ton. Unless you prefer to regard the testimony as a mystification devised by a corps of savans and scientists for no other purpose than your hocus-pocussing, then, though the testimony be hard to swallow, it is just as hard to reject. But that which may help a bit to get it down is the fact that the deponents go as far as they can, but not an inch or the fraction of an inch farther. They are enabled to demonstrate the persistence of consciousness after death and the visibility of the unseen. But not the immortality of the soul.

The reason, if complex, is clear. Travellers returning from the upper circles bring with them only what they took. Only that and their experience in transit. Their understanding is not broadened. Their wisdom is not increased. They know as little of what is beyond them as we know of what is beyond us. When you come to think of it that is in the nature of things. A trip across the country never develops faculties which the traveller lacked when he set out. It is probable, therefore, that death is but a posting-house, where horses are changed, and whence you proceed with such luggage as you brought.

But whither you proceed, and whether in proceeding you get very far, fraudulent spiritualism may pretend to tell, but scientific spiritualism cannot. To borrow a metaphor from the land from which we started, the veil of Isis remains unraised. For these are the secret things of which Moses told. To us only the visible is permitted.

Summarily, then, the decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania is all right. Belief in the matters herewith submitted does not predicate insanity. That proposition is incontrovertible. But not the converse of it. Insanity may proceed from the belief.

XIX

THE MODES OF TO-MORROW

Somebody or other, an archbishop, perhaps, declared with obvious regret that a woman gowned in the height of fashion possesses a serenity of mind joined to an elevation of spirit which the consolations of religion are incompetent to provide.

We have not a doubt of it. But in what does fashion consist? Women have been known to state that they would rather be dead than out of it, yet when a definition was sought no adequate description could be obtained. For it is one of the charms of women that in explaining everything they explain nothing. That is quite as it should be. It is for them to exhilarate and for us to expound. Yet of their clothes we know little. A little is a great deal. But in a matter such as this no mere man may know much. It is even discomforting to reflect that when the hour comes in which all secrets are revealed Fashion may resolve into Isis still unveiled.

Meanwhile, to the masculine eye at least, the vagaries of it are as recondite as the forecasts of the weather. The mysteries of time and space—mysteries so mysterious that science has reduced them to figments of fancy—are not more enigmatic.

Perhaps, then, it will be safe to say that fashion is an active abstraction—a phrase which does not mean anything, but which sounds very well. In any event, it is a form of debauchery of which the door is closed to man. There are exceptions, however. The deponent has seen six-footers loll about and admire their hunting togs. And there are other instances. There is, for example, a certain marquis and there is also a certain clergyman. The former one day was standing bareheaded in Lincoln & Bennett's, waiting to be waited on. A prelate entered, marched up to him, took his hat off, and asked him if he had one like it. The marquis examined it, handed it back, and with a sweetness which was silken, replied: "No; and if I had I'll be shot if I'd wear it." The clergyman wanted to assist at a table-d'hôte and could not. Through a tailor's defection he had no trousers to wear.

He said he was not a bit more particular than other people, but he had noticed that a clergyman going in to dinner without trousers was almost sure to excite remark. Fashion is not, therefore, a purely feminine vice. There you have at least two men who were slaves to it.

At the risk of writing ourselves down as something else, we should like to call ourselves a third. For, though our ignorance of fashion is abysmal, our admiration is without bounds. Apart from the pleasures of pure mathematics, we know of nothing more intoxicating. Behind its history is the history of love. Whoever invented the one invented the other. In days when tattooing was apparel it has been authoritatively surmised that woman's attractiveness was so meagre that she was as incapable of detaining men as animals are of detaining each other. There were herds, not homes. The development of the wardrobe was the development of the affections. The heart of man began to beat when woman ceased to resemble him. But it was not until meditation had made her modest and fashion fastidious that his enthralment was complete. Then at once where the boor had been the knight appeared. In place of the female came the woman. Hitherto she had served. Thereafter she began to reign. In the States to-day she rules the roost. Fashion has done it. Hence our admiration for that active abstraction. Hence, too, the serenity of spirit which a well-dressed woman displays.

That serenity is quite natural. Barring such abominations as golf skirts and blouses, smart women have never got themselves up more fascinatingly than they do to-day. In the old prints of earlier days they are astounding to behold. Frocks were masonry and chignons architecture. Caricaturists represent les très grandes dames followed by carpenters widening and heightening the doors through which they pass. In one sketch a hairdresser is shown on a ladder arranging topmost curls. On the head of the Duchesse de Chartres a coiffeur succeeded in exhibiting her entire biography. The hair of the Princess de Machin was manipulated into a cage, in which were loosed three thousand butterflies.

After the amputations of the Revolution fashion must have become simpler, but through epochs which we lack the art to describe it remained unalluring until Worth took a hand. The women he turned out looked like angels, only, of course, much better dressed. To-day the girls to whom Doucet has ministered are a caress to the eye. Personally, if we may refer to ourselves, there are frocks of Félix that have seemed to us more satisfactory than old masters, and there are also confections of Paquin that we have found as exhilarating as cups of champagne.

In what manner they are evolved and through what process, after their evolution, these ruedelapaixian seductions, primarily and, it may be, uniquely designed to pleasure some Princesse Lointaine, repeat themselves indefinitely, and variously vulgarised, reappear on the banks of the Neva, at the Golden Gate, in Bloomsbury and Bucharest, in Kandahar and Chicago, the Lord in his wisdom and mercy only knows, and in so saying it may be that we exaggerate, for, sure of nothing, we cannot be sure of that, although, indeed, there has just occurred to us an incident highly enlightening.

Some years ago the Queen of the Wends, Queen of the Goths, the Queen Matchmaker, who was the late Queen of Denmark, was also Queen of the Bicycle. In her obituaries the fact was not noted. Compared with her other titles it may have seemed unimportant. But it is only unimportant things that are really momentous. Louise of Hesse-Cassel became the progenitrix of sovereigns, and left the course of events unaltered. She got on a wheel one day and changed the face of the earth.

The event occurred before the flood, a full decennium ago, at a time when no decent person would have been found dead on a bicycle. It was at her summer court on the Baltic, through the wide leisures of which the selectest princesses and the least exclusive princes lounged, that the deed was done. What the mother of an empress in esse and of another in posse does, smaller fry copy. The young royals, her grandchildren, followed suit. Photographed, bike in hand, their pictures emerged in shop windows. At sight of them Paris went mad. Then New York caught a fever, which afterward spread to London, and ultimately was reported to have assumed epidemic proportions in Melbourne. So runs the world away. Meanwhile, the queen had put her wheel aside. Imitation is flattery's most odious form. None the less, a fashion had been set, industries founded, manufactories multiplied, and all through a monarch's whim, because of a summer day an entirely amiable lady had seen fit to mount a wheel.

That wheel has since been relegated to the provinces. In its place is the auto. Presently that will pass. Fancies vary, follies ditto. The one thing constant is change. Yet, as with the bike, so with bonnets. What great ladies do lesser ladies copy. Therein is the mode's modus operandi. These premises admitted, there arises the interesting problem, What shall the woman of the future wear? But, before deciding, it will be useful to determine what sort of a person that woman will be.

Could the subject be considered from the standpoint of Dr Schenck's promise that sex may be determined by maternal nutrition, it is obvious that woman would be scarce as Madeira and just as heady. But though Dr Schenck promised he did not fulfil. As a consequence, the subject becomes more complex. At the same time, women being all alike in this that they are every one of them different, it follows that what is true of them to-day was true in the past and will be in the future. Individually diverse, collectively they are undistinguishable. To the naked eye at least. And it was certainly to remedy this defect that Fashion was invented. For however fancies may vary and follies change, however distressing last year's hat may look, woman herself does not alter. It is the mode that passes, not the model. The eternal feminine is everlastingly the same. To tell, then, what sort of a person the coming woman will be, take a receipt from astrology and first hatch her milliner.

Even so and even otherwise, though it is the mode that passes and not the model, though through the change of years and the convolution of things the heart of archaic Eve beats throughout femininity to-day, the beauty of the lady has developed. Yet, as nothing is constant but change, that beauty is doomed to diminish. In the part of the world from which we write it cannot help itself. Beauty's patent of nobility is to be useless. Therein is the sorcery of the rose. It charms and does nothing. Commerce, combinations, concentration, and all that in them is, whether utilitarian, progressive, or both, are beauty's antitheses. The trend of the age is, as we have elsewhere noted, to things very large and very ugly. In their construction, development, and expansion we all either actively or passively collaborate. We cannot do otherwise. The Zeitgeist will not let us. It has us fast in its maw. For the bewilderments of feminine witcheries it cares not a rap. That for which it does care is progress. In moulding us to its will it moulds our senses and muddles our souls. The instincts it instils we will transmit. As a consequence the babies to come may develop both brains and brawn, yet never beauty. Now add the column up. The result is plain women.

And so much the better. Plain women are currently considered neglectable quantities. Such consideration comports an error that is profound. Memoirs and missions have acquainted us with many who dressed, undressed, and digressed divinely. The picture gallery of heroines is crammed with others who understood very well that, while beauty may allure, graciousness enchains. A service of Sèvres with nothing on it is less appetising than a petite marmite. Unaccompanied by other attributes, beauty alarms when it does not weary. Moreover, it is only the solely beautiful who are really plain. A really plain woman is one who, however beautiful, neglects to charm. By the same token a beautiful woman who contents herself with being merely beautiful is far plainer than a plain woman who does nothing but beautiful things. It is for this reason that the most beautiful woman in the world is always the woman whom we have yet to meet. It is for this reason, too, that in the Evangel of Women it is written, or rather will be when the Evangel appears: Blessed are the plain who succeed in charming, for theirs and theirs only is the Kingdom of Love.

But let us consider the subject less seriously. Beauty is relative. Perfect beauty is a phrase and nothing else. Once upon a time a philosopher produced a large volume, in the course of which he proved that God is perfection. Then he produced a second volume, equally large, in which he proved that perfection does not exist. It were impossible to be more exhaustively witty. Subsequently another philosopher produced a supplementary work, in which he proved that in the absence of perfect beauty a lady who is equally ugly all over is more satisfactory than one unequally fair. It were impossible to be more profound. These views, however, public opinion has failed to endorse. But that is natural. Moreover, there is a disease of the eye that is catalogued as hemiopia. Of any given object the patient sees but half. It is one of Satan's greatest tours de force to have afflicted us all with that malady and rendered us blind to feminine defects. It must amuse him not a little to see how we are all taken in. Were it otherwise men would devote themselves to pious works. For that matter, it is only those who have penetrated the guile of the Very Low that do. As a consequence, when, in the future, women are plain, men will occupy themselves only with virtuous deeds. And is not that a consummation devoutly to be wished?

Yet because the coming Eve is to be plain it by no means follows that she will be painful. On the contrary. In the good old days of the glory that was Greece, a woman whose peplon did not hang right in the back, whose general appearance was not modish, there and then, as we have somewhere remarked, became a disturber of the peace, and as such liable to a fine that varied with degrees of slatternliness from ten to a thousand drachmæ. Penalties not similar but cognate will, we assume with entire readiness, be visited by the legislators of the future on the woman who shall in her attire presume to neglect to charm. But we assume with equal readiness that such neglect will be rare. For while by that time hemiopia may have become curable and feminine defects be recognised and endured, it follows for that reason that women—celles de la haute, bien entendu—will be tricked out, adorned, and embellished, as were never even the goddesses of old.

How the ladies of the middle classes shall then appear interests us no more than how they appear to-day. We take it, however, that among them there will be some quite vulgar enough to be pretty. But about the plain yet peerless peris of the peerage of this and other lands there will be garments immaterial as moonbeams, gorgeous as quetzals, at once shadowy and stunning, luminous as the zaïmph of Tanit, coruscating as the shower of Danæ, the triumph of art, poetry, and the Rue de la Paix. For in default of feminine perfections such things as these must be, if only to perpetuate the species, and with it the jubilance and the guile of Satan and his pomps.

THE GHOST GIRL

THE GHOST GIRL

I

THE vivid climax to Nelly Chilton's wedding startled a metropolis long since used to the startling. But the spectacular termination of the beauty's marriage was commonplace by comparison to incidents that supervened.

In Bil Sayers' novel, "The Halls of Eblis," many of these incidents are told. The telling is the admirable work of an admirable writer. Events are set forth, not as they did occur, but as they should have occurred, which is the only way to tell a story. In the present document that process has been reversed.

Among those who stood witness to the events were Jim Bradish and your servant. He and I had been classmates at Harvard, fellow students in foreign universities, companions in the proscenia and side-scenes of life. We had travelled, feasted and starved together. I may say I knew him, that is if one human being ever does know another. While in Japan a cable caught us. His father was dead. Bradish was a very rich man.

At the time, I had, or thought I had, enough to go around, a bundle of bonds with which the trustee was diverting himself. When Bradish and I reached New York he was a plutocrat and I was a pauper. I hate the alliteration. More hateful still was the fact.

I have been about a bit and I know of no place where poverty is agreeable, or any place anywhere where it is less agreeable than in New York. Along the glittering precinct in which my people had moved, I was like the man who fell from the balloon, simply out of it. But not irremediably. Bradish did the obvious thing. He did not ask, he insisted on being my banker.

It would, I dare say, seem very fine of me if I had balked. I did nothing of the kind. I drew on him for what little I actually required. In two years I was afloat. A year later he was repaid. I was what is termed a best-seller. Nothing to boast of, quite the contrary.

Meanwhile the glittering precinct was closed to Bradish also, though, necessarily, not as it was to me. I lacked the money to walk in. He lacked the courage.

In looking back at it all now, I realise what I did not recognise then. In a previous life he must have done something very evil. What he had done only the keepers of the doors that close behind our birth could tell. But whatever it may have been, he paid for it. I have seen and, what is worse I have seen him see, people shrink back open-mouthed from before him. Karma had plastered his face with a birthmark shaped and coloured like a great scarlet spider. In spite of which he had the gentleness of a giant. After the lovable fashion of a sundial, it was only serene hours of which he took count. In unphilosophic New York that is always a feat. It is one, though, which presently he ceased to perform.

Meanwhile, I had pitched my tent in that loveliness that Harlem is. The tent was on the top floor of what is agreeably known as a walkup. Bradish hated it.

But he came there. I told him not to come. I told him I did not want him. I told him I did not want anybody. Idle tears. Up the interminable stairs he stalked and pounded and pounded, threatening to break the door down. When, cursing the interruption, I threw it open, in he would tumble, followed, as often as not, by Mike, one of his many servants, a mechanician usually bowed to the ground with a hamper of aspic and game, wine and strong waters.

In those days I was so out of it that I knew nothing except what I invented. But in Bradish's great, white, staring house, there were always men to dinner, to supper, to breakfast, for all I know to the contrary, and the talk of these men, who knew what was going on, and a lot that was not, he retailed to me and it was all so much fresh air. Again and again it supplied a situation, the slang of the day, the prompt retort.

I can see him now, sitting back, drinking his cigar, drinking, too, his strong waters and, in the orange light of my low lamp, that spider barely visible. Usually a dull brick it was only in moments of excitement that it reddened. It seemed then a living thing. There have been times when I could have sworn I saw it extending and contracting its antennæ. There have been others when it seemed about to spring. That, though, was later.

One night—it was in the third year after our return to this country—and on a night when it was snowing like the very devil, I heard the usual uproar. It was the only way that he, or anyone else for that matter, could get at me. There was no telephone. I had had the accursed thing removed. Moreover it was idle to ring, in addition to being hazardous. Touch the button and you get a shock. I had had a battery put in for that purpose. To lead a profitable life of crime requires silence, solitude and a natural gift for villainy. By this time, that gift and those fortifications aiding, I was afloat, all sales flying, if I may be permitted a stupid jest, one which, together with everything else concerning myself, I throw in to be rid of. This is not a biography, heaven forbid. It is the account of a door, closed and barred, and not mine either.

On this night, for the first time, I approached it. It was wide open, so wide that all I saw were the vistas beyond. It was not until later that I realised that there was a door there, a door that was to shut itself, shut tighter than a wall.

The night was vile. There was a wind to blow your head off and I thanked fortune that I had had the forethought, which I often lacked, to larder up beforehand, when I heard Bradish hammering and reviling me outside.

Superbly befurred, in a coat which even a tenor might have denied himself, but, the coat apart, dressed as he usually was, with that appearance of the threadbare which, in a man of large means, is always superiorly correct, he stamped in, kicking and throwing the snow off on me and, once in my workshop, removing the coat which he dropped on the floor.

Then, puffing a bit, he greeted me.

"You live like a bandit."

On one of my few chairs I sat down and looked at him.

"What do you want?"

"More than I can get. More than I deserve if I could get it."

"Here," I said, "don't run into excesses. The liquor is behind you."

He waved at me. "You remember the ships crowded in Aulis like white birds?"

I took it in and handed it back. "But not the face that crowded them there. I never saw the lady and I doubt that anyone else did. It all happened a long time ago and probably never happened at all. Anyway, beauty since then has departed. Successively women became handsome, good-looking, pretty. Now they think it smart to be plain."

It was a long speech and I lit a cigarette.

He fidgeted about and lit one also. "You would not have said that this afternoon." Informatively he continued: "Aphrodite never existed——"

"Good Lord! I thought it was Helen you were talking of."

"But she exists today."

"Well, I am sure Swinburne would be glad to know it. What is her present style and title?"

Negligently he strewed the ashes. "Miss Chilton."

"Oh!" I said longly, for even in my Harlem fastness the rumour of her beauty had reached me. "How did you swim into her galley?"

"Brevoort brought her to see some etchings."

"What did she say?"

"Nothing."

"Very well-bred of her. See here! The original Chilton was a patroon, was he not? Or no, he could not have been. A lord of the manor, that's it. There is a Chilton Manor somewhere up the Hudson. Didn't she say anything?"

"It was her mother who did the talking. I asked them to dinner tomorrow. You have got to come."

Well, why not? I thought, for the turpitude on which I had been engaged was done and I said: "Send a car for me."

To my knowledge he had six cars, which is only reasonable, and he may have had more, which is not. None the less he rebuked me.

"You act like a prima donna."

But he sent the car and I went.

The drawing-room, huge, high-ceiled, frescoed, fitted in yellow and black, was unusually bare, to the foot that is, and I wondered at it. At one end, fronting windows that gave on upper Fifth Avenue, were two rows of chairs. At them also I wondered.

"A camp-meeting?" I said to Mrs. Trefusis, born a Bradish, who was there with her daughter. The latter, a prim débutante who could throw a cartwheel without displaying much of her subsurface garments.

Additionally were Brevoort, a gay sort of ass; his sister, Hilaria Vaux, who was gayer; other topnotchers, and Cally, a physician, whom we called Cagliostro—a pleasantry which secretely he liked and openly resented. The best of us have our weaknesses. But as yet not the Chiltons.

Finally they came.

Bradish introduced me. "This is Chandos Poole."

Mrs. Chilton gave me her hand. A tall woman, admirably sent out, she had an easy way, which I fancied could be very repellent, and eyes flat as a snake's. Those eyes darted.

"I knew your mother." She turned to her daughter.

"Darling, you have heard me speak of dear Mrs. Poole?"

Probably the girl never had, though what she replied and whether she replied, I have forgotten. I was thinking of the ships crowded at Aulis, one of which instantly floated me to Paphos where I stood before Aphrodite when young and a girl.

Nelly Chilton had the low Greek brow, the ineffable Greek nose, lips lifted at the corners by the upturned comma of the Athenian mouth, buttercup hair, an apple-blossom skin and cornflower eyes. She seemed to have gems about her, not that she needed them or had them, but their glow was there and, with it, a charm that was overwhelming. Many a man would have paid through the nose to be allowed just to stand and look at her.

Aristotle, asked what beauty is, dodged it and said, "A question for the blind." I am not blind and I knew that I stood before it. It is a rare sensation. Only once had I experienced it quite so amply and that was when considering—through fieldglasses—a landscape of lilies and tigers.

But at once we went on and in to what I thought a very ordinary dinner, a sort of pot-au-feu with wings to it. The wings were ortolans, though where and how the caitiff of a chef had obtained them, I afterward forgot to ask.

The room, a sort of baronial hall, extended up through two storeys. Midway, it was circled by a gallery from which other rooms abutted and from which arrased tapestries hung.

I never cared for it, but I preferred it to the dinner which, in addition to being ordinary, was dull. If it had not been for Cally, it would have been deadly. Occasionally, Brevoort flared a little and then like a damp pinwheel went out. On one side I had the Trefusis girl.

Primly she remarked: "Must be jolly to write and do what you like to the heroines. Don't you find it nice and easy?"

I threw one of my own cartwheels. "Well, hardly. This morning I wrote a line. This afternoon I scratched it out. I am quite exhausted."

Up a bit, on the opposite side, was Miss Chilton. I saw her laughing at something Cally had said. Any emotion is unbecoming. True beauty is austere. Yet her laughter heightened hers. It did not deform, it humanised. It lifted her from mythology and set her down before you an unspoiled, unaffected girl.

From her I looked at her mother who was talking to Bradish, no, at him. After the manner of a woman of her monde and her years, she was considerably made up. Behind the paint and the slight contractions at her eyes and mouth, I could see her also, a soul disillusioned, hungry, fatigued, indomitable—a soul common enough, the soul of a woman at odds with fate and determined to outwit it.

Voicelessly I said to my neighbour, "Is Mrs. Chilton a widow?"

"He took his hat and umbrella and no one has seen him since."

Sensible man, I reflected.

At the moment, from across the table, Brevoort called at Miss Chilton.

"If you were not yourself, who would you dislike to be?"

"But that is just it," she answered. "We aren't any of us ourselves. We are all of us masked and it is that I dislike. I don't want a disguise, I want to be Me."

She spoke with little pauses in a husky Mayfair voice that was singularly fetching. At the time that was all I noticed, except that Bradish, who had been literally hanging on her words, looked as though he could jump straight down the throat from which they came.

That is all I noticed. But there is a Russian saying to the effect that life is a dark room in which we are shut in with an enemy—the eternal enemy that we have within us—and from whom we have to fight free. Afterward I recalled that saying and wondered whether she knew it and had been translating it for us. Yet how dark that dark room of hers was to become she could not have known. None of us knew. But even then its shadows were groping for her. At the glittering table, in the great lighted hall, more particularly perhaps in the brilliance of her incredible beauty, no one could see them. Yet, stealthy, ominous, relentless, they were reaching for her, reaching, too, for Bradish, stretching out to cover them both, to shroud them, to hide them away.

Then, at once, everybody was getting up.

Now, though, in the drawing-room, the chairs that fronted the windows were occupied by people, very sumptuous all of them, and all convulsed by some private joke.

For all I knew they might have been the pick of the social basket. Yet, suddenly, pushing back the chairs, there they were clapping and singing, kicking up before and behind, while one of them, a ravishing little animal, tiptoed out on the bare floor and danced.

The singing sank. At the piano was a fat lady. Still the girl danced, not acrobatically as I believe the fashion was then, but with what I imagined might be the fabled art of Taglioni. Presently, with a backward gesture at her spangled skirt, she stopped and bowed. On her forehead, one drop of perspiration glistened.

I did not see her again for a little and meanwhile a man, with a lot of hair and an affable manner, asked me for my hat, hoped I had not been careless enough to lose it, borrowed Brevoort's handkerchief, a square of folded linen, from which he shook out a shower of orchids that drenched Miss Chilton.

Then, at once, the other sumptuous people treated us to a farce, of which the fun was so good and so quick that some of us roared and Miss Chilton laughed.

I could see her at it and I thought she should never do anything else, except smile. For a while thereafter smile she did, no doubt, and often I dare say, if only for the mere civility of it, but when that little while had passed I never saw her smile again.

Presently there was a frisk and afterward there was supper. During the frisk, I delighted myself, and I hope the fat lady, by two-stepping with her. Bradish orang-outangoed with the little ballerina. But, good chap that he was, he put me beside her at supper, a real old-fashioned orgy, at which we all drank too much, except the Chiltons and the Trefusis, who long since had gone, the prim débutante showing off to the delighted Rialtians a tiptop cartwheel as she went.

How young we were then! How young and how mad!

II

Before me, the next evening, were the galleys of my latest crime. However iniquitous the copy, the proofs were worse. They were larded with microscopic felonies which required the eyes of a bug and the patience of a philosopher to detect, yes, and with the certainty of defeat in the end—yet I was attempting to correct them.

All at once the ink shook all over it. An earthquake had jarred my elbow. There was Bradish again.

When I opened, there was Cally also.

With my usual courtesy I greeted them. "Entrez, canailles."

In mitigation, Bradish gestured. "He picked me up in the street."

"Misfortunes never come singly," I resignedly replied. "They come single file and ask for a drink."

"For two of 'em," said Cally. "I have been dining at Duncan's. After dinner he danced a pas seul."

"For you?"

We were then in the workshop where I got out spirits which I knew water would dampen.

Cally helped himself abundantly.

"Some time since, Duncan called me in. He could not walk. He could shuffle a bit and even that hurt. Why, he did not know. No one knew. He had had the indicated tests which indicated nothing. He told me all about it, told it endlessly. I said: 'Do as I tell you and in six months you will dance.' Tonight, the six months were up. He danced. He danced on the dinner-table and broke it down. Pass the bottle."

"What did you prescribe, Cagliostro?"

"The dentist. I told him to have his teeth out, every one of them."

"And then robbed him!" I enviously exclaimed. "Lord! If instead of a hackman I were only a physician! It is true I have bankrupted a lot of people and I hope to bankrupt more. But I do it in cold ink. You do it in cold blood."

Cally nodded. "You are having a good time, aren't you?" Philosophically he added, "Well, we all had one last night."

He turned to Bradish. "In spite of the charm of one of your guests, I have held, and still hold, that beauty is a survival."

Blandly he turned to me. "Where is your telephone?"

"Down stairs, around the corner, two streets up, across the way, at the undertaker's."

Bradish lit another cigarette. "Did you ever hear of such a chap?"

"Genius is always eccentric," Cally quite as blandly replied.

He was bland. With a pointed beard, eyebrows that were a bit upturned and a beak of a nose, he had all the blandness of Mephistopheles.

At that beard he plucked. Then putting on his hat, out he went.

The door had not closed before Bradish was at me.

"The Chiltons are coming to supper. They are at the opera now with Mrs. Amsterdam. I told them to fetch her and that I would fetch you. You will like Mrs. Amsterdam. Or rather she will like you. She is very keen on good-looking young bloods."

"Go to the devil!" I retorted. "Good Lord! Mrs.

Amsterdam! I remember her when I was a little shaver. Why, I have sat in her lap."

"Have you? Well, don't remind her of that if she sits in yours. Now run along and dress."

I put the proofsheets before him. "While I am at it, here is some rot for you."

Bradish laughed. "You're the most hospitable chap I ever knew."

When I returned, he was looking at something else, at a mental vision of Nelly Chilton, I think, for as I entered he gave a sort of start.

It is years since then, but often I have thought how differently it might have fared with him and how differently it would have fared with her, could his vision have been clairvoyant. Yet, in that, I am probably in error. Probably, whatever the future holds for us is pre-written in our progression. None the less, I cannot but feel that all would have been changed, his life and her life, if for but a moment's space he could have beheld the halls that were waiting for him then. Hung with enigmas, tapestried with tears, Bil Sayers called them the Halls of Eblis, which, I believe, is Arabic for hell. If he could have seen them, and the "if" is enormous, he might have outwitted fate.

"Comeonski," I said, an invitation which we had acquired in Moscow.

He got at his watch. Thin as a wafer, it was always wrong.

"Yes, let's hurry. I hope Cally has not taken the car."

There were cabs in Harlem then, except when you wanted one and below, in the street, the spectacle of Mike hugging himself to keep warm, was comforting.

"Home," Bradish told him, "and never mind the speed law."

Whether or not Mike minded the law is perhaps unimportant, but just as we were approaching that home a fire-engine burst on the avenue like a typhoon. Incidentally a taxi was dodging it and against that taxi another car banged.

Already Mike had hopped off. Adjacently great doors had opened. Two servants, one with the face of a wooden mask and the other with the tread of a cat, hurried down. From the first taxi two women alighted; from the second a man. The typhoon had flown afar, chased by another.

But now we were all on the sidewalk, Bradish and I, Mike, the servants, the women, the man and two highly abusive mechanicians. How they pacified themselves is not a part of this document. The women, furred to the eyes, were unrecognisable; to me, that is, but not to Bradish, nor yet to the other man whose face appeared to be cut.

Bradish, meanwhile, was doing the honours of the pavement to the women, whom also the injured man addressed, and I saw one of them give him her hand, while the other affected to be unaware that he was about.

Bradish called at the wooden mask. "Peters, show the ladies in." He called at the catman. "Gedney, see to their wraps." He turned to the wounded. "You must not bleed to death. Come in with me and we will apply first aid. My name is Bradish. I see you know my guests."

"They are relatives of mine," lightly the wounded man answered. "My name is Austen. But I have only a scratch. Just as many thanks to you though."

As he spoke, he held his hat on with one hand and with the other patted his face.

Without lingering to hear more, I went on and up the steps, beyond which events were lurking, as they do lurk, until they are ready for us, though without waiting until we are ready for them, which only the sage ever is. Yet, as I look back now, I can see that even then they were gathering, prepared to pounce.

In the yellow and black room I found the Chiltons, found too that I was in no immediate danger. Mrs. Amsterdam was not there.

"Is he coming in?" Miss Chilton asked.

Without knowing to whom she referred, I told her of course he was.

"It is strange," the beauty continued. "I am fated to be in an accident. It is in my horoscope. But it is very wrong to believe in that. The Church forbids it. It is among the secret things and secret things, the Bible teaches, belong only to the Lord."

In speaking, she crossed herself.

I was profoundly astonished but I hope I did not show it.

"None the less," she continued, "when I saw that great mad thing rushing at us, I——"

"The typhoon you mean?" I put in.

"Typhoon! What typhoon?" Mrs Chilton surprisedly called at me.

But Bradish was effecting his entrance, and she turned to him.

"Sorry about Laura Amsterdam. She threw us over."

"The point is," Bradish with some gallantry replied, "that you are here and shortly your relative will be."

"Relative!" Mrs. Chilton, in the same surprised manner, exclaimed. "What relative?"

Bradish motioned. "A Mr. Austen who is slowly recovering from a wound that might have been mortal."

Mrs. Chilton motioned also. The gesture, though slight, contrived to be emphatic. It reduced any relationship to nothingness.

"Nonsense! Some of our people were related ages ago. If it comes to that, everybody is related to everybody."

Now though, in the wide doorway, he too appeared. The spaciousness framed him, disclosing the portrait of a man young, tall, virile, abominably good-looking, with an air curiously and attractively insolent. From his face the blood had gone. A strip of court-plaster replaced it.

"Aunt Mary," he leisurely remarked at Mrs. Chilton. "If that brute of a taximan of mine jarred you ever so little, you know I regret it."

What a crammer, I thought. For it was not regret that his face expressed, it was impudence. It was as though he were telling her: "See here now, I am, and shall be, one too many for you."

But as I am not writing fiction I may admit that that interpretation came to me not then but later when I thought it over. Yet though I still think the interpretation correct, I know he was wrong. He was not one too many for her. She was one too many for him. Yes, and fate was too many for both.

Meanwhile we had all gone in to supper. Bradish had Mrs. Chilton at his right, and, at his left, the beauty, next to whom Austen succeeded in seating himself.

I sat next to Mrs. Chilton who thoughtfully and generally remarked:

"It is too bad about Laura Amsterdam. She would have made the table even."

But she meant that it was too bad about Austen. Without him the table would have been evener.

I took that in with some pheasant that had been cooked, with oranges and almonds, in madeira and tea, and though that of course is the only way that a pheasant could be cooked, yet I felt that the caitiff below stairs was improving.

While I was savouring it, I glanced over at the beauty who was talking to Austen. At the moment she again suggested Aphrodite and I marvelled at this paradox in flesh and blood who looked like a pagan goddess and talked like a mediæval saint. Yet though the mythological quality persisted, it seemed sublimated then by something else, by just what I could not immediately determine, but in a moment I did. In her eyes there was a glow, in her voice a caress and it seemed to me that the beauty was in love, profoundly in love I imagined, and I wondered with whom.

When, finally, I nailed the lucky devil, it was without any applause for my own acumen.

"You do nothing but eat," Bradish threw at me.

"Yes," I threw back. "But I think when I eat and just now I was thinking of an ideal repast which we once enjoyed and which was composed of chrysanthemum soup and the maxims of Confucius."

"And dolphin, too," Bradish put in. "Don't forget the dolphin!"

"I never heard of such a thing." Mrs. Chilton resuming her surprised manner, exclaimed. "A dolphin! How was it cooked?"

"With various sauces and condiments," I told her. "You know the adage—Sweet are the juices of diversity?"

"No," she determinedly replied. "I do not know the adage and now that I have heard it, I dislike it extremely."

"Yes," said Bradish. "It is very painful."

But I did not propose to be snubbed and I took it up again.

"Everything that has to do with eating is painful. Eating takes away your appetite. I have always loved the bishop who said: 'God bless our home and damn our cook.' "

"But not Mr. Bradish's cook," Mrs. Chilton, with the same determination, retorted. "Last night the dinner was perfect and tonight the supper is plus que parfait. Darling!"

She looked at her daughter and turned to Bradish. "We must be going."

She added something which I did not hear. Then she repeated it. "Darling!"

Presently, when they were again furred to the eyes, and we were putting them in Bradish's car, I could not see Mrs. Chilton's face, though I would have given a dollar for the privilege. Unrebuffably Austen got in with them.

It was some time before I saw him again or the Chiltons either. When I did see them, a door was closing and beyond was a sphinx.

III

It must have been after two when, again in Harlem, I went up the interminable stairs. On the way I was thinking of that girl and her undreamed-of beauty. As I began at the fifth, I saw what I took to be an old woman huddled on the landing opposite my door. But, as I advanced, she stood up. I saw then she was not old but young and, immediately, as I approached her, I could not help it, I started and nearly slipped. Then I raised my hat. It was Nelly Chilton!

Why was she there? How had she come? What did she want? And where had she got a hat and where had she changed her furs? Where, for that matter, had she changed her expression? At supper it had been alluring. Now it was reserved.

My bewilderment must have been very manifest. In any event, at once she spoke. With an intonation, slightly foreign, she said something.

I heard, but I did not hear understandingly. That also she must have seen. She spoke again.

"Could you, without inconvenience, loan me a chair?"

I did get that and inanely I parroted it.

"A chair?"

She indicated an adjoining door. "I have lost my key. Until morning I am a vagrant."

And an exotic, I thought, for already I had recognised my mistake.

"You are quite right."

That is what she said and I started again.

"About what?" But, rallying, I resumed; "I have five chairs, I have even six, but the sixth is broken. You shall have whatever displeases you least."

I opened my door, switched the light in the hall and turned to her.

She entered and followed me into the workshop where I again switched a light.

As I looked at her then, she sniffed, much as a terrier will, and catalogued me.

"You are a literary man."

"No, I write for the magazines. There is nothing less literary than that. Will you try this chair?"

As I spoke, I looked again. In feature, in colouring, her resemblance to Nelly Chilton was curious. There it stopped. Similarly dressed and seen across a room, one could not have told them apart. A nearer view differentiated. Nelly Chilton looked like a goddess and talked like a saint. This young woman looked like a princess and, as I presently discovered, talked like a sibyl. The other girl's beauty was pagan. This girl's was noble. Otherwise, except in height and figure, not a pin to choose between them.

"We are not the same, are we? In the hall I saw you mistook me for her."

In private life, it was a bit weird.

Immediately she added: "Miss Chilton and I move in different spheres, but recently I came in contact with her. We both noticed the resemblance. It seemed to amuse her."

"Well, I'll be shot!" I exclaimed. "Certainly you are very gifted."

"Unfortunately gifted," she corrected. "Telepathy has its disadvantages."

"And its compensations."

"Occasionally, as in the present instance. I know

I can say that, for I know also you will not misconstrue it."

In speaking, she removed a glove. There are hands that are spiritual, hands that are coarse. There are philistine hands and hands that are artistic. I saw her fingers, long, tapering, and I chanced it.

"You are an artist."

"My hand is tell-tale, is it not? Yet the tales it tells are not quite true. For the moment, I am associated with a firm of interior decorators. It was there I saw Miss Chilton. But I am intruding. Perhaps you will help me with a chair."

As she moved toward one, I saw that she was simply and admirably dressed, dressed with an originality that is nowhere on sale.

"The landing is a bit bleak," I told her. "Why not make a morning of it?"

Momentarily she seemed to consider it. Then, like a good fellow, she removed her wrap and sat down.

I gave her my name and she gave me hers. It was Bolton, Aly Bolton.

At the combination I exclaimed and she said her father was English and her mother Russian. Both were dead. In outline she sketched her life. It was a very cobwebby outline. In exchange I gave her odds and ends from my own career. After which we got back at the beginning. She spoke again of Miss Chilton and I asked what she thought of her.

"Only the obvious things. She is a little obvious, is she not? But——"

She had hesitated and it trailed away.

I prodded her. "But what?"

Then it appeared she could "see," as that psychic term is used, and had "seen" since she was a child, when it perplexed and annoyed her parents. She had a brother who died. Afterward she played with him. Once, when he was in a chair her father sat on him. She screamed and hit her father and he punished her for it. After that, the talent was hid in a bushel. Since then it had diminished. But she could still "see," at least a little.

So she explained and I asked what she saw in Miss Chilton.

"In her? It would be hard to say. But, about her, I saw darkness, thick darkness and a light beyond."

"How did you see that? I mean how does anything of the kind come to you?"

"Very much as though I were looking through the wrong end of the opera-glass."

"And how do you interpret darkness?"

"It's a symbol. It means illness, misfortune, death."

I sat back. "Yes and, with the light beyond, the symbol is clear. 'Life is death in a land of darkness. Death is life in a land of light.' "

"Very beautiful," she said, "and probably true. Whose is it?"

"It is from the song of the singer going out from Amenti."

"Amenti?"

"The Egyptian purgatory. There the disembodied were judged. If they had harmed no heart, if they had made no one weep, if they had not talked abundantly, if they had not been anxious, harpers took up the song, they were free. From the land of darkness they passed to the land of light."

From my recital of antique sins, she turned. I could see her looking about, noting the absence of articles of virtue. Presently she said and I thought approvingly:

"You are clockless."

"Yes, and watchless also. Brain workers should be. Watches and clocks presuppose things to be done, appointments to be kept, amusements to be endured. They presuppose punctuality which is the thief of time."

She was good enough to agree with me.

From time we passed to space. We talked of everything in the universe, except Einstein's theory of it, which would have been premature. Altogether we talked for five hours. Never but once before had I talked so long to a woman and on that occasion I kept saying the same thing over and over again. Ultimately the sun leered in. It leered groggily, as though it had been making a night of it, and, asking her permission, I left the room, went out and around the corner, ferreted about, unearthed a locksmith, brought him back, set him to work and, with the key that he made, returned to her. Her arms were on the table, her head was in them, her hat on a chair. Sleep had sunk her in its deep lagoons.

In the street I had become a beast of burden, ladened with crescents, unsalted butter, fruit, cream. These I took to the kitchenette—horrible word!—where I made coffee. While the pot was boiling I arranged a tray. To embellish the tray, I took from the back corner of the cupboard's top shelf a Sévres cup that had come down to me wrapped in tissue paper. Other things that had come with it had gone with the diverted bonds.

On that early morning, with the tray and in evening clothes, I must have looked like a waiter when, rising from those lagoons, she looked up.

The experience of awaking in the rooms of a stranger must, I thought, be a novelty to her and I wondered how she would act. Whatever she did would be so much copy.

But there she routed me. I had put that cup before her. She took it, held it, her head went back. She seemed to be considering the ceiling. But presently,

"A large room. A man with a white beard. A little boy in blue. The old man is drinking from a cup. The little boy is showing him a wooden horse painted yellow "

From the ceiling, her eyes turned to me.

"This is the cup. Who are the people?"

Dumbfounded, I stared. What else could I do? For, as I told her, the old man was my grandfather and I the little boy. But this intimate demonstration of psychometry, which is the rarest and most curious of gifts, one that enables the gifted to tell from an object where the object has been and what occurred there, this miracle astounded me and I told her that also.

She took it lightly, with a light smile. Then, at once, she presiding, we fell to. The promenade around the corner and back had converted me into a hyena. I ate enormously, growling a little, as I suppose hyenas do, yet only at my own forgetfulness. I had omitted to fetch flowers. But then, praise God, it was not every day that I breakfasted with a beautiful sibyl. It would have been too disturbing.

"You live alone?" I asked.

A few hours before I had thought her face noble and reserved. Over the coffee-pot it projected an interior radiance, a glow clear and defined as mother-of-pearl.

"No, not alone," she answered. "I have a friend, Signor Matouchi."

Some opera-singer, I thought.

"He has the most ferocious whiskers you ever saw," she added, "and he will be sure to bite me if I do not hurry."

"Oh!" I said, inanely relieved, for what business was it of mine? "Well, give him my love and perhaps you will let me add a saucer of cream."

She thanked me, gathered her hat and cloak, took the key, thanked me again.

I saw her to the door, where I gave her the cream and where I heard Signor Matouchi meow. After which, I went to bed, slept prodigiously and woke from dreams of a mime.

For days he had haunted me. I had wanted, if possible, to produce something less ordinary than ordinary fiction and I had thought of doing a pantomime and of calling it The Chatterbox, though, as I look back now, I think the title came first and the idea of a pantomime came later. What better title, I youthfully reflected, could a dumbshow have?

The galleys of my last iniquity out of the way, I got at it. Except to the amateur, the getting at anything of the kind is a form of labour hard as a bricklayer's, much more engrossing and far less useful. It held me with invisible threads that were firmer than rope. They bound and gagged me, rendering me, as the opiates of creative dreams do render one, unfit for human companionship.

I did not forget the sibyl. Twice, in the hazards of hall and stairway, I saw and saluted her, but though indulgently she asked me, I did not return her visit. I did not forget Bradish, but I had other fish to fry. There were earthquakes. Hermetically I ignored them. Que diable! When I am not at home, I am out. Only a volcano could have erupted me.

Meanwhile, I dressed The Chatterbox. March went, April came. There were skies of silk, all the surprises and surrenders of spring, before I got up from it.

IV

THAT day, with a dozen violets in the lapel of a coat that still said Savile Row, I went junketing, not on Fifth Avenue, where the ornate used to stroll and where they stroll no longer, but to the east of upper Madison, wondering whether I might not happen on some flat less leprous than the walkup. Yet, as I look back now, I am sure the junket lacked conviction. Moving, the French say, is a little death. But in that sense all New Yorkers have their minor deceases and it was in trying to incline my heart that I wandered through thick streets, thin streets, streets of gloating windows, streets of obvious disquiet, streets of unaccountable beings, until finally, entering one that seemed pregnant with obscure calamities, I happened on a house that had a Leah-like air of desertion.

On it, a sign informed me that an apartment with all conveniences was to let and I was conjecturing these conveniences when, from the entrance, Austen appeared.

Instantly he amazed me.

"I was just thinking of you."

I stood and looked at him. Soberly and admirably dressed, he was the portrait of Aramis in modern clothes.

"Are you busy?" he asked.

Brummel's retort slid from me. "'Ants and people in trade are busy. Never ask a gentleman that.'" He took it with great good nature.

"Come in and let me offer you a sherry and bitters."

I did not want his sherry and bitters. It was the sign and the conjectural conveniences that tempted me and I followed him up two flights to a landing where, through the open door of an empty flat, I beheld a scrubwoman.

Leah, I told myself.

Adjacent was a parallel flat into which he showed me and then into a room that had an air careless and insolent, a room that resembled him, except that it was less well-dressed. There was a sideboard, a table covered with a drooping green cloth, the usual chairs, a bookcase, a green sofa and a cupboard, wide open, in which coats were hanging, fur coats, motor coats, rain coats, top coats, coats for every season and, it may be, of every colour. He closed the door on them, rang, and at once, as though sprung from a trap, a civil-faced gnome appeared.

"Shall it be a cocktail? Or would you prefer——"

"A drop of Polly, if you have it," I told him.

"A bottle of Apollinaris," he said to the gnome who seemed to produce it at once.

"Look here, Poole," he continued as the servant disappeared, "I have been wanting to call on you but I could not discover where you live. You are a member of the Buck, aren't you? I stopped in there yesterday, and asked the doorkeeper. Of course, he would not tell me, but I thought, in asking, that I might find you there."

"The flat next door is to let, is it not?" I appropriately enquired.

"Yes, or rather no. It was to let but a man I know has taken it. Have a cigarette?"

We were seated at the table, across which he shoved a case. I helped myself and he got back at me.

"What I wanted to see you about is Bradish."

"Hello!" I exclaimed. "How is he? I have not seen him in a hundred years. What's wrong with him."

"He is too confoundedly rich."

"Yes," I said, "it is disgusting."

"He ought not to be roaming around loose. I want him to keep off the grass."

What grass he meant, I did not know, but the effrontery of it was beautiful and I said as much.

"Then why don't you tell him so?"

"There you are! If I did, he would be in a position to tell me to go to the devil and I would have to swallow it. You know Mrs. Chilton?"

I drank the Polly. "Well enough to bow if she bowed first."

"Here it is then. She wants to make a match between him and her daughter and——"

"I don't see that that is any business of ours."

"It is my business at any rate and as a friend of his I think it is yours."

"Well," I said, "perhaps it is your business. You are a relative, aren't you?"

"A good lot more than that. I have known Miss Chilton ever since she was a little girl. I am about the only man she can turn to and——"

He looked away.

Everybody likes to be confidential, if they can be so to someone who will accompany them on the harp. But for the harp there must be intimacy. Between Austen and myself there was none and I understood why he looked away.

"But," he at once resumed, "that is neither here nor there. The point is that Miss Chilton is interested in someone else and it seemed to me that if you would say a word——"

"Good Lord!" I interrupted. "You speak as though he were persecuting her. That is not Bradish."

"No. Certainly not. It is her mother. She is doing what she can to force her to take him and it is for that reason I thought you might——"

"Never in the world. It would not help in the least. On the contrary——"

"But see here——"

"You don't know Bradish. Any interference makes him mulish and I don't blame him. I can be mulish myself. If I had his money I would be a wilderness of mules. Great Scott! What is the use of being rich as all outdoors if you can't tell anybody and everybody to go to the devil."

"Precisely, and that is just what I want him to say to Mrs. Chilton. If he doesn't, look here, Poole, if he doesn't, he is going to regret it."

I laughed. "Is that a threat?"

"You misunderstand me. He is not the man for Miss Chilton. I don't mean because of his unfortunate appearance. If he were Phœbus Apollo it would be quite the same. He does not appeal to her, not in the least. But her mother is so jockeying her that she may run her into it. In that case what sort of an existence can he expect to lead."

"He hasn't told me."

"Isn't it obvious though? I may be in error, but I'll wager he is as material as they make 'em."

"So am I."

Gracefully he yielded it. "I fear I am also."

"Well then?"

"But Miss Chilton is just the opposite. Miss Chilton is as spiritual as he is the reverse."

For a cited beauty, a beauty of her type and headiness that, ordinarily, would have been a bit thick. Yet, I knew it to be true. In her face were raptures. There were lilies in her thoughts. But that did not help matters. Even otherwise the matter did not concern me and I got up to go.

He, too, got up.

"Put in a word, Poole. You will be doing him a good turn."

You mean I will be doing you one, I thought, for I saw through it then.

But he laughed or affected to laugh and added:

"I don't pretend to know Bradish, but I do know Mrs. Chilton and that is enough."

He said it as he went with me to the door, where he thanked me and saw me out.

On the landing Leah stood, a pail in one hand, a mop in the other.

As I went down the stair, I little dreamed in what curious and tragic circumstances I was to recall having seen her there. What occupied me was my lucky squeak. By not more than a hair I had missed having Austen for a neighbour. He would have been waylaying and buttonholing me till I died.

Yet, as I afterward recognised, it was fateful for him, and not only for him but for all concerned, that he had buttonholed me at all.

I made straight for Bradish's house.

V

SINCE then, in looking back, there have been moments when it seemed to me that that moment was pivotal, that of all that afterward happened I was then the direct agent. There have been other moments when it seemed to me that it must all have happened anyway. The latter view is the more reasonable, the former more ambitious. As yet, I have made no choice.

Even when the servant told me that Bradish was not at home, even then, if I had gone away, the course of events must have swerved, though it is probable that sooner or later they would have reassembled in their designed combination. The old idea of the spiderous fates that sit and spin is picturesque, as any allegory should be. But behind the curtain, forces which we ourselves have created, play on us and on our lives. The fates that sit and spin are our own fingers. The spell they cast is destiny self-made.

These views, certainly superficial, came to me long later. At the moment I had turned to go. Before me on the pavement a man passed and nodded. That was the pivotal moment. The trivial incident arrested me and telling the servant I would wait I went on and in to the library.

Former Bradishes had been intensely respectable and equally dull. They were what, I believe, was called strict Presbyterians. Upstairs, in the rooms that extended from the gallery, some of their remains were covered with horsehair. In this room other remains survived—a severe carpet, a calvanistic table, stern bookshelves, straitlaced chairs. In a corner was the ugliest piece of statuary I ever saw. On the table was the biggest and ugliest inkpot ever made.

From a wall, Bradish's father looked down, very much, I suppose, as he had looked at these things when they all lived with him in Washington Square. Moreover, in an adjoining room, that gave on the street, were other felicities. The adjoining room, through which one had to pass to reach the library, was the real chamber of horrors. There Bradish received tiresome people, lawyers, agents and the like. Why, with all his wealth, he received them at all; why he stuck to the damning evidence of ancestral taste, these were mysteries from which I shrank.

But it was not all horror. On this day in that library I found an old friend who always had something new to say, in which he differed vastly from other people of my acquaintance. His name is Hugo's Shakespeare. The pages turn to the sound of trumpets, to the long parade of genius. The book is just what a book should be, perfectly impossible and equally exalting.

A moment and the pageantry took me. I was floating from height to height, from prophet to seer, hovering, a lost soul, before thrones in the ideal, passing from Isaiah and Æschylus, up through the ages to Hugo himself. Then abruptly, a titan reached and hurled me. Shot through space I was on earth again, in a highly uncomfortable chair, facing the insults that fell.

"What a beast you are!"

I shied the book. Bradish caught it and sat down before me.

With the disposition of a sundial—over which clouds will pass—the spider, at that moment, made him, as in moments of excitement it often did make him, unaffectedly hideous. Familiarity breeds many things. Usually I did not notice. I could not help noticing it then. It seemed about to spring.

He motioned. "I have gone to you. I have sent. The janitor said you were dead. What sort of a chap are you?"

"A mere pilgrim. What's wrong?"

"I am in hell."

"Look out," I told him, and far better than I knew. "There is always a deeper one. How did you get there?"

He put the Hugo on the table.

"It's Miss Chilton."

"See here," I said. "An hour ago Austen had the cheek to say you must keep off the grass."

Bradish stared. "He has been at you, has he?"

"He got me in his rooms and used me as a sewer. It appears that if you don't look out you'll get let in."

He started. "I will, eh? By whom then?"

"Her mother. He said she would jockey you into a corner."

"Gammon! She is in a corner herself and a pretty tight one. The woman hasn't a penny."

"There's the Chilton place."

"Mortgaged. Blanketed up to the roof, even to the vault there."

"Vault? What vault?"

"In colonial days every manor had its own cemetery. The Chiltons have theirs."

He was becoming historical, wandering away from it and, glad of it, I let him run on, but he did not run far. In a moment he was back again.

"Her mother is afraid they'll bolt."

I hoped they would. I omitted to say so however. Instead, I became sympathetic.

"Jim, if this were a novel of mine, I would make the hero—you are the hero—show himself in such fine colours that the lady would jump down his throat."

"Yes, you would be sure to write just such rubbish."

Pausing, he smoothed the table, which was entirely unruffled.

"I have, I suppose, a dollar or two. I have also, I suppose, a year or two ahead of me. I would give them all, everything I can claim in this world, everything I may hope for in the next, if——"

He broke it off, but I followed it and I thought, isn't it wonderful how the illusion of happiness which the idea of union with another can create, will pack a sane man's head with insanities. He thinks himself wholly in love with this girl and what he loves is not the girl but his idea of her. Any girl that resembled her would do as well. At which, up before me, surged that sibyl. Nelly Chilton and Aly Bolton were alike as two roses.

Meanwhile, painfully he was at it. "It's my face."

"Nonsense," I told him and I meant it. For a woman must be loved, though it be by a monster, perhaps particularly by a monster, provided that what it is conventional to call her affections are not otherwise involved.

"Hasn't Austen anything?" I asked.

"Enough to pay his tailor."

There had been an hour when even that potentiality had seemed chimerical to me and I might have said as much but, at the moment, Peters announced that luncheon was served.

Bradish got up. "Comeonski."

I, too, got up and, preceding him, went through the chamber of horrors and crossed the hall where Peters was opening the front door. I passed on and had entered the drawing-room when I heard a man speaking rapidly, in English, but with the unmistakable accent of France.

"Mr. Bradish? I am fortunate to find you. Is this yours?"

I turned. The man's back was to the light. I could not see his face, but I could see Jim's. He was looking at a strip of paper which the man held out to him—and held on to also—and, in looking, his face had grown vicious. Usually very civil to everyone, but already out of temper and angered by the abrupt intrusion, not only his expression was vicious, his voice was also.

"Never saw it before or you either. Peters, put him out."

"Ah, flute alors et bien merci!"

The man wheeled, he went, the door closed and I passed on through the black and yellow room and then through the portières that hung between it and the pseudo-baronial hall.

Bradish was at my heels and as I seated myself I put it to him.

"Who is your friend?"

Vicious still, he barked. "How do I know? He had a cheque drawn to somebody or other with what purported to be my signature."

"A forgery?"

He flung out his napkin. "What else? They will spot it quick enough at the bank."

"What was the tune?"

"Four thousand and odd."

"But look here. Are you sure it is not some cheque of yours that has been raised?"

"Even so, it would not matter."

He was wrong in that and I told him so.

He washed a clam down with chablis and exploded a "Ha!" to which he added: "Ever notice the little joker on a Bank of England note?"

"What little joker?"

"On the left side of the second letter of the word that tells the amount, there is a microscopic white speck. Unless you knew of it, never in the world would you see it was there."

"What of it?"

"Before the second letter of my name on my cheques I put a little pen prick. The tellers look for it first."

"Such originality is stupendous."

He put it from him. "It was my father's idea."

And what an old smarty he must have been, I thought. But I said, "Well, if you slip up on this cheque it won't hurt you. I would be ashamed myself to be as rich as you are."

He shoved at his plate. "You do talk such rot."

It was sheer envy on his part. He wanted to talk it himself. He wanted to trot Nelly Chilton out again. If you are gone on a girl you must talk of her even if you have to talk to yourself. He could not. The presence of Peters and Gedney prevented. Conscious of which angrily he ate and savagely he drank.

What were the courses that followed, I have forgotten but finally coffee came and to my regret the servants withdrew.

Then at once he was back to his muttons, endlessly, da capo and all over again until, after a full hour of them, Peters, to my joy, looked in.

"Mrs. Chilton, sir."

Enter the villain, I thought.

Bradish got up and half-turned. "Wait here."

The portières received him. They had parted and through the parting his voice floated back.

"This is so nice of you. Have you had luncheon?"

"Luncheon!" She seemed to spit it. "I am drowning."

"Do sit down."

"I tell you I am drowning and you ask me to sit."

"But——"

I could almost see him floundering with her.

"I want your help," she was saying. "You have got to help me."

That "got" was in italics.

"Certainly. Of course." I could hear him reply. "What is it?"

Slow music, I thought.

"How can I tell you?" But she must have known, for immediately she added, "I am in the hands of——"

Her voice had lowered. I could not hear her. I heard him though.

"A blackmailer!"

At her age! I thought.

Again her voice had sunk to inaudible levels. Yet presently a word swam up, a word of good omen. It was Bonheur, which means happiness, I believe, though hardly when it rhymes with Chanteur, for that means blackmailer, in French at any rate. Then, before I could put them together, a question rang frank as a sword thrust.

"Why don't you marry her?"

From before it, he must have backed.

"Why don't I? Good heavens, she——"

"Take her by storm! Go at her hammer and tongs! Carry her off her feet! God, if I were a man——"

He must have got his wind. "It isn't that. I would pick her up and run to the moon with her. There is nothing I wouldn't do, nothing! But——"

"I know," I heard her cry. "I know. 'God help me,' she told me, me her mother, 'it is either Fred or a convent.' A convent! With her looks! I shall go mad."

She seemed to tear the words, they came from her in tatters and I could fancy her lifting her hands, wringing them, crossing and recrossing the room, and I feared Bradish would say, "Calm yourself."

But at once she was at him from another angle.

"This painted beast, what am I to do with him? Only don't tell me I am a beast myself. I am a beast. I know it. But what is the amount to you? Besides, I thought you would never notice, or at least that I could make it good before you did. Now——"

"You might better have asked me," Bradish boomed in. "You could have had it and welcome. As it is I'll take it up. I can't do less."

"But there you are. He says only Nelly herself——"

Again her voice sank and again his swam up.

"I'll beat him to jelly first."

She made some sound, a sort of rasping laugh. "Much good it would do for us both to be in Sing Sing—so near the manor, too."

At that fine levity some plan must have occurred to him. In any event he suggested one.

"Go there. Go there now, today, as fast as you can. She does not know, does she?"

"Not yet."

"Don't tell her then. I'll settle him somehow."

"But of course I shall tell her. She can't refuse you then."

"No, no. It wouldn't be fair."

"Leave it to me," I heard her say and abruptly, for the first time, I realised that I should not have heard her at all. I felt as one may who has been listening at a keyhole. The feeling gave me a twist in the head.

I got up and went to one of the windows from which, in the garden below, I saw a fat man, all in white, a white linen baretta on his head, tormenting a dove-coloured peacock. Momentarily the picture distracted me. But snatches from the duo kept returning. They were like lines in a melodrama. In particular, one stood out: "It is either Fred or a convent."

Fred, I assumed, was Austen.

The fat man, who wore a third empire imperial pulled at it and looked up. I moved away and, as I turned, Bradish came in.

"Has she gone?" I asked.

"The Lord be praised."

"Look here, Jim. Beat me if you like. I overheard a lot of it."

He sat down, helped himself to a glass of brandy and looked over at me.

"That chap with the cheque was Bonheur et Cie. Ever hear of him?"

"Yes, and of Chanteur et Cie, and so have you. You might have known better than to be so quick with him. I must say you botched it famously."

"That's right. Put me in the wrong."

"You put yourself there."

"But how was I to know? He shoved the damned cheque at me and asked if it were mine. What else was there for me to do except send him to the devil?"

"Well, now you can go after him."

"I can, can I? Then you didn't hear his terms."

"He didn't mention any."

"Not here. But from here he went straight to Mrs. Chilton. What do they give you?"

"For blackmail?"

"Forgery."

"Three or four years I fancy. It depends on how polite you are to the judge. But that is all nonsense. You have only to say the cheque is yours and that is the end of it."

"I would have to say it in court. Besides there would be experts."

"Your testimony would prevail."

"But think of the papers! Think of the mess! He says I disowned it in the presence of witnesses and that either Mrs. Chilton can go to jail or else her daughter can come and see him. Those are his terms."

It was like a page from Balzac. It revolted me and I rounded on him.

"What did you mean then by saying you would settle him?"

"I meant I would lay him out, I suppose."

But that seemed very imbecile and to show no doubt that I could be an imbecile too—which I was— I said what afterward I could have bitten my tongue off for.

"Suppose you let me take a hand."

"If you only could, but how can you?"

"I heard you tell Mrs. Chilton to take her daughter and go to the manor. Did she say she would?"

"Yes, today, this afternoon."

"Follow them then and stand guard."

The strategy was amateur and, what is worse, catastrophic. But he jumped at it. I could see him picturing himself with outstretched hands, hands that dripped with money, protecting two women, one who was certainly no better than she ought to be, and the other too good perhaps for mortal man.

"Meanwhile," I added, "I will hold the blackmailer up."

"How?"

"I can't say. I don't know. But I will. At all events I'll try."

It was then I put my foot in it. At the time the door was open, wide open. It was I that gave it the first shove. That I meant well has nothing to do with it, or rather it has. Well-meaning people do the most harm.

"There is an inn there," he was saying. "I'll put up at it. Perhaps——" He broke off. He looked away. At what? I do not know. But almost at once he took it up again. "Well, you never can tell. When I am out there with them, she may reconsider it." Again he looked away, then at me. "If I wire you, you will join me, won't you?"

I stood up. "If you wire, I'll never get it. Telephone here. I'll be in tomorrow. It may be that by that time this creature will have changed his tune. If not——"

He nodded at me. "In that case, I'll ask her again."

I did not follow him and I told him so.

"If Nelly marries me, the cheque, whether good or bad, won't make a wrinkle."

"I suppose not," I said. But I was thinking of something else, and I added: "Whom will you take with you?"

"Mike."

"Hold on. Send a line to the bank. Say you guarantee the signature. And I may need Peters. Tell him so. While you are at it, tell him to pack your things. Then hurry out there as fast as you can."

He saw me to the door. As I went down the steps a motor passed. In it was a man with a dyed mustache. I did not know him from Adam, but the mustache reminded me of another, whose owner, a friend of mine, I had been of some slight service to the year before. Among New Yorkers, gratitude is phenomenal. My friend was a Dublin man and at the time—the poor devil has since passed over—he chiefed it at Police Headquarters.

A taxi took me there. On the way, I evolved a series of schemes that had in view the rout and ruin of Bonheur et Cie. I have forgotten them all now and I regret it. They would have fitted any novel, however poor.

At Headquarters, then in Mulberry Street, I found my friend in the front room, which resembled a real estate office, and where, although he presented the forbidding appearance of an auctioneer, he greeted me with an affability that was painful.

"Me boy, you will just put your fist to this."

He had leaned over, fished from somewhere a copy of my last turpitude and produced a fountain pen. It made me feel like Ainsworth, who contrived to be the author of a hundred novels and a thousand crimes.

As it happened, he knew nothing of Bonheur and he sent for a vulture-eyed man with a battered beak who knew less.

Meanwhile, without mentioning names, I had given him the facts.

"And a Frenchman is he, me boy? Sure as you live if he is that kind of a bullfrog, he's wanted over there and that's why he's here. I'll send one of the lads to give him the look-over. Drop in tomorrow. I may have him in chains."

I took it of course at its face value. None the less it gave me an idea.

VI

THE next forenoon I rang at Bradish's door. Gedney opened, but, as usual, Peters was in the hall.

"Has Mr. Bradish telephoned?" I asked him.

"Yes, sir. Just now. I said you were not here, sir. Mr. Bradish said he would call up again in an hour."

"Where is your hat?"

"My 'at, sir?"

"Call a cab, please, Peters, and come with me. I won't keep you long and I may not need you at all. I am going to a shop on the avenue. When we get there, you stand by the door."

"Yes, sir. Beg pardon, sir. May I ask what it is about?"

"A crook who is trying to get the better of Mr. Bradish."

Peters was as straight and probably as strong as a grenadier. But, a professional man, he wore the professional mask. It was wooden. None the less a corner of his lip had lifted very much as a dog's does when about to bite.

"Thank you, sir. I'll have the cab in a moment."

The Maison Bonheur was on the ground floor. It has gone since but, at the time, a small groom stood at the door; a tall commissionaire on the curb. The window, very spacious, delicately hung, exposed nothing so commercial as anything for sale.

As I entered, a young person in black arched her eyebrows at me. The room, behind which extended a suite of other rooms, was fitted with mirrors, with brocaded chairs, with a table that shone. At the moment, a woman, whom I judged a topnotcher, was talking to another woman, whom I took for a première. But the young person had approached.

"Yes, sir?"

"Tell Bonheur to come here."

"Who shall I say?"

"Say it's a man who wants a word with him and who won't dilly-dally about it either."

The topnotcher looked from the première at me and from me at the première. The latter stared. But the young person had gone and I sat down.

Then almost at once, followed by the young person, the dressmaker appeared.

"I am Mr. Bonheur. What is your business?"

More for copy purposes than anything else, I looked him up and down.

Bradish was not Adonis, but you never would have mistaken him for any but the right sort. The dressmaker had blue-black hair that was curled; dark, crafty eyes; lashes so long that they were probably false; a straight nose, lips full and painted, a powdered chin, a loose tie, an embroidered waistcoat, a coat that fitted like a mannequin's, tight trousers, purple socks, patent leather pumps, the air of a coiffeur and an odour of musk. A chambermaid might have thought him attractive. I thought of what my friend at Headquarters had said and in French straight at him, I threw it.

"I have seen you before."

"You have the advantage of me."

"Every advantage. The last time I saw you was in the Cour d'Assises."

I flung the words at him like so many stones. I could see them land. I could see him wilt. I could see him going mentally down under them. With what he had been charged in that Paris court, he knew. I did not know. But he thought I knew and the stones were effective. Through mere chance, at the very start, I had him. The rest was easy. But I threw a few more.

"Your name is not Bonheur. It is Chanteur. Yesterday I cabled your description to Paris."

It was not very pretty of me to lie like that. But a chap who won't lie for a woman may be a Christian, he is also a duffer.

He had extended his hands. "Mais! Mais! Comprends pas."

"Yes, you do. You have a cheque that Mr. Bradish signed. You are trying to blackmail a client with it."

He smiled. It is rare to see such a smile. Entirely muscular, it revealed the teeth and left the crafty eyes unaltered.

"Je vois bien maintenant. It is a misunderstanding. I have no cheque signed by Mr. Bradish."

"You have a cheque that you brought to his house. That cheque I saw him sign."

"Another cheque, yes. But not this cheque. In the presence of a domestic he disowned it."

I turned. In the doorway, beside the little groom, Peters stood. I motioned at him. In he came.

"Ever seen this man before?"

"Yes, sir. Yesterday."

"Where was that?"

"In the hall at Mr. Bradish's, sir."

"Did you see a cheque, or hear anything about one?"

"No, sir, I did not."

The dressmaker shrieked it. "Il ment. C'est puant."

Peters edged nearer. "Beg pardon, sir. May I ask what he said?"

I smiled at him. "He complimented you on the ease with which he says you lie."

Peters had removed his hat. He put it on. In putting it on he removed his mask. The professional man had gone. Peters had emerged into private life.

"For tuppence, I'd knock your head off. Call me a liar and I'll knock it for nothing."

I motioned at him. "That will do, Peters."

At once the professional man returned. The mask was resumed.

"Thank you, sir."

I looked at the dressmaker. "Mr. Bradish has gone from town. Two ladies, who were misguided enough to come here, have gone also. But I remain and I'll tell you one thing. I'll tell you two of them. You can present that cheque or you can preserve it. But if I hear of so much as a peep from you about it, I will first lay you out and then hand you over to the police."

I stood up and passed on. As I went I saw him in a mirror. He was wiping his face. Alarmed, the top-notcher must have fled. But I could see the première and the young person considering him with slanting eyes.

VII

At the Buck Club, just around the corner, I had a truffled omelette, a cutlet in curlpapers, admirable service, the day ahead of me, but as yet no word.

On vacating the Maison Malheur which, I fear I vacated rather magnificently, but at the time I was rather young, I told Peters to go back to the house and, when the telephone asked for me, to have me called at this club, where I then instructed the operator to take down any message and send it to the dining-room on the floor above.

Vain oblations, though how disastrously vain, I did not realise until later. Meanwhile, the dishes gone, I sat and smoked, exchanged the time of day with a man I did not know from Adam and was wondering vaguely why I bothered to talk to him at all, when the message came, a few words from Peters to the effect that Mr. Bradish had not telephoned, that he had hurried in, got the upshot of things and had hurried away, leaving word that I was to be at the Chilton place on the morrow by noon.

The upshot of things? I uncomfortably meditated, as I went down and kicked my heels in the main room, what the dickens did Peters imagine was the upshot? The stones I had thrown, had been thrown in French and although he had seen some of them flying, he might have misjudged their effect.

For one mad moment, I thought of telephoning to him, the next instant sanity returned. I knew I could not. Even the sight of a telephone horripilates me and in my trade one has to avoid anything of the sort. Horripilation arrests the imagination and disrupts your work.

Afterward, in sackcloth and ashes, I regretted it, regretted rather that if the telephone was one too many for me, I had not sent for Peters, dug it out of him, and then flown up the Hudson as I would have flown if I had known. But I did not know. How could I? It is true, I had an intuition that a screw was loose.

Bradish's message was queer. Why should he want me to be at the manor at noon?

In an effort to solve the riddle, I thought of this, that and the other, of everything in fact except that he had botched the whole thing.

In view of what occurred, I have to say and although I hate emphasis, I cannot say it emphatically enough, that what he did, he did innocently, ignorantly, honestly, without knowledge of the facts, thinking it all for the best, best for himself I admit, but best also for her, poor girl, as, in the inscrutable wisdom of the powers that rule our lives, perhaps it was.

Meanwhile, I looked up a time-table, made a mental note of a train and sat back among matters personal.

The Pilar-Morin troupe had been giving pantomime and while I hoped they might rise to mine, I was uncertain whether to dangle it before them personally or have the dangling done by an agent. Yet as either course had its disadvantages, I postponed any immediate decision, yawned my head off, lounged out, lounged in, dined with two polo men and afterward read all the evening papers, in one of which I discovered that the Pilar-Morins had gone. When have I loved a dear gazelle that it did not sicken, yes, and die? It was too much and I went home.

The next morning I was up at what I think I have seen described as betimes. In spite of which, or perhaps precisely on that account, I missed the train. It may seem fantastic to say it now and yet I cannot but believe that, if I had not missed it, what afterward occurred would not have occurred at all.

When, ultimately, a village trap dropped me at the manor, Bradish ran out and cursed me. I expected nothing else. Through the mysterious laws of life any kindness is repaid in pain.

It was then a trifle after one and the day was of the Veronese school, a day made of light, of colour, of cobalt, apple-green and ochre. In the air was the smell of lilacs. Beyond was the Hudson and, before me, the house, ugly, comfortable, the mortgaged windows candid and open.

In the days of the landed gentry, in the days of big bugs, bigwigs, chariots, postillions, red coats, loud oaths and tenant-tilled estates, the manor had, I dare say, been as good as the rest of them, superior perhaps, but on that Veronese high noon, it seemed down at the heel, as such places do seem when the odour of gentry has gone and that of the bailiffs has come. It was like some of the places in England where the drawbridge has crumbled and the moat is choked. Moreover, originally mile after mile in extent, running far up from the river and reaching nobly to the north and south, time and creditors had dwindled and curtailed it. Of the great estate that had been, only the house and the immediate grounds survived, only these and two buildings, one of wood, the other of stone; one the family stable, the other the family vault.

But Bradish, ceasing to revile me, was talking, hurriedly enough, about matters that I did not quite grasp, but mainly that they were just sitting down to it, that owing to the haste of it all, there was only Mrs. Chilton, Mrs. Trefusis, Austen, the clergyman and the bride.

I looked at him. "The bride?"

"My dear chap, I am, or will be—it is a bit awkward for the moment—but I shall be the happiest man in the world and I owe a lot of it to you. Now come on in. You are too late to act for me at the wedding, as I hoped you would; you are in time, though, to drink our health."

"But——" I found but that.

He misunderstood it. "Bonheur be blowed. It is of no consequence now what he says or does. She is mine!"

His eyes lifted. His face had cleared. The spider was dead. He seemed transfigured. Never had I seen him like that before. Never did I see him like that again. It was his one moment of happiness. Already the door was closing on him. He was at the threshold of the Eblian halls.

At the time I knew nothing of that door, nothing of those halls. I knew only that Peters had botched it, that Bradish was unaware that Bonheur had been squelched, and a sudden picture surged—Mrs. Chilton telling her daughter the pretty tale of a blackmailer, leaving it to her darling to decide whether she would suffer her mother to be jailed, pointing to Bradish as their saviour, constraining her to accept him and I felt for the poor devil a pity that was infinite. For when that girl knew, as she would know, as everything is known, nothing could convince her that he had not been a party to it. Never for a second would she believe that she had not first been rooked and then bought and sold.

Rather idle to tell him that then. Rather idle to mar with now superfluous information, a day not merely perfect but which to him was ideal. I could do nothing except what I did do. I followed him in.

I had seen Nelly Chilton—Mrs. James Bradish as she then was—but twice. On each occasion her beauty had been incredible. Where was it then? She was standing behind a table. Beside her was Austen. Nearby, Mrs. Chilton was directing a waiter. In a window, a clergyman was talking to Mrs. Trefusis. Through another window, I could see Mike. From the walls, Chiltons with vermillion coats and lace jabots, others with powdered hair and pointed bodices, looked on. In the air was a scent of lilacs.

The table was spread. There were dishes, wines, flowers, all of which, the waiter included, must have come from Fifth Avenue, ordered by Bradish, charged to his account.

These details, unimportant in themselves, contributed to the atmosphere of this room that was stirred by that girl's vibrations. The clergyman held his head a trifle to one side, as though appreciating something said by Mrs. Trefusis, who was quite incapable of saying anything appreciable, and who was looking, not at him, but at the others, at Mrs. Chilton, painted and flushed; at Austen, black from the black tumult within him, and at that girl.

Hatted, dressed in a costume of light cloth that was dark, what had been done to her? Paphos had crumbled, Venus had gone. Instead was Hades and Proserpine drawn into it. Exquisite still, as Proserpine must have been, she had lost her flagrant beauty. White as a sheet, her lips quivered. There were no tears in her eyes. In their purple pools there was worse, a look that those have who are haunted.

Austen was speaking to her. She did not reply. She was gazing straight ahead, at what? I cannot say. At things visible only to herself perhaps, but, more probably, I think she was meditating ways and means of escape, which even as they fluttered before her, she must have known were absurd. Her spirit may have been brave. The pale camisole of what is correct, the straitjacket of conventionality, strapped her. None the less, I think that given one of the sudden tempests that the Hudson knows and from which, in a second, night is flung, given that and I believe she would have taken Austen and bolted. It was more the vivid day than the pale camisole that restrained her.

These impressions, however long in the telling, were close packed in a moment's space. They flooded me as I entered. A moment more and the atmosphere cleared. Mrs. Chilton smiled, Austen turned, the bride lowered her eyes, the clergyman abandoned the window, Mrs. Trefusis approached, the waiter advanced and, to the latter's patent astonishment, over the table, with head bowed, the clergyman said grace.

A cork popped. I found myself eating foie gras, an abominable dish, which reminded me of duties already sufficiently shirked and rising, glass in hand, I proposed the health of the happy couple.

The clergyman took it up. I like clergymen, when they are likeable, and Dr. Renwick, God bless him, was a likeable man, in fine form, and between us we managed to keep it going, managed to evoke at least the ghost of gaiety that every wedding feast demands.

But the whole thing was ghastly. That girl neither ate, nor drank, nor spoke. Ramrodded in her chair she looked at Austen, who looked at her, as she looked at him, with eyes that were tragic. But while her face, to which the rare and riante beauty seemed then to have said farewell, was white and tense, his face was black and violent.

It was poignant. An old air, quaint and sugared, an aria from the Somnambula, the O perché non posso odiarte, beat time in my head. It was precisely as though they were joining in, wondering why, in so much love, hate could not enter.

With that surety that breeding is, Bradish appeared unconscious of it. The spider had leaped into life again, but any venom it may have been distilling he splendidly concealed, rattling on at Mrs. Chilton, turning from her to the clergyman, from him to Mrs. Trefusis, and back again to his sudden mother-in-law.

That woman, with her painted face and air of intolerable secrets, had a look frightened and relieved. The fright was retrospective. It had gone. But fright, even in going, leaves its mark. The mark was on her, yet mitigated by an immense relief. Everybody was dished. Crœsus was her son-in-law. None the less, beneath her summoned smiles, perhaps she shuddered. Yet with the same surety that Bradish displayed, she talked and laughed, turning now to Mrs. Trefusis, again to her daughter, turning away, forced to seem as unconscious of her as Bradish appeared.

Foie gras is fit only for the cultivated taste of a drayman. Suprême de poulet Régence is a mockery to a hungry man. At high noon champagne turns one's stomach. I would have given a dollar, two dollars, five, for a cut of beef, a baked potato, a mug of ale. In that extravagant mood, ardently I wished myself elsewhere. The breakfast apart, it was distressing to look at the bride. It seemed to me painful to stare at Proserpine descending into Hades, though, could I have foreseen the deeper depths in which she was to pass, instead of staring, I would have screamed.

Then, to my relief, Bradish said something to Mrs. Chilton. She stood up. We all stood up, except the waiter, who was already standing. In spite of the odour of food and wine, faintly the scent of lilacs lingered. Through a window, from which I had previously seen Mike, I saw him again, grooming a car in which were bags and a hatbox. From the window I looked at the bride. She was talking then, talking inaudibly to Austen, saying perhaps the tender things that hurt and hurt, the words that bring tears swiftest. From them, I looked at Bradish.

"Jim," I called, and as I spoke I went over and took his hand, "I don't know where you are bound, but wherever it may be, my best wishes, all of them, every one, go with you."

He did not reply. He just nodded and shook my hand. He was, I realised, strung up to the breaking point of human emotion. But he did not betray it. It was the spider that did. Glowing with a crimson and baleful life of its own, I could almost see the antennæ contract.

"God bless you," I told him. "The things I leave unsaid to your wife, say to her for me."

Still he said nothing. He nodded as before and shook my hand with a grasp that was mighty.

Why did I not hold on to him as mightily? Why did I leave him for what he was going on to meet? It was there. It was just beyond. It was at the turn of the road. Eyes clearer than mine could have seen it. Hands firmer than mine would have held him. A voice more gifted would have told him not to leave that room.

In looking back at it now, when it is all over and done for, it seems to me, as it must seem to many another, that when we are a bit more evolved, we will look ahead as readily as we now look back; that the immediate future will be as clear as the immediate past. Or, more correctly perhaps, we will realise that there is no future, no past, merely a continuous present in which events occur. Those events we will see, as the traveller on a highway sees meadows or bogs, abysses or peaks, friends or foes, or, perhaps, merely courtyards curtained with cashmeres where chimeras and hippogriffs crouch. Consciously he goes on to meet them or, as consciously, turns away.

All that, and stupid enough it is, and, by the same token, sufficiently unconsolatory, came to me later. Meanwhile, I must have taken some sort of congé. I say I must have because, while I would have taken French leave, as they call it in England, and English leave, as they call it in France, some forms I did observe. But I remember nothing about it. All I do recall is a diligent smile that I got from Mrs. Chilton and a look, absolutely haunted, that came to me from that girl. That look, from that girl, who was barely a bride, accompanied me to the village where I went with the clergyman and with the waiter tagging behind.

I did not then know the clergyman's name. A few moments later I learned that it was Renwick, a good name as he, I am sure, was a good man.

On the way down, a car shot by. In it was Mrs. Trefusis. A car followed, a car long, narrow, grey, one which I had already seen at the manor. In it I had a glimpse of Austen, flying on, ignoring us, lost to everything, lost in the black tumult of his soul.

Meanwhile the clergyman had been quoting Thomas à Kempis. Interested in what he was saying, I forgot the haunted eyes. By this time we had reached the village and, as he was reciting a passage, it came, a bolt, as the phrase is, from the blue.

Mentally, it took me a moment to adjust myself. Meanwhile, I was staring at the man who had precipitated it. Seated in a waggon he was yelling at the clergyman, calling him by name, which I then learned was Renwick. It was not hot on that Veronese day, yet he was perspiring, yelling and wiping his face at the same time, urging Dr. Renwick to get in and: "You, too, young feller, if you know 'em."

He spat and shouted. "It was up yonder. They're all dead, all three of 'em. I'm headed for Dr. Curtis. But there's room for all. Get in."

In his cultivated voice, I heard Dr. Renwick say: "Mr. Belcher, I am sorry. I have not understood what you were telling me. Who is dead?"

Again the Comanche shouted: "Miss Chilton and two men."

We all know we are to die and few of us believe it, and naturally perhaps, since there is no such thing as death. But death, even in its literal meaning, lacked coherence then. I could not believe it. My mind had not yet adjusted itself to what my ears had heard. But I was aware that Dr. Renwick was hurriedly questioning and I was aware, too, of hurried and shouted replies. I was aware also of a gathering group, sprung from nowhere, from a saloon opposite, from the sidewalk, from a grocery nearby, from the station beyond, from the sky; a group that had dropped or arisen about us and it was dully, from sounds that seemed to proceed from afar that I absorbed and reassembled the purport of it all and of which the substance was that Bradish's car, flung out like a meteor, had thrown a wheel, reared, reversed, turned over and that those within were dead.

Then at once, from the momentary and mental swoon, I swam up and I thought, what does this Yahoo know about it? They may not be dead; knocked out perhaps, perhaps unconscious, but not dead.

Even then I denied myself the truth. That was sheer primitiveness, the instinct of self-preservation, for truth, some truths at least, can drive one mad.

VIII

When I reached the manor, they were there. Anything being preferable to the yelling Yahoo, it had been a relief to see him take Dr. Renwick and go. Of the relief that they were in search, I had my doubts and also my certainties. A country practitioner, what could he do? At once Cally and his wizardries hopped in my mind.

Already the door, the enigmatic door, was closing. I did not know that. I knew of no door. Yet, as I later discovered, in that door I turned the key.

Meanwhile, entering the station, I wrote a telegram to Cally which I incorrectly addressed. Since then I have often wondered what might have occurred if I had addressed it correctly. But as often I have concluded that Cally was prevented from receiving the telegram not, primarily, because of an error of mine, but because it was not intended that it should reach him. The progressions of life and of death it is not for mortals to alter. When they do alter them, or appear to, what is done was in accordance with higher designs. That is the occult view to which sometimes, though not always, I adhere.

The wire itself, it took me quite a little while to send, the operator happening to be refreshing himself elsewhere. It was therefore some time after the Comanche had gone that I reached the manor, and, as I have said, when I did reach it, they were there.

The door of the house was open. Open and empty too was the hall. In the room where we had breakfasted there were but the brave and bodiced Chiltons looking on from their frames on the walls, only these, half emptied bottles, dishes unremoved, the remains of a wedding feast at which Death, too, had looked on.

As I entered the hall, I heard voices that came from the floor above. There, in a room hung with faded chintz, furnished with rickety Sheratons, on a satinwood fourposter, lay that girl. Over her a little man bent. He was shaking his head. It seemed very empty. But the motion distracted me. I looked at the others, at Mrs. Chilton, at a woman I had never seen, and at Dr. Renwick who, holding a book from which he must have read the marriage service, was concluding some prayer.

"Heart failure superinduced by shock," the little man by way of Amen pronounced and I looked again at that girl.

Her eyes, that had seemed so haunted, then were closed and her face, that had been so drawn and tense, had recovered its former beauty. It was as though death in taking her life had given back her loveliness. The jewels, which imaginatively I had strung about her and which she had never needed, had gone, as the haunted look had gone. In their stead was peace, the peace that is perhaps beyond all knowledge, yet attenuated, I thought, by just the quiver of a passing smile, a smile that just showed itself and went. The effect, highly curious, was as though her riante charm had made an effort to return and death had pulled it back.

"Yes," Death seemed to say, "in my arms you may be lovely, but smiles I cannot brook."

That, too, was imagination. I saw it was. In the upturned commas of her perfect mouth there was no suggestion of any smile at all. Death had kissed her smiles away; kissed from her despair, happiness, sorrow, kissed her into peace.

"So far as I can determine," the little man was saying, "not a single lesion. Just the heart."

"And Bradish?" I asked and checked myself, for the girl's mother was sobbing.

It was her fault. At that moment she knew it. At that moment she knew what the Halls of Eblis are, the horrible halls of the horrible hell into which the foster sisters, Regret and Remorse, can fling you.

A hand covered her eyes, from which tears, possibly scorching, certainly unredeeming, ran down into the paint beneath. What could I do? What could anyone do? A poet said he could sympathise with anything except suffering. I had no sympathy for hers, but apparently Dr. Renwick felt differently.

"My dear Mrs. Chilton! My dear Mrs. Chilton!"

he was remonstrating. "Sorrow is sent to make us nobler than we were."

You are entirely right, I thought. But you miss the point. Sorrow afflicts the spirit that is freed, particularly when the spirit is probably present, probably in this very room. A line of de Vere's recurred to me: "Grief should be like joy, equable, sedate."

But more effective perhaps than the clergyman's ministrations, was the ingrained sentiment of form. Mrs. Chilton choked back her sobs and when her hand fell, as it immediately did fall, she displayed a visage blotched certainly (for water and paint do not marry very well), but assured. To have achieved that so promptly did not show callousness. One is never callous about oneself. But it constituted one of the minor triumphs of civilised life.

She turned to me. "Dr. Curtis says Mr. Bradish will recover. Will you come where he is?"

On the way, the little man buttonholed me.

"I did not say that. I said he might recover. A man of means, I understand. I'll telephone for a nurse."

"For a dozen," I told him.

In a room, practically a duplicate of the other except for the furniture which was Chippendale, Bradish lay on another colonial fourposter. Unconscious as he was, he did not know, and might never know, what had happened. Already his clothes had been removed; already, too, he had been examined. "A broken collarbone," the little man announced, and that I knew was nothing. "A broken ankle," he continued, and that I knew was less. But, to these, he added an occipital fracture and I thanked God I had wired for Cally.

The next visit was to poor Mike who, like that girl, was dead; though, unlike her, his neck was broken.

Mrs. Chilton, meanwhile, had disappeared and I went down to the hall, where I found Dr. Renwick. He was just leaving. The funeral, he said, was to be at noon, in forty-eight hours, and, since I was returning to town, would I insert the usual notices and add, it was Mrs. Chilton's wish, he explained, that the funeral was private.

"Yes," I told him, "but there is a lot else: Bradish cannot be moved. He will have to have nurses. The nurses will have to be fed. I know nothing of the domestic arrangements here but, apparently, they are not profuse. If Mrs. Chilton does not object, and I hope she will not, I shall send some of his servants."

Vaguely he motioned. "Pray do so, Mrs. Chilton was to have gone from here today. Now she will go immediately after the funeral of that poor child, whom I loved like a daughter."

"Where is her father?" I asked.

He raised his eyes, shook his head. I saw that he did not know, saw too that the question distressed him.

I put on my hat. "May I accompany you?"

Courteously he consented and, as we went down the road, which twice that day I had ascended and on which on each occasion, the Daughters of Hazard, of whom Æschylus tells, had lain in wait, he stopped and gave me his hand. He was going, he said, to the undertaker.

"An undertaker here! In this little place!" I exclaimed.

"Death visits the hamlet as well as the metropolis," he replied.

A cross-road took him and I went on to the station alone, more alone, I think, than I had ever been before. I could not comfortably contemplate a future from which Bradish was eliminated and, if he recovered, if he did, I felt that it would be harder still for him to reconcile himself to the long rain of days from which she had gone. To have got her partook of the marvellous, but to have got her one moment and to have lost her the next, might become to him a retrospective torture that would inhabit his thoughts until the accustoming hands of time calmed him and lulled him and let him forget.

So I thought. I thought it would pass as all things pass. Yes, I thought that. I could not foresee that there was to be no forgetfulness, nothing but the fidelity of torture that was to take him and play on him and strike from him every note in the whole gamut of pain.

IX

ANOTHER day after Veronese.

As the train flung itself along the river, I told myself I had done all I could. To the surprise of a clerk in a cage, I had shoved at him a marriage notice and a death notice of even date, both concerning the same person. He did not like it and who would? I had to establish my identity before he would accept them. Meanwhile I had shipped to the manor whatever an unconscious man needs the least. I had gone to the great white staring house and sent Peters with the chef and two other servants to the station. I had gone to Mike's widow. I had done other things which I have since forgotten. I had done all I could. But in the train that was taking me to the funeral, I had a sense of subconscious discomfort, the sense of some paramount thing overlooked. Then, just before the train was stopping, out it hopped.

Cally!

In the hurry of all I had had to do, I had neglected to go to his office. But, I consolingly reflected, what did it matter?

That it did matter, and monumentally, I was not to learn until later and yet why, at the time, it should have pricked me, I doubt if Freud could have told.

What did it matter? I reflected. I had not been to his office and would not have found him if I had, for he must have gone to the manor, where probably he had remained. The idea that my telegram was an estray never entered my head.

In the train were small detachments of silent and sombre people, relatives I fancied, and I was convinced of it when they all got out at the station, where conveyances for them which the undertaker must have seen to and supplied, yet perhaps inadequately; in any event there was none for me, unless I intruded on mourners whom I did not know, and while capable of a good deal, but not of that, I started off on foot, disconsolately noting that the day of the wedding and the day of the funeral were twins. There were the same colours, the same myrrh and cassia in the air that was not of spring or of summer but of both, a season not for death but for life, a time to love love, not to bury it.

"Will you get in?" someone was saying.

I had heard a car, but I had not looked. Then I did look. It was the long, grey car I had seen after the wedding and in which had been Austen hurrying on in that effort which is the most desperate of all, the attempt to escape from oneself. He was in the car then and, as I looked, I thought his face blacker even than before, a face that expressed not the sorrow that he must have felt, but rebellion at life, at death, at all there is, at all there shall be; the face of a soul in hell.

"Will you get in?" he repeated and, when I did, he asked about Bradish.

I told him what I could. He asked nothing else. He said nothing more. I fancied that he knew as much as I did.

In the papers of the day before there had been accounts headlined, featured, graphic, inexact. The tragic wedding of the last of the Chiltons to the playmate of her childhood. The beauty of the bride. The wealth of the bridegroom. The death of the one. The mortal injuries of the other. The manor. Colonial New York. The mourning of what was termed the four hundred.

These accounts Austen had certainly seen and I wondered whether he had already run up to the village. I did not ask, nor did I ever learn that he had, though afterward, from circumstances that developed, I realised that he must have. At the time however, during the brief drive, he said nothing more, nor did I hear him utter another syllable. Yet then, one does not go to a funeral to talk and necessarily this was more than a funeral to him, much more, though how I arrived at that extravagant conjecture is beyond me even now.

The brief procession from the train had entered the house when we reached it and together we passed on and in to the room of the candid and mortgaged windows, through which a breath of lilacs came.

Into that breath there filtered the subtler fragrance of lilies that banked an open coffin in which the dead girl lay. Behind the coffin, his back to the wall, from which the brave and bodiced Chiltons looked, was Dr. Renwick. Before the coffin were the mourners, among whom I had a glimpse of a man who, though he stood with bowed head, had an air of extreme distinction. I had a glimpse also of a stricken woman.

Rouge is not mourning. Her face was unpainted. But that air of ease, of potential arrogance, of intolerable secrets, the impression wholly atmospheric which previously Mrs. Chilton had suggested, the impression of a soul at bay, that had gone. She looked what she was, a woman conscious that the blow that had struck her her own hand had dealt.

Unobtrusively I hope, in any event as quietly as I could, I edged nearer to where the dead girl lay. Forty-eight hours earlier I had seen that Death in kissing her had brought her beauty back, heightening it even, rendering it calm, unaware of emotion as true beauty ever is, divesting it of anguish, divesting it, too, of joy. In Death's arms she had been at peace.

But at this time, as, in edging nearer the coffin, I saw her again, her expression seemed to have changed. Her lips half-parted showed the nacre of her teeth and in and about them, in and about the downcast eyes, there was a look different from that which Death had brought, different also from that which Death had kissed away. In those days I was less familiar with the phenomena of death than I have since become. I knew then that those whom the gods love die young. I did not know that the gods in sending death to those they love send with it some vision of the supernal. It was there. In those upturned lips and downcast eyes there was wonder.

"I am the Resurrection and the Life!"

The sonorous and exalting words, the most exalting that I know, shook me. From the dead, I looked at the living. I looked at the clergyman, at the mourners, at the lover.

Death, the death rather and the sight of it, may have wrought its miracles on him. In his car, on the way to the house, he had looked defiant, rebellious, a soul at odds with God and man. But now, in some way, through some special grace, through one of the miracles that Death achieves, peace had, or appeared to have, descended upon him. What his face displayed was not resignation, which may be, and often is, but a form of mental suicide, but relief, the relief that comes when hope, fear, uncertainty, all the vultures of the mind, have fled, when the worst that can be has been done.

At the time, it was in that manner that I viewed it. Afterward, in reassembling impressions, another explanation, less laboured and more obvious occurred to me. The change in Austen, if change there really were, I attributed to the simple process of thanksgiving. He had lost the girl he loved, yet the loss had been strangely mitigated. An unbearable knowledge had been lifted from him. He could not have her, but neither could anyone else. She had been taken, but not to another's arms. What he had lost, no one had won.

It was in recognition of that, I thought, that the thanksgiving had come, and I thought also that the thanksgiving was very human. That the girl of girls shall not be won, murder after murder has been committed. That too is human. Human and tolerably primitive.

Meanwhile, the service had ended. A stout man, fussy but silent, the undertaker, attended to the coffin's removal to the hall, where I followed and where neatly, swiftly, almost noiselessly, he closed it.

To me, it was like a kick in the stomach. I looked away. On the adjacent stair was Peters. Without speaking, I motioned. The motion, I knew, sufficed. I knew he would know that presently I would return. As I motioned, I thought of Cally. Where was he?

But at once the coffin's journey began again and we all went on and out to the grounds and the vault, a structure roomy and chill, where perhaps the shades of departed Chiltons greeted the spirit of their kinswoman who, forty-eight hours earlier, during that other ceremony had, I am sure, despairfully wished for the peace that was theirs, had wished also and far more desperately that Bradish were Austen.

As the coffin passed into the crypt, back from it came the odour of tuberoses, the scent sweet and deadly of wreaths put upon it. I have never forgotten it. Dr. Renwick was then reciting the last words of the final rites and, these ended, I turned back to the house.

In the hall was Peters.

"How is he?" I asked.

"The nurse says——"

"But Dr. Cally? What does he say?"

"Dr. Cally, sir? I haven't seen him. Dr. Curtis——"

"Do you mean to tell me Dr. Cally has not been here?"

"Not to my knowledge, sir."

It was inconceivable. The idea that I had botched the address never occurred to me. What did occur to me was that when I could I would give him fits.

The opportunity was not delayed. Mephistopheleanly, in the open doorway, there he stood.

I sprang at him. "What the devil! Where have you been? Why haven't you come before?"

One look, a look bland and sarcastic, was all he deigned to give me and that look he diverted to Peters.

"Upstairs? Lead the way."

"But see here," I threw in and started to follow.

He turned to me. "You stay where you are."

The stair took him, and would have taken me, had not philosophy, an old friend of mine, caught me by the arm, remarking that Cally was quite right, that I would be only in the way, that explanations of mine would explain nothing, that certainly he did not need to be told what certainly I did not know, whereupon instead of damning, I blessed. Thank God, he was there!

The mourners, meanwhile, were leaving. Not all, however. Two women and a man were entering the hall. One of the women was Mrs. Chilton. When I saw her in the room beyond, probably she had a hat on. I had not noticed. I saw it then, saw too that she was heavily veiled. I had moved aside and as, with the other woman, she passed me, she made some slight inclination of the head. Then up the stair they went. I had never seen the other woman before and I have never seen Mrs. Chilton since. Afterward I learned that that afternoon both had driven away. But had I known that that was to be my last meeting with Mrs. Chilton, mentally I would have wished her well. It is very pontifical to judge anybody.

Then, immediately, I found myself judging the man who had come in with them. He had an arid air, the dry, self-sufficient look of the super-rich and a mouth like a buttonhole. Probably a banker, I thought: probably, too, the husband of the woman who had just gone up the stair. I did not envy either of them and suddenly I felt very hostile.

He was there, fiddling with his hat, affecting to regard me as part of the furniture. It was not that that angered me. What angered was that Mrs. Chilton, instead of messing things with that blackmailer of a dressmaker, could not have gone to him and could not go, because, while manifestly the man was a relative, she knew him to be poor, unwilling to aid. For it is unwillingness to aid that constitutes poverty, and that is the poverty, not of the poor, but of the rich.

Then at once the idea passed, banished by another, the possibility that the painted blackmailer and the painted mother-in-law were in league together and I cursed myself that I had not thought of it before. Any jackass could have seen that ordinarily Bonheur would never have gone to Bradish with the cheque. Ordinarily he would have put it through his bank. And for how much was it after all? Bradish had said four thousand, but he had barely glanced at it. It might have been forty thousand and I could picture Mrs. Chilton waving it at the dressmaker, staking him with it in return for services that would enable her to force her daughter's hand.

Momentarily, the picture occupied me. Before I could elaborate it, there was Peters on the stair.

"Well?"

"Dr. Cally's compliments, sir, and if you are to wait, you will please not wait for him. No, sir, Dr. Cally is to be here for some time."

"But what else did he say? What did he say about Mr. Bradish?"

"Nothing, sir. Nothing to me. But I don't think he is easy in his mind about him, sir."

For that matter, I was not easy in my mind, either. Nor had I been, not for a moment since the Yahoo yelled. Consequently I did want something to go on and I said:

"Look here, Peters. You say I want to see him."

"Yes, sir, I will hascertain. But he has the door closed and he said he wouldn't let anyone in, not even Mr. Bradish's own mother if she came here from the grave."

Well, that at least was definite and I went out on the grounds where for a moment I stood and looked at the vault.

That door, too, was closed.

PEACE is never the bedfellow of the anxious, and anxious I was the next day, as I sat in my own workshop. Far more so than three years before when I found myself dished. A man may lose a fortune and recover and double it. He cannot replace a friend. At the time, I had no other friend than Bradish. The events of the last few days needed talking over.

I wanted to talk them over. Few can be conversational alone. But with whom? That also came to me. In the course of the evening I rang at Aly Bolton's door.

"Who is it?" she asked from within.

I told her and she opened.

The narrow hall, a hall identical in construction with my own, was hung with India shawls and the living-room, though also identical with my own, appeared much larger and so appeared because the centre was uncluttered. Moreover, at either end was a mirror. Then also, the étagère, the chairs, the table, placed back against the walls, were none of them in the way, while on the walls were prints, dark and old, from which the walls seemed to recede.

I used to think that a man's distinction resided in the distinction of his surroundings and though I think so no longer, none the less it would have been obvious to anyone not courageously vulgar that the occupant of the little flat was an artistic young woman. A gifted young woman, too, as I had already discovered.

"I have felt for you," she said as we sat at that table. "The papers told me. And now you are troubled."

"It is about Bradish," I replied. "He and I are pals. I don't know whether he will pull through. By the way. Occasionally he must have disturbed you. He used to come here and raise the dead."

She exclaimed at it. "I thought it was he! I saw him once at your door, but he did not see me. He was too busy trying to get at you. I liked his face. It is very beautiful."

Wonderingly I looked at her.

"Yes, the face of a beautiful nature."

I nodded. "Yes, he has that. But I am sure you are right in saying he did not see you. If he had he would have stood and mused and afterward told me of it."

"No, he did not see me."

She spoke simply as the complex do speak. On the table between us was a service, of Danish ware I think, and she asked would I have tea.

She got up to prepare it and again I looked about. The mirror at the farther end of the room was framed in lacquered bamboo. Adjacent were shelves of polished wood on which were books. Facing them was the piano. It was all very ordinary. It was the atmosphere that charmed. I have been in ornate apartments where the vibrations jarred; in opulent homes where they were so malign I could not remain. In this two-by-four flat there were none or, if there were any, they were restful. It was an atmosphere in which there was nothing discordant; not the atmosphere of the cloister for that is choked; not the atmosphere of bohemianism for that is pretentious. It was the atmosphere that is created only by those whose ways are pleasant, by the gentle and by gentlefolk.

Returning with the samovar, she poured me a cup. She made no offer of cream, of sugar, nor yet of lemon. It was tea she gave me, just tea, as tea should be drunk, when it is tea, and this was tea, the real thing, tea that needed only a honeysuckle or two to make it celestial, tea of a variety and of a quality that could be obtained but in the Chinese quarter and there at one shop only.

I knew that tea. It awed me. For I knew, too, what it cost and, vaguely, I wondered where she got the money.

"That night," she was saying. "You remember? You talked of antique sins. Anxiety was one of them. I think you need not sin that way. I may be in error, but I think your friend will recover."

It was easy enough to say, but merely because it was easy she seemed hardly the one to say it. In speaking, she had raised a cup and I had been looking at her. She wore a blouse embroidered in the Rumanian manner. As always, her expression was noble and reserved. Nelly Chilton had been sent out as perhaps only a blackmailing faiseur can send out a young woman. Apart from that, apart too from her riante look, apart also from her Mayfair intonation, in feature, in colouring, there she sat.

"It is startling," I told her.

That time she missed it. "But I may be wrong."

I shook my head. "It is the resemblance."

The cup which she still held she put down. "From what I read about her it was instantaneous. That is terrible. It would have been so inexpressibly better for her if she could have lingered a little and realised that she must die."

I took it up. " 'From battle, murder and sudden death, Good Lord, deliver us.' "

"Yes, and how profound that is. The shock of sudden death confuses. The dead do not know they are dead. They think they are still here. Well, perhaps they are. Perhaps they are the ghosts of whom one hears and never sees."

From her lips it sprang out at me, the central situation for a novel and commercially I exclaimed, "That's it!"

There again she must have missed it. She looked but she did not speak.

"Shop," I told her. "To a chap in my trade nothing comes amiss. We make copy out of our own disasters.

She laughed, and in laughing her resemblance to Nelly Chilton became not startling merely, but exact.

Without mentioning it, I sat back. "Yes, but the point is elsewhere or rather it is here. I have been threshing about for a plot. A moment ago before you sat the needy knife-grinder. Now he is needy no longer. You have suggested a story. And hello!" I interrupted myself to exclaim, "here comes the title, The bourne from which——?"

Noiselessly she clapped her fingers. "A ghost story! There never has been a good one. The chance is yours. Take it. The title itself should inspire. The bourne from which——"

She paused and added, "I wonder, though, if every reader can fill out the rest of it. Yet, even incorrectly given, 'The bourne from which no traveller returns' is too long."

"Well," I said, "when it appears, if it ever does appear, you must let me bring you a copy."

"Thank you. You will find it easier to mail it."

"You are not leaving here, are you?"

"Next week. I go to Paris."

As she spoke she went to the piano, rippled the keys and hummed rather than sang the valse chantante, O Paris, gai séjour!

Desisting, she turned. "The house where I am is sending me. You shall have the address."

"I congratulate you. But the story will keep until you return. Besides it would clash with that gaiety. If I can, I want to make the reader shriek with fright, tear his hair out and hide under the bed."

She laughed. "The shiver at last!"

On that high note I would have gone, but from somewhere Signor Matouchi appeared and yawned at me. I tickled him in the stomach. Ostentatiously, he purred.

Then, kissing her hand, I left.

XI

A WEEK later I would have burned an incense-wand, only I did not happen to have one. A message had reached me. If I had dictated it myself it could not have been more to my taste. It was a message which either clairvoyantly or sympathetically Aly Bolton had divined. Bradish would recover. That was all. There are brevities that are enormous. It was at the amplitude of this brevity that I would have burned an incense-wand.

The message was from Cally. It had come from his office. That day I looked in there. I found him at a vast table on which was a riding crop and a box of cigars. Nothing else, except over the table his infernal blandness, two fingers and a moment's talk.

The fingers withdrawn he pointed one at me.

"What have you behind the forehead?"

"Pulp."

"In that pulp the objective changes of the external world are converted into the subjective changes of consciousness. But in what manner the conversion is effected no one knows and, in our day, no one will."

"What of it?"

"A lesion of the occipital cortex may affect that mystery. Bradish has a lesion of that nature. He will recover, but whether mentally he is the same man again depends on circumstances which I am now too idle to explain."

He stood up. "Come again when I am busy."

A hand on my elbow, he was edging me along, dangling the keys of Destiny at me.

I shook him off. "When can I see him?"

"When I have him in town. You can see him then, that is if he does not object."

Mephistophelianly Cagliostro smiled. It was as though he were adding: "If it were I now, you'd never get in."

I, too, can smile and I said: "I'll pay you for that. By the Lord Harry, I'll put you in a book."

Blandly he shoved me out. "It takes genius to concoct a horrible revenge."

Well, he was right. As I turned the corner I thought of Æschylus, before whose spectres women swooned, and I wished for his stylus, a wish instantly replaced by a hope. I had walked straight into Aly Bolton and I hoped she was dying of hunger.

"Look!" I exclaimed. "Over there! A few streets down! A man is beckoning at you!"

"Very impertinent of him. Who is he?"

"A sorcerer. He is calling, 'Miss Bolton! Miss Bolton! Come to my arms and before you I will set strawberries and crème vierge, plovers' eggs beaten into an amber foam, quinces on platters of jade!' "

Always gracious, she smiled and turned and together we went down the street, packed as at that hour it always was with envy, greed and other things that do not look nice in print, yet to which she seemed indifferent or else unconscious . . .

She said nothing and her silence was very confidential. It was as though she were saying to me, We talk the same tongue and in that tongue there is no need for speech.

Silence has its licenses and I am sure she had no intention of according me any. The trick of eye, of look, of way, the arts rehearsed before a mirror, the little spells a girl may cast, if only for practise, she disdained or else ignored. Her silence may or may not have been confidential. It was not provocative.

In the gastronomic El Dorado which presently we entered, her attitude changed necessarily. Yet it was I who spoke first and not to her but to the waiter.

When he had gone, she said with that irrelevance which is always so apropos:

"And the ghost story?"

Ten minutes earlier Cally had shaken the keys of Destiny at me. I was yet to learn that the Urim and Thummim were then in her hands from which she was shedding the gloves.

The gloves were white, her costume was dark, admirably made, equally simple. I lack the huxter's eye but I knew it was not a bargain, and suddenly I recaptured a sensation which I had not experienced for years, that of intimate association with a charming and beautiful girl.

At once, and with the same irrelevance, I began about a house in which I had lived.

"The house was back from the road. The doorway extended up to and through the second story. Before the house was a high wall of grey stone. Above was a grey sky. Under the house was a cellar, which is the usual place for a cellar, but beneath it was another cellar. In the second cellar were barrels. In the barrels was gold."

"Yours?"

"I do not know. I do not know where the house is. I do not know how long ago I lived there. As a child, the memory of it was vivid. It seemed as neighbourly as the day before. Perhaps it was. Time is very relative. It may be that there is no such thing. Kant said that. Kant said that time is a category of the intellect. As a child I did not know it. As a child it seemed to me that I had just come from that house of which my people knew nothing. Since then I have realised that I lived there in a previous existence. But I have always felt that I shall find the house again and just now I felt that when I do find it, I shall find in it a girl who will look like you."

"A compliment should be brief. That is the most elaborate compliment I ever heard."

She smiled as she said it, but she smiled as much at the waiter as at me. The waiter was showing her, not the plovers' eggs that carelessly I had promised, but a salmi Sardanapale.

When he had served it, she said: "That is the great advantage of being a novelist. A novelist can imagine things that never happened, that never could happen, but which are real to him."

Without transition, as though wanting to get away from it, she added: "This salmi must have been cooked in a jewelled pan."

Leisurely I drew her back. "You are entirely right, but so too am I. Epictetus advised us to cheat ourselves and dream. But do we cheat ourselves when we recall what we did in a previous life? From the majority, any and all memory of it is withheld. That is very merciful. If people remembered what they did when they were here before, a hundred and one out of ninety-nine would go mad."

Whether it were that last word that prompted, or whether it were due to unconscious telepathy, I do not know and I do not believe she knew either, but, dismissing the subject, she said:

"How is Mr. Bradish?"

"I was just coming from his physician when I met you. He said that Bradish has a lesion that may result in cerebral deglutinisation. That's a bit stiff. Until latterly, Bradish was the sanest man I knew. But latterly he went quite mad over Nelly Chilton and while I do not blame him for that—how can I when you are her living image?—yet, assuming that he recovers, then when he learns she is gone and gone too just when he had her, it might topple him completely."

She nodded understandingly and stood up. She was going, she had much to do she said, as she thanked me, and I saw her to the door, to the eager sunshine, to the crowd that took her and hid her away. Behind me, from an orchestra in the restaurant, came a strain sweet and slow. I had never heard it before. I heard it afterward. I heard it every time I thought of her until I saw her again, which then was a long way off.

XII

SINCE then, in looking back, it has seemed to me that the Daughters of Hazard that threw Nelly Chilton into a stone vault, sank Bradish into depths where Death alone could follow, and then, because there are other depths, depths which only the living can enter, because he had not suffered enough, because he must suffer more, recalled him that he might know what pain is.

Then it was that, in the voids where he lay, an artery reached and drew him. His scattered senses, satisfied with their temporary decentralisation, resisted. During the subtle struggle, fought in a dim corridor of the brain, a memory stirred and spoke. Along the corridor two syllables sounded remotely. They were as taps on a damp drum beaten obscurely behind the shelves of thought. They awoke no echo, evoked no image. Drifted by the currents of unconsciousness, they passed. But the currents, barred by assembling ideas, broke to their murmur. A memory that had gone, looked back. The taps on the drum sounded less dumbly. From behind the shelves of thought a face peered out. On the lips of the sleeper there formed a name.

"Nelly!"

His eyes opened. Before him was a woman, plain, strange, dressed after the manner of the Belle Chocolatière. His eyes closed, partially they reopened and, quite as though he were back in earlier Parisian days, he said, and distinctly enough:

"A boire!"

"Bravo!" I said when I heard of it.

Subsequently, Cally had him removed to the great white staring house where at last I went, and where I found him convalescent, collected, entirely rational, apparently as sane as before.

At the time, he was in the library and as I entered he got up and limped toward me. Loosely his clothes hung about him. The spider reduced, had paled. Then, before I could attempt to condole, for the attempt at condolence is all one can make, he surprisingly eluded it.

"These chairs are beastly. There is not a chair in the whole house that is fit to sit in. Formerly I did not notice. One chair was as good as another. But since I have been up, I find I want, well, what we all want, what I lack. I must send Peters around to pick up something decent."

I lit a cigarette. "See here, old chap, you will be having a birthday soon. Sensible people have birthdays all the time. I'll give you one."

"What? A birthday?"

"A chair."

"You are becoming singularly generous. But I want to ask you. How did she look?"

I hesitated and he added, "I asked Cally."

"He wasn't there. I rather botched a message to him. He did not reach the manor until afterward."

"So he told me. How did she look?"

Fishing, I found the picture. "As though surrounded by the ineffable."

He held it up. I could see him visualising it. "Yes, that would be Nelly."

Still holding it, he continued, "I don't believe a word of it."

I stared. "Of what?"

"Of her death. I can't believe it."

That seemed natural and I told him so. "Of course not. If the circumstances were reversed I could not either."

Then, at once, anxious to get him away from it, I tried a twist. "Cally says what you need now is a change. He said Paris."

"Paris would not help me. I have supped on her."

"Yes, but the supper was years ago. Now it is dinner time. Before all this happened, I wrote a pantomime. I can't place it here. Recently a showman, an odiously familiar brute, clapped me on the back and said, 'Produce the stuff in Paris and I'll import the troupe.' "

Bradish shifted. "I know Chose of the Neuvelles, and if Machin has not forgotten me, I know him, too."

"At all events Emile has not forgotten you, or me either. I gave him twenty louis the last time I was there."

"Emile?"

"Don't you remember sweet Alice, Ben Bolt? Don't you remember how he used to rub his hands and ask, 'And what will ces messieurs be good enough to be willing to desire?' "

"The man at the Café Anglais?"

"Precisely. We can have Chose and Machin there and, with the champagne at their throats, one or the other will disgorge a contract. Then, on the first night, when they call for the author, you can appear and I'll shy a bouquet at you."

"I don't know that I would like that."

"Of course you will. That will be in the autumn and, meanwhile, there is Spain and the bullfighters, and the gipsies and the cigarreras and the highwaymen and, under the stars, their little dramas of love and hate that spend themselves not in a scene but in a murder."

"That's Granada."

I saw he was getting interested and I was about to strum another air when Peters appeared.

We went in to luncheon, during which I kept talking of the Andalusia I knew and loved, sending his thoughts skimming afar; promenading him along the crocus and pink Delicias; seating him before the castagnettes and guitars; showing him the flamenco; the slim, twisting waists, the eyes burning above butterfly fans; scenting it all with the odour of almonds, the smell of grape.

He looked up. "When could you go?"

"This minute. Call a cab."

"You seem to have a Golconda of enthusiasm! What do you say to a shot at next week?"

"Ole tu madre! Hurrah for your mother!"

Behind the hurrah, a hallelujah followed. There he sat, white, gaunt, shaken, sane. Save for the remark that he did not believe the dead was dead, a remark qualified by the supplement that he could not believe it, he had said nothing that was not humdrum, commonplace, normal. Previously, I had thought that with time, in which everything breaks, wears itself out, passes away, resignation would come and forgetfulness with it. But though he still remembered and though, too, the memory must have been poignant, already he was resigned. So I thought. That opinion I shortly and entirely altered.

XIII

On the floor were cigarettes, boots, books, shirts, coats, trousers, enough for a trunk, a big trunk, and, as I hate trunks, I was meditating how to get it all into a bag. The problem was pretty, it partook of geometry which I also hate. In similar circumstances a poet would have omitted to meditate. A poet would have called for his harp and composed a song. But I am a practical man and I decided that if, but this once, I could stuff everything in, for the next few months Peters, or Gedney, or both, would attend to the stuffing.

Then again came the rattle of Destiny's keys. At the time I did not know it. I mistook the shaken keys for a tradesman knocking, bill in hand, at my door. As I was out of commission, copyless, with nothing more commercial in my head than the fringes of that ghost story, I did not swear, I did not care. I went on and opened.

There was Bradish.

Not for a moment had I imagined it was he and I stared.

"What have you done with your earthquake?"

He limped in, limped along to the workshop, sat down, tapped at his teeth.

I waved at the floor. "You couldn't loan me Peters for an hour, could you?"

Whether he heard or not is unimportant. He had been looking down, he looked up and bit at his underlip. As I afterward thought, he was steadying it. Then it came.

"I have seen her."

I, too, sat down. "Seen whom?"

"Nelly."

Until then I had not noticed the spider. It was so violently red that I wondered if he had been drinking and I tried to humour him.

"Yes, of course. Occasionally I see her also."

"I tell you I actually saw her."

I thought of Aly Bolton and I said, "Look here, old chap, you have seen someone who resembles her."

He got up, took a cigarette from the floor, lit it, sat down again.

"Nobody resembles her. In all the world she is unique."

Well, you are wrong, I thought, but I said: "There is no such thing as mystery, there is only ignorance and with that I am abundantly supplied."

Yet, as I said that, I told myself that whomever he had seen could not be Aly Bolton. She had gone.

Gloomily he flicked his ashes: "I suppose you think me crazy."

I smiled at him. "I would think you abnormal if you were not. In open court here, Spitzka, testifying as an expert, said that all men are insane. In France, Janet said the same thing. Do you object to the evidence?"

He laughed fiercely. "Not if it includes you."

Glad that he laughed, I laughed also. "Well, then, the company I am in is nothing to boast of. But seriously now, you know as well as I do, and probably better, that alcohol or morphine can produce hallucinations which, though actually seen, represent merely the observer's mental condition."

He shook the cigarette. "You are talking rubbish.

I don't drink, at least not to excess, and I don't take morphine, though I have had enough to drive me to it."

"Yes, I know. But I know too that any strong emotion can have the same result. Why, good Lord! everybody knows that the attendants at morgues have to be on their guard against the false identification of the dead. People go there distracted by grief at the loss of a relative and with the image of that relative so glued to the retina that they identify the first body they see."

He gave a sort of groan. "I did not come here to exchange stupidities, my mind is clear as a bell."

"And so you will admit was Balzac's. Balzac intended to give Gautier a horse. He forgot to, but he talked so much about it that he believed he had given it and used to ask Gautier how the horse behaved. From that you can realise what the imagination is. You imagine you have seen the dead, whereas you know that that is impossible."

"Impossible?" he angrily repeated. "Time and again I have heard you say that the word ought to be kicked out of the dictionary."

"Well, except in connection with pure mathematics, so it should be. If, as Huxley said, we understood all that is implied in so common an instance as an object that falls, we would not doubt the possibility of any occurrence however incredible. At the same time——"

"See here, I am not drunk or doped or a novelist. I don't care what Huxley said, what you say, what anyone says. I saw her."

Argument weakens all things. I yielded.

"Very good then, where was it?' '

"In the Park."

"In the Park! How in the Park?"

He fumbled and produced some papers. "I had been to the French line. They hadn't much, but I got the captain's cabin, the first officer's cabin. Here they are. On the way up, the car took the Park. Near the carousal I saw her. She was alone. She was on foot. I got out. There were people just ahead of her. As I got out she passed beyond them. For a moment, I lost sight of her. There are steps there. They lead to a lake. I thought she must be on them. From the top you can see all around and I looked everywhere. Not a sign of her. She had vanished. Like that!"

"Hold on! Did you see anyone you might have mistaken for her?"

"I could not mistake children for her, could I? Or old women, or nursemaids, or babies, or a boy in a boat on the lake? No. I mistook no one for her. Believe me or not, it was she."

I, too, helped myself to a cigarette from the floor. As I lighted it, I nodded at him.

"But I want to believe you, only—and for heaven's sake don't think I am jesting—only you would have made it a bit easier if you had said you had seen her at night, in the old-fashioned way, at the foot of your bed, sticking her tongue at you."

He shook his head. "It was not her ghost, if that's what you mean. It was she, alive, Nelly Chilton in flesh and blood."

When he said that I was less eager to have that poor vagrant of a word kicked out of the dictionary. What he said was impossible and yet, as I had to recognise, for the impossibility of it there was a good measure of excuse. The sum total of all he knew about her death was hearsay. He had been flying along with her in the open and, without transition, he was in bed, a strange woman looking at him. Of intervening events he had no knowledge whatever. There were not only no intervening events, there was not even an intervening blankness. The last instant before he lost consciousness and the first instant when he recovered it, met and fused. Mercifully he had felt nothing, heard nothing, seen nothing. Since then he had felt and acutely. He had heard, and crushingly. But of the anterior moments and hours and days and weeks and all that had been packed into them, he had but the evidence of his own injuries and such information as others supplied.

Supported by the injuries, the information was credible. But human nature does not always accept the merely credible. That which, in nearly killing him, had thoroughly killed her, constituted a shock so overwhelming that he had not assimilated it. In any catastrophe there is always a sense of unreality and the seeming unreality of the girl's death must have been with him until just then, a little before, when in the Park, the sight of someone had accentuated the unreality and convinced him, at any rate for the time being, that she was not dead, but alive. After all, he had not seen her, as I had, in her coffin, and of those who had seen her, I was his only witness.

"Where is Mrs. Chilton?" I asked.

"Somewhere in France. My lawyers have the address. Why do you ask?"

"And Mrs. Trefusis?"

"Newport, I fancy. What do you want of her?"

"If Mrs. Chilton were in town I would ask you to see her. As she is not and as Mrs. Trefusis is away, I do wish you would see Austen or Renwick, or somebody."

"What good would it do?"

"Jim, look here. At present I am the only one you have talked to who was at the funeral. I wish you would talk to some of the others. They could only substantiate what I have told you, but what I have told you has not been enough. What you would hear from them would be cumulative and convincing. You would know from it that you are mistaken about what you saw, or thought you saw, in the Park. Besides I dare say Cally could explain it."

"I dare say he could. But he and the seven sages in active collaboration could not explain it away."

"I am not so sure. Cally told me you had a lesion of the occipital cortex. At the time he did not know, or professed not to know, how it might result. My own ignorance being unfathomable, I looked it up and I found that in cases such as yours there may be an impairment of vision."

"Yes, that's true. At first I could not distinguish objects very clearly, but that has gone. I can see now as well as ever."

"No doubt you think so. Lots of people are colour-blind and have not the slightest suspicion of it."

"Yes, and lots of people are stupid and don't suspect it either. But their stupidity does not affect me. I saw her. There is not the peradventure of a doubt about it."

Mentally, at that, I threw up my hands. I did not know what to say and, before I could determine, he was at it from another angle.

"I want you to help me."

Theoretically, it is a privilege to help anyone. Actually, it is the guano of ingratitude. Yet, weak as water, I nodded at him.

"Well, then, since she was in the Park today, she may be there tomorrow. It was about noon when I saw her and tomorrow at eleven I shall station myself at the top of the steps and I want you to be at the bottom. Will you?"

It was sheer insanity but, though insanity has always appealed to me, I did not at once agree.

"Assuming, not for argument's sake, but just to avoid one, that it was your wife you saw, it is not cricket to trap her. If it was a ghost your attitude should be equally correct."

"But it is she who is not running straight."

"All the more reason then why you should."

He got up, lit another cigarette and began limping about. It seemed to me that I had tangled him and, with my usual weakness, I switched.

"I'll go you. If I see her, I will salute her. If you see her, you will of course do the same. But if I were you, and mind you I am not, but if I were, I would stop there. To attempt in any way to detain or address her, unless she invites it, would be an evil act."

He turned on me. "I can't see where the evil would be."

"Yes, you do, you see perfectly. You know it would show a total lack of consideration for her personal independence. If Renwick had not mumbled a dozen phrases over you both, you would never dream of it.

Because he did, that does not make her your thing. But all this is utter nonsense. You did not see her and what you did not see, you will not see again. None the less I'll go you. I'll go you because I hate the humdrum and love the insane."

I broke off and added: "Can you loan me Peters for a minute or two?"

"Peters? Yes. Certainly. What do you want him for?"

"You may not know it, but he is a genius. He can pack. It is more than I can do."

"Pack! Pack for what?"

"Sevilla! Granada! Cadiz! There are the tickets, I'll toss you now. What did you pay? I'll toss you and give you a cheque for the one I lose."

"Oh!" he said longingly. "You are still going, are you?"

"Of course I am and so are you."

"Not now, not until I find Nelly."

I could not budge him. I tried, but not very hard. I knew the harder I tried the more mulish he would become, but I knew, too, that if I said little or nothing, sooner or later he would veer, suggest whatever I had and believe the suggestion his own. Not a very original process perhaps, but I have found it the only way in which one can live in comfort with unoriginal people.

Consequently I threw up the sponge. "All right, Granada will keep. But you're mad, mad as a hatter, mad as two hatters, mad as Lincoln and Bennett."

"Then you will be there at eleven tomorrow?"

"I will be there at ten fifty-nine."

He limped along. I saw him out, heard him lumber down the stair, crossed the landing and rang at Aly Bolton's door.

It opened and a frowsy lady said: "Are you the gasman?"

"Yes," I replied. "But not your gasman and, believe me, I deplore it deeply."

"Get along with you. What do you want?"

"Miss Bolton's address."

The lady displayed the most distressing mouth I ever saw.

"Are you meaning the party as was here? I never seen her. Likely the janitor can tell you. Is it a bill?"

"For the rent"—in my heart, I would have added but she closed the door.

XIV

For the purposes of that story of mine, already I had looked over the papers published by the Society for Psychical Research and, greatly to my amazement, discovered what I already knew, that the ego persists after death. But evidence of the persistence of the ego is not evidence that it revisits the glimpses of the moon. In the whole interminable set of records there is not one authoritatively established ghost.

And yet, either Bradish had seen a ghost or else he was mad.

It is true he might have been lying and I would have given him the benefit of that doubt if I had known him less long and less well. It was not that he could not lie and did not lie, for he did lie, as we all have to lie, out of consideration and civility if nothing else. But in his cock-and-bull story I knew that he had been telling, not the truth certainly, but what was truth to him.

I got up from the table, to which I had returned from the frowsy lady, and kicked my clothes about.

But good Lord! I mentally exclaimed. What ponderable reason have I for saying that it is not the truth? The fact that there has been no authoritatively established ghost does not prove that there cannot be one.

Dissatisfied with the reductio, I kicked again and tried to look at the matter from the angle of insanity. Cally had waved that flag. Yet, apart from the determination with which Bradish had clung to the idea that he had seen Nelly Chilton, he seemed normal as you please, to me at least, but while I knew precious little about insanity, I did know that the presence of an idea, fixed and erroneous, is the surest proof of dementia. The idea might therefore show that he was mad, unless, of course, it were not erroneous.

But that is nonsense, I decided. He did not see the the dead, he did not see a ghost. If he saw anybody, it was Aly Bolton, and yet how could he? She is not here.

But I am here, I disgustedly reflected, and what is worse, I argue with myself. I don't wonder the frowsy lady mistook me for a gasman.

Then back to me, from over the way, the possibility trotted. It might be Aly Bolton. Apparently she had gone. On the other hand, she might not have. She had said she was going and though clearly she had vacated the walkup, it did not follow that she had vacated New York. Then, suddenly, I realised that I knew nothing whatever about her, realised also, and for the first time, that while seemingly frank as an open newspaper, actually she might be secretive as a sealed book.

Exceedingly lovely, clothed in riddles, in her two-by-four flat, she had been out of place as a piano in a pantry. Her natural atmosphere was the spaciousness of some spacious domain. What she had was the stuffiness of a furniture shop. That in itself was incongruous. Yet, apart from it, where did she go? what did she do? For all I knew to the contrary, privately she might be a Borgia and publicly a bacchante. She suggested none of these things. What she did suggest was a soul singularly evolved. But even though she were not, even though she were no better than the law allows, her charm prevailed. That charm had inundated me. Because of it I knew, whatever she might be, that always before her my hat would sweep the ground.

When a man does not feel that way, he has no feeling at all. One might say he is callous.

None the less mystery surrounded her and I wondered if I had the right to probe it. She had been living there, across the hall, beautiful and solitary at night, looking like a princess and dressed for the rôle and, by day, associated with a furniture shop. It was not only incongruous, it was curious. It suggested that complexity which dual personality is, and yet which all problematic natures possess.

In considering the matter, it occurred to me that while I had no right to lift any of her veils, to even touch them for purposes of my own, yet, for Bradish's sake, perhaps I should. If I could lead him up to her, the shock he would get would be as pronounced as the one at my doorbell and far more effective, for definitely it would lay that ghost.

I reached for my hat, took a pair of gloves, stuck a stick under my arm and went down the stair.

On the main floor was the den of the janitor, a dirty, wild-hearted little man with a hostile and drooping eye. Long since I had tamed him. A dollar here, a cigar there, and he had become a watch dog, barking that I had moved, that I was dead, guarding me from interruptions.

"Tell me, pretty maiden," I said when I got at him. "What is Miss Bolton's address?"

He did not know. But he knew her place of business. It was a furniture store on Fortieth Street near Fifth Avenue.

In an hour I found the shop, which had the air of a Franco-Chinese bazaar. Among other curios was a chair that stretched its arms to me. Pending the attentions of a clerk with shiny hair and a shiny moustache, I accepted the chair's embraces. At the moment, the clerk was talking to a woman, a topnotcher, I thought, Mrs. Amsterdam for all I knew to the contrary, but presently he bowed her out and I asked for Miss Bolton's address.

"Miss Bolton? Never heard of her."

"Here is her picture then. A beautiful young woman, beautifully dressed, who speaks with a foreign intonation. She is connected with your firm. Where is she?"

"Oh, yes! I recognise the picture. But—er—she was with us under another name."

I shifted. "This is a decent chair. Send it to Mr. Bradish."

"Mr. James Bradish?"

I nodded.

"Is this Mr. Bradish?" he asked, looking, I could see, for the spider of which all New York was aware.

"No, but if he likes the chair, I will pay for it."

"Yes, sir. May I ask your name?"

I gave it, the Buck Club with it and added, "Well, where is the lady?"

He smoothed that moustache. "She—er—she disassociated herself from us just when Mr. Delatour was sending her abroad. I believe she is in Montreal—or is it Toronto?"

I could not tell him and he went back among tall bahuts, silk tapestries, porcelain monsters, and I saw him lean over a table.

Twelve hours away, I thought. If she is away!

But he was returning. "I don't seem to find it. Mr. Delatour may know. He is out now, I will ask him."

I got up.

He saw me out. "Yes, sir, it will be attended to and the chair also."

As the lift took me, I could have sworn that the lady of the steps was Aly Bolton. From the start I could have sworn it and would have sworn it, sworn it at Bradish, had I not believed she was in Paris and I know of no normal process whereby a young woman can be in two places at once. Or any normal process either whereby she can have two names and no address.

I was on the avenue by this time, looking in at shops that were filled with things I did not want. What I did want was a bite. I made for Sherry's, changed my mind, boarded a bus and got out at Bradish's corner.

In the hall was Peters and I asked him to get me a sandwich.

"And a glass of Madeira, sir."

Already Gedney had told me that Bradish was in the reception-room, and at once, as I entered that chamber of horrors, I discovered him at the window, standing there, looking out, a thing which a gentleman never does.

He turned and explained it. "I am on the watch now, you know."

"Well, you need not be. I have got it."

We went on in to the library and seating myself I added: "Also I have a chair for you. I thought it very comfortable. I thought it more than comfortable. It was what you might call a 'varsity chair. It was highly instructive."

"You have heard something."

"Rather a long story, too. But perhaps it won't bore you. There is a young woman hereabouts who might be——"

He had it away from me before I could get it out.

"Nelly's twin. She is employed at Delatour's. Nelly told me about her. If that is your story, what is true in it is not new."

"But look here——"

"Oh, I'm looking and I propose to keep at it. Here are your sandwiches. I hope they will seem more appetising to you than that story has to me. Did you think I would swallow it?"

Peters had put a tray before me and gone. The sandwiches went quite as quickly.

Smoking, he watched me and puffed. "Nelly said the resemblance was confined to the profile and colouring. She said the Delatour girl was more fragile and slimmer. I remember just the way she put it, 'She's me etherealised.' "

"In duodecimo," I threw out. "Yes, that's true. None the less——"

"You thought I could mistake one for the other. Never."

I pushed at the tray and he sat down and shoved a box at me.

"Have a cigar. You will be there tomorrow?"

"Yes, and the day after. As often as you like. But I think you are wrong. I think it was the Delatour girl, as you call her. I would have said so this morning, only I thought her in Paris."

"And thought me insane."

"Look here, Jim, either you are cracked or else you saw a ghost. There are no two ways about it."

"But you are ridiculous with your ghost. I never heard such rot."

"Ever heard of Carlyle then? 'Ghosts,' the old duffer said, 'nigh a thousand million of them walk the earth at noon.' "

"Carlyle was capable of anything, except decent English. He never saw one of his ghosts or you either."

"It is a pretty question. In England almost every old family has a ghost. A ducal family has two ghosts. You know about the Crookes ménage, don't you?"

"Who the deuce is Crookes?"

"An ordinary person who discovered thallium, invented the radiometer and foretold the x-ray."

"The chemist?"

"From what I hear, he is passionless as algebra. Now he said, 'I do not say such things may be, I say such things are.' "

"He did not say it about ghosts then."

"You are quite right. He said it about a spirit materialised by a medium, a very pretty spirit, a spirit that called herself Katie King, gave him her photograph, a lock of her hair and sat in his lap, sat in it not once, but a hundred times. I am not making this up, it is all down somewhere."

"I don't believe it."

"Of course you don't. You believe in the reality of things. You believe there is heat, you believe there is cold. There is neither heat nor cold. There is merely vibration and the brain to translate it. You believe there is light, you believe there is colour. There is no light, there are no colours. There is only matter and motion and the optic nerve. On the other hand you don't believe in illusions. Of all illusions the real is the greatest."

"Here! Help yourself to the Madeira but spare me your Fichte and brandy."

"Very good then, consider the lilies of the field. They toil not, neither do they spin and you have seen them in their ideal condition. But you have not heard them grow into it. That is because your ears are not attuned to their vibrations. If they were, you would precious soon discover the noise they make. Because you are not deaf, you don't believe it. Because you are not blind you believe there can be nothing that is not obvious. It is the obvious alone that is illusory."

"In the Park today, Nelly was perfectly obvious, with nothing illusory about her."

"Except when she vanished."

"I did not say she vanished. I said——"

"You said you saw her one minute and could not see her the next. Isn't that what you told me?"

"Well, yes, but——"

"Look here, old chap, a crustacean extracts from the water material wherewith to make a shell. From grain a bird produces feathers and an elephant produces ivory. These processes are marvellous. But they are so common that we accept them as a matter of course. Yet, in view of them, it is quite conceivable that the disincarnate can so utilise particles and elements of the air that materialisation ensues. Materialisation can be even forced upon them. The dead can be raised. It is true it takes black magic to do it and nowadays who believes in that sort of thing? I am sure I did not until occultism taught me better. Given certain conditions and the dead can be raised. Given others and they can raise themselves. There are more things in heaven and earth, Jim Bradish Horatio——"

"Beg pardon, sir."

In the doorway Gedney stood and with him a man and that chair from which I had set forth to tell Bradish what he knew beforehand. It was a mocking chair.

But now, stretching its arms at Bradish, he too let it embrace him.

He turned to me. "Jolly good. Where did you find it?"

"At Delatour's."

He turned to the man. "Tell Delatour if he has another like it to send it here."

In a moment, when the man had gone, he turned again to me.

"Very nice of you, I'm sure. Was it from that girl you got it?"

"Lord, no. I didn't see her."

"How did you know then about the resemblance?"

"She had a flat across the way from mine."

"At your confounded walkup?"

"Where else? I am not maintaining two establishments. But she saw you there once and said you had a beautiful nature. She was entirely wrong. None the less you might cultivate one."

"I think I am cultivating one. I have accepted your chair with gratitude and your remarks with charity. What more would you have?"

"Abandon this whole thing. If you are not cracked already it will drive you crazy."

"Beg pardon, sir."

There was Gedney again, this time with a card on a salver.

Bradish looked at the card, looked at me.

"A man with some leases. They won't take long."

He got up and limped into the chamber of horrors. On the table beside me was The Dawn, a novel by Bil Sayers, which the junior member of the house that published my rubbish told me had sold to the tune of sixty thousand copies.

Idly I opened it. Instantly the room dissolved. I was wandering afar in a fancy ball of the imagination, one in which I felt unworthy to tie the latchets of the writer's shoes. The ball he gave suggested a Baudelarian masquerade conducted by Gautier; the dual surprises that only a magician of letters can create; the words glued to the idea and the idea a winged thing. With the name of a prize fighter, Bil Sayers had the pen of a witch.

But the room reassembled its atoms. Bradish reappeared. Yet it may be he had lingered too long in the chamber of horrors. It may be that some of its atmosphere had permeated him. He startled me with the first thing he said.

"What did you mean by saying the dead can be raised?"

"Merely that and nothing more."

"How is it done?"

"Only the initiate know. But I understand that among the requisites are incantations, chemicals and buckets of blood."

"And the dead rise from the buckets?"

"With the blood and other substances the spirit materialises."

He had been standing. He sat down in the chair I had given him, reached for the book I had put on the table, fidgeted with it and shoved it back.

"And you say it has been done?"

"Read your Æschylus. In the Persians there is an account reasonably circumstantial and tolerably terrific. Since then, there have been a number of instances. Only the other day I saw an account of one in the London Times. It told of a séance at the Winter Palace where a Thibetan lama evoked for the tsar the spirit of Alexander II."

"His grandfather? The chap who was bombed? I don't believe it."

"How admirable you are today. You ask for information. The prettiest girl in all the world can only give you what she's got."

But there was Gedney again. Someone else had come and I reached for my hat.

"Tomorrow at eleven?" he said when he saw I was going.

"On the dot."

XV

The next morning I went to the roof. About me were fastidious tokens, the subsurface garments of my neighbours. In the street were hurrying insects. Above, indifferent to the idiot agitations of man, serenely the sun looked down. It reminded me of Brahma, who knows the nothingness of all.

But the sun, that is a divine lecturer, is also a heavenly clock. The hour of my rendezvous with the quick, perhaps also with the dead, was approaching. I threw myself down the stairs and ultimately reached the Park, where I found Bradish gazing, as Janus gazed, two ways at once.

Amicably he greeted me. "You are always late."

Inimically I answered him. "You look like a god."

Bolstered by a stone pillar, he stood at the top of a flight of steps. Beneath was a path that girdled a miasmatic lake. The path was punctuated with the exclamation points of trees, between which, at spaced intervals, were arbours, vine-covered, filled with mosquitoes. At the foot of the steps, three children shouted as only American children do shout. Along the path a man strolled, his hands behind his back, talking to himself. Otherwise, at the moment, there was no one.

Along the top of the steps were nurses, prams, old women. Beyond, on the road, were cars, victorias, girls on horseback. Across the road, more trees.

Bradish looked at his watch, which was always wrong.

"It's eleven-thirty," he informed me. "Now," he authoritatively added, "you go down there."

At the foot of the steps, I gave the shouting children a quarter and invited them to hasten elsewhere in search of lollypops, of which I hoped they would sicken and die. At once the man who had been talking to himself began talking at me. There are times when if I cannot answer rudely, I do not answer at all. This was one of them. The shouting children had got me on edge. Besides it seemed imbecile to stand waiting for someone who would never come, for something that could never happen.

I lit a cigarette. My talkative friend had moved on. The children had gone. But now, at the right, people appeared, tourists I judged, quite a lot of them, talking in that rasping voice which is one of my beloved country's many specialties and dressed in a fashion that is another. I looked at the miasmatic lake in which were intrepid ducks and suddenly I turned. I had heard Bradish.

At the top of the steps, his limping foot may have slipped. I could see him, one hand on the balustrade, pulling himself up, motioning at me with the other. But I saw, too, something else. Descending the steps was Nelly Chilton—she, or her ghost.

Dumbfounded, I gasped but I rallied, dropped my cigarette, raised my hat. At that instant she was midway on the steps above me. Whether or not she saw me I could not tell. She ignored me as only an entirely well-bred woman can ignore a man whom she does not wish to notice.

I stared. She was nearer then than the instant before and, in staring, I was conscious of three distinct and practically simultaneous impressions. First, that she was not Nelly Chilton but Aly Bolton; second, that she was neither the one nor the other; third, that whoever she might be, she was livid.

Confused by the conflicting impressions, I looked up at Bradish, looked without consciously seeing him, looked again at her, for her, rather. She was no longer there. During the shift of my eyes she had vanished.

The tourists then were directly in front of me. One of them, a man, was asking me something. I flung him aside, flung myself through the others, flung myself beyond and looked. Not a trace! On the other side of the path were bushes. No one! Nearby was an arbour. Empty!

I turned. Bradish, red as a tomato, was limping along the path. Behind him the tourists, bunched together, were rasping angrily at me. I was sorry to have appeared uncivil, but I was not in the humour to say so. I had my hands full with Bradish. Without his hat, passing and repassing a hand on his head, his mouth working, that spider venomously active, before me he stood, unable to speak, congestioned by emotion.

"Come here."

I got him in the arbour, got him seated, killed a few mosquitoes and asked if his car was waiting. I do not think he heard. He was stuttering something, what I could not make out, something to the effect that my Nelly was dead.

I never had a Nelly. Otherwise it was curious. Bradish, six feet tall, ordinarily nerveless as a stone wall, was shaking like a frightened girl.

In those remote days, brandy was to be had in the Park and very bad brandy it was. But there are times and seasons when bad brandy is better than none. This was one of them. I thought, My kingdom for a pony! His house, though, was very neighbourly. Rather than the hazards of sylvan bars, it seemed to me safer to get him there.

"See here," I said. "If you came on foot, we'll find a cab."

Again he passed a hand over his head. "Where is my hat?"

"Probably on the steps."

He got up. I put a hand under his elbow. He shook it off and limped along.

The tourists then had gone. The children I had hoped were dead had returned, dirtier, noisier, not sick but sticky. They were having a rough and tumble on the steps, from the top of which, Fletcher, who had succeeded Mike, was looking down.

By this time Bradish had himself in hand. In the car he said nothing but at his house he distributed various orders.

"Except to Dr. Cally I am not at home."

"Yes, sir. Thank you, sir."

"Something to eat and drink in the library. Anything."

"Brandy," I threw in.

"And curaçoa," Bradish added.

Brandy and curaçoa make very good medicine. I applauded the prescription. Apart from which, I have often wondered how it was that in questioning his sanity, I did not question my own. For presently, after his servants had come and gone, and we had both dosed ourselves and he went back into it, I followed his lead, not head over heels perhaps, but with relative confidence.

The lead he gave was, at first, merely an indication.

"Well, what do you make of it?"

"I don't know what to make of it, except that whoever the lady of the steps may have been, neither of us ever saw her before."

He lit a cigar, puffed at it, lit it again.

"You are right. Neither of us has seen a ghost. Yesterday when you spoke of one, I thought it ridiculous. I did not believe it possible. I do now, though. No, I still do not believe it possible and yet I have to believe it. My eyes deny what my ears affirm."

I exclaimed at him. "Your ears! What have your ears to do with it?"

He was relighting his cigar and I doubled on him. "Look here! What in the world did you go and tumble over for?"

"It was her doing."

"How her doing? You don't mean she knocked you down?"

"In that beastly hole where we sat, I told you about it. You seemed more interested in the mosquitoes."

"Tell me again then."

"She was almost on me when I saw her. That was just before you did the football work through those people. To tell you the honest truth I did not expect to see her. I hoped I might. I did not believe I would. When she came on me, like that, I started, and she did, too. Yesterday, I don't think she saw me. But, today, when she did see me, she gave a sort of start and I was so overcome I out with something, 'Nelly!' or, 'My Nelly!' and tried to touch her. I know I stretched my hand toward her. She edged away, drew her head back and said, and said it from the tips of her lips, but as plainly as I am talking to you, 'Your Nelly is dead.' You remember how she used to look. She had a skin of cream with claret in it. At that instant she looked as though she did not have a drop of blood. I started again to approach her. Already she was hurrying down the steps. I slipped on a bit of orange peel and called to you."

It was rather rattling. To clarify it, I said, "You are sure she spoke?"

"There is no question about it. When I said 'Nelly!' or 'My Nelly!' she said, and said it as though she were annoyed, 'Your Nelly is dead.' "

"The devil!"

At the moment I found but that. Yet immediately I had it, or thought I had it, and I gave it to him.

"In that arbour, it occurred to me that when I went through those people and was headed one way, she had already taken the other."

"Supposing she had. I don't see how it matters."

"If what you tell me is true, I mean if you did not imagine it, it matters everything. What you saw and I saw was not a ghost. Ghosts may or may not appear, but, assuming they do appear, they don't talk. They cannot. The physical organs are lacking."

I could see him turning it over. Then he, too, had it, or thought he had it, and he gave it to me.

"Hold on! You told me that the spirit that sat in Crookes' lap said her name was Katie King. She must have talked to tell it."

"Yes, and for that matter I have had a spirit talk to me. In Boston, at a séance, a spirit bobbed up right in front of me. As she was young and pretty, or at least seemed so in the darkened room, I put an arm around her and she bleated, 'Don't, don't!' and cuddled closer. While I was hugging her, the medium barked like a bulldog, 'Young man! Don't you take liberties with Bright Eyes.' Then Miss Bright Eyes slipped from my arms and disaggregated through the floor."

I laughed as I said it, as one does in telling a thing of that sort, but it did not amuse Bradish. Gloomily he smoked and I gave the story its proper perspective.

"But look here, Bright Eyes and Katie King and any other mediumistically materialised spirit is not a ghost. A spirit is a physical exteriorisation of the medium's psychism. Apart from the medium, it has no existence whatever. On the other hand, a ghost, the old-fashioned ghost, had its own entity, its own volition. Like the wind, it came and went as it listed. But, except in novels, it never talked. How could it?"

Bradish got up and stamped about. An old trick of his, it had always annoyed me. But on this day, occupied as I was with what a German would call the being and the non-being, nothing mattered except the key to the riddle which had complicated itself by becoming a problem with an enigma added. The lady of the steps constituted the problem. Was she or was she not a ghost? In either case, who was she? In the latter query was the enigma.

The practically simultaneous impressions that I had derived from her, vividly confusing as they were at the moment, had since become less distinct. Of them all the third, being the last, was the strongest and I told myself that while the apparition might impossibly be Nellie Chilton, might possibly have been Aly Bolton, more probably it was a fair unknown.

Yet, in that event, why had she said that Nelly was dead? How, for that matter had she come to say it? Above all why the de haut en bas attitude? Assuming it were Nelly Chilton, assuming it were Aly Bolton, assuming it were a third and unknown quantity, what had Bradish done to be spoken to with such loftiness? He was a good sort and his attitude to the departed had been impeccable. Why then the air of saying, Villain, unhand me?

At that, quite like the mosquitoes on the lake, an idea hummed and bit.

I looked up at Bradish.

"Jim, would you mind continuing your promenade sitting down? I have something to ask you."

He turned to me. "Well, what?"

"You remember the ladylike dressmaker with the cheque. What did you tell them at the manor about him?"

It was a bit far away. It took him a moment to get there. In the process he sat down.

"I don't see why you want to go back into that. But if it is any benefit to you, I got Mrs. Chilton alone and put the matter before her. She took it to Nelly. When she returned she said Nelly would marry me."

"So I assumed. But just what did you tell Mrs. Chilton?"

"What Peters told me, that he had gone with you to Bonheur and that the scoundrel would not budge."

At that, I too got up and stamped about. I stamped the harder because I did not know what to say. Truth should be agreeable or else withheld. To have told him that Nelly Chilton had agreed to marry him solely because of circumstances which she was distressingly unaware no longer existed or which, if they had ever existed, existed only in her mother's imagination, to have told him that would have been tantamount to hitting him over the head.

"Well, why do you ask?" I heard him say.

I stopped and turned. "Oh, nothing."

"Nothing, eh? Then you have a mighty queer way of asking mighty queer questions about it."

I had turned away, I turned again. "The whole thing is queer. I am trying to get the rights of it. From the manner in which the lady of the steps spoke to you, it seems to me that she must have felt herself aggrieved."

"About what, in God's name?"

"She may have got the idea that the Bonheur story was too bad to be true."

"But where could she have got such an idea?"

"Ah, where! That's it."

"And from whom?"

"From whom, as you say."

"Well, then?"

"I do not know where she got it, how she got it or what she got, but from your account she appears to have, or appears to think she has, a grievance against you, if not about Bonheur, then about somebody or something else."

I sat down and he got up.

"I believe you are right."

But there now at the door was Peters.

"Dr. Cally, sir."

In he walked, the living image of the devil, and pointed a finger at Bradish.

"You're exciting yourself, my son. None of that I told you."

He nodded at me. "What's new on Parnassus?"

I got up to go. "What's new with you? Any interesting cases?"

Cally plucked at his beard. "My cases are all interesting—to the patients. But recently I had one that might interest a genius. George Eliot had a similar case in one of her novels. You, of course, could handle it better, much better. You have, what she lacked, the impressionist touch."

I knew he was guying me. None the less I walked straight into it.

"What sort of a case?"

Blandly he smiled. "Hard up for a plot? Well, some day I may give you one. But not now. Now I have to scold this young man. He seems in a very depleted condition. Been exchanging ideas with you, hasn't he?"

"Hardly that," I said, making for the door and smiling at him as I went. "Merely a tip or two. I was suggesting another physician."

XVI

In the workshop that night I tried to solve the riddle. The enigma passed and repassed. It galloped like Flaubert's sphinx.

> J'ai vu le sphinx qui fuyait. Il galopait comme un chacal.

In meditating that picture, a message reached me. Probably the result of what people who like fine words call unconscious cerebration, or of what people who like finer ones call inspiration, none the less the message seemed to originate not from within but from without. It seemed as though an invisible presence had conveyed it. Even now, though years have gone by since then, I am unable to say that it was not due to an external agency. The superjective, always potential in us, though in most of us usually dormant, may have transmitted it from one of the unseen helpers that we all have and who are most active in our behalf when we are striving, not for ourselves, but for others.

In any event and however the impact may have originated, eventually it supplied the key to the riddle, opened that door and changed three lives. The complex result was not immediate and in time much, if not all of it, would in any case have been achieved. Sooner or later all doors open, all lives change. But I believe now that the key was hidden in the message which, simple enough on the surface, told me to do what I had then no intention whatever of doing and that was to visit the Park the next day.

Châteaubriand, who knew what poetry is, said there are apparitions that visit the heart of man. They come, as thieves and angels do, and like them depart. An apparition had visited me. It instructed and I obeyed. On the morrow, at eleven-thirty, I was again in the Park, at the foot of those steps.

I had no plan of any kind, which often is the best plan of all. I had thought that when—and if—the lady appeared, I would let circumstances guide me. But though I had not planned what I would do, I had planned what I would not do. The day before she had cut me dead. Ghost or not, I did not propose to have her cut me living. If, graciously, she were so inclined and bowed, my hat would sweep the steps, and if by look or motion she intimated that I might address her, then, while I had no phrases rehearsed, I did think I might become quite talkative and not about the weather, either.

Meanwhile, on the third step from the bottom, I sat down. The dear children of the day before may have sickened at last. The tourists may have thought the Park a haunt of thugs. The talkative man who talked to himself, must have been talking elsewhere. Save for the mosquitoes I was alone. Beyond, on the miasmatic lake, a boat floated. Above was a tender turquoise and the indifferent sun. Of the lady, not a sign.

I lit a cigarette. As I tossed the match, my hand stung. From it fell a pebble. I looked up. At the top of the steps, Bradish was looking down. Then at once, as though he had no time to waste, he turned his back, a very fine back, draped beautifully in beautiful flannels.

I called at him. "Au large, canaille."

Still that back and I fancied he was gazing Janus-esquely as he had gazed the day before.

Up the steps, like a chamois on Chamonix, I flew.

"See here, confound it, you will only make a mess of things as you did yesterday, whereas I——"

"You will do wonders."

"At all events, I won't lose my head and my hat and tumble over backward. If she sees you, she'll bolt, godlike that you are. But me, now, she may not notice and I can tiptoe along and see what becomes of her. It is not supposable that she will dematerialise as little Bright Eyes did when her chaperon caught me hugging her."

"You never can tell. She dematerialised yesterday. She dematerialised the day before."

"But neither of us saw her at it. Now I saw Bright Eyes perform her little act. She sank from my arms through the floor, disaggregating as she went."

"She was a fool not to have disaggregated sooner."

"I dare say. But that's not the point. If you are to stop here, I'll go. If you go, I'll hold the fort."

Bradish grabbed me by the arm. "There she is now! In that taxi!"

In the cab, almost in front of us then, I could see her, see too that she was bowing, not at both of us, not at Bradish, that bow was for me, and raising my stick in signal at the mechanician I bounded. Before I could reach her she too may have signalled. A yard or two beyond the cab stopped, a gloved hand was held out to me and my eyes were eating her face.

"Well!" I exclaimed. "Of all people! You are not the ghost of yourself, are you?"

She smiled. "No. I don't think so. Yet I may be. One never knows."

"But——"

The smile persisted. "You thought me abroad?"

"And heard you were not."

The smile passed. She was no longer looking at me, but over me, and I felt a kick. I knew it was he, confound him, and half turning, I said:

"This is Mr. Bradish, Miss Bolton."

I had seen him in any number of situations, but I had never seen him awkward before. Shy, yes, and diffident also, but awkward never, yet there he stood, fiddling with his hat, his mouth twitching like an embarrassed schoolboy.

The smile returned. "How do you do, Mr. Bradish?"

He sort of gasped, but he let go. "Thank you, thank you. Had the pleasure of seeing you here yesterday, I believe. Yesterday and the day before."

I suppose she knew what he was thinking. She usually could tell what anyone thought, that is when she wanted to, but she took it very simply.

"Yesterday and the day before I was in Canada. I am on my way now from the station."

She turned to me. "When you can you must look in at my new quarters. Signor Matouchi will be glad to see you—and you also, Mr. Bradish, should you care to come. Will you tell the man to drive on?"

Another smile and she drew back. But I poked my head in at her.

"My love to your angel and say I don't know where he lives."

She laughed and told me. It was on the west side in the upper Eighties. As she told me, I saw travelling bags at her feet. She gave me her hand. I told the driver and fell back.

Bradish, his hat in his hand, his tail between his legs, was ambling away.

I caught up with him. "Well, sir, I hope you are satisfied. That ghost is laid."

With latent ferocity he turned on me. "Was that the Delatour girl? She doesn't resemble Nelly in the least."

"She doesn't, eh? After your telling her you saw her here yesterday and the day before! I like that!"

"I don't know that I particularly care what you like or what you don't like. At a distance there is a resemblance, I admit that. But the voice is different. This girl has a foreign intonation, a foreign look. Viennese, I should say. I did not notice that until she spoke. Then at once the slight resemblance faded. It was not she who said to me yesterday, 'Your Nelly is dead.' "

"It was not you either, I suppose, who grabbed me by the arm and said, 'There she is! There she is!' "

"I made a mistake, that's all there is to it. You needn't rub it in. Come on to the house and have luncheon."

Mentally, again I threw up the sponge. In trying to unravel it the night before, I found that I did not believe that the lady on the steps had spoken to him. I believed that self-suggestioned, he had imagined that she had. Other people have had auditory hallucinations, and why not he? Why not he, particularly? He was just in a condition for them. In any event one thing now was certain and, in a matter such as this, one was a great many. The lady of the steps was not Aly Bolton. Definitely she was eliminated. I was free to pick and choose between a dead girl and a dame inconnue and of the two I infinitely preferred the latter. At the same time, it struck me that in a town as beauty-lorn as Manhattan the coincidence of three young women identical in beauty was fabulous. Of the three one had now dropped out. The wonder remained. The subtraction diminished it by not more than a jot.

I looked at Bradish. "What did Cally say?"

"About what?"

"The condition of affairs in Peru."

He scowled. "You are always trying to be funny."

I laughed. "How splendid it is for you not even to have to try! Come now, out with it. What did he say?"

"He did not say anything. He had no chance. I did not tell him. If I had, he would have wanted to have me committed."

As he said that, he nodded at me and I nodded back.

"I am not so sure but that we both of us ought to be. Here we have been, two days running, hunting a ghost at high noon and in this beastly Park of all places. Not Cally alone, but anyone else would think we were cracked."

"Speak for yourself. What Cally did say is that I ought to get out of here."

I ran up the flag. "Granada, Sevilla, Cadiz! Can't you hear the castagnettes, the clinking heels, the guitars and the shouts? Can't you smell the orange-trees and the blood? Can't you see the flash of the rapier, the bull on his knees and the whole plaza yelling like mad? The Lord have mercy upon us! There people spend their coppers and live. Here they grub for them and die."

He turned on me. "All that is copy. You know you don't care a rap for any of it and you know, too, and jolly well, that I don't either."

We had reached the avenue. Just beyond, a man was scaling a bus. I did not know him, but he reminded me of Austen. I thought of the street of obscure calamities in which he had buttonholed me. As I remembered it, it was somewhere off there to the east and I asked Bradish if he knew where he lived.

Bradish gestured vaguely. "He left a card for me. Very civil of him, I thought."

We lunched like imitation barons in the pseudo-baronial hall. But Bradish played with the food. He had a headache, he said, and I never heard him say such a thing before.

Afterward, in the library, I caught him gazing at me with pensive malignancy.

"What did you have in your head yesterday when you brought up that Bonheur business?"

At the moment I had forgotten just what had suggested it and I told him so.

"I will refresh your memory then. You intimated that Nelly might have misconstrued it. What the devil did you mean?"

"Oh, nothing in particular."

I was wriggling. He saw it and pinned me down.

"I wish you would tell me."

A good straight honest lie has saved many a situation. But, at the moment, my imagination was indigent. I could not think of one and though I regretted it later, I told the truth.

"Well, then, since you will have it, you were a bit precipitate."

"How?"

"I lied like a thief to Bonheur. I told him I had seen him in the dock, told him I had seen you sign that cheque. Then I shook the stripes and handcuffs at him. When I got through, he was a wet rag."

Bradish bit his lip, but clutching back at his own version, he brought it out.

"Peters said he would not budge."

"Peters was only in there for a moment. He marched in and threatened to knock Bonheur's head off. I sent him out again. Afterward I rather feared he might have got it wrong and I sat about forever expecting you would telephone. You didn't, but then——"

"But then what?"

"Afterward I thought it all bunkum."

He roared it. "Bunkum! What do you mean?"

I looked him over. "See here, I have no desire to defame any woman, least of all your mother-in-law. But I'll wager what you like that she gave Bonheur that cheque—which she knew you would honour—just to pave the way for her to come here and throw a scare in you. That day Austen buttonholed me. I told you about it. He said she would jockey her daughter into marrying you. Well, she did. She jockeyed her, jockeyed you and that's the long and short of it."

He passed his hand over his forehead, got up, limped into the chamber of horrors and back again, while I threshed around for a palliative. I did not find any, or what I did find seemed very futile. Yet what is there in life that is not futile? As for this thing, I knew that by day he could rid himself of it. Through mere determination, one can, by day, rid the mind of anything. But, at night, I knew it would take him unawares, pull at his sleeve, wake him, sit there and stare.

"She has got to know. She has got to be told that I knew nothing of it."

He had stopped limping about and was standing in front of me, the spider pulsating as I had never seen it pulsate before. In standing he sort of shook, as one does with the ague.

"I don't know how I can get her to know. In the Park, if I see her again, she may refuse to listen. I——"

He broke off, sat down and got up again. "I'll import a lama, hang me if I don't."

I could not make head or tail of it. Perhaps he saw that I could not for he waved and added:

"You told me of a Thibetan lama that raised the dead."

"Lord of Eternity!" I helplessly exclaimed. "No doubt I did. I am capable of retailing any insanity. But a lama is not a prize-pig. You couldn't import one. Besides——"

"You said," he cut in, "that there had been any number of instances. Other means failing, there shall be one here."

I sat back. It seemed phantasmagoric. But what else had the episode on the steps been? Perhaps where all is abnormal, the abnormal ceases. Yet the abnormal need not be the illicit and I said as much.

"That way leads to Bedlam."

He laughed. His laughter was that which a poet catalogued as heard in hell, far down.

"Where else have I been since I woke up at the manor and saw that woman looking at me? As soon as I knew about Nelly, I wished I had gone with her. I have wished it a hundred times. I wish it now."

He sat down. "I suppose it is indecent of me to say so. It is always indecent to say how one feels. But, unless I find a way out of this——"

"Well, you will," I interrupted. "I have told you that. You are standing before a door that is closed, bolted, barred, sealed and walled. There are just two things than can efface it—time and silence."

Sotto voce I added: "And some one to beguile them both."

Angrily he protested. "Save that for your novels. Ten years hence, time and silence might help and would help now, I suppose, if all this had happened ten years ago. But today, tomorrow, the day after! Not for an instant."

"See here, if you don't mind, I'll ask some of your people to fetch me a drink."

I did not want it. To fuddle in the daytime has always seemed to me the act of a barbarian or else of a fool. But liquor, which excites most men, was a sedative to Bradish and I thought that under its influence, his mood might change, veer and pass.

He was one too many for me.

"Stop on here and get as squiffy as you like. My head aches to split. I am off to bed."

He was going, but he stopped, turned, pointed.

"That door you know—the door bolted, barred, sealed, walled—I'll break it down."

XVII

It seemed very unnatural of Bradish to have a headache. Unnatural too was his irritability. In my ignorance, the combination seemed to me symptomatic of approaching derangement and so weighed on me that that night I awoke calling for help. I had had a frightful dream about Switzerland.

It passed as such things do pass and that afternoon I went to the address which Aly Bolton had supplied.

By comparison with the walkup, the house was noble. A lift exalted me and presently a moonfaced maid conducted me to a sitting-room that was charming.

"Rather a change from Harlem," I said when the maid's mistress appeared.

She had come into a little money, she told me. In telling it, she gave me her hand and, indicating an oblong silver box that sat on a table, offered me a cigarette. But though she smiled, as I think she alone could smile, she had the languid air of those who are a bit overworked.

"And now tell me about yourself," she added.

I was admiring her frock. It was delicious and she was delicious in it. The combined delights sang about me.

"You may perhaps remember my ghost story."

"You have been writing it?"

"I have been living it. In the second chapter you walked in."

She was looking at me, reading me, I thought, but even for her clear eyes I felt that that second chapter was too involved and I shook it out for her after summarising the first.

In turn she summed it. "The lady of the steps you took first for Nelly Chilton, then for me, then for a stranger, after which she vanished, though not until she had told poor Mr. Bradish that his Nelly was dead. But what better ghost story would you have?"

"Personally I cannot improve it. But you might. Since yesterday I have been hoping you would. The curious gift that is yours may save a poor devil's reason."

Always superior, she did not deny the gift nor did she belittle it. She put it properly before me.

"One may psychometrise an object, not an illusion."

"Forgive me, this was nothing of the kind."

"A lady capable of a triple metamorphosis while descending a flight of steps may not be a ghost, but certainly she is a moving picture and would you not call that an illusion?"

"I will call it whatever you like. But I do not believe she spoke to Bradish. I believe that what he said she said was an auditory hallucination. Now, ignorant brute that I am, I do not know whether I have an open mind or not. But I can admit that if he had an auditory hallucination, I may have had an ocular one. That lady may be a figment of my own imagination. She certainly is as far as you are concerned. Yet, assuming that Bradish heard nothing and that I saw less, our testimony coincides in one particular. The vision appeared to us both. There is no illusion about that."

Her head drawn back, she was gazing upward, not at the ceiling, but through it and beyond. At what? I cannot say. At other stars perhaps, at skies more deeply blue, at lands that would be divine were it not for man.

A picture returned and I displayed it.

" 'I saw the sphinx in flight. He galloped like a jackal!' "

Leisurely she redescended to earth and to me.

"You have a solution?"

"No, but I had an impact. It directed me to the Park. Yesterday I saw you there. Then I knew why I was sent. I was sent to meet you, for you alone can help us."

"Tell me how."

"I will tell you more. Bradish believes that the vision has misinterpreted an entirely innocent act of his. That is impossible. Death took her too suddenly. It is true she might have acquired an erroneous account of it where she is and that, I think, is his idea. Yet how could she? One does not gossip in the astral. At least it is not supposable. But he won't look at it in that way. In the sheer luxury of his grief he wants to get at her."

"Orpheus and Eurydice!"

"A modern version. Orpheus, whose lyre charmed all nature, all hell as well, tried with it to recover his dear departed. Bradish thinks a cheque book equally coercive. I was idiot enough to tell him of a Thibetan lama who had evoked a dead emperor. Yesterday he spoke of importing one quite as though he had only to cable and hang the expense."

"Your poor Mr. Bradish might know that every lama is not a magician and also that magic is not confined to Thibet."

I took another cigarette. "There are satanists everywhere. I dare say there are a few here."

She moved a matchbox to me. "I know of one by repute. Probably there are others. The atmosphere of New York, charged as it is with grossness, is highly favourable for them. Yet I doubt that any or all of them could help your friend in the least. I doubt that a congress of black magicians could summon Nelly Chilton."

"She is too white, you mean?"

"That would have its effect. But there is another reason, one of a different order. I——"

She hesitated, paused, broke it off.

I picked it up. "Well?"

She pushed it away. "It is all so out of the common that sooner or later I shall be reading it, with your name on the cover. You have been living it, as you said. You know all the characters, all the facts."

"Not all the facts, there's the rub. Even otherwise, it entirely exceeds my absence of talent. For that matter I can think of but one writer who could do it justice and that is Bil Sayers. Have you read The Dawn?"

"Yes. Do you like it?"

"Enormously. The book is very able. So is he. He keeps his name out of the papers and nowadays it takes genius to do that."

For a moment she appeared to turn it over. Then she said: "It may be he feels that a writer should so arrange his life that posterity can find no evidence of his having lived at all."

I laughed. "There are writers that survive only because death has ignored them. But all this is shop-talk. What did Canada say?"

"Where I was it did not talk, it whispered. I went for that whisper. At times, New York deafens me, then it suffocates and I have to get away."

"While you were away, I took the liberty of enquiring for you at Delatour's. At the time I did not know but that you might be the lady of the steps."

"They undeceived you, I hope."

"A shiny young man was reasonably vague. I left with the impression that somewhere in Canada there was a young gentlewoman with two names and no address."

"The shiny young man knew me only as an expert. My individuality and my own name I keep for my friends."

"And among your friends is a sorcerer. Would you care to visit his cavern tonight?"

"Dear Mr. Delmonico? I should love to."

I stood up. "You're a brick. I will stop by for you then at, say——"

She helped me. "At seven-thirty."

Presently the lift was redescending me to earth.

XVIII

THAT night, when the philters had been removed, the den of the necromancer was void of the bewitched. The disenthralled were afar, at the sea, in the mountains. Those still under the spell had gone to roof-gardens, or else to joys less severe. In a corner two phantoms were tenderly telling how they hated each other. Occasionally a goblin moved as moves a form in a dream. At the entrance occasionally a face appeared and vanished. Otherwise we were alone.

Among the elixirs had been a flagon of Nuits. There is nothing so agreeably demoralising. A faint reflection of its scarlet midnight had passed into her face. On the table her right hand lay. In her left hand was a cigarette. Though years have gone since then, I can see her still, see the smoke as she blew it through her teeth, see the dawn with which the Nuits had tinted her face. From the back of her chair her wrap trailed. The colour, pale amber, rhymed with her dress which was mauve and which left her slimly and decently naked, not severely nude as one of the post-bellum frocks that began too late and ended too soon would have done, but after the engaging manner of what was fashion then, just calmly and properly bare. In that dress she looked like a song from Shelley translated by Baudelaire. The aërial effect was there; there too was the odour of exotics and these influences were more subtly incandescent than the headiness which Nelly Chilton in her more definite beauty had exhaled. Of that beauty one had been at once aware. It was flagrant. The beauty of this girl disclosed itself slowly as perfection ever does. It needed custom and a certain degree of intimacy before the full loveliness appeared. An acquired taste perhaps, yet a taste which once acquired none other can replace.

Ouvrons nos cœurs aux ivresses nouvelles.

In that line of Leconte de Lisle there is an invitation and a wisdom which most of us miss. Lifting the thimble of another elixir I was about to repeat it to her when she took it from me. With that curious divinatory gift which she possessed she may have seen it coming and, conscious that it awoke no echo, she waved it away. The heights are not for every mortal. They were not to be mine that night.

"We are here on business," she was saying and looking as she said it as unbusinesslike as you please. "If I am to help, there are one or two things I should know. Whom had she that was near to her?"

"Well," I said, "she had at least one distant relative. That was her mother. Mrs. Chilton had a Darling for her always. I think though it came from the lips. At heart I think she looked on the girl as a golden egg, or do I mean the hen that lays it?"

"And her father, was he a distant relative also?"

"A foreign one I should say. At some time or other he folded his tent. He may be now in Paris or he may be in San Francisco. When a New Yorker concludes to disappear he makes for the coast, or else for the Seine. What determines the choice must depend on memory, or such information as a club window supplies."

"A man of position was he?"

"I do not know. I do not know what a man of position is. But I fancy he was reasonably aware that he came of good stock. If he had come of better stock he might have omitted to be aware of it at all."

She raised a slender finger. "If I am to help you to help Mr. Bradish, please do not talk like a society play."

I raised my hand in salute.

The slender finger sank.

"The golden egg you mention spells Mr. Bradish, I suppose. From the spelling am I to infer the wolf?"

"The whole pack. They chased Mrs. Chilton through the doors of Bradish's bank where she dodged in and out and ran into a fine fellow who promised her the penitentiary unless she permitted him to make up to her daughter. Or so at least she confided to Bradish."

"You mean she invented it?"

"At any rate, Bradish swallowed it. And here the plot thickens. Previously and, I fancy, by prearrangement, the fine fellow had shown Bradish a forged cheque which naturally he disowned and, as it happened, in the presence of witnesses. At the moment, the poor chap never for an instant imagined that Jim the Penman was Mrs. Chilton. An hour later she swam in, owned up and, the next day, with an imaginary penitentiary staring her in the face, frightened her daughter into taking him. For a moment only. Since then Bradish has learned the truth. He thinks she has also and thinks she believes he knew of it at the time and got her under false pretences."

Aly Bolton, dropping her cigarette in a fingerbowl, watched it drown and looked up at me.

"There was a nearer one yet?"

"Much nearer. A chap named Austen. She was dead in love with him and is still for that matter. Dead in love is a ridiculous expression when applied to the living, but it fits a ghost."

Up again went that slender finger. "I asked you not to talk like a society play and now you are trying to talk like a low comedian."

"I wish I might so talk that——"

She had taken her gloves. She was reaching back for the wrap. I saw that the nature of my conversational ambitions she divined and dismissed.

Summoning a goblin, I paid and off we went and into a cab where I did not attempt to take her hand. I knew it would be withdrawn. I knew she was not the girl to give a man the lesser mystery of a hand to hold unless the greater mysteries were to follow.

I knew she would never graduate the degrees to the the temple. I knew she might never give anything, but I knew also that if she ever did, the gift, however slight, would be the token of everything else. I not only knew that, I knew that she knew exactly what I was thinking.

The experience of making up to her without the necessity of saying a word, delighted me. It supplied all the enticements of love without any of its disillusions.

But at once I was conscious that even the immaterial was denied me. We were seated together, a fold of her wrap just touching me, and it was through the fold that she may have got the current of my thoughts that were perfumed with her imagined kisses. In any event, without moving an inch, she drew the fold from me. The motion she made was so slight that had I been less conscious of her I would not have noticed it. But I did notice it. I knew it was a rebuke, one as unspoken as everything else had been, and turning to her I raised my hat.

"Forgive me."

Readily she might have asked for what? Readily she might have pretended ignorance. There was no pretence about Aly Bolton.

"Yes," she said. "I will." She paused and added:

"We have to see Mr. Bradish through and for that we must be friends."

Friends! Dear me, how long ago that is!

XIX

THE next day it rained ravishingly, a rich downpour that ordinarily would have been to me life's full delight. A nice long rainy day, what more can the heart desire? It keeps you in and keeps others out. But my table was bare. Bare was the cupboard of my mind. I had squandered my substance on ghosts and girls. In revenge, that drab of a muse had fled. She had deserted my bed and board. Mentally, that day, I was dished.

To the ripple of the rain I beat a tattoo on the window. Hollow device. Wearying of it and conscious of being in low spirits, the genial idea occurred to me of cheering Bradish up.

The fates had ordered otherwise. When drippingly I got to his house, Mr. Bradish was not at home, sir. Would I wait? No, I would not, and I descended on the Buck Club where that gay ass Brevoort supplied me with arid jests and offers of liquid refreshment.

"See here," in my misery I said to him. "What's up?"

"Not stocks. They have been up. Now they are down. Thank the Lord they can't go sideways. Another Martini?"

The day, though dark, was young. There were but two other members in the room and they were at the farther window. I knew that intentionally they would not listen and that even otherwise they were too removed to overhear. Mentally I weighed it. Should I tell him? Weighing it still, I beat about the bush.

"The last time I saw you, a very affable person converted your handkerchief into a conservatory. Remember it?"

"Shook it out, the beggar did, over Miss Chilton. Should say I do remember."

At his empty glass he nodded. "Tell you what. When I read about her, it knocked me silly."

Cautiously he looked at the other window. "I say! You don't believe in ghosts, do you?"

"No, I don't," I told him. "But I am dreadfully afraid of them."

Yet as I uttered that antique stupidity, I gasped.

The gay ass now was solemn. "Six days ago, no, hold on, five, it was on the eighteenth, I know because I had an appointment with my dentist. I was on my way to him when I ran smack into her. You don't believe me, of course not. Would not believe my own mother if she told me. Couldn't believe it myself. Yet there was Nelly Chilton and I off with my hat. Never noticed me. Passed straight on. I tell you a feather would have done for me. What bucked me, the Lord only knows, but I doubled and followed her. Followed her straight into a shop and found it was she and yet that it wasn't."

I snarled at him. "What do you mean?"

"Search me. Looked exactly like herself and yet she didn't."

I snarled again. "That second Martini that you haven't had, has not gone to your head, has it?"

"I don't wonder you ask. But I tell you there was something damn queer about it."

"You know she is dead, don't you?"

"Of course I know it. If the notice in the paper had not said, 'Funeral private,' I'd have gone. Sent flowers though. Knew her when she was knee-high."

He touched a bell and ordered. "Two Martinis."

I rounded on him. "In the shop, how did she look?"

"Ghastly."

"Shop lighted?"

"They all are."

"Calcium?"

"Don't remember. Why?"

"That might account for it. Besides——"

"Besides what?"

"If you knew her since she was a child, you must have known her people. Had she any cousins?"

"Her father is the last of the Chiltons."

"Is her mother equally unique?"

"Her mother was a Fellowes and, by George! now I come to think of it——"

"Well, what?"

"She had a brother, Cranston Fellowes. He's dead. Got drunk on a yacht and fell overboard. They fished him out. Too much for him though. Pneumonia probably. That was before my time. Heard of it often though. My governor knew him. Said he and Mrs. Chilton were the living image of each other. Now he had a daughter. Never saw her. Don't know anybody that ever did. When she was fourteen she bolted with a chauffeur."

"A chauffeur!" I exclaimed.

Gaily the gay ass laughed: "Hey, why not? Everybody can't be a best-seller."

The cocktails had come. While he was drinking his, it naturally occurred to me that the lady of the steps and the lady in the shop must be the same and, conceivably, the chauffeur's inamorata.

I raised my glass. "What did she do in the shop?"

"That's it! A floorwalker asked what I wanted. I looked at him as much as to say, 'speak when you're spoken to,' just looked from her at him and back again and, begad, she'd gone!"

The coincidence was so striking that untasted I put the cocktail down and tentatively played out a rope.

"The usual sea of millinery had engulfed her."

"Devilish high the sea must have been to carry her off like that."

Still playing out the rope, I laughed. "Not a bit of it. The trouble with you is you are too fascinating. A woman has eyes in the back of her head. This woman knew you were following her. She feared for herself and entered a shop to lose you."

If you can chuckle gravely, the gay ass did. Yet at once, assuming a false modesty, he waved the picture away.

"Oh, for all of me——"

Again I rounded on him. "Look here! You go about telling other people what you have told me and before you can say Jack Robinson they'll clap you in Bloomingdale. Isn't it obvious that the lady in the shop is your chauffeur's girl?"

"He isn't my chauffeur. What's more, I fancy she is no longer his. But perhaps you are right. It may have been she. I didn't think of it before."

"Think of it now then."

We were seated as, in a club, men often are, at a window. Through it, for a little since, I had been aware of an encroaching blue. The ravishing rain had ceased. Westward the sky had cleared. At the houses opposite, the sun, from its magic treasury, was tossing aigrettes of gold.

But now a youth in a slashed waistcoat was bearing down on us.

"Beg pardon, Mr. Brevoort. A telephone call, sir."

With a gesture of excuse, he left me. I was glad of it. The advice I had volunteered applied to us both. I too needed to think of it and while he was shut in a cupboard, I ferreted about, found my umbrella and went out.

To go out when you have nowhere to go affords a spaciousness of freedom that is eminently relaxing. I had no wish to curtail it. After the stuffiness of that window, the puddles and gasolined air exhilarated and though it would be an excess of metaphor to say that they enlightened, none the less at the next corner I threw the chauffeur's girl into the middle of the street. Good enough for that gay ass if he wanted her, she was too fanciful for me. For a moment I had been inclined to swallow her, but on that corner I threw her up. The facial resemblance of cousins is rarely vivid and I abandoned the young woman with a shrug.

I was yet to learn that one does not get rid of a girl like that. It was some time before she caught up with me again but when I next saw her, then, in return for my shrug, she gave me a start.

It was near the Cathedral that I said goodbye to the misconducted daughter of Cranston Fellowes who, in addition to outraging the proprieties with a chauffeur, had managed to become mistaken for a ghost, and although I dropped her there, originally, in the club window where I first saw her, I had thought of taking her along and making her go through her tricks for the benefit of Bradish and his peace of mind.

Yet, as I afterward realised, nothing earthly could have benefited him. Back of the doors that close behind our birth it must have been all prearranged. Long ago, on inaccessible spheres, for some sin anterior and forgotten, all that had happened to him and all that was yet to happen, must have been written in his progression. Men who denounce the injustice of fate do not realise that their destiny is self-made, that as they sow they reap, though the reaping be postponed until their nominal death has intervened and they return here for the harvest.

These esotericisms did not occur to me when I was throwing the chauffeur's girl in the street. They came, with other things in their train, years later. At the time, innocently, in my ignorance, I thought that one may outwit fate. Innocently and ignorantly I thought I might help Bradish. I know I tried and, in his horrible journey to nowhere and back, it is possible that my efforts were of aid. But the journey itself, the long road hedged with hazards, no one but he could take, no one could save him from it. In the secret chambers of his soul he followed it. He had to follow it. Ineluctable as such journeys ever are, that journey was his destiny self-made. But I can say for him, that though he fell, as again and again he did fall, he saw it through and, not at the end, there was no end, there never is an end, but somewhere, midway between nothing and nowhere on that hazard-strewn road, he found peace. How he found it, and where he found it, will be related later on. Yet, now that I think of it, Swinburne told it better than I can, better than anyone could. "Even the weariest river winds somewhere safe to sea."

"I DON'T like it, sir," Peters was telling me.

It was in my workshop. I am not the Pope and I had asked him to sit down. I do not think he liked that either. In any event, an expert in his vocation, he knew the niceties of its etiquette too well to accept. Civilly, but firmly, he had refused.

"Well, Peters," I told him, "you know I cannot listen to you. What Mr. Bradish does is his own affair. If he cares to tell me that is another kettle of fish, but you ought not to."

"Then who can I tell, sir?"

That was it. Bradish had relatives whom he studiously avoided. There was no one to stand in loco parentis. To produce another legal phrase, I was his nearest friend.

For a moment I turned it over. An idea crossed it and I said:

"Anyway, say nothing to Dr. Cally."

"No, sir, I certainly will not, sir. But that now is another thing that has made me hanxious. I asked Mr. Bradish if he would wish me to have Dr. Cally in. Mr. Bradish has always been most the gentleman to us servants. But he cursed me something dreadful. He looked frightful, sir. I was afraid he'd have a fit. But if I may take the liberty of saying it, the people that come there—" and Peters raised a hand in mortification—"they——"

I interrupted him. "I can't listen to that. I will stop by and if Mr. Bradish cares to tell me anything I may know what to say. In that box over there you will find some cigars. Help yourself."

A week had gone since I threw the chauffeur's girl overboard. In the interim, my old drab of a muse had returned more in love with me than before. Poor taste on her part, but there she was and I had been wringing from her a tale of the west. As, at the time, I had not been farther west than Hoboken, local colour stood about in jars. I had only to help myself. Within range of my gun—which I could pull by a slight of wrist too quick for the eye to detect—were prairies, cattle, saloons, faro-banks, cowboys, bad men, bad lands and The Girl, a flower, fleet as a mustang and pure as prayer.

I had gone at the accursed thing because I could not go at the ghost story and I could not go at that because I was living it. You never can properly begin a novel until it is finished.

All that by the way. I enter it in these papers only that I may make it clear, how it was that since the ravishing day when I pitched Miss Fellowes in the mud, I had not seen Bradish, or Aly Bolton either. For that matter, I had not even revisited the Park. But, at the time, I felt that the lady of the steps would descend them no more. It seemed to me that when Bradish first saw her there, she had not seen him. It seemed to me also that when she did see him, she may have feared that if she went there again, some effort might be made to detain her. I have, it is true, no facts to support my opinion, but I believe that the second time she was seen on those steps was the last time she returned there. In any event, neither Bradish nor I saw her there again, nor have I heard of anyone more fortunate.

But to go back a bit. I was in the workshop wringing a farrage of rot from that drab, taking down her gurgles, when I heard someone without. There was no pounding; just a tap, just a voice.

"Please, sir. It's Peters."

It was an awkward and perilous moment. But something might be wrong with Bradish. Consequently I had no recourse but to go forward with a backward eye and, while clutching the story with one hand, open the door with the other.

Four minutes later, Peters had gone. With him that fly-by-night had flown. Try as I might, it was idle, not a line would come. The only thing that prevented me from throwing my inkstand out of the window was the subliminal consciousness that I would have to buy another.

In the circumstances, what I did do was perhaps excessive. Resigning myself to the will of the gods, I went to sleep.

I awoke with a jump. Either the house had blown up or else the roof had fallen in. But no, it was merely Bradish at the door.

Without any of the amenities of life, he issued his edict. I was to come to his house at once. The pronunciamento pronounced, he deigned to be scurrilous.

"What on earth have you been doing?"

"Writing a book."

"Why haven't you looked in on me?"

"Writing a book is like having a baby. Any interruption is at the expense of the child."

"You talk like a wetnurse and act like a thug. I would have telephoned, wired or sent, but no one can get at you. Here I am, on the edge of it, and I have had to come myself. What is more, a blear-eyed scoundrel below told me you had married and moved to Brooklyn. What a devil of a way to live!"

We were on the stair while he was singing that song and presently we were in his car.

There he improvised another. "That door is not as tight as you think. I have got the locksmith."

As he said that, I could see Peters, his hand lifted in mortification at the people Bradish received.

"Where did you find him?" I asked. "In the gutter?"

"It was a bookshop."

"A bookshop!" I amazedly repeated.

"A cellar. Run by a lousy old party who sells queer trash. Sells it, no, has it on tap and sits there looking at it, twirling his thumbs, waiting for customers that never come. He had the effrontery to tell me he was busy, yes and fearless."

"How did you——"

"How did I find him? Through another bookseller. When I got in the cellar I asked for occult literature and an instructor. It was then he told me he was busy. I paid him for his time, promised him more money and gave him my address. He has been sending instructors ever since. Of the lot, I selected one. He is the locksmith. He says he can make the door open of itself. If he does, I believe I shall die of joy after having nearly died of grief."

We were flying through the Park. I was looking at the stars, at the myriad worlds, and a very convincing spectacle they are when you have erroneous ideas of your own importance. In the light of suns that reach us æons after the suns themselves have ceased to be, it occurred to me that Bradish had an idea, perhaps exaggerated, of the importance of mundane joys and sorrows. What he had said about the door opening of itself seemed to me equally exaggerated. I do not believe in miracles, although in view of my literary crimes it must have required a procession of them to keep me out of Sing Sing.

The flight of the car diminished into a soapy slide. We were at the house where, as usual, Peters was in the hall. His face, as wooden as ever, was an expressionless mask from which his eyes looked at me. There was no recognition in them, but there was, I thought, anxiety.

Bradish, meanwhile, had said a word to him.

"When the magus comes we will be in the library."

The magus! I chewed the title. The taste was rotten.

But in the library where already Gedney had preceded us, there were, in addition to authors less interesting, a set of the works of the monks of Chartreuse, operas from Cognac, and a sonata, pale yellow, that had been composed in Rotterdam.

Bradish began reading one of them and, I thought, very fluently.

Patting his mouth with his handkerchief, he sat down at the table where already I had seated myself and to which he drew another chair.

"For the magus," he told me.

I smiled. "Have you found him expensive?"

"Well," he replied, drinking quite as fluently again, "no." He waved the glass, indicating the room, the spaciousness of the great, white, staring house. "In view of this, I suppose he put prices up a peg or two. But that is neither here nor there. At any figure the key will be cheap. By the way, I wish you would ask for a look at it. I know nothing of these things and you do."

I sat back. "Good heavens! What I know could find a playground on the head of a pin. A few odds and ends I may have picked up, but that is all that can be picked up by anyone not an initiate and the initiate tell nothing. Or, if they do, they are killed."

Bradish put down the glass. "How killed? What do you mean?"

"In France a man named Delormel, who was an initiate, published a book—La Période Solaire. What was in it I do not know, but I do know that in twenty-four hours not one single copy of that book was anywhere obtainable and Delormel was dead."

"The magus!"

It was Gedney announcing the locksmith who, at the entrance, folded his arms and bowed.

Affectations have never appealed to me and that affectation of orientalism angered. To give him such credit as may have been his due, he saw my hostility at once, and saw it, too, though my expression had not altered.

But such credit as may have been his due, he must have been unable to obtain elsewhere. Thin, and by comparison with Bradish and myself, undersized, he wore a long frock coat, stained and shabby. On one hand he had a glove from which a finger had prominently gone. He had a high frayed collar, a dingy black stock, but no cuffs, none at least that I could see, and I divined the complete absence of linen. The man was in rags and he held himself with an air that Frederick Le Maître may have displayed, when, in Robert Macaire, he appeared princely in tatters.

He bowed again, moved toward us and sat down. His eyes large, black, piercing, commanding, turned from Bradish to me. His hair, yellowish white, the colour of old straw, was abundant and through it he ran that fingerless glove. His features, plainly Semitic, were otherwise regular and his skin, pale saffron, was blotched. He might have been forty. He may have been a hundred.

As silent he sat, turning his eyes without moving his head, I thought him the most repellent creature I had ever beheld, a soul unclean, which is common enough; but a soul so unclean that it attracted elementals as filth draws flies. Things revolting, unmaterialised and therefore invisible, but none the less hideous, might, I thought, be crawling all over him and, conceivably, might crawl from him to me. Mentally I crossed myself. Physically I edged away.

He saw that as, presumably, he saw everything and smiled. But what a smile! A smile that disclosed teeth that were vulperine, black and yellow, pointed and sharp, the fangs of a human hyena.

Then at once, but slowly, in the voice of a ventriloquist, each syllable carefully enunciated, he addressed me.

"You are young, therefore ignorant and in ignorance is disdain. You are contemptuous and unaware that I am a priest. Magus means priest and the knowledge you lack and which I possess is the sacred wisdom to which Plato, Plutarch and Virgil bowed and which caused three of its hierophants to lay symbolic homages at the cradle of your Lord. That wisdom, the Maghdim, created the gigantic civilisations whose ruins still support the weight of sixty cycles. In your ignorance you disdain the Maghdim which, in your mouth, is magic and magic a conjurer's device. Sir, magic is will. It was by the magic of his own will that Brahma created whatever is. By will man may also create, he may acquire prerogatives apparently superhuman and, if he be an adept, even as I, he can will to his will all the forces and powers of nature."

I nodded at him. "You are entirely right. I am an ignorant brute. Ignorant and cynical. But I have heard that magic is of two classes, the white and the black; that the one works through pantacles and prayer, the other by sacrilege and Satanism. Yours, I assume is the latter. Jim, pass the bottle. Give the magus a drink."

"I do not consume liquor, sir, and if I may further instruct you, Satan is the name that the perversely ignorant give to Elim Sabaot."

"Who is that?" Bradish asked.

"Elim Sabaot is the Being whom you call God."

"Ah, yes!" I exclaimed. Illiterately I added: "Elim Sabaot is the incommunicable name of which the mention was forbidden and which is employed now only in magical mantras by vulgar thaumaturges. Do you count yourself among them, Magus?"

"Sir, I am a priest of the Maghdim, and if that be vulgar and black, then black and vulgar was the power with which Swedenborg summoned the dead. Black and vulgar also was the power which Spiridon, a bishop whom the Church made a saint, evoked the spirit of his daughter. Spiridon and Swedenborg were priests of the Maghdim, even as I."

"Good Lord!" I disgustedly exclaimed. "If it comes to that, then so was Cagliostro."

"Permit me again to correct you, sir. Cagliostro, though he summoned the dead and had them parade before his guests at supper, possessed but an imperfect knowledge of the sacred science and was surrendered by the true magi to the Roman Inquisition."

Physically the creature was revolting. Morally he nauseated me. I felt I could stand it no longer and I started to go, but beforehand I gave him one more.

"It is wonderful to meet anyone as invariably right as you are. At the same time, the honour of being addressed by Cagliostro's superior is too overwhelming. Jim, I'll borrow your car and go home."

The beast had risen. He turned to Bradish.

"Since your friend intends to counsel you against my offices: nay, by his manner has so counselled you already, it is for me to go."

He backed to the entrance. There, folding his arms, he bowed as he had bowed before.

Bradish followed him out. For a moment I could hear them talking, their voices diminishing as they went, the key jingling in the wake. I was sorry then I had not asked to look at it and then flung it in the vermin's face.

For assuming the key, assuming also that it had even a minor value, it would have opened one door at least, the door of some box in which there was coin. Yet, I suddenly had to ask myself, was it not already in the lock of the cheque-book that Bradish signed? The fact that Bradish was a fool and this creature a knave did not lessen the magic of that.

But there was another angle, far more important. Any key of a door to the dead drips with perils. I feared them for Bradish who, at the moment, came limping in.

Malignantly he surveyed me. "Rather had you, eh? Served you right for being so damned uncivil. Never saw you show up worse, damned if I have, and I wanted you to sit in with us. Now he won't have you."

But that cup of coffee was a trifle too strong. In no circumstances would I have approached the door and there it went slamming in my face. The ease with which the trick had been turned made me laugh.

"What the devil are you grinning at? Do you think he can't do it?"

"Do what?"

"Break through."

Before answering, I helped myself to the Rotterdam sonata. Then I looked up at him.

"Given the Satanism, the occult knowledge, together with the ability to employ it and, everything being possible, perhaps he can. But the perils of the threshold——"

"Damn the perils!"

"Yes, but then they may damn you. In the last attempt at anything of the kind that I know of, one of the participants was strangled to death and another went raving mad."

"What became of the third?"

Surprised at the question, I asked one. "How do you know there was a third?"

"The old cock said there must be three and, hang it, I had counted on you."

"You will have to count again then. In this instance there were three. The third escaped in time."

Bradish gestured. "Escaped, did he, and from what? The effects of his own imagination. Otherwise they must have botched it. From what I understand, and I propose to verify it, in the course of the ceremonies the door will open and Nelly will appear."

"Perhaps," I told him and I told him, too, to mark the perhaps. "But," I added, "supposing that instead of the dead, there appear, as there appeared to the people I just mentioned, a materialised elemental that grapples with you, eats your throat out, tears your reason away. What happened to them, might happen to you. They also were trying to evoke a dead girl. A demoniac incube came in her place. For God's sake, Jim——"

He shoved the gin at me. "Have another. We are not in Sunday school."

I was looking at him and, as I looked, I had an impression, curious, abnormal and perhaps unfounded that he was obsessed. In his eyes was an expression so evil and about his mouth a twist so vile, that it was as though a psychical confiscation had occurred and I was looking at another being.

Since then I have been through the war, where I learned what fear is; where I learned also that in the presence of the fearful you will falter if you do not laugh. I had not learned that lesson then. None the less I laughed. I laughed at him—or at it.

Viciously he eyed me. Then at once, with a shake of the head, he raised a hand and passed it down over the face from forehead to chin. It was as though he were wiping, or trying to wipe, some of the evil away. But the action may have been entirely unconscious. None the less and though the horrible expression remained, it had diminished and in a moment, when he again spoke, it seemed to leave him, sponged away by an effort of his own volition.

"The old cock told me to say to you from him, Silence and Farewell."

I looked at my glass and from it at him. "Very considerate. It is the occultist leave-taking. I do wish he would say it to you."

As I said that, I could have sworn that in spite of his efforts, that revolting look, the look of another entity, glared out from him at me.

He turned on his heel and turned back.

"The car is waiting."

So too was that look. I did not laugh then. I went on and out. As I went the look followed. In the car, there it was. It was like a look shot through the keyhole of some door below.

In times of stress, and this was one of them, a cultivated indifference has its value, but it is perhaps less conducive to serenity than the opiates of work. Resolutely, on the morrow, I prepared to give my pen a skirt dance around that garbage flower of the west, yet, such was the stress, that it was not until evening that I had it sufficiently groomed for the grand écart. But what pen, however poor, can be saltitudinous on an empty stomach? With a view to various vilenesses at a cookshop nearby, but accompanied by cowpunchers, bad men and that prairie pearl, I was somnambulistically vacating the rookery when the janitor's drooping eye popped up and a note fluttered at me.

Anything of the kind was distinctly forbidden and I was about to give him fits but inadvertently I had looked at the superscription. Never before had I seen that writing. Yet its character, oddly cobwebby and equally clear, was as serviceable as a photograph.

"I thought as how," the dirty little man was saying, "seeing it was her——"

"And thou hast done well, my pretty maiden. Here."

I fed a dollar into his dirty paw and read.

Would I come and dine?

Would I? The bad men could shoot themselves through, shoot every cowpuncher I never saw. For all I cared the freckled lily could bolt for good, bolt for bad. A fairer flower was beckoning then.

"Will come with joy and leave with regret," I scribbled with her address on a card.

"And here," I said, feeding out another dollar. "Run around to the telegraph shop and send this at once."

She is a good sort, I presently remarked at my mirror as I tied my white tie.

Now, in looking back, I remember that the dinner was detestable. But though the dinner was vile, Aly was delicious. Not a philistine trace of preoccupation, no bourgeois attempt at excuse.

The attitude charmed me. Moreover, as I have lived as lizards live, on sunshine and dust, the quality of the dinner did not affect me in the least. It could not have been worse, though if it had been, what could it have mattered since she was there? Later I learned that she had left it all to the maid. Thrice happy maid who, while not the rose, yet lived nearby.

Presently coffee came. The cloth was removed and she played a little; an air from Louise, the Depuis le jour; then more perfumery, Salomé's song in Hérodiade. After which, turning on the bench, she looked at me.

"I think the lady of the steps is a Miss Fellowes."

"Hello!" I exclaimed, surprised enough at the sudden entrance of the young woman I had pitched in the street.

From the bench she moved nearer. "You know of a Miss Fellowes?"

"Why, when was it? The day after I brought you back here, I looked in at a club where a gay sort of ass, a chap named Brevoort, told me of a Miss Fellowes who ran off with a chauffeur."

"The gay young man told you something else."

"He certainly did. He said she was a cousin of Nelly Chilton."

"And looked like her?"

"He thought her her ghost."

Aly laughed. "He must be a dear."

"But," I asked, "why do you think she is the lady of the steps?"

"I happened to see her and the probability occurred to me."

"It occurred to me that the lady of the steps was you and, if I had not known that at the time you were in Canada, it would have occurred to me that you were Brevoort's ghost; or no, not his ghost, the ghost he thought he saw."

"I am glad to be acquitted."

"But your innocence is not a proof of this other girl's guilt. I don't think it was she at all."

"Whom do you think it was?"

"Some fair unknown who possessed the extraordinary advantage of resembling both you and Nelly Chilton."

"Why then may it not be this Miss Fellowes?"

"Well, you see, don't you know, in view of the chauffeur she must be considerably out of it. Brevoort said she had not been seen or heard of since she danced the pas de quoi."

"Well?"

"Well, then, when Bradish hailed her as his Nelly, she would not have known him from Adam and as a consequence could not have retorted, 'Your Nelly is dead.' "

From the silver box Aly Bolton took a cigarette, lighted it, blew a ring of smoke, ran a finger through it and, incidentally, through my argument.

"Mr. Bradish is known to all New York. Miss Fellowes cannot be more out of it than I am and yet the first time I saw him I knew at once who he was."

"But my dear young woman. When——"

"Don't be so violent. I am not your dear young woman."

"My hated young woman then. When you saw Bradish in the Park, if he had hailed you as his Nelly, I will wager a bag of ducats you would not have assumed a sainte n'y touche attitude and told him what he knew."

"Yes, but, and to borrow your own mode of expression, you see, don't you know, Miss Fellowes may be more conversational. Then also, and however the chauffeur may have disconnected her, none the less she is one of the family and if she read the papers she would have known that her cousin had married and died."

"Where did you see her?" I suddenly remembered to ask.

"In the street."

"How did you know she was Miss Fellowes?"

"I did not know. I had never heard of Miss Fellowes. But when I saw her I stopped and said, 'This is Mrs. Bradish, is it not?' and she said, no, she was Miss Fellowes."

"Like that! Without showing surprise or anything? Forgive me. I don't get the atmosphere."

"It was today. I was passing the cathedral. She was coming out. I stopped and spoke. She seemed annoyed, if anything. Then I saw she had a man with her. If I had known she was not alone, I would not have spoken at all."

"The chauffeur perhaps?"

"I can't tell you. I had but a glimpse of him. I should say he was fifty and probably English. He did not look like a chauffeur. This man looked like a viceroy. He had the grand air."

"We can bury the chauffeur then. But after she spoke, did she vanish?"

"Yes, in a cab."

"And before that. How did she look? Brevoort said she was ghastly."

"Her skin was the colour of lard. I could feel that she had suffered and suffered acutely. Yet then, an impression of that kind I often get. Perhaps people are not always as debonair as they seem. But I had still another impression, that she was preoccupied about something. What, I cannot say. I might have picked her mind, but that, except when the picking is involuntary, I never do. Yet there is something that she is keeping to herself. Of that I am sure. I am sure, too, some day it will be known. Unfortunately for us all, sooner or later any secret we may have is bared."

Then for a while we discussed it, she maintaining that Bradish should be told, I maintaining that it would not matter now and relating the incidents of the night before.

"I know the magus by repute," she said at last. "His rags are a masquerade. If he is paid to open that door, he will. What he finds behind it is another matter."

I stood up. "You tell me that sooner or later all secrets will be bared?"

She must have seen it coming, for she called to her ostentatious cat.

But I did not propose to have Signor Matouchi interfere and I put it to her.

"When will mine be bared?"

Sagely she replied: "When its hour comes."

"That is not very comforting. I always picture the future as a greenroom of which the stage-manager is Time. The hours he motions to beset our lives are sad enough, but sadder still are those that are yet to come."

Quickly she looked at me. "Do you not think that that depends on ourselves? It is not the hours that are sad, it is we that sadden them."

As quickly I looked at her. "Bil Sayers said that. It is in The Dawn."

She gave me her hand. "Yes, I was quoting from it. Perhaps it is not very profound."

"Less profound than your eyes," I replied. "When you quote to me, quote to me with them."

Tolerably banal, I resumed to myself when I was at last in the street. Why is it, when a man is in love, he talks like a fool?

XXII

WHETHER the western garbage-lily bolted or not, is certainly immaterial. In any event, so many amazing incidents intervened that it was some time before my pen could pirouette before her. The quick lariat of her slang, the astonishing grace with which she leaped on a horse from behind, the aura of purity that carried her on a piebald mustang unspotted through the machinations of the worst men in the bad lands, for these virginal acrobatics my publishers had to wait.

Another young woman, the girl I had pitched in the street, primarily detained me. Pictured by Aly, she differed from the ghost that Brevoort had pursued and although, the night before, when she so surprisingly appeared, I could not take her seriously, yet, such are the clarifying processes of sleep, that it seemed to me Bradish should be shown the composite view. It seemed to me that she must be the lady of the steps. It seemed to me also that since she had a name, she must have also a local habitation.

Apart from which I was curious about him. The evil look in his eyes, the ugly twist to his mouth, the highly uncomfortable idea of psychic confiscation, these impressions lingered, but only after the manner of nightmares that day has dispersed. I had been conscious of them. They had disturbed me. But afterthought had induced the idea that they were due to the malign influence of that Eblian rat, or else—and what was less fantastic and more reasonable—to my own attempt at interference and the hostility to the vermin that I had displayed.

Moreover, in the same manner that the strength and precision of my own impressions had diminished, it seemed to me that his own impressions might have lost their force, that I might find him, not as he had been, but perhaps less tedious than latterly he had become. Ever since the vision on the steps, he had been tiresome as only a self-centred invalid can be. For he was an invalid, mentally at least, with whose tediousness it was, no doubt, my duty to bear.

It is true that when a duty is not a joy I have shirked it and shirk it I always shall. The doing your duty for duty's sake seems to me sanctimonious cant. There ought to be joy in everything. There should be joy in that and not the sense of severe satisfaction which some people appear to get out of it. Anyway, brainworkers are different. Brainworkers represent a special form of life. For them to suffer themselves to be depressed is immoral.

It was with these Confucianisms in mind that I approached the great white staring house. Occupied as I was with them, I did not immediately notice Peters. He had come out from the basement before I saw him and then, to my amusement, I heard him urge me to go away.

Yet at once he must have thought better of it, incomprehensibly better, for he backed into an area, invisible from the upper windows, where he effected a dumbshow that would have been good business in my pantomime. His face, ordinarily wooden, was as full of expression as a Chinese mask and that, phenomenal as it is in an English servant, decided me. I marched in to where he was.

"Pardon me, sir, but Mr. Bradish's orders are that no one is to be admitted and Mr. Bradish particularly mentioned you, sir."

I looked at him and pulled at my nose.

At that, he clapped a hand to his mouth.

Immediately several things occurred to me. I realised that the grand Satanic séance was being held and that a man, straight as a grenadier and perhaps equally strong, was afraid of something which he did not understand. At the same time, I realised also that while courage is often the result of an entire absence of imagination, quite as often ignorance is the most potent factor of fear. Yet as I doubted that Peters had ever heard of the demoniac polka and as I was sure it would be too much for him if he had, I invented a palpable explanation, but, before producing it, I thought that for once he ought to have his say and I gave him the cue.

"What the devil is all this?"

I could see him jumping at it. His hand dropped.

"I don't know, sir. As God is my witness I don't. But have you noticed the windows, sir? All darkened, everyone in the 'ouse, even to those at the back and here in the basement. That isn't all; no, sir. The furniture taken out of the drawing-room, every stick of it, and a fire burning there, a fire all night, and Mr. Bradish in there with two men. Yesterday a man came in a closed carriage, he is one of 'em. That man as was here the night you were, sir, he's been in the 'ouse ever since and he's another and there are two lambs. The man as came in the carriage he fetched them and a copper pot big enough to boil 'em both."

The witches' cauldron, I thought, and I thought too, whoever wrote Macbeth knew what he was writing about.

"And no one allowed in since then, sir, and none of us allowed out. Gedney, he's at the side door. I am here and Fletcher is at the back. Mr. Bradish hasn't eaten anything, not one of 'em has, not a crust, and we are none of us allowed above the basement floor and what they are doing there with that pot and those lambs and in the dark, God 'elp me, sir, I don't know."

"It is very simple," I said. "Just a little ceremony in commemoration of the landing here of the first cargo of schnapps. All good Knickerbockers piously observe it. Nothing to concern yourself about. Noticed any wind yet?"

"Wind, sir? In the 'ouse? With the windows all closed!"

"Well, if you do, pay no attention. It will be over shortly. It'll stop by tomorrow."

Whereupon, with something to think of, I turned on my heel and, in passing, glanced up at the house which, with the windows closed and the blinds so drawn that not a ray of light could enter, looked both sepulchral and hermetic. But only to me. A passer who thought of it at all, would have thought merely that the owner was away.

And yet would he? Not if he were the least psychic. For about the great white staring house, there was a sensation of chill, a savour of things damned, an impression of space, of shapes of sin, of monstrous crimes, of sacrilege and sorcery.

And yet, I reflected—and reflected, too, very erroneously—if an ordinary passer had succeeded in looking in, he could have witnessed nothing more than the mummeries of three men in a darkened room where, set in a circle marked by cabalistic designs, stood a tripod topped by a pot full of blood, before which one of the men, turning and bending to the north and south, was invoking enigmatic beings, calling to them in words rhythmic and unprintable. But nothing else, nothing whatever, except what the normal eye could not detect, a crew of elementals swarming in a wind that swept through the dismantled room and tore along the hallways of the empty house.

That would be all, unless the passer lingered, in which case he might behold a vapour rising from the cauldron, a vapour that wavered, ascended, descended, expanded and, gradually solidifying, assumed a human shape; the form of a girl translucently beautiful, immortally pale. If, after that, he did not shriek and run away, it would be because he was a brave man and lacked imagination.

Certainly I, too, lacked it. There was far more for that imbecile to see than I saw for him. There were rites curiously revolting, a ritual of perverted horror, all the turpitudes of the black mass accentuated by the infamies of black magic. Of that I did not learn until later.

At the time, in picturing pictures for my imaginary passer, I had entered the Park where I found a bench free from nursemaids and babies. There the trees, the green, the grass, distracted me. I thought of hills and dales and winding lanes. I love the country when I am not in it. Wearily a squirrel eyed me and gingerly approached. I stretched my hand. A ball of fur and nothing! The squirrel had evaporated as suddenly as the lady of the steps. My thoughts went back to her, from her to Bradish, and I wondered. The always possible possibility of his becoming insane occurred to me, as it had occurred before. In those shadowy halls of his, Lyssa, goddess of the mad, goddess, too, of the elect, stood and waited. I could picture her also, picture her fanning him with her harlequin wings, binding him with her opal chains.

And for what? The tenuous theory of sins anterior and forgotten returned, but the immediate cause was clearer. He had everything, except one thing only. Certainly he was not Adonis. But what of it? When you are rich as Crœsus, though how rich Crœsus may have been I have no idea, yet when you are, then were your nose as big as a pillow and your face an open wound, always there are attractive women to call you Dear. You cannot keep them away with a club.

That was not enough for Jim Bradish. A dead girl, who had been in love with another man, was shoving him deeper and deeper into the shadowy halls, beckoning to Lyssa, calling to her, telling her to take him and bind him and hide him away.

What a fool! I reflected. What a bloody fool any man is who wants more than peace, fresh linen, a cigarette and a book! I thought of Aly. As addition to the little inventory I wanted her. But I knew, well enough, she did not want me. If she had wanted me, and I could have kept my head, I might have said, Refuse me everything.

Then along the path before me came Marguerite of Navarre. She nodded, stopped, smiled, tapped me with her fan and said: "Si vous voulez cesser d'aimer, possédez la chose aimée."

Or did I dream it? Like the squirrel she had gone and I was back at those halls, at the window there, looking in at the unholy horrors that they held, and again I wondered. Yet there was nothing earthly I could do, except prime Cally who never needed priming.

I might adventure that way, I thought, submit a hypothetical case and get my bearings.

On I went. At his house, a servant told me it was not the doctor's office hour.

"So much the better then. Take my hat and stick."

The negro backed but he rallied. "He isn't in."

I turned on my heel and was going up the street when I saw Cally affecting to hide behind a lamppost.

I stood and looked at him.

"Well," he said, pretending to pretend that he had not been there. "I saw the literary light at my door. Highly effulgent. I've read your last book."

"You must have been very idle. See here, I have a conundrum for you. What would you do if a patient went mad? Rob him?"

"I would cure him first. Thinking of Bradish, eh? You need not. There is not a possibility of it. He's not a genius. If he were like you now——"

"Or you."

"Always the retort courteous. Poole, you are the most engaging man I know. Come on in and smoke a small cigar. I won't offer you a big one. I haven't the time."

At his office, he abandoned me in a dismal den where, as I kicked my heels, I reflected that since he was as confident about Bradish as all that, not only it was idle to bother but it would be beastly of me to tell tales out of school.

These meditations were interrupted. Cally returned cigarless. He had no cigars, he told me, and took one of mine which, hang him, he seemed to enjoy. As he pulled at it a remark he had made the last time I saw him occurred to me, and, with an eye to copy, I prodded him.

"What about that interesting case?"

"Which one?"

"You said George Eliot had written about something similar."

"Yaas, I remember now. When I mentioned it I had just come from the g.p. It was a case of catalepsy. Could you use that?"

"Hardly. Too much of an hors d'œuvre. The public wants roast beef and boiled potatoes. But though I can't feed out catalepsy, I'll take a bite of it myself."

"Sorry. Impossible to serve it today. It will keep though. Let me see. If you are still hungry, look in on Sunday."

But a man capable of that cigar trick was capable of anything, and I shied, little thinking how soon and how desperately I was to rush to him for aid.

XXIII

I FELT quite the loafer when, after leaving tricky little Cally, I entered the club where other chaps looked as I felt. Mainly polo men, they were healthy, innocent-minded young animals to whom a purveyor of cheap fiction was one of the literati, a being to be treated with respect and avoided with care. None the less, at the window where they sat, they made room for me, swapped stories with each other, stories as innocent as themselves, and yet told with such a flourish of By George! and I tell you! with such shrieks of laughter and such unfathomable good fellowship, that I will be shot if I did not begin to feel as innocent as they and went with them on and up to dinner, a noisy catch-as-catch-can sort of an affair, at which some of them became a bit superhilarious, but where I kept my head.

I can truthfully testify to that because of subsequent events which even now I vividly recall. The polo chaps were all to be off on the morrow, for a match somewhere or other, at Point Judith I think, but, for the evening, they had planned to go to a roof and as in the interim I had talked not shop but horses, their respect for the literati had so measurably diminished that they were for having me chip in. I agreed of course and then managed to lose them, after which I went on and up to the temporary temple of Beelzebub.

Beelzebub or, more exactly, Baal Zebub, a Syrian demon, was lord of flies and, I remember thinking at the time, possibly lord of fireflies also. For the temple, previously dark, was bright. Through curtains at the windows came the gleam of electric bulbs and it occurred to me that in the great dining-hall a feast was in progress, an infernal orgy, at which to the right and left of Satan's legate, sat the quick and the dead; that there, with that saffron monster of a magus, were bride and groom; Nelly Chilton summoned from her grave and Bradish conjecturing the chill raptures of her bloodless lips, the frigid emptiness of her ghostly arms, the renewed and spectral wedding.

I thought of that, of more too I dare say, as I stood on the stoop. But at once the door opened. Gedney was there. Beyond was Peters. On the stair was Bradish.

"Hey!" he threw at me.

Gedney took my hat and stick. He seemed catlike as ever. From Peters the Chinese mask had been lifted. His face was as dumb as before. But on that stair, Bradish had an air and an expression so reassuring that it upset me.

"Gedney, take Mr. Poole's orders."

In the Park I had dreamed that Marguerite de Navarre addressed me. On the stair, Bradish seemed equally unaccountable. What I had really expected, I do not remember but I suppose it was the unexpected. Well, there it was. Instead of odours of the black mass and savours of a satanic feast, the normal confronted me and such was my mental somersault, such rather are the abysses of human nature, that finding the banal where I had awaited the demoniac, I strangled an oath.

"Come on in here," Bradish was saying.

Vacating the stair, he indicated the library. There again I looked at him. The evil that had been in his eyes, the ugly twist about his mouth, the suggestions of an alien and obsessing entity that he had exhaled, these malignities had gone. Even the spider had diminished. It was no longer crimson but dull, lifeless as, in the old days, it used to be.

Reassured as to that, but vastly perplexed, I let fly.

"I was here at noon and could not get in. You were closeted with that rat I suppose. Where is he?"

He half raised a hand. "I don't know. I don't care. But I can tell you this, he did it."

Now, though, Gedney, with his catlike tread, was coming in.

In my bewilderment, not at him, but at what Bradish had said, I flopped in a chair.

"It cost me a pretty penny, I can tell you that also, but I can tell you, too, it was uncommonly cheap."

Gedney had gone and I reached for one of the serenades he had brought.

"Then the door was opened?"

"Well," he surprisingly replied, "that depends on how you look at it."

"But as yet," I angrily protested, "I don't know how to look or what to look at. Either the Satanism succeeded or it did not. Which was it?"

"It did both."

At that, and feeling perhaps that only spirit forces could sustain me, I emptied my glass.

He was still standing, but coming to the table he poured out a little gin, watered it discreetly, sat down and sipped. He sipped with the comfortable air of an old woman drinking tea.

I do not know why that should have angered me further, but he seemed so entirely at his ease that I barked.

"See here. I hate rows unless I make them myself."

He looked over his glass at me. "Yes?"

I nodded at him. "I can promise you this, there will be one unless you stop beating about the bush."

"There was a bush, but it's gone. She's alive."

"Alive! What are you talking about?"

He put down the glass. "About Nelly of course and I always knew it. From the start I knew it. From the moment I woke up and saw that nurse looking at me, I did not believe that anything had happened at all. Afterward I realised that I had been hurt and that Mike was dead and I was sorry enough about that. But, as for Nelly, I never believed it. All gammon and spinach, that's what I thought it. I have told you so time and again."

I had it at last. Long since overstrained, the Satanism had unhinged him. The man was demented, therefore to be humoured and I nodded again, this time pleasantly enough and soothingly answered, "Of course, of course."

He sipped again. "Yes, today the magus confirmed it. He and I and an occultist that he had in, engaged in an enterprise that was frankly revolting. In that room across the hall things were done that made my flesh creep. There were others that nauseated me. There was a sort of double shuffle, the crapulous and the sanguinary heel-and-toeing with the invisible. I throw a veil over it and all the more readily because I swore I would. Apart from that, there were influences about, influences that had come or been loosed there. What they were is beyond me. I could not see them, but I felt them. It was as though a lot of bats were swarming about me in the dark. It was ignoble and it was horrible. But there was nothing more, or rather there was nothing else. The fact that there was nothing more threw the old cock in a fury. He spluttered at me like a hellcat. I got it out of him then. Nelly did not appear because she could not appear and could not appear because she is alive."

I smiled and said nothing. What was there to say? But in smiling I revised my inexpert diagnosis. Bradish was not mad; he was far worse, he was silly.

"Yes," he resumed, "how could she materialise when she was material already? But the old cock did not stop there. He cursed and swore that I had inveigled him into attempting to evoke a spirit that was not a spirit, that I knew was not a spirit and I had done it out of vulgar curiosity, to see what could be evoked, an act, he said, that might have been mortally disastrous to all concerned. His adjutant was as spluttery as he."

And that was the way he wriggled out of it, I thought. But I said, "I don't suppose they fell on you tooth and nail."

As Bradish could have knocked their heads together, knocked the heads of a dozen like them, the supposition was extravagant. He took it gravely.

"They were viperish enough for anything and though I paid them what I had promised, they reviled me in terms that at least had the merit of being new. I naturally protested that——"

"I dare say you did," I interrupted. "But not that you had been rooked. You were plucked like a pigeon. Those rats knew beforehand that there would be no materialisation and worked on your credulity after planning to put the failure and the burden of it on you."

"No, not at all. Their rage was not feigned. Rats they may be. They are not Salvinis. When I protested that it had been formally certified to me that my wife was dead and that she had been put in a vault at Chilton Manor, the magus spat at me, 'Go and look.' "

"The only sensible thing that has come from him. I wish you would. Go tomorrow. The day after, loan me Peters for an hour and we can start for Spain."

"I shall go tomorrow and you will go with me."

"Nothing of the kind. I have had enough of this tomfoolery. Take Peters, or take Gedney, or take both. They can help you shift things about but I won't. Besides, you won't need to shift anything. The coffin is at the entrance, on the right. Get the door open and you will find it."

"There is always a door, isn't there? Well, I will open this one."

"You have not opened any yet and when you do open this one you won't want to open any more. But for the Lord's sake get it over tomorrow. Then, hurrah for Spain!"

"I am not going to Spain. I shall look for Nelly."

"Well then, after looking in Hades, you can hunt through heaven."

"I shall go about," he unheedingly continued, "I shall——"

"Meet Miss Fellowes," I put in.

"What?" he put back.

"Mrs. Chilton's niece. Ever hear of her?"

"What are you bringing her in for?"

"The other day Brevoort said he had seen her somewhere. In a shop, I think."

"He was drunk. She has not been in this country for years."

"She might have returned."

"When she was quite young she ran away with a green-grocer, or was it a groom? I have forgotten. Anyway she ran away from him, ran over to Europe where she has been running ever since. Mrs. Chilton told me."

"Did she say she looked like her daughter?"

"Like Nelly? No. Why do you ask?"

"I thought she might be the lady of the steps."

"That was Nelly herself."

"I won't argue over it. But hadn't she any other cousins? There must be other Fellowes hereabouts."

"A lot of bores also. If you have anything up your sleeve, out with it, but don't sit there asking stupid questions. You make me nervous."

I gave it to him then about Aly's little adventure, about her, "This is Mrs. Bradish?" and of the vexed, "No, I am Miss Fellowes."

I could see him taking it in, see him turning it over and I capped it.

"You may be sure that some Miss Fellowes or other is the lady of the steps."

But in turning it, he must have seen something else. He threw it back at me.

"No, all that is sheer nonsense."

He lifted his glass and I looked in mine. In it floated the earlier surprises, the amazement I had experienced when, on entering the house, I had been met, not by the sound of shaken bells, the muffled riot of a Satanic orgy and the spectacle of the spectre bride, but by the numbing fingers of the commonplace.

From the infernal to the banal, how brief the bridge! At that platitude, the memory of a verse from the one American writer who could have adequately pictured the episode recurred to me and I misquoted it.

> " 'Is all we feel or think or seem,
> But a dream within a dream?' "

"What are you mumbling?" he asked.

But I had had enough. I left him to his morrow, little suspecting that there also Poe would have been of use.

XXIV

In and out of the hall when, on that morrow, I returned there, were wiry, aproned men whom Peters directed in the task of re-establishing the black and yellow room as it had been before the parlour game of hide and go seek.

Mr. Bradish, he told me, was motoring and would I wait, sir? Of his experiences and presumable emotions since he unburdened himself in the area, not a word. An automaton was before me. The man had gone.

It was after six then and in the library I renewed my acquaintance with Hugo's Oriéntales, in which to the hum of mandolins, the poet leads you through the Andalusia that he knew and sang.

"Yes, sir, Mr. Poole is in the library. Thank you, sir."

In the silent house, deserted now by those aproned men, Granada had been before me. I saw the Plaza de Toros, heard the shouts. Then, suddenly the Alhambra faded, the bullring crumbled, the shouts were stilled.

"She is not there!"

Bradish, a cap on, took it off, dropped it, removed his gloves.

"Just as I told you."

Astonishment is dumb. I said nothing. I could not say anything. Then it occurred to me that I had not heard him aright.

"What's all that?"

"The coffin is open and empty. Empty! And there is nothing emptier than an empty coffin."

He had sat down on that chair from Delatour and was folding and refolding his gloves which presently he put on the table.

"It is just as I told you."

The repetition of any remark weakens it. Besides he had told me nothing of the kind. In addition, and although I hate the word, I knew it was impossible. A corpse cannot rise from a coffin. I doubt if even a live Hercules could open one from within. Then I had it.

"Look here! You promised those rats a fortune. No doubt you gave them something on account."

He leaned over, took a cigarette. "What I paid has nothing to do with it."

"Everything. To guard against any Stop thief on your part, they arranged matters before the tea-party was given, then when it fizzled, as they knew it would fizzle, they cried Cheat at you. You protested. At that they told you to go and look. Well, you have looked. You found nothing because what there was had been removed."

He twirled the cigarette. "The grass before the vault was a foot high. If within the last few days they had been there, if anyone had been there, the grass could not have looked as it did."

I turned it around at him. "Did you ever hear of Heraclitus? Heraclitus died of laughing, literally of laughing, at the stupidity of his friends."

Bradish lit the cigarette. "I am not one of them then. Perhaps you are. I know what you are going to say, that they got fresh sods of grass and planted them for me. They did nothing of the kind. I looked into that also."

Drinking the smoke, he resumed: "Nelly never was there at all. I felt that from the start and what I felt the magus confirmed. Now where is she?"

"Ask that rat. If he can raise the dead, raising grass must be easy for him. If it were I, I would prosecute him, not for bilking me, I would not want it known what a bloody fool I had been, but for rifling a sepulchre."

He flicked his ashes. "You need not talk the way you write. Rifling a sepulchre! The dust on the coffin was an inch thick. Perhaps you will say they planted that also."

"It would be only artistic of them and on a par with everything else. The confidence game with which they gulled you, I cannot but admire. You are swallowing it still and crying for more."

My shots, such as they were, may have told. He seemed to be weakening and I gave him another.

"See here! Send for that rat, offer him a release in full and another cheque if he will tell you what he did with the remains."

"If he were the crook you think him, he would accept the offer and say he dumped them in the river. I admit he is a queer fish. But he is not a crook. He does not need to be one. The man is a conjurer and he knows his trade. The other night, after you had gone, I had him in here again. He sat at this end of the table. At the farther end was that inkstand. It must weigh five pounds. He beckoned, said something, I don't know what, and the inkstand slid of itself the length of the table to him."

"So you think. It did not slide of itself. It was moved by elementals. That night I could have sworn they were crawling all over him. I have thought since then that some of them must have crawled on you. You looked it. I don't mean to compliment you, but you looked like a fiend."

At that, or at something else, a memory perhaps, he shifted, uneasily I thought, turned away and then to me.

"We are wandering all over the grounds."

"Yes, we would be much better off in Spain."

"Leave me in the lurch then. I am going to find Nelly."

The faith that moved mountains! Instead of my incredulity weakening him, his confidence was weakening me. That confidence, irrational, illogical, utterly insane, had been superb. When he heard the girl was dead he did not believe it. That disbelief the sight of some damsel in the Park had confirmed. When the young person reiterated what others had asserted, he had tried sorcery to get the girl back. That failing he had looked for her in her coffin. In its emptiness his confidence was renewed. Now he was going to find her! Among the living he was going to hunt for the dead! What could you do, what could anyone do with a chap like that? I saw but one course and I took it.

"Jim, you are sublime!"

He must have thought I was guying him. He shook his head.

"I can see it all from your angle. I do not blame you because you cannot see it from mine. It would be phenomenal if you could. It is not a thing I can analyse. It is not an idea, it is a sensation, like joy or like dread, which one experiences and cannot describe, no, nor share."

I dressed it a bit and gave it back.

"It is the inner voice, the voice that makes the hero, makes the martyr."

"And the fool," he put in. "I may be one. You think so and Cally would. If Cally knew what you know he would want to lock me up. But a fool may be wise in his folly and time alone can show whether I am an imbecile in mine."

He was taking it then so sagely that a recompense was due and lightly I produced it.

"Spain can go hang. I'll see you through."

I made the promise as one promises the moon. His quick and rapid fire in defence of the Eblian rat had confused, it had not converted me. The girl was dead. That her tomb had opened and her remains had flown were matters temporarily inexplicable but eternally subordinate. The girl was dead. Yet that fact, which was the cardinal fact, Bradish could not and would not accept. Readily I might promise to see him through. But see him through to what?"

"And there I am," he was saying, "I am up a tree."

That tree, how well I knew it! I was as high up in it as he and my perch was more rickety. He had faith to sustain him and I had none. What I did have was a range of vision superior to his, because impersonal, and along it I looked. The horizon was dark. Not a sign of help. Not the hope of a ladder.

"Dinner is served, sir."

In the old days of the grand manner, before the battle began the young officer put on his gloves. He put on the white gloves that tradition required. In the great crises of life one should always dress for dinner. Evening clothes have a steadying effect. At the announcement, I regretted I was in flannels.

At table I forgot them. Very thoughtfully, Peters had provided a cru from the Garonne, which while not summery, had an amplitude that was majestic. In its red kisses were art, literature, the hum of lutes, and all of them enchanting the palate, caressing it with combined enthrallments. The sorceries of the red magic brightened the horizon. Afar was a gleam that looked like a sail or, more serviceably, a ladder.

Yet, not being Archimedes, I omitted to cry Eureka!

Instead I said and casually enough: "How did you get in?"

The red necromancies may have lowered Bradish from that tree. They may have lifted him higher. In any event he was not at the moment where he had been. Vaguely he looked at me.

Ordinarily the fact that Peters and Gedney were present would have prevented any intimate conversation. But as they knew about the visit to the tomb, I reconstructed it.

"The vault was locked, was it not?"

"Oh! Yes! Well, I sent Fletcher for a man to open it. It took some time."

"Afterward, you locked it again?"

"Naturally."

"What did you do with the key?"

He turned. "What did I do with the key, Gedney?"

"You left it in the padlock, sir."

"Who is at the manor?" I asked.

"Nobody. It is boarded up. Mrs. Chilton wanted to rent it. I had my lawyers take a lease of it from her. Why do you ask?"

"I shall be going there tomorrow."

He sat back. "That's mighty nice of you. You may find something that I missed. Take Fletcher and the car."

I stood up. "There are one or two things I have to do beforehand. Send the car to my shop at noon and if I find anything——"

"Fetch it straight here."

He turned again. "Gedney, a cab for Mr. Poole."

XXV

The cab took me to a noble mansion, an exalting lift to a door.

In the sorceries of the red wine from the blue river, it was Aly Bolton I had seen with the ladder. Aly assisting and we might all climb down, though what lay at the foot of the tree was enigmatic as the mysteries of Eleusis. Theories I had had. One after another they had come. One after another they had gone. If Aly balked and refused then, until we were all dead, it might be that only the tree would remain.

In looking back at it now, I realise, what I should have realised then, that there are mysteries it is wiser to ignore than to elucidate. In the greenroom of the future where the hours fall in line, there are many that wound, there are some that console. Time, that stages the hours which inform our lives, had sent Bradish many charged with darts and might have sent him others that would have dulled their pain. The grave of all things has its violet. Yet, for that lessened mourning to replace the blacker trappings of one's woe, a grave there must be. To the ineluctable, the strongest yield. It is suspense that daunts us all.

In looking back now I see that clearly enough, yet more clearly still I see that instead of helping, I harmed. The fact that my intentions were good only aggravates the offence. The best intentioned people are the most insupportable. "Pas de zèle," said Talleyrand. Why did I need to show any?

But though now with riper years, I ask myself these things, I know that whatever happens, happens because it had to happen and because it could not happen otherwise. There is consolation in that, there always is in philosophy and one can find consolation nowhere else except, as a poet said, in the dictionary.

"Yes, sir."

Moonfaced, a little maid was looking at me. How long she had been looking it is awkward to conjecture. After reaching the door, the possibilities of the ladder had swarmed about me. In considering them I had forgotten I had knocked. I had not seen the door open or the moonfaced maid. I was in the condition of a chess player who answers a question minutes after it has been put.

But even as the absent player awakes so did I awake and in awakening I smiled.

Was Miss Bolton visible?

Then presently I was tickling a gentleman who resented it so little that he scaled me, perched on my shoulder and was purring ostentatiously when graciously, as she did everything, the lady of the ladder appeared.

Then I also purred. "I love your cat. I love your flat. I love—lalage. Dulce ridentem, dulce loquentem, Lalagen amabo. Horace said that, or something like it. Lalage was a young woman who charmed his leisures. I am sure you are much better looking. But sweetly you smile, as she smiled. Sweetly you talk, as she talked. If sweetly you do not blush, as sweetly she must have blushed, it is because I headed myself off in time. Yes, thank you, I will sit down and thank you, yes, I will smoke."

"You are thinking of something else than that improper young woman."

Before I answered I took and lighted a cigarette. Even then I could not go at it like that, all of a sudden. The art of life, as of literature, consists in easy transitions and I fell back on Bil Sayers.

"Yes, The Dawn. Recently I was looking it over again. A very admirable performance."

I coughed and resumed: "Bil Sayers writes his books as the Moslems built their mosques, mixing musk with mortar that the whole structure should be perfumed."

I did not improvise that, or rather it was my usual improvisation, one that I had played many a time and oft to the tune of other works, other poems. But, though she had not blushed before, she flushed a little then and I knew my hackneyed performance had the merit of pleasing her, as the picturesque always does please the artist.

She shook a tapering finger at me. "That is not what you have in mind."

How lovely she looked! Adorably constructed and constructed too to be adored, as she sat there, her fair face slightly flushed, one bare arm on the table, the other supporting her head, I wished I were Greuze.

"What is it?" she asked.

"Well, you see, you know, after I left here the other evening, a problem occurred to me. Why is it when a man is in love he talks like a fool?"

"That is not it either," she said, and I thought the flush deepened.

That annoyed me. She knew perfectly well that I wanted her. There was no news in that. But it was vexatious of her to accept my own estimate of myself. It was an estimate which she should have returned to me corrected and revised. But that was not Aly's way and in my annoyance I let go.

"Why do you ask what I am thinking when you know without being told? I am thinking of you and a ladder. I am up a tree and I want to climb down."

"Is the tree on the Hudson?"

Then, as I nodded, she added: "You brought it in with you. But whether it is an oak or an aspen, the tree of knowledge or the tree of the golden fruit, you must tell before I can say whether anything I may do will be of use."

I put the whole thing before her; the danse macabre, the rat's assertion that the girl was alive, the visit to the vault, the empty coffin, the profundities of Bradish's prodigious faith.

"And I thought him mad," I concluded. "He may be saner than I. But you can see now the tree on which we sit. Barring a miracle, he alone or I alone or both together cannot, whatever we contrive, get behind the puzzle of what became of the corpse. It is true, he will have it that there was no corpse and there is his amazing faith. Of course, without a crystal or even with one, I cannot make him see and hear what I did. I cannot make him hear the physician, as I heard him, pronounce the girl dead. I cannot make him see her, as I saw her, in her coffin. It is not that he doubts my word, he prefers the testimony of his own intuitions and what is one to do with a chap like that? Between us, one or the other is wrong. He thinks I am, I know he is. For assuming what has happened time and again, that the girl was in a trance and was buried alive, assuming all that, then, if after being put in the vault, consciousness returned, she would have died of suffocation in the coffin. She could not have got from it. But assuming even that she did, she could not have got out of the vault. No one would have heard her calls for help. Moreover if anyone did hear, it is quite on the cards that they would have shrieked and run away. The problem therefore is just this: I want to know what became of the body, Bradish wants to know what became of the girl."

Aly looked up. "To solve the problem, you spoke of a miracle. What did you mean?"

I shook my head. "You don't need to ask, you know. The miracle is you, Aly Bolton. You are a living, breathing miracle, a miracle of beauty in a miracle of flesh."

"Also, there is a Mr. Chandos Poole, who is a highly lyrical young man."

"Yes," I told her, "and a trifle vatic to boot. For he can tell you one thing which you cannot foresee. He intends to be far more lyric than he is. He intends to be so lyric that seraphs will take up the burden of his lay and strum it at you from their golden harps."

That was an improvisation and poor as every improvisation is that has not been practised and rehearsed in advance. Conscious of which, I coughed again and took another cigarette.

With an indifference so vividly incandescent that I could have caught and kissed her until she swooned and died, she stood up, left the room, followed by her ostentatious cat. Then almost at once she returned with a wicker-covered gourd of glass which she said, and which I did not believe, she had given herself, and which contains the liquid sol bémol that mortals—mortals who know—call mandarin liqueur.

She gave me a thimble. I lapped it, poured a drop on my forefinger and offered it to Signor Matouchi. He sniffed and bit me. Any kindness is repaid in pain.

Aly, who had had half a thimble, put down her little glass.

"Who was at the manor the night of the funeral?"

Nursing the bite, I told her. "Bradish, who was unconscious, a nurse who was dumb, a servant who was deaf and a mechanician who was dead."

For a moment she considered the picture. Then she tried to frame it.

"It would fit in your ghost story."

I shook my head.

She smiled and smoothed her hair. "You do not think so now. You will later. At present you are too near it. It lacks perspective for you. But let me ask. Why not make a scenario of it?"

"For whom?"

"Well," she said, still smiling, still smoothing her hair. "There is Bil Sayers. You seem to like his work."

The manner in which it afterward came about has nothing to do with the present document, but later a novel of Bil Sayers appeared which I have already cited. Entitled The Halls of Eblis, it presents many of the incidents that are given here. Otherwise it is superiorly dramatic, the dénouement being totally different from what actually occurred. That is as it should be. The climaxes of fiction are logical, those of life are not. In fiction matters turn out as they ought to. In life it is just the reverse.

I throw that in now to get rid of it. At the time I was not thinking of fiction but of a corpse that had assumed a fictional aspect of life. I wanted to be rid of that also. I wanted it safely reburied. Meanwhile, nursing the ungrateful bite, I looked over at Aly. She seemed to be nursing the scenario which she had suggested.

I brought her back. "I have shown you the tree. Will you supply the ladder?"

She looked up. "A descent is always possible, but is it wise?"

"Why do you say that? Do you see anything?"

"No, I am in the tree with you. But you want to climb down and I do not."

Surprisedly I stared. "Why don't you want to?"

"I might disturb things."

"Things!" I amazedly repeated. "What things?"

"The things at the bottom. They are so quiet. It is wrong to disturb them. It is always wrong to stir the silent things that do not speak. The world is full of noise and sin. The silent things only wish for silence. It is wicked to go down and harm them where they hide."

"But," I protested, "you move me to tears."

I said it jestingly, but at once I could have said it in earnest. Her eyes had filled. I saw her tears. None the less she smiled. It was very curious. She was both smiling and crying, crying because she could not help it and smiling that I might not be distressed. It was not only curious, it was affecting. I leaned toward her.

"What was it that you saw—down there?"

She brushed her eyes. "Nothing. I have not looked. It is what I fear to see."

"And what is that?"

"I do not know. I only know I dread it."

"But you want to help. You said so."

"Yes, I said that."

"Then will you?"

"I will help, but I will not harm."

"Aly Bolton, listen to me. You will harm if you do not help."

"How will I harm?"

"Banality kills. Suspense is more treacherous. It may drive Bradish insane."

At that she made a little pathetic motion and I added: "Will you go there with me tomorrow?"

She pressed her hands together almost as though she were wringing them. I loosened and kissed them and looked up at her.

"Will you?" I repeated.

"Yes," she said longly. "I will go."

Her eyes were still wet and why were they? Though I asked she did not tell, perhaps she could not. But they were still wet when, our simple plans simply made, she saw me to the door.

XXVI

I AWOKE to the crash of worlds, to the trumpets of the last judgment. In the sarabands of lightning there was an expansiveness, a continuity and a glory that made the black sky gold. A picture torn from the mythologies, the war of titans and of gods, I went to the roof to enjoy it. The lightning there was raspberry, the sky when not a gold field was a tent of crêpe. Between was scudding lingerie, and I held my hair on as I stood, like a valkyr I hope, in the howling and deluvian rain.

The night before, the vibrance of Aly's sensitiveness had affected me. I dreamed of undergrass grown overgreen where, in bogs of leprous scum, devils danced and ghouls were coldly crouching. Ordinarily I would have taken them straight to the workshop. The crashing worlds interfered. When, over the Palisades, a curtain had risen, when the lightning had rescaled the sky, when gods and titans had slunk back to the classical dictionaries, and the air aquiver with their surge and rout was wholly divine, I could only rush down, dry my hair and change my clothes. It was high noon and Aly waited.

The flight through the suburbs, the shoot up the Hudson, pictures that I did not see, incidents that did not occur, the antiquarian will set forth in Bil Sayers' novel. He is the poet of this matter of which I am but the clerk. For the dull-as-ditchwater effect of the present account I offer therefore no apologies. On the contrary. The effect has its value. Every scrupulous critic knows that no history can be reliable unless it is packed with yawns.

Among the simple plans of the night before, luncheon at the village inn had been included. Since then, Aly had otherwise ordered. When the exquisite girl got with me in the car, there got with us a basket in which were sandwiches and a thermos bottle of coffee and water, and a very good drink I have always found it,—though, to take the taste from my mouth of one or two of the surprises that awaited us, I would have said Thank you to a glass of brandy.

Meanwhile, as Aly entered the car, I looked in her eyes. The rain had dried them. They were blue as the sky and bluer. On her face the slight flush of the night before persisted, maintained there perhaps by the consciousness of the ladder. But, as the car flew on, these delicacies lost themselves behind a motor veil and it was not until we reached the manor that I could feast again upon them.

The house, which had had an ugly, comfortable air, exhaled then the more penetrating atmosphere of emptiness and desertion. The front door was walled, the candid windows were barred and the grounds which on the funeral day had seemed none too smart, were the unkempt. Desolation brooded there. Only the vault was unaltered. In the days of the landed gentry, the Chiltons had been a high-handed, high-headed lot. What remained of them that vault contained.

We had left Fletcher, the car, the basket and the veil on the road beyond and, as we approached the vault, I heard her say, perhaps to me, perhaps to herself:

"There it is, exactly as I saw it."

There, too, was the long grass of which Bradish had told, a bit trampled since his own excursion, and in the padlock was the key concerning which Gedney had informed him. Whether the downpour of the morning had already rusted it is now immaterial but it would not turn. As, at the time, I could crack a hickory nut with my fingers, I knew that where I failed Fletcher would do no better and I was for sending him for the man of the day before, when Aly tried it. The key turned, the hasp loosened, the padlock fell and through the then opened door the chill breath of the dead came at us.

From before it Aly retreated. The flush then had gone, but though at the moment she was pale she must have been resolute for she rallied and entered. The back of the vault was dark, the north side was dim but on the south side, on the lower slab, where I had seen the coffin put, light entered with her and I saw again that bier. But not as I had seen it when I followed it there. It was open, it was empty, and back to me swam the remark that Bradish had made:

"There is nothing emptier than an empty coffin."

Aly, who needed no guidance, no prompting, no word from me, removed a glove, put her bare hand on the coffin and looked away, looked up. At what? What did she see? Her lips moved, but they may have gone dry. She moistened them and so absent was her expression that I am sure she did it unconsciously. Her upper teeth were pressed on her lower lip. I could see the edges, see too the facial muscles contracting the corners of her mouth. Still she looked up, but through eyelids that had closed. Hers was the rapt look I had read of and never seen. Then presently, with an intake of the breath, her eyes opened, she turned, left the vault, but stood by me while I recovered the padlock and fastened it again.

Finishing with it, I turned to her. She was putting on her glove and she finished with that before she spoke, preluding what she did say with a little motion, a gesture slight, perhaps involuntary, as though either expressing regret for what she was about to tell, or else disclaiming responsibility for it, a little gesture that I could interpret as I pleased.

"There is a man, tall, slim, handsome, with the brave air of a young prince marching past lifted swords out from a tapestry of the renaissance. Who is he?"

"Go on."

"He went to the coffin, swept heaped flowers from it, raised the top. He lifted it so readily it could not have been closed. She lay there white, motionless, dead. He bent over her, bent closer, kissed her, straightened, moved aside, moved back, bent to her again, put his arms about her, lifted her from the coffin, carried her out, carried her into the night. I saw no more. Who is he?"

"Austen."

"The man who was in love with her?"

"And with whom she was in love."

But I did not ask were she sure. I did not ask whether there were the chance of error. On the morning when she awoke in my workshop, I brought her coffee, and a cup. From that cup she had evolved a picture of me as a child, of my grandfather who was living then, of the room in which he sat. No, I did not ask were she sure. Nor did I marvel at the psychometry with which I was familiar. It was the ladder. It was for that I had brought her there. I merely exploded.

"So that is it then! But why did he carry her away? Where did he carry her? What did he do with her when he got her there? He could only have buried her again and not that it can make the slightest difference to her now, but when she lived, had she thought of herself as a corpse, an idea I am sure that never entered her head, but if it had she would have said: Put me with my people. Why then did he carry her away? Why did he profane her with kisses? What Bradish did was sacrilege. What Austen did seems to me worse. Why did he do it?"

"The magus said she was alive."

"But I saw her dead. You saw her dead. I remember your very words 'There she lay, white, motionless, dead.' "

She made another little gesture, just a motion with her hand.

"But because I can sometimes see things, it does not follow that I can explain them."

"No, of course not. Besides, in asking a string of imbecile questions, I was putting them to myself. I was trying to clarify my own ideas and I cannot, I'll be shot if I can."

She got away from it. "Don't you think we might give that poor man a sandwich or two? He drove so well."

In exploding the questions, I had been too full of them to notice, but I saw then that she looked completely fagged, as one must I suppose after such an expenditure of nervous force.

"We might have a few ourselves. I know I would say Thank you for a glass of brandy. But I would say it for you, you look utterly done."

None the less and however exhausted, she saw to it that Fletcher had his sandwiches and, with them, a glass of coffee and water.

Then, for a while, the basket between us, we sat on the steps of the house where she tormented a bit of bread. She was not hungry she said, except for cigarettes and as she sat and smoked I saw about her that air of languor I had noticed the first time I was at her flat and where she may have been psychometrising also.

In watching her, I stuffed and, at the same time, reviewed the picture series revealed by her latest tour de force. Charged with surmises, with hypotheses, with interrogations, the pictures passed before me. For my own edification I tried to imagine what had occurred before they were taken and what had happened afterward. Considered in the ensemble they were illustrations for an unwritten tale of Hoffman, etchings for some story lost or strayed from the portfolio of Villiers de l'Isle Adam, vignettes for an unpublished manuscript of Poe.

From them, I turned to her.

"Last night I dreamed of dancing devils and crouching ghouls. I don't wonder now. Austen cannot be plural but he is certainly singular. Singular! He is epic. The imagination reels from before him. For what lethean farewells, for what plutonian embraces, for what lemurianisms did he go to the vault that night? What drew him there and what having drawn him there, induced him to take her away? Barring the old tales of mediæval monasteries, there is nothing like it anywhere. Austen is not epic merely, he is unique. I should like to have a word with him. Bradish certainly will."

The sibyl sighed. "Poor man, his path has been hard and is to be harder yet. Heretofore it has been a path, a very uncertain path, but still a path on which there was light. Now it is a blind alley."

She paused, sighed again and stood up. "How wrong it is to stir the silent things that do not wish to speak."

Through the long green afternoon, back to the sordid city, back from sepulchral visions to the trivialities of the everyday, on we flew. We flew whirlingly, noisily and yet silent as the things that should not stir. Aly could not talk. One of the rare beings that never complain and always console, her head must have been splitting, but she said nothing of it. Only, she could not talk and, at her house, I thought her hand trembled when she reached it to tell me goodbye.

The white staring house came next. In the library there, Bradish resembled a great caged beast of the jungle, a wounded lion, with nothing for his mind to chew on, nothing except the marvel of the empty bier.

"Well?" he threw at me. "Find anything?"

"Everything. But before you can grasp it, I must tell you that Miss Bolton——"

"Damn Miss Bolton. What do you mean by everything?"

For that damn, ordinarily I would have damned him, but on the top branch of the tree where he prowled he needed indulgence. I let it go therefore and gave it to him.

"Austen took her."

Open-mouthed he fell back and clutched first at a chair, then at the table, all the hate, all the virulence, all the murderous jealousy of the male mounting and flaming in that spider on his face. Instantly hideous, he shook. Yet then, one has to recognise, that in beasts, in men, in women, jealousy, the most primitive of emotions, is the most blinding of all. At that moment, Bradish, mentally, was trampling Austen beneath his heels, gouging his eyes out with them, trampling him to death.

That sweet surcease not being practicable, at all events not then, he gave a sort of yelp, looked at me, I dare say without seeing me, and disdaining the bell, called mightily.

"Hey! Peters! Gedney!"

From the hall beyond, both hastened, Gedney with his catlike tread, Peters with his mask of wood.

Pointing a finger like a pistol at the latter,

"Er-er," he stuttered, "a Mr. Austen, he called here, left a card. Find it."

"Yes, sir," said the mask. "Thank you, sir."

"And Gedney," he called at the catman. "Fletcher waiting? Tell him to wait."

"I say, old chap," I put in, threshing about for what I could say. "You rather left this business to me. Now don't you think——"

"Think!" he roared. "I have done nothing but think. Now I shall act."

I ran a spoke in at him. "He won't be at home."

"I'll damn soon find out."

"If you please, sir."

Peters with a card on a tray, was presenting it.

Bradish snapped it up, snapped it back.

"Look him up in the telephone book. Say I am coming. Say James Bradish is coming at once. Say——"

"Yes," I threw in. "Tell him to clear the decks and prepare for action."

Fiercely he turned on me. "I wish——"

"So do I. I wish you had some sense. Can't you see that to get him, there will have to be a surprise attack. Have Peters tell him to call to quarters and he will be ready for you. Take him off his guard, you idiot."

The strategy was a douche. From before it he backed. He did not like it. I could see that. I could see that what he wanted was to sail right in, flags flying, trumpets blowing, batteries unmasked, fair play and be hanged to you. But into his dislike for any strategy the idea must have filtered that Austen himself was not playing fair, for suddenly he rounded and turned to Peters who had stood before us precisely as though he were waiting to hear whether he were to fetch sherry and bitters or tea and toast.

"Find out when he will be in."

"Thank you, sir."

"Now that is more like it," I said as the man withdrew, "and I'll go with you."

He turned again. "No you won't. He would think I had brought a husky along. I'll show him. I'll settle this business myself."

"But see here," I said, sparring for wind. "You know nothing about it. Hadn't you better have a few facts to go on first?"

"You said he took her. Did he or did he not?"

"Yes, but——"

"That's all I need."

"Except a gun."

The shot confused him. Ardently I wished that with chloroform I could dull the confusion into inaction.

Yet the chloroform I lacked, Peters serviceably, if metaphorically, produced.

"The gentleman is not at home, sir."

"Then find out when he will be."

"Yes, sir. I asked, sir. Mr. Austen's man said that Mr. Austen was expected at seven."

Bradish sat down and tapped at his teeth. The chloroform was acting and, in a moment, when the anæsthetist had gone, I took his place.

"It seems unfortunate, but you never can tell. If all of a sudden he marched in here, what could you do, what could you say? You could only shout, 'Where's my wife?' and have him shout, 'What do you mean?' There you would be. You couldn't tell him. You don't know. Don't you have any tea in the house? I have been at it for you all night and all day. I am starving and you lack the decency to offer me a crust. What a curse it is to have a friend like you."

He muttered and moved. Anæsthesia was not complete. But confusion was departing. The assassin was slinking away. Presently the normal being would return. Even then he was showing his head.

He touched a bell. "Tea!"

When presently it came, he drank two cups, with a drop of brandy in them. I was glad to see him at it. Tea clarifies, brandy strengthens, and force, though not too much of it, and sense, though not too much of that either, was what he needed most.

He put down the cup. "Suppose you tell me."

At that, I outlined Aly's grand act on the triple psychic trapese, omitting only the Stygian kiss which she had beheld there. The rest I gave him. The feat itself, the palpitant gyrations, may, or may not, have surprised him. He said nothing on the subject, nor, in regard to the abduction, did he say—and I thought it singularly heroic of him—that he had always suspected it. Quite the contrary. His first comment was that he had thought of everything but that.

His second comment seemed to me less commendable.

"Nelly was the lady of the steps. It was she whom Brevoort saw and to whom Miss Bolton spoke. She has taken her mother's name."

"But see here——" I began.

He checked me. "Do drop all that. It is the old song. I am sick of it, sick and tired of it and the variations. You were about to tell me she is dead. She is not dead. She is alive. I knew it from the start."

"But see here," I again began, renewing to him the objections to any such possibility which I had advanced to Aly at the manor.

He treated them like cobwebs. "That is not the point. The point is where did he hide her? Where has he been hiding her ever since?"

"You will have to ask him. But I doubt that she is hidden. The lady of the steps was not hidden, Brevoort's lady of the shop could come and go and Miss Fellowes had the freedom of the city. Then also Miss Fellowes had a man in tow, an old man. If Austen had her hidden she would not be about, nor would she be roaming the streets with any man, young or old. Besides this Miss Fellowes is probably alive, whereas——"

Impatiently Bradish shoved at his cup. "There you go again. But no matter. I'll know tonight."

"Yes, but softly does it. The stupidest thing you can do is to make a row."

"Ah, there at last you are right! When I first heard of the abduction, there might have been one, there would have been one, there could not have been anything else. But there will be none now. All the same, I'll make him disgorge."

That was reasonable enough. Anæsthesia had had its proper effect. I could safely leave him and, as I had troubles of my own, I got up to go.

He motioned at me. "I don't know but that——"

It broke off. In a moment he put it together again.

"See here. I don't care a tinker's curse what Austen thinks. This is a ticklish business. I may need a witness."

I sat down again.

"All right. Here he is. I'll go you. I wanted to from the start."

He looked at his watch.

"I can't sit here and twirl my thumbs. Suppose we start now. If he isn't in, we can camp on his doorstep."

I jumped up.

"Comeonski."

XXVII

At the house where, long since, before anything at all had happened, Austen had buttonholed me, I led the way up the stair to the floor where he lived and on which, facing the head of the stair, were two parallel flats.

Uncertainly before them I hesitated. Was Austen's the one on the left or at the right? In the one which was not his I had, on that remote visit, seen a scrubwoman. She may have eloped. She was no longer there. Both doors were closed. Moreover dusk had come. The landing was dark. If there were names on the doors, the names were invisible.

I turned to Bradish. "I don't know which is his."

He shoved me aside. "Potluck then."

Already he was feeling for the button. Whether he found it or not I do not know. Yet, instantly, the door swung back. There, his hat on, a stick in one hand, the other still on the knob, was the abductor.

From behind, a light in the hall showed Bradish's face without showing Austen's and whether he were surprised or not I could not tell. I am sure though he must have been. In any case, he did not betray it. He had himself in hand at once and devilish cool he was about it.

"Hello! Was it you that telephoned?"

That was his greeting, offhand as you please. But even as he spoke, Bradish was speaking to him.

"I want a word with you."

Austen stood aside. "How de do, Poole? Come in. That room there, if you don't mind."

Bradish went on. As I followed I saw a head poked suddenly through a doorway farther down the hall. It was Austen's gnome I thought. But now we were all in the sitting-room where I had been before. Apparently, nothing had happened to it. It had the same careless air. On the sideboard were decanters. On the table was the drooping green cover. As before, the cupboard door stood open.

Austen closed it. He had entered with us and, after closing the cupboard, indicated the decanters.

"Have a drink?"

Bradish took off his hat.

"Austen, where is my wife?"

Austen motioned.

"Do sit down."

I did. Bradish remained standing. He stood on one side of the table, Austen at the other. On the table was an ivory paper-cutter. Austen reached for it and said:

"I don't know why you ask me that."

Bradish pulled at his gloves. "You know perfectly and I will thank you to tell me."

Austen looked at the ivory knife, then at me. From me he looked at Bradish.

"Your wife is dead."

Bradish had removed a glove. He struck the table with it.

"See here, I have reason to believe that after the funeral you entered the vault and abducted her."

Austen threw down the knife and turned again to me. It was as though he were saying: "You hear that! He's crazy."

Bradish may have so interpreted it. Resting one hand on the table, he leaned forward.

"I propose to get at the bottom of this. I don't mean to be more disagreeable than I can help, but——"

Austen interrupted. "You needn't apologise. Besides, the only place I know where you can get the information you ask is the bureau of vital statistics."

Impatiently Bradish straightened.

"That has nothing to do with it."

Austen smiled, or affected to smile. "Come now. You ought to see that it has everything to do with it. If you take a look, you will find there, entered and filed, the certificate of your wife's decease."

Bradish flushed. I could see he was trying to hold in and I could see too he was having a job of it.

"I don't want that. What I want is to know what became of her after you abducted her."

Austen took up the paper-cutter again. I thought he was stumped but he wasn't.

"Whom do you mean by her?" he surprisingly asked.

For the first time Bradish raised his voice.

"Here! Don't quibble. You know I mean my wife."

Austen made a pass with the knife.

"It is hardly a quibble to repeat that she is dead."

Bradish was looking him straight in the eyes, he was looking straight at Bradish and he added:

"I can tell you nothing else."

At that Bradish sort of nodded. "Very good then. If you won't answer me as man to man, you will answer me as defendant to plaintiff."

Austen raised his eyebrows. Perhaps he did not understand. I am sure that I did not.

"You may not know it," Bradish continued, "but I have leased the manor. The vault is my property and you effected a felonious entry into it."

It was a false move. A threat is always that. Besides how was any action possible? The jury were yet to be born that would accept Aly's story. At once I started to interrupt but, before I could, Austen was shrugging his shoulders.

"The sooner I have your complaint, the sooner you will have my answer."

Bradish put on his hat. "Is that your last word?"

Austen turned to me.

"Can't you help a bit, Poole? You were at the funeral. You saw Mrs. Bradish in her coffin."

"Yes," I answered, "but I have seen her since, or at least——"

I was about to qualify it and say if I had not seen her I had seen her ghost, instead of which I screamed. I saw something else and, at what I saw, it may be that my hair stood on end for I could feel my flesh creep.

There, before me, before Bradish, but not before Austen whose back was turned, was Nelly Chilton.

I say Nelly Chilton. It was she or her ghost. The door of the cupboard had opened and there she stood.

A second only. Clothed sepulchrally in white, instantly she vanished.

In screaming, I jumped and so violently that I overturned the chair. Stupidly, I stopped to raise it. It took but a moment, yet as I started and screamed, Bradish cleared the table, swung himself clear over it and dashed into the cupboard in which she—or it—had disappeared.

I had just a glimpse of Austen turning and looking amazedly after him. He had not seen the phantom but I had and, with no conscious motive, yet propelled, I now think, by sheer nervous excitement, I bolted, flung myself in the cupboard.

There was no one there!

I heard, or thought I heard something, the sound of an object that had fallen, but I was too rattled to locate it, too confused to be sure.

On either side coats were hanging. At the back there were more, but of Bradish not a sign, of the phantom, not a trace. Save for myself and the hanging garments in which feverishly I felt, save too for the ceiling and floor, save these things and myself, the cupboard was empty. There was no one. Together the quick and the dead had gone.

My forehead was wet, my hands were moist. I got out my handkerchief and reentered the room.

That also was empty.

"Well," I nervously mumbled, "I'll be damned!"

XXVIII

On the table was the paper-cutter. It was not very helpful and I got down and looked under the table. For all I found I might as well have looked out of the window. Besides it was a bit awkward. While I was still on my knees and before I could rise, the door, not of the cupboard but of the room, opened and Austen's man came in.

"I am taking a walk," I told him.

"Exactly, sir."

He spoke as though crawling about on all fours was perfectly natural and I stood up.

"I was looking for Mr. Austen. I will thank you to tell him I am still here."

Civilly he considered me.

"I will see, sir, but I think Mr. Austen just went out."

"Out!" I repeated.

But he too had gone.

I sat down and tried to pull myself together. In spite of the ease with which I had invented a promenade, I was unstrung, nervous as a witch, dripping with perspiration, and, as I raised my hand to wipe my face, it did what no hand of mine had ever done, it shook.

I got up, went to the sideboard, helped myself from a decanter, spilling a little of the contents, and heard the glass click against my teeth.

This won't do, I reflected.

To steady my nerves, I evolved a few platitudes, among others that, if I had seen a ghost, I ought to applaud my luck instead of being alarmed by it.

The comfort of that was mediocre. For, admitting the ghost, what had become of Bradish? His dematerialisation was a phenomenon for which nothing in occultism had prepared me. I was necessarily aware, as everyone else is, that, by virtue of certain austerities, an adept can disentangle himself from the body and swim into the astral, but, even so, he has to leave his body behind and, so far as I could discover, Bradish had not left so much as his hat. On the other hand there are, or there used to be, stories of people that had the gift of becoming invisible. But the precedent helped me no more than the paper-cutter. Bradish had no such gift.

I peered at the cupboard. For all I knew to the contrary there might be some power there, a power of which I had never heard, some force unimaginable and inexplicable that had whisked him away. But whisked him where? It would have to land him somewhere. It could not gobble him up.

These platitudes, however long in the telling, came at me in flashes. They occupied but a moment and in peering at the cupboard I approached it and reached in a tentative hand, bracing myself to snatch it back at any snatching forward. Then, conscious presently that it was unmolested, that there was no attempt to whisk me, I put a foot in.

Except for such light as came from the window behind me, it was dark and I lit a match. I could see then that on either side were wooden bars from which, on hangers, the coats hung. At the back there were hooks and more coats. As for the floor, I could feel it. It was unyielding as rock. I looked up. The ceiling, obviously there, was out of reach. Then the match burned my fingers. I dropped it and felt behind the coats, not to find Bradish, I knew he was not there, but with some imbecile idea of testifying afterward that I had done so.

By this time I was relatively collected, reasonably cool, yet conscious of an odd feeling in my head. It was as though a little top were spinning there. With that consciousness, memory raised a latch. I was back in Mayfair, where a woman was telling me of some friend, a typical Englishman who, for a bet, had passed the night in a house said to be haunted, and who, the next morning, was taken from it raving mad. Then at once logic raised another latch. I realised that for that Englishman to go mad he must have been confronted by some unimaginable horror. Confronting me were coats. The deduction followed. Nothing very horrifying there. On the other hand there was something so baffling that it amounted nearly to the same thing and in view of that top I wondered if my brain was about to tip. Before it could, I jumped. I jumped as a cat does at the unexpected. I had heard somebody, or something, and in jumping I wheeled. Another awkward moment. There again was that gnome.

"I was looking for Mr. Bradish," I told him.

"Exactly, sir."

On this occasion he spoke as though his master's friends invariably played hide and seek whenever they came to see him.

"Where is he?" I added.

Respectfully he considered me. "Where is who, sir?"

"Mr. Bradish?"

"I don't think I know the gentleman, sir."

"You were in the hall when I came in here with Mr. Austen, weren't you?"

"In the hall, yes, sir."

"There was nother man with us. That was Mr. Bradish. Have you any idea where he is?"

He wiped his civil mouth. "Excuse me, sir, I didn't see any other gentleman."

I had abandoned the cupboard. I was standing by the table and I had taken up the paper-cutter which I was trying to use as a fan. But at that I dropped it.

"Look here," I said. "I am speaking of a man who came in here a few minutes ago with Mr. Austen and myself. Mr. Austen opened the door for us. You must have seen him."

"Yes, sir. Mr. Austen was going out."

"I am not speaking of Mr. Austen. I am speaking of the man who came in with me. You saw him."

"I can't rightly say I did, sir."

"But you saw me come in?"

"Yes, sir. I saw you, sir. You are the gentleman that was under the table."

"Then do you mean to stand there and tell me that apart from Mr. Austen and myself, you saw no one come in?"

"Yes, sir; no, sir."

I snapped at him, "What do you mean by no, sir; yes, sir?"

But his civility remained unaffected.

"I don't mean nothing, sir. You asked me about another gentleman. I didn't see no other gentleman."

He is an idiot, I hopelessly decided. But at once, catching myself up, I smiled at him.

"Have you ever seen a—er—a ghost here?"

He backed. His mouth twitched. But he was still civil.

"Will you be waiting for Mr. Austen, sir?" In backing, he turned. At the door he turned again.

"If you don't mind, sir, I have work to do."

The hall took him. Once more I was alone in this room in which a vision had appeared and a mortal had disintegrated, a room from which, in fear of me, a gnome had fled.

I sat down. That top must have doubled itself. It seemed to me that two of them were spinning just beneath the pineal gland. Joined to that was the sensation which one has after a white night, the sensation that the brain won't act. I told myself that I if could put my head under a shower, it would help. But I did not want to go ferreting about for the bathroom. I knew the gnome would find me at it and, however accustomed he might be to the vagaries of Austen's guests, few of them I imagined could come there to bathe. None the less I rather fancied that if when stripped and in the tub I had told him I was expecting my grandmother, his "Exactly, sir" would be as prompt and as civil as before.

At the picture, nervously I laughed. I had laughed at nothing and what better reason can one have? Then again I laughed, this time at the little gnome for running away. He must have thought me cracked, that is if he thought at all. But perhaps I am, I immediately reflected. Perhaps everything that has occurred has only seemed to occur. Even so, I told myself, people are not mad because they see things that do not exist, they are only mad if they believe in them and I won't. Yet how vain that resolution was! I could not make myself believe that Bradish had not come with me. I could not pretend that I had not seen him disappear. The vision that had evaporated with him might be a phantom and I was willing to let it go at that. But there was nothing phantasmal about Bradish. None the less the gnome had not seen him at all!

But that is impossible. I told myself. Either he lied or Austen coached him or——

My mind shot back. I reconstructed our entry. Bradish, lordly as usual, had marched in first. I had followed. In following I had seen the servant's head poked from a doorway farther down the hall. Probably, a moment earlier, he had seen his master about to leave. Then, hearing voices, he had looked out again, but not until Bradish had entered this room.

This is it, I reflected, but, I had to ask myself, what did it matter? The complex problem remained. How and where had Bradish gone?

Clearly he was not under the table, or secreted in the cupboard, and I wondered whether he could have levitated himself through the ceiling. There was a medium — whom Browning threw rhymes at — who could perform that little trick, or at all events something similar. But, I had to realise, Bradish was no more capable of anything of the kind than he was of composing a ballet. Even otherwise, what object could he have had? He had come with me to this shop, solely that he might bully Austen. In that he had failed, or been about to fail, when he flung himself over the table and jumped into the fourth dimension.

What kind of behavior was that? Patently, it had amazed Austen, as well it might, and the memory of it so angered me that if, at that moment, Bradish had popped back, I would have up and struck him.

No such luck, however, and for the time being at any rate, no possibility of it.

As that conclusion reached me, a query followed. If there were no chance of his popping then, when would he pop and would he ever? Had he definitely deserted this world?

"But that is madness!" I exclaimed aloud.

At once, to put an accent on it, if one were needed, I saw that gnome peering in at me from the door. A moment only. The door closed. More frightened perhaps than before, again the harmless wretch had fled.

I could not blame him. First he had found me on all fours; afterward in the cupboard. On the first occasion I told him I was taking a walk. On the second, I had insisted he had seen what he had not seen and I had enquired about a ghost. Now, a moment since, he had heard me talking to myself, talking of the madness which he must have suspected. Instantly, I could hear the clanging ambulance, feel the strait-jacket, see the psychopathic ward!

Unstrung as I was, it alarmed me. I sprang up, grabbed my hat and stick and with the idea of doing something, of going somewhere, of enlisting somebody's aid, I hurried on and out and down the stair to the street where, comfortably, Fletcher waited.

I had forgotten him utterly and said as much.

"Thank heaven you are here! Have you seen Mr. Bradish?"

He touched his cap. "Why no, sir. Not since he went in with you."

"You are sure he hasn't come out?"

"Positive, sir."

"Fletcher, look here. He has disappeared."

His eyes bulged. "Mr. Bradish has?"

"We went in to see a man and while Mr. Bradish was talking to him all of a sudden he wasn't there. I don't know what to do."

Fletcher's eyes bulged wider. But any hypothesis save one, that I was drunk, was clearly beyond him. I saw it and motioned.

"Here, let's go to Dr. Cally. He may tell us how to act."

On the way, I thought of Aly and wondered whether what she had seen, or thought she had seen, were true, feeling, as I wondered, that it were better if it was not; though better still, better far it would be if, when Bradish entered the vault, he had found his bride there, found her lover with her, found him dead, found her dead, found them dead together, and when, ragingly, he had tried to tear them apart, they had crumbled to dust before him. A climax such as that would, it seemed to me, be more fatefully poetic than the melodrama which Aly had related.

But now we were at Cally's, who, it appeared, was out. It was that nigger of his who told me and surly enough he was about it. He did not know where Dr. Cally was, he knew nothing and he looked ready and eager to slam the door in my face.

Fortunately, I know just how to tame a brute of that kind and, quick as a wink, I pulled a roll of bills straight at him.

"Throw out your hand."

The effect was magical. Instantly a sullen lout became all teeth and eyes. In his erebean face I could even detect gleams of intelligence.

"Find him. Tell him it is a matter of life and death. I will be at the Buck Club."

Confident then, that unless Cally had also evaporated, he would shortly materialise, I flew down the steps, hopped in the car and told Fletcher to drive to the club where, when presently I entered it, I ran around like a chicken with its head off.

In the main room I saw no one to whom I could turn and, leaving it, I did what I rarely do, I looked in my letter box. There was a chance, slim enough in all conscience, yet still a chance that from some recondite region, Bradish might be trying to communicate with me.

The box was tolerably stuffed, but mainly with circulars from among which I sifted two letters, one of which contained a request for my autograph. I dropped it. Immediately a boy in a slashed waistcoat sprang from nowhere, picked it up and gave it back to me. I dropped it again and put my foot on it. The other letter was from my publishers who said that five thousand was offered for the picture rights of my last iniquity and would I see them about it?

Mere starvation wages, I thought and thought no more about it, for the time being that is, and hurried on through the billiard room to the bar where there were two men whose names I might have remembered but whose faces were blanks.

One of them had the agreeable air of having just stepped from a bandbox. He invited me to drink.

I ordered vichy.

The other man, who reeked of polo, addressed me in a throaty voice.

"Whatcher up to now, Poole? Writin' somethin' noo?"

I barked at him. "Writing something? I am living something, something that would bowl you over, bore holes in you and stuff you full of nightmare. Do you know Bradish?"

"The spider chap? What of him?"

I gulped the vichy. "He was with me one moment and vanished the next. Is Brevoort here?"

Lightly, with a forefinger, the other man motioned. "There's a boy trying to speak to you."

I looked about. The slashed waistcoat had approached.

"Dr. Kelly, sir. He's in the hall."

Without one of the amenities of life, I abandoned those men and hurried on and out to where Cally stood.

He plucked at his beard. "You've been corrupting my servant. He says you gave him thirty dollars."

"See here! Bradish has disappeared. You and I have got to find him."

He adjusted his glasses. "Disappearances are deceptive. How did it happen?"

"I went with him to call on a man and, while there, a ghost appeared and Bradish jumped into the fourth dimension."

"Where did these commonplace incidents occur?"

"At Austen's."

"Was Bradish acquainted with the ghost?"

"It was Nelly Chilton's."

Mephistophelianly he eyed me, not as though he were questioning my sanity, but rather as though he had always thought me demented.

"You saw it too then? Where did it come from?"

"A cupboard, and look here, no sooner did it appear than it disappeared and Bradish disappeared also."

"In the cupboard?"

"Didn't you hear me? I dashed in there the next instant. There was nobody there, nobody, nothing, coats only."

He lit one of his vile cigars.

"Poole, always I have admired you. But never before have you been as brilliant. Personally, fool that I am, I have regarded the fourth dimension as an example of mathemathical hysterics. But to you it is a cupboard full of old clothes. That is what I call originality. Now——"

I grabbed him by the arm. "Stow all that. We have got to get back there and——"

He shook me off. "If you take my advice, you will leave things as they are."

I could have torn my hair, torn his. Again I grabbed him.

"I don't want your advice. If I had elephantiasis I wouldn't take it. I want your help."

"Why don't you knock me down?"

He said it with a hateful affection of patience, the resigned patience of the long suffering, and it infuriated me.

"I'll be shot if I don't, if you won't come along."

"A lamb led by a lion," I heard him protest at the doorkeeper who regarded us both with professional stolidity.

But at last I had him in the car and after directing Fletcher, I went over it again, but this time in full.

"What do you make of it?" I concluded. "To me it is a nightmare."

"Can you keep a secret?"

"Yes.

"Well, I can't. Your nightmare is a mare's nest."

"How a mare's nest?"

"You are a novelist, I believe."

"You mean I have invented all this?"

"No, that would require ability. You have merely twisted things crooked and then frightened yourself with them."

"Yes," I admitted. "That is only commonsense. The whole affair has rattled me so that I can't think straight."

"Totally unnecessary to tell me that, Poole. Moreover, if I were you, I wouldn't talk of commonsense. It might seem boastful."

I found no adequate retort. Besides, what he said was natural enough. He did not believe me. How could he? How could anyone believe my cock-and-bull story? How for that matter could I prove it? I had no witness except Austen, who might deny everything, and that gnome who had not seen Bradish at all.

But now the car was veering. Into the street of obscure calamities it swam and, at the Leah-like house, we alighted.

XXIX

In the hall, on the way up, Cally looked at his watch and blandly, with his abominable unconcern, remarked that he had an appointment at nine.

"At nine!" I exclaimed. "It must be midnight now."

"Two minutes after eight precisely."

I stared. It was my turn. I did not believe him. It was incredible that all that had happened could have been comprised into an hour's space.

"Seeing more ghosts?" he obligingly enquired.

But now we were on the landing above. It was darker than before, yet, without apparent effort, he found the button.

The gnome opened. Cally said something, asking for Austen I think, and I went on with him into the sitting-room where the evaporation had occurred.

Previously, it had not been lighted. It was then and Cally indicated the cupboard of which the door had been closed.

"Is that your fourth dimension?"

Suddenly I felt very tired. Joined to the fatigue was a sense of helplessness. I felt that Cally would be of no use whatever and I cursed myself for not having thought to subvention Aly. She could have psychometrised the cupboard and told me what happened when Bradish disappeared.

From the chair on which I had dropped, I looked about. Cally had opened the cupboard and I saw him go in. Then I lost sight of him and I wondered—though with that indifference which lassitude brings—whether he too had been whisked away.

Yet almost at once he showed himself and beckoned. I got up and went to him. Preceding me, he re-entered the cupboard and pushed at the back. Silently it parted. An unimagined door had opened. I was looking into another room.

A foot or two beyond was a trunk and beside it a hat. I saw that, saw too something else. Across the room was another door. As I looked it also opened.

From behind it a face, ageless and sexless, peered and I heard a sexless and ageless voice.

"In Christian charity, will you go?"

But the voice, however unearthly, was human. The room into which I looked was real. Then at once I was in darkness. Cally had withdrawn his hand. Instantly the cupboard's back exit had closed and I realised how it was that when Bradish dashed in there, I had missed him by not more than a hair.

"There is your fourth dimension. Take a jump in yourself. If you don't find Bradish, it is because he has gone. I am going too. Some folks have their living to make."

It was Cally of course. I had no answer for him, nor any surprise at his familiarity with the lay of the land. I took it that he had stumbled on it by accident, as I might have, if I had been less rattled when Bradish disappeared. Then, at once, with a push of my own, I passed through.

At the right was a sofa, behind it a window. Opposite the sofa, a yard or two away, was a table. On it was a book and above it a light. Nearby were two chairs. Save for a small rug, that trunk and the hat, the floor was bare. These things I absorbed at a glance. What alone among them detained me was the sofa.

There sat Bradish. He was holding his leg as though it were a guitar.

The attitude exasperated me. If a last straw were needed there it was and I yelped.

"What are you doing?"

He motioned at the opposite wall. "Nelly is in there. I would have had her, I nearly had her, she was just ahead of me, making for that door, when I tripped and fell."

It was too much and I let go.

"You are always tumbling over yourself and always at the wrong moment. It is a pity you did not break your neck."

He grimaced. "I nearly did. I fell over that trunk and twisted my bad ankle. The pain must have knocked me. When I came to, I was on the floor."

I gave it to him again.

"I thought you were dead, confound you. When I saw what you saw, I sprang in the air and screamed like an octopus, but you dashed in here and fainted from sheer bravado. Come along out of this."

"Not till I see Nelly."

"You intend to stay here for the rest of your born days?"

"I intend to get at Nelly if I have to break down every door in the place."

"Nice blackguardly program."

He threw out his chin. "Kid gloves, eh? I have worn them too long."

As he spoke, he lowered his leg, got to his feet, winced visibly and as visibly stared, not at me, at something or someone behind me.

I turned. In the doorway, through which that unearthly face had peered, stood a man whom I remembered having seen at the funeral. Obviously a man of the world and not of its neighbourhood, as some worldly men are, he had that air of extreme distinction which certain New Yorkers used to possess and which now is gone forever. Another lost art.

He bowed to Bradish. "My name is Chilton. He turned to me. "Mr. Poole, I believe. Won't you both be seated?"

There could be but one Chilton—Nelly's father. There he stood. Bradish sank back on the sofa. I took a chair. There were but two chairs. He took the other.

"Mr. Bradish," he resumed. "It was my intention to call on you tomorrow, for in returning here, I hardly expected to find you. Austen, who went in search of me, told me of your visit. He told me also what you said. In what manner you discovered what you did discover is incomprehensible. It is also unfortunate. He paused and continued: "What I have to say to you intimately concerns my daughter."

I made for the door. "Mr. Chilton, I am your very obedient servant."

At once he protested. "No, no, I beg of you. Please do not go. At least for a moment. I——"

"Your daughter," Bradish heatedly cut in, "is in the next room. She——"

"My daughter is dead," the old man interrupted.

At that the lion roared. "She isn't! She can't be! She never has been! I don't believe it. I've seen her."

Cheerlessly the old man eyed him. "When you saw her she told you she was dead. She spoke the truth. Civilly she has no existence."

"What do you mean, sir?" Bradish cried at him.

The old man's right hand had been ungloved. Slowly he removed the other glove.

"What the law is here I do not know, but I do know that on the Continent a death certificate, properly entered, is incapable of revision."

The spider then seemed to be digging into Bradish's face.

"It cannot be that you propose to stand on that?"

The old man turned to me. "I stand on nothing." He turned to Bradish. "None the less——"

"What?"

"I ask you to relinquish her."

Bradish glared. The expression is cheap. I can think of none other that is as adequate.

"Not to her lover!" The five syllables he tore from his mouth and flung them so violently that the spider seemed about to fling itself with them. Nor had he done. With the same violence he gestured at the cupboard. "In that room in there I surprised her going to him."

But the violence served only to heighten that air of distinction.

"Mr. Bradish, no man should speak, as you have spoken, to a girl's father. Yet I do not venture to reprove you. Presently you will reprove yourself. Meanwhile you will allow me to correct you. When you surprised my daughter in the adjoining room, it was in search of me she was going. Since Austen first took this apartment for me, very often I have sat there, usually with him, but also with Dr. Cally, who has been attending her."

And that, I reflected, is how tricky little Cally knew the lay of the land.

"As Dr. Cally is aware, though you are not, she is dying. The dying, Mr. Bradish, do not act in the manner which you have asserted."

Again the wounded lion roared.

"Dying! It is impossible. Only a while ago, she——"

Protestingly the old man had motioned. "I must ask you to hear me. For some time I was abroad. It was only a few days before my daughter's marriage that I returned to this country. She was then interested in Austen as she always had been. To my knowledge she had never looked, as the phrase is, at another man. Her marriage to you was therefore a surprise to me. She has since told me that her mother so represented matters with which you are familiar, that she had no other recourse. Mr. Poole, will you care to smoke?"

In speaking he produced a cigarette case, which he offered to me, offered to Bradish, who shook his head. I thanked him and took one. He also took one and resumed.

"You will appreciate in a moment why I enter into circumstances which, without reflecting in any way on you, are painful to us both. But then the whole matter is painful, far more so than you know. Have you a match, Mr. Poole?"

I struck one which I gave him. He thanked me, lighted his cigarette and motioned at Bradish.

"I love Nelly. She is the one human being I do love. A sacrifice for her would not be a sacrifice, it would be a joy. I can make none. There is none to be made. You ask if I proposed to stand on the death certificate. I can only stand and look on, stand and wring my hands."

The gloves which he held he dropped, bent over and recovered them.

"Mr. Bradish, you married a girl whom you have lost through no fault of yours, through no fault of hers. Be good enough to keep that in mind. But you have lost her as I have, as we all have, for we have lost her forever."

Then again the wounded lion roared.

"It is preposterous! I don't believe it!"

The atmosphere was stifling. Charged with grief, with anger, with suspense, it had us all by the throat. I was about to go and throw open the window, but the old man was speaking.

"Civilly she is dead and nominally——"

He broke off. For a moment, resolutely he closed his mouth. Then at once, with a gesture of excuse, he looked at Bradish.

"I again ask you to relinquish her."

Again Bradish flung it at him. "And I repeat, I will not relinquish my wife to her lover."

Mr. Chilton looked at me and though years have gone by since then, that look seems to me still the most despairful that I ever saw. But precisely as he had mastered himself a moment earlier, he mastered himself then. The air of extreme distinction returned and it was actually with a smile, the smile of a man of the world to whom nothing is important, that he turned anew to Bradish.

"I fear you will have to relinquish her to her lover, for her lover is Christ."

Even then I did not get it. Nor did Bradish. He blazed.

"Either you are insane, sir, or I am."

"No, not that," the old man still with that smile replied. "But you are wretched and angry and I am wretched and sad. Let me tell you. During the funeral, my daughter's consciousness returned. But with that consciousness was another, perhaps the most pitiful and perhaps, too, the most horrible that a mortal can experience. She heard the service, smelt the tuberoses, knew where she was, knew that she was assisting at her own funeral and she could not speak, she could not stir. Catalepsy in paralysing the nerve centres had made her rigid. She was unable to move an eyelid. Perhaps you can imagine how she felt. I do not want to."

The smile had gone. Cheerlessly he continued.

"That night, as you have since discovered, Austen rescued her. But the rescue itself was entirely fortuitous. He had previously arranged that the coffin should not be closed and that arrangement, which had in view a last visit to her, was merely one of sentiment. But when he saw her, when he touched her, it seemed to him that she could not be dead and he brought her to me here and sent for Dr. Cally."

"Yes," I said, and I said it only for the sake of saying something. "Cally told me of a case of catalepsy. He did not tell me whose."

"We begged him not to. Meanwhile, after he had revived her, she said she saw the light. She——"

He broke off. Again the room was being invaded, this time by Austen, who nodded at us and seated himself on the trunk.

The old man glanced at him, turned, straightened and looked at Bradish, and what a look!

"Legally my daughter is dead. Nominally she is dying. A Sister of Mercy is with her now."

The face in the doorway, I thought.

With that look, he was adding: "Yesterday my daughter was received in the Catholic Church. Shortly, so far as the world is concerned, she will be buried from us all. Will you say, for your saying it may give her an added peace, will you say you relinquish her now before she begins the novitiate that ends with the veil?"

It was too suffocating. On the table at my elbow was a book, a breviary as I then discovered. But the lines were blurred. I could not see them. What I did see was that girl, the cited beauty, bidding farewell to love, to life; taking the black veil which is a white shroud. The picture was the most desolate I had ever seen. Yet, at once, beneath it, those words, which are so curiously radiant, shimmered like thin flames: "Behold, I make all things new!"

For her, yes; not in this life certainly, but in the next and probably in her lives to follow, all things broken would be made complete and she would find again things vanished.

But for Bradish, what could life hold except the tantalian torture of knowing her alive and yet dead to him? Again I wondered what sin, enigmatic, anterior, unknown, could have thrust him in those halls where expiation would walk ever at his side, sit with him when he sat and, in sleep, lie with him when sleep he could.

I turned to look at him. He was no longer where he had been. He had gone to the window where he stood, his back turned, looking out, but at what? What did he see there? It must have been something very penetrant for in a moment, when he turned, the spider that had been digging and tearing at his face had yellowed and the face itself was drawn and grey.

From the night, age may have reached and touched him. Yet also, another presence may have touched not him alone but his soul. So I thought. I was entirely in error. At the moment I did not realise that, only that he was saying something, saying it in a voice that rang.

"All right, I will, and I am glad of the chance."

What on earth did he mean, I wondered. In the interim I had lost the connection. I think the others had also. They were looking at him, as I was, in vague surmise.

But at once and to my disgust he became sententious.

"The world is very narrow."

Martin Tupper, I thought.

Immediately he retrieved himself. "Let the world be her convent."

Where did he get that? I asked myself. It is too good for him.

"I shall ask," he was adding, "that we be divorced."

"You will ask in vain then," I called at him. "Yesterday, as I understood from Mr. Chilton, Mrs. Bradish joined the Church. The Church does not recognise divorce."

Impatiently he gestured. "The Church can grant an annulment."

Austen sprang up, "Bradish——"

"We have been man and wife in name only," he uninterruptedly continued. "In the existing circumstances that might not be enough. But there are antecedent circumstances that will be."

"Bradish——" Austen again began.

"I married her under false pretences."

"Jim!" I protested.

"Not intentionally. I was unaware they were false. But the fact remains that she became my wife because of conditions which she was unaware had ceased to exist; that is, if they ever existed. If only for that I cannot do otherwise than release her. But there is another reason, a personal reason which, when Mr. Chilton entered here, I meant to state but which is superfluous now. As it is she can have the marriage annulled and return, not to death, but to life. I wish her joy."

"Bradish," Austen began anew and this time succeeded in saying it, "it is what I expected of you."

He might, I thought, have said less. But I thought, too, he could not have said more.

Bradish made no reply. He did not even look at him. He ignored him completely and that attitude, it seemed to me—and how erroneously!—was induced neither by jealousy nor callousness, but by that detachment which is part of the higher faith, and a line, less radiant than that other but more beautiful came back to me: "Near to renunciation, very near, dwelleth eternal peace."

"Now, I'll go," he abruptly added.

Mr. Chilton had stood up.

"Goodnight," he rather cavalierly concluded.

I had gone on to the trunk where I got his hat which I gave him and, Mr. Chilton preceding us, we went on to the door of this flat where the old man, as he opened it, bowed gravely.

In the car, Bradish turned to me.

"I will go to Spain with you next week."

"You will go as a grandee then. You have done a noble act."

He twisted his eyebrows at me. "Rubbish! When I came to in that ghastly room I determined to get at that girl if I broke down every door in the place."

"So you said."

"And I meant it. But it was not to carry her off. It was to tell her what I thought of her. I would have told Chilton, told him to tell her, told him when he came in the room, if he had not infuriated me at the very start."

He broke off and angrily continued, "When I keeled over, she never turned, she never stopped. For all of her I might have died there. Afterward, when I sat on that confounded sofa, I realised what must have been unconsciously germinating in me ever since that day in the Park when she said she was dead."

Surprisedly I looked at him. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that I hate her. It was that that I wanted to say."

Well, after all, it was only natural. His torture had been excessive. The screws had been turned too tight. Besides, hatred is but love reversed.

Before I could say so, up again ran the Spanish flag.

"Yes," I said. "But you will have to loan me Peters for an hour."

That hour never came.

XXX

THE morrow was amazing as every morrow should be, but, in the instance, shuttled with a vast surprise which I, who had promenaded from the unexpected to the unawaited, had entirely omitted to foresee.

The surprise, which battened on me in a lift and multiplied itself elsewhere, began, after the manner of great events, in a commonplace fashion.

I was on my way to sign the picture contract at my publishers when I ran into Aly. As I had all that had occurred to tell her, I asked her to come with me and go afterward to the sorcerer's for his brews.

But though, good sort that she was, she consented, she did not see her dear Mr. Delmonico that day, while I beheld what is far rarer than any sorcerer, the complex phenomenon of dual personality.

Meanwhile, we had entered the junior partner's office. At the moment, he was elsewhere. But Miss Judson, his secretary, was there, and there also was a lanky young man, the portrait on foot of a greenhorn.

Then, as Aly and I waited, he addressed me, asking whether Broadway were uptown or down, and I was informing him when the junior member entered behind me with a "Ha!"

To which he added, "I see you know Bil Sayers."

The depth of the sanctuary is the place for idols. Invisible, secreted from vulgar eyes, there they should remain. The same may be true of authors. Yet, while I do not recall that I had evolved any particular image of Bil Sayers, I am sure I never imagined he would resemble a lout. I glanced at Aly. She also seemed perplexed. There goes her idol, too, I thought, when another incident occurred.

The junior member was old and stout. The senior member was young and slim. At that moment, his hat on, a cigar in his mouth, in he marched. In all the vanishing acts that prestidigitateurs perform, I have seen nothing more instantaneous than the manner in which that cigar disappeared. No dancing master

I ever heard of could have been quicker with his hat.

It was not for me of course, nor even for the lanky genius, that these immediate feats of haute école were performed. He was not looking at either of us. He was looking at Aly, and a proper tribute to her beauty it was.

But Miss Judson had come to me with the contracts and I went forward to a desk where, with the junior member facing me, I sat down.

"Our London house has particularly requested the autograph. It is for the Queen. I will have a Dawn in at once. Miss Judson!"

It was the senior member's voice and Ho! I thought, how tickled the Queen would be if she could see the lovely lad.

Then Aly's voice reached me, though occupied as I at once became with a tortuous clause of the contract, what she said I did not hear, and subconsciously I fancied she must be expressing—yet how far more graciously!—precisely what I thought.

Then I signed and the old junior member told me the cheque would be mailed that night.

The entire transaction had not taken more than a moment or so, but when I got up the young senior member had disappeared, as his cigar had, gone, I took it, for the book. In the window the genius stood on one foot, picking his teeth. I thought the attitude excessive and Aly must have thought so also. She was pink.

Nodding at the junior member, I passed out with her to the hall where, while waiting for the lift, I condoled.

"Sorry I saw him, aren't you?"

At that moment Miss Judson flew up.

"Shall I mail it to you, mem?"

Of all the gentle people I ever met, Aly Bolton is, I think, the gentlest. Yet instantly, for some undivinable reason, she assumed the expression of a tigress.

But a descending cage has stopped and into it we got, while Miss Judson called:

"It's for the Queen, mem, did they tell you?"

The steel door slammed. Down we sank.

"What the dickens do you care?" I muttered at her. Pink before, she was pinker then.

Nor could she have heard me, for as we reached the street she said and said it, too, with flashing eyes:

"It is outrageous. They promised no one should know."

Imbecile that I was, not until that moment had it dawned upon me. But in that moment, dawn came, dawn went. It was day. With its full light in my eyes, I blinked. Then I laughed.

"You're a sneaky little thing."

A vagabond cab was passing and I raised my stick.

But no. She did not want to drive. She did not want elixirs. As for the old junior member and the young senior, never would she put her foot in their shop again, while, as for the Queen, well, I was glad Broadway was not Pall Mall.

Never had I seen her angry before. Never have I seen her angry since. Vexed, yes; annoyed also, but angry, no, and I have regretted it. An exquisite girl in a tempest—what more appetising sight would you have?

"And I am not a sneaky little thing," she snapped at me. "And it is none of your business anyway."

I have found it politic to agree with anyone, no matter whom, about anything, no matter what, and I applied that myrrh and cassia.

"Of course it is none of my business. Moreover, decent people never hear anything that was not intended for them. It was sneaky of me to listen. But never mind. Your shameful secret is safe. No one shall know from me that you are the great Bil Sayers. I won't have the chance to tell. I am leaving this part of the planet."

She cocked the seashell of an ear. "What?"

In the tumult of the jostling street, it was not possible to go into it then, nor did I attempt to until we reached her flat where her "Oh! Oh's!" at my account of all that had happened continued until the account was ended when, clapping her hands, she cried:

"Those two will be happy ever after."

That, I think, set the tune.

What I said, what she said, what afterward occurred when the brave, foolish words, Forever, Never, were uttered by us both, all that has nothing to do with the present document except, that in enabling me to build an immediate castle in Spain, it withheld me from the Alhambra.

The fairy castle metamorphosed itself into a Riverside flat.

But that also is irrelevant. What alone imports is Bradish, who accepted my infection with such passivity that I could not but see he thought it better so and preferred to be alone.

That is years ago. For a while he wrote. He wrote from Avignon. He wrote from Vallombrosa. Then his letters ceased. During the war he fought for Italy and died for her in the Alps. There he was delivered from the sweep and loneliness of things. If the great renunciation did not bring him peace, he found it there. There at last he was free and forever from those halls hung with enigmas, tapestried with tears, before which the sphinx in flight gallops like a jackal.

THE END.

PART I.

THE PACE THAT KILLS.

I.

"I wish you a happy New Year, sir."

It was the servant, green of livery, the yellow waistcoat slashed with black, bearing the coffee and fruit.

"Put it there, please," Roland answered. And then, in recognition of the salutation, he added, "Thanks: the same to you."

"H'm," he mused, as the man withdrew, "I ought to have tipped him, I suppose."

He leaned from the bed, poured some milk into a cup, and for a second nibbled at a slice of iced orange. Through the transom came a faint odor of home-made bread, and with it the rustle of a gown and a girl's clear laugh. The room itself was small. It was furnished in a fashion which was unsuggestive of an hotel, and yet did not resemble that of a private house. The curtain had been already drawn. Beyond was a lake, very blue in the sunlight, bulwarked by undulant hills. Below, on the road, a dogcart fronted by a groom was awaiting somebody's pleasure.

"It is late," he reflected, and raised a napkin to his lips. As he did so he noticed a package of letters which the napkin must have concealed. He took up the topmost and eyed it. It had been addressed to the Athenæum Club, Fifth Avenue; but the original direction was erased, and Tuxedo Park inserted in its stead. On the upper left-hand corner the impress of a firm of tailors shone in blue. Opposite was the engraving of a young woman supported by 2½*d.* He put it down again and glanced at the others. The superscriptions were characterless enough; each bore a foreign stamp, and to one as practised as was he, each bore the token of the dun.

"If they keep on bothering me like this," he muttered, "I shall certainly place the matter in the hands of my attorney." And thereat, with the air of a man who had said something insultingly original, he laughed aloud, swallowed some coffee, and dashed his head in the pillow. In and out of the corners of his mouth a smile still played; but presently his fancy must have veered, for the muscles of his lips compressed, and as he lay there, the arms clasped behind the head, the pink silk of his sleeves framing and tinting his face, and in the eyes the expression of one prepared to meet Fate and outwit it, a possible observer who could have chanced that way would have sat himself down to study and risen up perplexed.

Anyone who was at Columbia ten years ago will remember Roland Mistrial,—Roland Mistrial 3d, if you please,—and will recall the wave of bewilderment which swept the campus when that young gentleman, on the eve of graduation, popularity on one side and honors on the other, suddenly, without so much as a p. p. c., left everything where it was and betook himself to other shores. The flight was indeed erratic, and numerous were the rumors which it excited; but Commencement was at hand, other issues were to be considered, bewilderment subsided as bewilderment ever does, the college dispersed, and when it assembled again the Mistrial mystery, though unelucidated, was practically forgot.

In the neighborhood of Washington Square, however, on the northwest corner of Tenth Street and Fifth Avenue to be exact, there were others whose memories were more retentive. Among them was Roland's grandfather, himself a graduate, founder of the Mistrial fellowship, and judge of the appellate court. And there was Roland's father, a graduate too, a gentleman widely respected, all the more so perhaps because he had run for the governorship and lost it. And again there was Roland's aunt, a maiden lady of whom it is recorded that each day of her life she got down on her knees and thanked God he had made her a Mistrial. In addition to these, there were, scattered along the Hudson, certain maternal relatives—the Algaroths, the Baxters, and the Swifts; Bishop Algaroth in particular, who possessed such indomitable vigor that when at the good old age of threescore and ten he decided to depart this life, the impression prevailed that he had died very young for him. None of these people readily forgot. They were a proud family and an influential one—influential not merely in the social sense, but influential in political, legal, in church and university circles as well; a fact which may have had weight with the Faculty when it was called upon to deal with Roland Mistrial 3d. But be that as it may, the cause of the young man's disappearance was never officially given. Among the rumors which it created was one to the effect that his health was affected; in another his mind was implicated; and in a third it was his heart. Yet as not one of these rumors had enough evidential value behind it to concoct an anonymous letter on, they were suffered to go their way undetained, very much as Roland had already gone his own.

That way led him straight to the Golden Gate and out of it to Japan. Before he reached Yeddo his grandfather left the planet and a round sum of money behind. Of that round sum the grandson came in for a portion. It was not fabulous in dimensions, but in the East money goes far. In this case it might have gone on indefinitely had not the beneficiary seen fit to abandon the languors of the Orient for the breezier atmosphere of the west. The Riviera has charms of its own. So, too, have Paris and Vienna. Roland enjoyed them to the best of his ability. He even found London attractive, and became acclimated in Pall Mall. In the latter region he learned one day that his share of the round sum had departed and his father as well. The conjunction of these incidents was of such a character that he at once took ship for New York.

It was not that he was impatient to revisit the misgoverned city which he had deserted ten years before. He had left it willingly enough, and he had seldom regretted it since. The pins and needles on which he sat were those of another make. He was uninformed of the disposition of his father's property, and he felt that, were not every penny of it bequeathed to him, he would be in a tight box indeed.

He was at that time just entering his thirtieth year—that age in which a man who has led a certain life begins to be particular about the quality of his red pepper, and anxious too that the supply of it shall not tarry. Though meagre of late, the supply had been sufficient. But at present the palate was a trifle impaired. Where a ten-pound note had sufficed for its excitement, a hundred now were none too strong. Roland Mistrial—3d no longer—wanted money, and he wanted plenty of it. He had exact ideas as to its usefulness, and none at all regarding its manufacture. He held, as many have done and will continue to do, that the royal road to it leads through a testament; and it was in view of the opening vistas which that road displayed that he set sail for New York.

And now, six weeks later, on this fair noonday of a newer year, as he lay outstretched in bed, you would have likened him to one well qualified to keep a mother awake and bring her daughter dreams. Our canons of beauty may be relative, but, such as they are, his features accorded with them—disquietingly even; for they conveyed the irritating charm of things we have hoped for, striven for, failed to get, and then renounced with thanksgiving. They made you anxious about their possessor, and fearful too lest the one dearly-beloved might chance to see them, and so be subjugated by their spell. They were features that represented good stock, good breeding, good taste, good looks—every form of goodness, in fact, save, it may be, the proper one. But the possible lack of that particular characteristic was a matter over which hesitation well might be. We have all of us a trick of flattering ourselves with the fancy that, however obtuse our neighbor is, we at least are gifted with the insight of a detective—a faculty so rare and enviable that the blunders we make must be committed with a view to its concealment; yet, despite presumable shrewdness, now and then a face will appear that eludes cataloguing, and leaves the observer perplexed. Roland Mistrial's was one of these.

And now, as the pink silk of his shirt-sleeves tinted it, the expression altered, and behind his contracted brows hurried processions of shifting scenes. There was that initial catastrophe which awaited him almost on the wharf—the discovery that his father had left him nothing, and that for no other reason in the world than because he had nothing whatever to leave—nothing, in fact, save the hereditary decoration of and right of enrolment in the Society of the Cincinnati, the which, handed down since Washingtonian days from one Mistrial to another, he held, as his forefathers had before him, in trust for the Mistrials to be.

No, he could not have disposed of that, even had he so desired; but everything else, the house on Tenth Street,—built originally for a country-seat, in times when the Astor House was considered rather far up-town,—bonds, scrip, and stocks, disappeared as utterly as had they never been; for Roland's father, stricken with that form of dementia which, to the complete discouragement of virtue, battens on men that have led the chastest lives, had, at that age in which the typical rake is forced to haul his standard down, surrendered himself to senile debauchery, and in the lap of a female of uncertain attractions—of whose mere existence no one had been previously aware—placed title-deeds and certificates of stock. In a case such as this the appeal of the rightful heir is listened to with such patience that judge and jury too have been known to pass away and leave the tale unended. And Roland, when the earliest dismay had in a measure subsided, saw himself closeted with lawyers who offered modicums of hope in return for proportionate fees. Then came a run up the Hudson, the welcomeless greeting which waited him there, and the enervating imbecility of his great aunt, whose fingers, mummified by gout, were tenacious enough on the strings of her purse. That episode flitted by, leaving on memory's camera only the degrading tableau of coin burrowed for and unobtained. And through it all filtered torturesome uncertainties, the knowledge of his entire inability to make money, the sense of strength misspent, the perplexities that declined to take themselves away, forebodings of the morrow, nay of the day even as well, the unbanishable dread of want.

But that for the moment had gone. He turned on his elbow and glanced over at a card-case which lay among the silver-backed brushes beyond, and at once the shock he had resummoned fled. Ah, yes! it had gone indeed, but at the moment it had been appalling enough. The morrow at least was secure; and as he pondered over its possibilities they faded before certain episodes of the previous day—that chance encounter with Alphabet Jones, who had insisted he should pack a valise and go down with Trement Yarde and himself to Tuxedo; and at once the incidents succeeding the arrival paraded through his thoughts. There had been the late dinner to begin with; then the dance; the girl to whom some one had presented him, and with whom he had sat it out; the escape of the year, the health that was drunk to the new one, and afterwards the green baize in the card-room; the bank which Trement Yarde had held, and finally the successful operation that followed, and which consisted in cutting that cherub's throat to the tune of three thousand dollars. It was all there now in the card-case ; and though, as sums of money go, it was hardly quotable, yet in the abstract, forethought and economy aiding, it represented several months of horizons solid and real. The day was secure ; as for the future, who knew what it might contain ? A grave perhaps, and in it his aunt.

II.

"If I had been killed in a duel I couldn't be better." It was Jones the novelist describing the state of his health. "But how is my friend and brother in virtue?"

"Utterly ramollescent," Roland answered, confidingly. "What the French call gaga."

The mid-day meal was in progress, and the two men, seated opposite each other, were dividing a Demidorf salad. They had been schoolmates at Concord, and despite the fact that until the day before they had not met for a decennium, the happy-go-lucky intimacy of earlier days had eluded Time and still survived. Throughout the glass-enclosed piazza other people were lunching, and every now and then Jones, catching a wandering eye, would bend forward a little and smile. Though it was but the first of the year, the weather resembled that of May. One huge casement was wide open. There was sunlight everywhere, flowers too, and beyond you could see the sky, a dome of opal and sapphire blent.

"Well," Jones replied, "I can't say you have altered much. But then who does? You remember, don't you"—and Jones ran on with some anecdote of earlier days.

But Roland had ceased to listen. It was very pleasant here, he told himself. There was a freedom about it that the English country-house, however charming, lacked. There was no one to suggest things for you to do, there was no host or hostess to exact attention, and the women were prettier, better dressed, less conventional, and yet more assured in manner than any that he had encountered for years. The men, too, were a good lot; and given one or two more little surprises, such as he had found in the card-room, he felt willing to linger on indefinitely—a week at least, a month if the fare held out. His eyes roamed through the glitter of the room.

Presently, at a neighboring table, he noticed the girl with whom he had seen the old year depart: she was nodding to him; and Roland, with that courtesy that betokens the foreigner a mile away, rose from his seat as he bowed in return.

Jones, whom little escaped, glanced over his shoulder. "By the way, are you on this side for good?" he asked; and Roland answering with the vague shrug the undetermined give, he hastened to add—"or for bad?"

"That depends. I ran over to settle my father's estate, but they seem to have settled it for me. After all, this is no place for a pauper, is it?"

"The wolf's at the door, is he?"

Roland laughed shortly. "At the door? Good Lord! I wish he were! He's in the room."

"There, dear boy, never mind. Wait till spring comes and marry an heiress. There are so many hereabouts that we use them for export purposes. They are a glut in the market. There's a fair specimen. Ever meet her before?"

"Meet whom?"

"That girl you just bowed to. They call her father Honest Paul. Oh, if you ask me why, I can't tell. It's a nickname, like another. It may be because he says Amen so loud in church. A number of people have made him trustee, but whether on that account or not they never told. However, he's a big man, owns a mile or two up there near the Riverside. I should rate him at not a penny less than ten million."

"What did you say his name was?"

"Dunellen—the Hon. Paul Dunellen. At one time—"

Jones rambled on, and again Roland had ceased to listen. But it was not the present now that claimed him. At the mention of the plutocrat something from the past came back and called him there—a thing so shadowy that, when he turned to interrogate, it eluded him and disappeared.

Then at once, without conscious effort, an episode which he had long since put from him arose and detained his thought. But what on earth, he wondered, had the name of Dunellen to do with that? And for the moment dumbly perplexed, yet outwardly attentive, he puzzled over the connection and tried to find the link; yet that too was elusive: the name seemed to lose its suggestiveness, and presently it sank behind the episode it had evoked.

"Of course," Jones was saying, in reference, evidently, to what had gone before—"of course as millionaires go he is not first chop. Jerolomon could match him head or tail for all he has, and never miss it if he lost. Ten million, though, is a tidy sum—just enough to entertain on. A penny less and you are pinched. Why, you would be surprised—"

"Has he any other children?"

"Who? Dunellen? None that he has acknowledged."

"Then his daughter will come in for it all."

"That's what I said. When she does, she will probably hand it over to some man who wont know how to spend it. She's got a cousin—what's that beggar's name? However, he's a physician, makes a specialty of nervous diseases, I believe; good enough fellow in his way, but an everlasting bore—the sort of man you would avoid in a club, and trust your sister to. What the deuce is his name?"

"Well, what of him?"

"Ah, yes. I fancy he wants to get married, and when he does, to entertain. He is very devoted."

"But nowadays, barring royalty, no one ever marries a cousin."

"Dear boy, you forget; it isn't every cousin that has ten million. When she has, the attempt is invariable." And Jones accentuated his remark with a nod. "Now," he continued, "what do you say to a look at the library? They have a superb edition of Kirschwasser in there, and a full set of the works of Chartreuse."

The novelist had arisen; he was leaving the room, and Roland was about to follow him, when he noticed that Miss Dunellen was preparing to leave it too. Before she reached the hall he was at her side.

There is this about the New York girl—her beauty is often bewildering, yet unless a husband catch her in the nick of time the bewilderment of that beauty fades. At sixteen Justine Dunellen had been enchanting, at twenty-three she was plain. Her face still retained its oval, but from it something had evaporated and gone. Her mouth, too, had altered. In place of the volatile brilliance of earlier years, it was drawn a little; it seemed resolute, and it also seemed subdued. But one feature had not changed: her eyes, which were of the color of snuff, enchanted still. They were large and clear, and when you looked in them you saw such possibilities of tenderness and sincerity that the escape of the transient was unregretted; you forgot the girl that had been, and loved the woman that was.

And lovable she was indeed. The world is filled with charming people whom, parenthetically, many of us never meet; yet, however scant our list may be, there are moments when from Memory's gardens a vision issues we would fain detain. Who is there to whom that vision has not come? Nay, who is there that has not intercepted it, and, to the heart's perdition perhaps, suffered it to retreat? If there be any to whom such apparitions are unvouchsafed, let him evoke that woman whom he would like his sister to resemble and his wife to be. Then, if his intuitions are acute, there will appear before him one who has turned sympathy into a garment and taken refinement for a wreath; a woman just yet debonair, thoughtful of others, true to herself; a woman whose speech can weary no more than can a star, whose mind is clean as wholesome fruit, whose laugh is infrequent, and whose voice consoles; a woman who makes the boor chivalrous, and the chivalrous bend the knee. Such an one did Justine Dunellen seem. In person she was tall, slender, willowy of movement, with just that shrinking graciousness that the old masters gave to certain figures which they wished to represent as floating off the canvas into space.

And now, as Roland joined her, she smiled and greeted him. With her was a lady to whom she turned:

"Mrs. Metuchen, this is Mr. Mistrial."

And Roland found himself bowing to a little old woman elaborately dressed. She was, he presently discovered, a featherhead person, who gave herself the airs of a princesse en couches. But though not the rose, at least she dwelt near by. Her husband was Mr. Dunellen's partner; and to Justine, particularly since the death of her mother, she had become what the Germans, who have many a neat expression, term a Wahlverwandtschaft—a relation not of blood, but of choice. She was feather headed, but she was a lady; she was absurd, but she was lovable; and by Justine she was evidently beloved.

Roland got her a seat, found a footstool for her, and pleased her very much by the interest which he displayed in her family tree.

"I knew all your people," she announced at last. And when she did so, her manner was so gracious that Roland felt the hour had not been thrown away.

During the rest of the day he managed to be frequently in her vicinity. The better part of the morrow he succeeded in sharing with Justine. And in the evening, when the latter bade him good-night, it occurred to him that if what Jones had said in regard to the cousin was true, then was the cousin losing ground.

The next morning Mrs. Metuchen and her charge returned to town. Roland followed in a later train. As he crossed the ferry he told himself he had much to do; and on reaching New York he picked up his valise with the air of one who has no time to lose.

III.

In a city like New York it is not an easy task, nor is it always a profitable one, to besiege a young person that is fortressed in her father's house. And when the house has a cousin for sentinel, and that cousin is jealous, the difficulty is increased. But, time and tact aiding, what obstacle may not be removed?

Roland understood all this very thoroughly, and on the day succeeding his return from Tuxedo he examined the directory, strolled into Wall Street, and there, at the shingle of Dunellen, Metuchen, & Such, sent in a card to the senior member of the firm.

The Hon. Paul Dunellen—Honest Paul, to the world in which he moved—was a man who in his prime must have been of glad and gallant appearance; but latterly he had shrunk: his back had bent almost into a hump, he held his head lower than his shoulders, but with uplifted chin—a habit which gave him the appearance of being constantly occupied in peering at something which he could not quite discern, an appearance that was heightened by his eyes, which were restless, and by his brows, which were tormented and bushy. He had an ample mouth: when he spoke, the furrows in his cheeks moved with it. His nose was prominent; all his features, even to his ears, were larger than the average mould. When Roland was admitted to the room in which he sat, the first impression which he got from him was that of massiveness in decay.

"Mr. Mistrial, I am glad to see you. I knew your father, and I had the honor of knowing your grandfather as well. Will you not take a seat?" The old man had half risen, and in this greeting made manifest something of that courtesy which we are learning to forget.

"You are very kind," Roland answered.

"It is because of my father that I venture to call. If I interrupt you, though"—and Roland, apparently hesitant, occupied himself in a study of his host—"if I do," he continued, "I beg you will allow me to come again."

To this suggestion Mr. Dunellen refused to listen ; but during the moments that followed, as Roland succinctly one after the other enumerated the facts in the case of his lost inheritance, the lawyer did listen ; and he listened, moreover, with that air of concentrated attention which is the surest encouragement to him who has aught to say. And when Roland had completed the tale of his grievance, he nodded, and stroked his chin.

"The matter is perfectly clear," he announced, "though I can't say as much for the law. Undue influence is evident. The trouble will be to invalidate a gift made during the lifetime of the donor ; but—" And Mr. Dunellen made a gesture as who should say, It is for that that courts were established. "Yet, tell me, why is it that you have done nothing about it before?"

To this Roland made no immediate reply. He lowered his eyes. "Paralysis is written in your face," he mused. Then aloud and rather sadly: "The fairest patrimony is an honored name," he said. "It is for me to guard my father's reputation. It is only recently, stress of circumstances aiding, I have thought that without publicity some compromise might possibly be effected." He looked up again, and as he looked he assured himself that the old man would not outlast the year.

"Well, Mr. Mistrial, you must let me quote the speech a lord made to a commoner, 'You are not a noble, sir, but you are worthy of being one.'" And Mr. Dunellen reaching out caught Roland's hand and shook it in his own. "I enter thoroughly into your delicacy the more readily because I do not encounter it every day—no, nor every month. It does me good—on my word it does. Now, if a compromise can, as you suggest, be effected, and you care to leave the matter in my hands, I will do my best to serve you. It may take some little time, we must seem neither zealous nor impatient, and meanwhile — h'm — I understood you to say something about your circumstances. Now if I can be of any—"

This offer Roland interrupted. "You are truly very kind, sir," he broke in, "and I thank you with all my heart. All the more so even because I must refuse. I have been badly brought up, I know; you see, I never expected that it would be necessary for me to earn my own living; yet if it is, I cannot begin too soon: but what would the end be if I began by borrowing money?"

As Roland delivered this fine speech he was the image of Honesty arrayed in a Piccadilly coat. He rose from his seat. "I am detaining you, I am sure. Let me get the papers together and bring them to you to-morrow."

"Do so, by all means," Mr. Dunellen answered, rising too. "Do so, by all means. But wait: to-morrow I may be absent. Could you not send them to my house this evening, or better still, bring them yourself? It would give me pleasure to have my daughter meet a man who is the moral portrait of his grandfather."

"Your daughter!" Roland exclaimed. "It is not possible that she is the Miss Dunellen whom I saw the other day at Tuxedo."

"With Mrs. Metuchen: Why, of course it is." And the lawyer looked as surprised as his client. "This is indeed a coincidence. But you will come, will you not?"

"I shall consider it a privilege to do so," Roland, with a charming affectation of modesty, replied; and presently, when he found himself in the street again, he saw, stretching out into beckoning vistas, a high-road paved with promises of prompt success.

And that evening, when the papers had been delivered, and Mr. Dunellen, leaving the guest to his daughter's care, had gone with them to his study, Roland could not help but feel that on that high-road his footing was assured; for, on entering the drawing-room, Justine had greeted him as one awaited and welcome, and now that her father had gone she motioned him to a seat at her side.

"Tell me," she said, "what is it you do to people? There is Mrs. Metuchen, who pretends to abominate young men, and openly admires you. To-day you captured my father; by to-morrow you will be friends with Guy."

"With Guy?" Mechanically Roland repeated the phrase. Then at once into the very core of memory entered the lancinating pang of a nerve exposed. During the second that followed, in that tumult of visions that visits him who awakes from a swoon, there came to him the effort made in Tuxedo to recall in what manner the name of Dunellen was familiar to his ears; but that instantly departed, and in its stead came a face one blur of tears, and behind it a stripling livid with hate. Could that be Guy? If it were, then indeed would the high-road narrow into an alley, with a dead wall at the end. Yet of the inward distress he gave no outward sign. About his thin lips a smile still played, and as he repeated the phrase he looked, as he always did, confident and self-possessed.

"Yes, I am sure you will like each other," the girl answered; "all the more so perhaps because no two people could be less alike. Guy, you see, is—"

But whatever description she may have intended to give remained unexpressed. A portière had been drawn, and some one was entering the room. Roland, whose back was toward the door, turned obliquely and looked.

"Why, there he is!" he heard Justine exclaim; and in the man that stood there he saw the stripling he had just evoked. Into the palms of his hands a moisture came, yet as Justine proceeded with some form of introduction he rose to his feet. "So you are the cousin," he mused; and then, with a bow in which he put the completest indifference, he resumed his seat.

"We were just talking of you," Justine continued. "Why didn't you come in last night?"

"It is snowing," the cousin remarked, inconsequently, and sat himself down.

"Dr. Thorold, you know;" and Justine, turning to Mistrial, began to relate one of those little anecdotes which are serviceable when conversation drags.

As she ran on, Roland, apparently attentive, marked that one of Thorold's feet was moving uneasily, and divined rather than saw that the fingers of his hand were clinched. "He is working himself up," he reflected. "Well, let him; it will make it the easier for me." And as he told himself this he turned on Thorold a glance which he was prepared to instantly divert. But the physician was not looking; he sat bolt-upright, his eyes lowered, and about his mouth and forehead the creases of a scowl.

Dr. Thorold was of that class of man that women always like and never adore. He was thoughtful of others, and considerate. Physically he was well-favored, and pleasant to the eye. He was sometimes dull, but rarely selfish; by taste and training he was a scholar—gifted at that; and yet through some accident of nature he lacked that one fibre which differentiates the hero from the herd. In the way we live to-day the need of heroes is so slight that the absence of that fibre is of no moment at all—a circumstance which may account for the fact that Justine admired him very much, trusted him entirely, and had she been his sister instead of his cousin could not have appreciated him more.

And now, as Roland eyed him for one moment, through some of those indetectable currents that bring trivialities to the mind that is most deeply engrossed he noticed that though the physician was in dress the shoes he wore were not veneered. Then at once he entered into a perfect understanding of the circumstances in which he was placed. Though he lost the game even as the cards were being dealt, at least he would lose it well. "I'll teach him a lesson," he decided; and presently, as Justine ceased speaking, he assumed his gayest air.

"Yes, yes," he exclaimed, and gave a twist to his light mustache. He had caught her ultimate words, and with them a cue.

"Yes, I remember in Nepal—"

And thereupon he carried his listener through a series of scenes and adventures which he made graphic by sheer dexterity in the use of words. His speech, colored and fluent, was of exactly that order which must be heard, not read. It was his intonation which gave it its charm; the manner in which he eluded a detail that might have wearied; the expression his face took on at the situations which he saw before describing, and which he made his auditor expect; and also the surety of his skill in transition—the art with which he would pass from one idea to another, connect them both with a gesture, and complete the subject with a smile. The raconteur is usually a bore. When he is not, he is a wizard. And as Roland passed from one peak of the Himalayas to another, over one of the two that listened he exerted a palpable spell. At last, the end of his tether reached, he turned to the cousin, and, without a hesitation intervening, asked of him, as though the question were one of really personal interest, "Dr. Thorold, have you ever been in the East?"

Thorold, thrown off his guard, glared for an instant, the scowl still manifest; then he stood up. "No, sir; I have not," he answered; and each of the monosyllables of his reply he seemed to propel with tongue and teeth. "Good-night, Justine." And with a nod that was rather small for two to divide, took himself from the room.

He reached the portière before Justine fully grasped the discourtesy of his conduct. She stared after him wonderingly, her lips half parted, her clear eyes dilated and amazed, the color mounted to her cheeks, and she made as though to leave her seat.

But this Roland thought it wise to prevent. "Miss Dunellen," he murmured, "I am afraid Dr. Thorold was bored. It is my fault. I had no right—"

"Bored! How could he have been? I am sure I don't see—"

"Yes, you do, my dear," thought Roland; "you think he was jealous, and you are wrong; but it is good for us that you should." And in memory of the little compliment her speech had unintentionally conveyed he gave another twist to his mustache.

The outer door closed with a jar that reached him where he sat. "Thank God!" he muttered; and divining that if he now went away the girl would regret his departure, after another word or two, and despite the protestation of her manner, he bade her good-night.

It is one of the charms of our lovely climate that the temperature can fall twenty degrees in as many minutes. When Roland entered the Dunellen house he left spring in the street; when he came out again there was snow. Across the way a lamp flickered, beneath it a man was standing, from beyond came a faint noise of passing wheels, but the chance of rescue by cab or hansom was too remote for anyone but a foreigner to entertain. Roland had omitted to provide himself with any protection against a storm, yet that omission affected him but little. He had too many things to think of to be anxious about his hat; and, his hands in his pocket, his head lowered, he descended the steps, prepared to let the snow do its worst.

As he reached the pavement the man at the lamp-post crossed the street.

"Mistrial," he called, for Roland was hurrying on—"Mistrial, I want a word with you."

In a moment he was at his side, and simultaneously Roland recognized the cousin. He was buttoned up in a loose coat faced with fur, and over his head he held an umbrella. He seemed a little out of breath.

"If," he began at once, "if I hear that you ever presume to so much as speak to Miss Dunellen again, I will break every bone in your body."

The voice in which he made this threat was gruff and aggressive. As he delivered it, he closed his umbrella and swung it like a club.

"A nous deux, maintenant," mused Roland.

"And not only that—if you ever dare to enter that house again I will expose you."

"Oh, will you, though?" answered Roland. The tone he assumed was affectedly civil. "Well now, my fat friend, let me tell you this: I intend to enter that house, as you call it, to-morrow at precisely five o'clock. Let me pick you up on the way, and we can go together."

"Roland Mistrial, as sure as there is a God in heaven I will have you in the Tombs."

"See here, put up your umbrella. You are not in a condition to expose yourself—let alone anyone else. You are daft, Thorold—that is what is the matter with you. If you persist in chattering Tombs at me in a snow-storm I will answer Bloomingdale to you. You frightened me once, I admit; but I am ten years older now, and ten years less easily scared. Besides, what drivel you talk! You haven't that much to go on."

As Roland spoke his accent changed from affected suavity to open scorn. "Now stop your bluster," he continued, "and listen to me. Because you happen to find me in there, you think I have intentions on the heiress—"

"It's a lie! She—"

"There, don't be abusive. I know you want her for yourself, and I hope you get her. But please don't think that I mean to stand in your way."

"I should say not."

"In the first place, I went there on business."

"What business, I would like to know?"

"So you shall. I took some papers for Mr. Dunellen to examine—papers relative to my father's estate. To-morrow I return to learn his opinion. Next week I go abroad again. When I leave I promise you shall find your cousin still heart-whole and fancy-free."

As Roland delivered this little stab he paused a moment to note the effect. But apparently it had passed unnoticed—Thorold seemingly was engrossed in the statements that preceded it. The scowl was still on his face, but it was a scowl into which perplexity had entered, and which in entering had modified the aggressiveness that had first been there. At the moment his eyes wandered, and Roland, who was watching him, felt that he had scored a point.

"You say you are going abroad?" he said, at last.

"Yes; I have to join my wife."

At this announcement Thorold looked up at him and then down at the umbrella. Presently, with an abrupt gesture, he unfurled it and raised it above his head. As he did so, Roland smiled. For that night at least the danger had gone. Of the morrow, however, he was unassured.

"Suppose we walk along," he said, encouragingly; and before Thorold knew it, he was sharing that umbrella with his foe. "Yes," he continued, "my poor father left his affairs in a muddle, but Mr. Dunellen says he thinks he can straighten them out. You can understand that if any inkling of this thing were to reach him he would return the papers at once. You can understand that, can't you? After all, you must know that I have suffered."

"Suffered!" Thorold cried. "What's that to me? It made my mother insane."

"God knows I nearly lost my reason too. I can understand how you feel toward me: it is only what I deserve. Yet though you cannot forget, at least it can do you no good to rake this matter up."

"It is because of—" and for a second the cousin halted in his speech.

"Voilà!" mused Roland. "Je te vois venir."

"However, if you are going abroad—"

"Most certainly I am. I never expect to see Miss Dunellen again."

"In that case I will say nothing."

They had reached Fifth Avenue, and for a moment both loitered on the curb. Thorold seemed to have something to add, but he must have had difficulty in expressing it, for he nodded as though to reiterate the promise.

"I can rely upon you then, can I?" Roland asked.

"Keep out of my way, sir, and I will try, as I have tried, to forget."

A 'bus was passing, he hailed it, and disappeared.

Roland watched the conveyance, and shook the snow-flakes from his coat. "Try, and be damned," he muttered. "I haven't done with you yet."

The disdain of a revenge at hand is accounted the uniquest possible vengeance. And it is quite possible that had Roland's monetary affairs been in a better condition, on a sound and solid basis, let us say, he would willingly have put that paradox into action. But on leaving Tuxedo he happened to be extremely hungry—hungry, first and foremost, for the possession of that wealth which in this admirably conducted country of ours lifts a man above the law, and, an adroit combination of scoundrelism and incompetence aiding, sometimes lands him high among the executives of state. By political ambition, however, it is only just to say he was uninspired. In certain assemblies he had taken the trouble to assert that our government is one at which Abyssinia might sneer, but the rôle of reformer was not one which he had any inclination to attempt. Several of his progenitors figured, and prominently too, in abridgments of history; and, if posterity were not satisfied with that, he had a very clear idea as to what posterity might do. In so far as he was personally concerned, the prominence alluded to was a thing which he accepted as a matter of course: it was an integral part of himself; he would have missed it as he would have missed a leg or the point of his nose; but otherwise it left his pulse unstirred. No, his hunger was not for preferment or place. It was for the ten million which the Hon. Paul Dunellen had gathered together, and which the laws of gravitation would prevent him from carrying away when he died. That was the nature of Roland Mistrial's hunger, and as incidental thereto was the thirst to adjust an outstanding account.

Whatever the nature of that account may have been, in a more ordinary case it might have become outlawed through sheer lapse of time. But during that lapse of time Roland had been in exile because of it; and though even now he might have been willing to let it drift back into the past where it belonged, yet when the representative of it not only loomed between him and the millions, but was even attempting to gather them in for himself, the possibility of retaliation was too complete to suffer disdain. The injury, it is true, was one of his own doing. But, curiously enough, when a man injures another the more wanton that injury is the less it incites to repentance. In certain dispositions it becomes a source of malignant hate. Deserve a man's gratitude, and he may forgive you; but let him do you a wrong, and you have an enemy for life. Such is the human heart—or such at least was Roland Mistrial's.

And now, as the conveyance rumbled off into the night, he shook the snow-flakes from his coat.

"Try, and be damned," he repeated; "I haven't done with you yet."

IV.

To the New Yorker March is the vilest month of all the year. In the South it is usually serene. Mrs. Metuchen, who gave herself the airs of an invalid, and who possessed the invalid's dislike of vile weather, was aware of this ; and while the first false promises of February were being protested she succeeded in persuading Miss Dunellen to accompany her out of snow-drifts into the sun. It was Aiken that she chose as refuge ; and when the two ladies arrived there they felt satisfied that their choice had been a proper one—a satisfaction which they did not share alone, for a few days after their arrival Roland Mistrial arrived there too.

During the intervening weeks he had seemed idle ; but it is the thinker's characteristic to appear unoccupied when he is most busily engaged, and Roland, outwardly inactive, had in reality made the most of his time.

On the morning succeeding the encounter with Thorold something kept coming and whispering that he had undertaken a task which was beyond his strength. To many of us night is apt to be more confident than are the earlier hours of the day, and the courage which Roland had exhibited spent itself and went. It is hard to feel the flutter of a bird beneath one's fingers, and, just when the fingers tighten, to discover that the bird is no longer there. Such a thing is disappointing, and the peculiarity of a disappointment consists in this—the victim of it is apt to question the validity of his own intuitions. Thus far—up to the looming of Thorold—everything had been in Roland's favor. Without appreciable effort he had achieved the impossible. In three days he had run an heiress to earth, gained her father's liking, captivated her chaperon, and, at the moment when the air was sentient with success, the highway on which he strode became suddenly tortuous and obscure. Do what he might he could not discern so much as a sign-post; and as in perplexity he twirled his thumbs, little by little he understood that he must either turn back and hunt another quarry, or stand where he was and wait. Another step on that narrowing road and he might tumble into a gully. Did he keep his word with Thorold he felt sure that Thorold would keep his word with him. But did he break it, and Thorold learn he had done so, several consequences were certain to ensue, and among them he could hear from where he stood the bang with which Mr. Dunellen's door would close. The only plank which drifted his way threatened to break into bits. He needed no one to tell him that Justine was not a girl to receive him or anyone else in the dark; and even fortune favoring, if in chance meetings he were able to fan her spark of interest for him into flame, those chance meetings would be mentioned by her to whomsoever they might concern. No, that plank was rotten ; and yet in considering it, and in considering too the possibilities to which, were it a trifle stronger, it might serve as bridge, he passed that morning, a number of subsequent mornings. A month elapsed, and still he eyed that plank.

Meanwhile he had seen Miss Dunellen but once. She happened to be driving up the Avenue, but he had passed her unobserved. Then the weather became abominable, and he knew it was useless to look for her in the Park ; and once he had visited her father's office and learned again, what he already knew, that in regard to the lost estate, eternity aiding, something might be recovered, but that the chances were vague as was it. And so February came and found his hunger unappeased. The alternate course which had suggested itself came back, and he determined to turn and hunt another quarry. During his sojourn abroad he had generally managed a team of three. There was the gerundive, as he termed the hindmost—the woman he was about to leave; there was another into whose graces he had entered; and there was a third in training for future use. This custom he had found most serviceable. Whatever might happen in less regulated establishments, his stable was full. And that custom, which had stood him in good stead abroad, had nothing in it to prevent adoption here. Indeed, he told himself it was because of his negligence in that particular that he found himself where he was. Instead of centring his attention on Miss Dunellen, it would have been far better to wander in and out of the glittering precincts of Fifth Avenue, and see what else he could find. After all, there was nothing like being properly provisioned. If one comestible ran short, there should be another to take its place. Moreover, if, as Jones had intimated, there were heiresses enough for export purposes, there must surely be enough to supply the home demand.

The alternate course alluded to he had therefore determined to adopt, when an incident occurred which materially altered his plans. One particularly detestable morning he read in public print that Mrs. Metuchen and Miss Dunellen were numbered among the visitors to South Carolina, and thereupon he proceeded to pack his valise. A few days later he was in Aiken, and on the forenoon of the third day succeeding his arrival, as he strolled down the verandah of the Mountain Glen Hotel, he felt at peace with the world and with himself.

It was a superb morning, half summer, half spring. In the distance a forest stretched indefinitely and lost itself in the haze of the horizon beyond. The sky was tenderly blue, and, beneath, a lawn green as the baize on a roulette-table was circled by a bright-red road. He had breakfasted infamously on food that might have been cooked by a butcher to whom breakfast is an odious thing. Yet its iniquity he accepted as a matter of course. He knew, as we all do, that for bad food, bad service, and for futility of complaint our country hotels are unrivalled, even in Spain. He was there not to enjoy himself, still less for the pleasures a blue ribbon can cause: he was there to fan into flame the interest which Miss Dunellen had exhibited; and as he strolled down the verandah, a crop under his arm, his trousers strapped, he had no intention of quarrelling with the fare. Quite a number of people were basking in the sunlight, and, as he passed, some of them turned and looked; for at Aiken men that have more than one lung are in demand, and, when Roland registered his historic name, to the unattached females a little flutter of anticipation came.

But Roland was not in search of flirtations: he moved by one group into another until he reached a corner of the verandah in which Mrs. Metuchen and Miss Dunellen sat. Merely by the expression on the faces of those whom he greeted it was patent to the others that the trio were on familiar terms; and when presently he accompanied Miss Dunellen off the verandah, aided her to mount a horse that waited there, mounted another himself, and cantered off with the girl, the unattached females declared that the twain must be engaged. In that they were in error. As yet Roland had not said a word to the charge he might not have said to the matron. Both of these ladies had been surprised when he reached Aiken, and both had been pleased as well. In that surprise, in that pleasure, Roland had actively collaborated; and taking on himself to answer before it was framed the question which his advent naturally prompted, he stated that in journeying from Savannah to Asheville he had stopped over at Aiken as at a half-way house, and that, too, without an idea of encountering anyone whom he knew. Thereafter for several days he managed to make himself indispensable to the matron, companionable to her charge ; but now, on this particular morning, as he rattled down the red road, the courage which had deserted him returned ; and a few hours later, when before a mirror in his bedroom he stood arranging his cravat, he caught a reflection of Hyperion, son-in-law of Crœsus.

V.

In a fortnight that reflection was framed with a promise. Justine had put her hand in his. The threads by which he succeeded in binding her to him are needless to describe. He understood that prime secret in the art of coercing affection which consists in making one's self desired. He was never inopportune. Moreover, he saw that Justine, accustomed to the devotion of other men, accepted such devotion as a matter of course; in consequence he took another tack, and bullied her—a treatment which was new to her, and, being new, attractive. He found fault with her openly, criticised the manner in which she sat her horse, contradicted her whenever the opportunity came, and jeered—civilly, it is true, but the jeer was there and all the sharper because it was blunted—at any enthusiasm she chanced to express. And then, when she expected it least, he would be enthusiastic himself, and enthusiastic over nothing at all—some mythical deed canned in history, the beauty of a child, or the flush of the arbutus which they gathered on their rides. To others whom he encountered in her presence he showed himself so self-abnegatory, so readily pleased, sweet-tempered, and indulgent, so studious even of their susceptibilities and appreciative of what they liked and what they did not, that in comparing his manner to her and his manner to them the girl grew vexed, and one evening she told him so.

They happened to be sitting alone in a corner of the verandah. From within came the rhythm of a waltz; some dance was in progress, affectioned by the few; Mrs. Metuchen was discussing family trees with a party of Philadelphians; the air was sweet with the scent of pines and of jasmines; just above and beyond, a star was circumflexed by the moon.

"I am sorry if I have offended," he made answer to her complaint. "Do you mind if I smoke?" Without waiting for her consent he drew out a cigarette and lighted it. "I have not intended to," he added. "To-morrow I will go."

"But why? You like it here. You told me so to-day."

With a fillip of forefinger and thumb Roland tossed the cigarette out into the road. "Because I admire you," he answered curtly.

"I am glad of that."

The reproof, if reproof there were, was not in her speech, but in her voice. She spoke as one does whose due is conceded only after an effort. And for a while both were mute.

"Come, children, it is time to go to bed." Mrs. Metuchen in her fantastic fashion was hailing them from the door. Already the waltz had ceased, and as Mrs. Metuchen spoke, Justine rose from her seat.

"Good-night, Don Quichotte," the old lady added; and as the girl approached she continued in an audible undertone, "I call him Don Quichotte because he looks like the Chevalier Bayard."

"Good-night, Mrs. Metuchen, and the pleasantest of dreams." But the matron, with a wave of her glove, had disappeared, and Justine turned.

"At least you will not go until the afternoon?"

"Since you wish it, I will not."

She had stretched out her hand, but Roland, affecting not to notice it, raised his hat and turned away. Presently, and although, in spite of many a vice, he was little given to drink, he found himself at the bar superintending the blending of gin, of lemon-peel, and of soda; and as he swallowed it and put the goblet down he seemed so satisfied that the barkeeper, with the affectionate familiarity of his class, nodded and smiled.

"It takes a Remsen Cooler to do the trick, don't it?" he said.

And Roland, assenting remotely, left the bar and sought his room.

The next morning, as through different groups he sought for matron and for maid, he had a crop under his arm and in his hand a paper.

"I have been settling my bill," he announced.

"But are you going?" exclaimed Mrs. Metuchen.

"I can hardly take up a permanent residence here, can I?" he replied.

"Oh, Justine," the old lady cried, and clutched the girl by the arm, "persuade him not to." And fixing him with her glittering eyes, she added, "If you go, sir, you leave an Aiken void."

The jest passed him unnoticed. He felt that something had been said which called for applause, for Mrs. Metuchen was laughing immoderately. But his eyes were in Justine's as were hers in his.

"You will ride, will you not? I see you have your habit on." And with that, Justine assenting, he led her down the steps and aided her to the saddle.

There are numberless tentative things in life, and among them an amble through green, deserted lanes, where only birds and flowers are, has witcheries of its own. However perturbed the spirit may have been, there is that in the glow of the morning and the gait of a horse that can make it wholly serene. The traveller from Sicily will, if you let him, tell of hours so fair that even the bandits are coerced. Man cannot always be centred in self; and when to the influence of nature is added the companionship of one whose presence allures, the charm is complete. And Roland, to whom such things hitherto had been as accessories, this morning felt their spell. The roomy squalor of the village had been passed long since. They had entered a road where the trees arched and nearly hid the sky, but through the branches an eager sunlight found its way. Now and then in a clearing they would happen on some shabby, silent house, the garden gay with the tender pink of blossoming peach; and at times, from behind a log or straight from the earth, a diminutive negro would start like a kobold in a dream and offer, in an abashed, uncertain way, a bunch of white violets in exchange for coin. And once an old man, trudging along, saluted them with a fine parabola of hat and hand; and once they encountered a slatternly negress, very fat and pompous, seated behind a donkey she could have carried in her arms. But practically the road was deserted, fragrant, and still.

And now, as they rode on, interchanging only haphazard remarks, Roland swung himself from his horse, and, plucking a spray of arbutus, handed it to the girl.

"Take it," he said; "it is all I have."

His horse had wandered on a step and was nibbling at the grass, and, as he stood looking up at her, for the first time it occurred to him that she was fair. However a girl may seem in a ball-room, if she ever looks well she looks best in the saddle; and Justine, in spite of his criticism, did not sit her horse badly. Her gray habit, the high white collar and open vest, brought out the snuff-color of her eyes and hair. Her cheeks, too, this morning must have recovered some of the flush they had lost, or else the sun had been using its palette, for in them was the hue of the flower he had gathered and held.

She took it and inserted the stem in the lapel of her coat.

"Are you going?" she asked.

"What would you think of me if I remained?"

"What would I? I would think—"

As she hesitated she turned. He could see now it was not the sun alone that had been at work upon her face.

"Let me tell. You would think that a man with two arms for sole income has no right to linger in the neighborhood of a girl such as you. That is what you would think, what anyone would think; and while I care little enough about the existence which I lead in the minds of other people, yet I do care for your esteem. If I stay, I lose it. I should lose, too, my own; let me keep them both and go."

"I do not yet see why?"

"You don't!" The answer was so abrupt in tone that you would have said he was irritated at her remark, judging it unnecessary and ill-timed. "You don't!" he repeated. "Go back a bit, and perhaps you will remember that after I saw you at your house I did not come back again."

"I do indeed remember."

"The next day I saw you in the Park; I was careful not to return."

"But what have I done? You said last night—"

"Why do you question? You know it is because I love you."

"Then you shall not go."

"I must."

"You shall not, I say."

"And I shall take with me the knowledge that the one woman I have loved is the one woman I have been forced to leave."

"Roland Mistrial, how can you bear the name you do and yet be so unjust? If you leave me now it is because you care more for yourself than you ever could for me. It is not on my account you go: it is because you fear the world. There were heroes once that faced it."

"Yes, and there were Circes then, as now."

As he made that trite reply his face relaxed, and into it came an expression of such abandonment that the girl could see the day was won.

"Tell me—you will not go?"

Roland caught her hand in his, and, drawing back the gauntlet of kid, he kissed her on the wrist. "I will never leave you now," he answered; "only promise you will not regret."

"Regret!" She smiled at the speech—or was it a smile? Her lips had moved, but it was as though they had done so in answer to some prompting of her soul. "Regret! Do you remember you asked me what I would think if you remained? Well, I thought, if you did, there were dreams which do come true."

At this avowal she was so radiant yet so troubled that Roland detained her hand. "She really loves," he mused; "and so do I." And it may be, the forest aiding, that, in the answering pressure which he gave, such heart as he had went out and mingled with her own.

"Between us now," he murmured, "it is for all of time."

"Roland, how I waited for you!"

Again her lips moved and she seemed to smile, but now her eyes were no longer in his, they were fixed on some vista visible only to herself. She looked rapt, but she looked startled as well. When a girl first stands face to face with love it allures and it frightens too.

Roland dropped her hand; he caught his horse and mounted it. In a moment he was at her side again.

"Justine!"

And the girl turning to him let her fresh lips meet and rest upon his own. Slowly he disengaged the arm with which he had steadied himself on her waist.

"If I lose you now—" he began.

"There can be no question of losing," she interrupted. "Have we not come into our own?"

"But others may dispute our right. There is your cousin, to whom I thought you were engaged; and there is your father."

"Oh, as for Guy—" and she made a gesture. "Father, it is true, may object; but let him. I am satisfied; in the end he will be satisfied also. Why, only the other day I wrote him you were here."

"H'm!" At the intelligence he wheeled abruptly.

Already Justine had turned, and lowering her crop she gave her horse a little tap. The beast was willing enough; in a moment the two were on a run, and as Roland's horse, a broncho, by-the-way, one of those eager animals that decline to remain behind, rushed forward and took the lead, "Remember!" she cried, "you are not to leave me now."

But the broncho was self-willed, and this injunction Roland found or pretended it difficult to obey; and together, through the green lane and out of it, by long, dismal fields of rice, into the roomy squalor of the village and on to the hotel, they flew as though some fate pursued. Justine never forgot that ride, nor did Roland either.

At the verandah steps Mrs. Metuchen was in waiting. "I have a telegram from your father," she called to Justine. "He wishes you to return to-morrow."

"To-morrow?" the girl exclaimed.

"Thorold has learned I am here, and has told," her lover reflected. And swinging from his saddle he aided the girl to alight.

"To-morrow," Mrs. Metuchen with large assumption of resignation replied; "and we may be thankful he did not say to-day."

And as Roland listened to the varying interpretations of the summons which, during the absence of her charge, Mrs. Metuchen's riotous imagination had found time to conceive, "Thorold has told," he repeated to himself, "but he has told too late."

After a morning such as that, an afternoon on a piazza is apt to drag. Of this Roland was conscious. Moreover, he had become aware that his opportunities were now narrowly limited; and presently, as Mrs. Metuchen's imaginings subsided and ceased, he asked the girl whether, when dinner was over, she would care to take a drive.

Protest who may, at heart every woman is a match-maker ; and Mrs. Metuchen was not an exception. In addition to this, she liked family-trees, she was in cordial sympathy with good-breeding, and Roland, who possessed both, had, through attentions which women of her age appreciate most, succeeded in detaining her regard. In conversation, whenever Justine happened to be mentioned, she had a habit of extolling that young woman—not beyond her deserts, it is true, but with the attitude of one aware that the girl had done something which she ought to be ashamed of, yet to which no one was permitted to allude. This attitude was due to the fact that she suspected her, and suspected that everyone else suspected her, of an attachment for her cousin Guy. Now Guy Thorold had never appealed to Mrs. Metuchen. He was not prompt with a chair ; when she unrolled her little spangle of resonant names he displayed no eagerness in face or look. Such things affect a woman. They ruffle her flounces and belittle her in her own esteem. As a consequence, she disliked Guy Thorold ; from the heights of that dislike she was even wont to describe him as a Poke—a word she could not have defined had she tried, but which suggested to her all the attributes of that which is stupid and underbred. Roland, on the other hand, seemed to her the embodiment of just those things which Thorold lacked, and in the hope that he might cut the cousin out she extolled him to her charge in indirect and subtle ways. You young man who read this page mind you of this : if you would succeed in love or war, be considerate of women who are no longer young. They ask but an attention, a moment of your bountiful days, some little act of deference, and in exchange they sound your praises more deftly than ever trumpeter or beat of drums could do.

But because Mrs. Metuchen had an axe of her own to grind was not to her mind a reason why she should countenance a disregard of the Satanic pomps of that which the Western press terms Etiquette. And so it happened that, when Roland asked Justine whether she would care to drive, before the girl could answer, the matron stuck her oar in :

"Surely, Mr. Mistrial, you cannot think Miss Dunellen could go with you alone. Not that I see any impropriety in her doing so, but there is the world."

The world at that moment consisted of a handful of sturdy consumptives impatiently waiting the opening of the dining-room doors. And as Roland considered that world, he mentally explored the stable.

"Of course not," he answered ; "if Miss Dunellen cares to go, I will have a dogcart and a groom."

With that sacrifice to conventionality Mrs. Metuchen was content. For Justine to ride unchaperoned was one thing, but driving was another matter. And later on, in the cool of the afternoon, as Roland bowled the girl over the yielding sand, straight to the sunset beyond, he began again on the duo which they had already rehearsed, and when Justine called his attention to the groom, he laughed a little, and well he might. "Don't mind him," he murmured; "he is deaf."

In earlier conversations he had rarely spoken of himself, and, when he had, it had been in that remote fashion which leaves the personal pronoun at the door. There is nothing better qualified to weary the indifferent than the speech in which the I jumps out; and knowing this, he knew too that that very self-effacement before one whose interest is aroused excites that interest to still higher degrees. The Moi seul est haïssable is an old maxim, one that we apprehend more or less to our cost no doubt, and after many a sin of egotism; but when it is learned by rote, few others serve us in better stead. In Roland's relations with Justine thus far it had served him well. It had filled her mind with questions which she did not feel she had the right to ask, and in so filling it had occupied her thoughts with him. It was through arts of this kind that Machiavelli earned his fame.

But at present circumstances had changed. She had placed her hand in his; she had avowed her love. The I could now appear; its welcome was assured. And as they drove along the sand-hills she told him of herself, and drew out confidences in exchange. And such confidences! Had the groom not been deaf they might have given him food for thought. But they must have satisfied Justine, for when they reached the hotel again her eyes were so full of meaning that, had Mrs. Metuchen met her in a pantry instead of on the verandah, she could have seen unspectacled that the girl was fairly intoxicated—drunk with that headiest cup of love which is brewed not by the contact of two epiderms, but through communion of spirit and unison of heart.

That evening, when supper was done, Mrs. Metuchen, to whom any breath of night was synonymous with miasmas and microbes, settled herself in the parlor, and in the company of her friends from School Lane discussed that inexhaustible topic—Who Was and Who Was Not.

But the verandah, deserted at this hour by the consumptives, had attractions for Justine, for Roland as well; and presently, in a corner of it that leaned to the south, both were seated, and, at the moment, both were dumb. On the horizon, vague now and undiscerned, the peach-blossoms and ochres of sunset had long since disappeared; but from above rained down the light and messages of other worlds; the sky was populous with stars that seemed larger and nearer than they do in the north; Venus in particular shone like a neighborly sun that had strayed afar, and in pursuit of her was a moon, a new one, so slender and yellow you would have said, a feather that a breath might blow away. In the air were the same inviting odors, the scent of heliotrope and of violets, the invocations of the woodlands, the whispers of the pines. The musicians had been hushed, or else dismissed, for no sound came from them that night.

Roland had not sought the feverish night to squander it in contemplation. His hand moved and caught Justine's. It resisted a little, then lay docile in his own. For she was new to love. Like every other girl that has passed into the twenties, she had a romance in her life, two perhaps, but romances immaterial as children's dreams, and from which she had awaked surprised, noting the rhythm yet seeking the reason in vain. They had passed from her as fancies do; and, just as she was settling down into leisurely acceptance of her cousin, Roland had appeared, and when she saw him a bird within her burst into song, and she knew that all her life she had awaited his approach. To her he was the fabulous prince that arouses the sleeper to the truth, to the meaning, of love. He had brought with him new currents, wider vistas, and horizons solid and real. He differed so from other men that her mind was pleasured with the thought he had descended from a larger sphere. She idealized him as girls untrained in life will do. He was the lover unawaited yet not wholly undivined, tender-hearted, impeccable, magnificent, incapable of wrong—the lover of whom she may never have dreamed, yet who at last had come. And into his keeping she gave her heart, and was glad, regretting only it was not more to give. She had no fears; her confidence was assured as Might, and had you or I or any other logician passed that way and demonstrated as clearly as $a = a$ that she was imbecile in her love, she would not have thanked either of us for our pains. When a woman loves—and whatever the cynic may affirm, civilization has made her monandrous—she differs from man in this: she gives either the first-fruits of her affection, or else the semblance of an after-growth. There are men, there are husbands and lovers even, who will accept that after-growth and regard it as the verdure of an enduring spring. But who, save a lover, is ever as stupid as a husband? Man, on the other hand, is constant never. Civilization has not improved him in the least. And when on his honor he swears he has never loved before, his honor goes unscathed, for he may never yet have loved a woman as he loves the one to whom he swears.

With Justine this was the primal verdure. Had she not met Roland Mistrial, she might, and in all probability would, have exhibited constancy in affection, but love would have been uncomprehended still. As it was, she had come into her own; she was confident in it and secure; and now, though by nature she was rebellious enough, as he caught her hand her being went out to him, and as it went it thrilled.

"I love you," he said; and his voice was so flexible that it would have been difficult to deny that he really did. "I will love you always, my whole life through."

The words caressed her so well she could have pointed to the sky and repeated with Dona Sol:

"Regarde: plus de feux, plus de bruit. Tout se tait.
La lune tout à l'heure à l'horizon montait:
Tandis que tu parlais, sa lumière qui tremble
Et ta voix, toutes deux m'allaient au cœur ensemble:
Je me sentais joyeuse et calme, ô mon amant!
Et j'aurais bien voulu mourir en ce moment."

But at once some premonition seemed to visit her. "Roland," she murmured, "what if we leave our happiness here?"

And Roland, bending toward her, whispered sagely: "We shall know then where to find it."

VI.

NEW YORK meanwhile, in its effeminateness, had forgotten the snow, and was listening to the sun. And the day after the return from Aiken, as Roland, in accordance with an agreement of which the locus sigilli had a kiss for token, went down to knock at Mr. Dunellen's office door, the sky was as fair as it had been in the South. Yet to him it was unobtrusive. His mind was occupied with fancies that had a birth, a little span of life, and which in passing away were succeeded by others as ephemeral as themselves—thoughts about nothing at all that came and went unnoticed : a man he had met in Corfu, and whom a face in the street recalled ; the glisten of silk in a window that took him back to Japan;—but beneath them was a purpose settled and dominant, a resolution to trick Fate and outwit it—one which, during the journey from Aiken, had so possessed him that, in attending to the wants of Mrs. Metuchen or in ministering to Justine, at times he had been quasi-somnambulistic, at others wholly vague. But now, as he gave his card to an office-boy, to all outward intent he was confident and at ease; he picked up a paper and affected to lose himself in its columns. Presently the boy returned, and he was ushered into the room which he had previously visited. On this occasion Mr. Dunellen was not seated, but standing, his back to the door. As Roland entered he turned, and the young man stepped forward, his hand outstretched.

To his contentment, and a little also to his surprise, in answer to that outstretched hand Honest Paul extended his, and Roland had the pleasure of holding three apparently docile fingers in his own; but in a moment they withdrew themselves, and he felt called upon to speak.

" Mr. Dunellen," he began, with that confident air a creditor has who comes to claim his due, "Mr. Dunellen, I have ventured to interrupt you again. And again I am a suppliant. But this time it is of your daughter, not of my father, that—"

He hesitated, and well he might. Mr. Dunellen, who had remained standing, and who in so doing had prevented Roland from sitting down, now assumed the suspicious appearance of one who detects an unpleasant smell; his features contracted, and for no other reason, apparently, than that of intimidating the suppliant in his prayer.

But Roland was not to be abashed; he recovered himself, and continued glibly enough: "The matter is this. I am sincerely attached to your daughter, and I am come to ask your consent to our marriage."

"That is the purpose of your visit, is it?"

"It is."

"My daughter is aware of it, I suppose?"

"She is."

"And she consented, did she?"

"Perfectly."

"H'm! My daughter has made a mistake. I told her as much last night. There can be no question of marriage. You will do me the favor to let the matter drop."

"I am not a rich man, Mr. Dunellen, but—"

"So I am informed. But that has nothing to do with it. There are other things that I take into consideration, and in view of them I insist that this matter be dropped."

"Mr. Dunellen, I love your daughter; I have reason to believe that she cares for me. We became engaged a few days ago. I came here now to ask your consent. If you refuse it, I have at least the right to ask what your objection is."

"Rather unnecessary, don't you think?"

"I cannot imagine, sir, what you mean." And Roland, holding himself unaffectedly straight, without the symptom of a pose, looked the old man in the eyes.

That look Mr. Dunellen returned. "Take a seat," he said; and, motioning Roland to a chair, he sat down himself.

"All this is needless," he announced; "but since you are anxious for an explanation, I will give it. In the first place, when you were at my house you remember that my nephew Dr. Thorold happened in. The other day I mentioned to him that you were at Aiken. He then informed me of a certain incident in your career, one which you have not forgotten, and of which I do not care to speak. I may say, however, that it utterly precludes the possibility of any further intercourse between my daughter and yourself."

And the old man, still gazing at his guest, added: "This explanation should, it seems to me, suffice." But he made no attempt to rise, or to signify that the interview was at an end, and Roland, who was shrewd, interpreted this in his own favor. "He is not altogether positive," he reflected, "but he can be so to-morrow," and with a show of shame that did him credit he hung his head.

"I had thought the incident to which you refer was forgotten," he murmured, penitently enough.

"Forgotten? Do you suppose Thorold forgets? Do you suppose any man could forget a thing like that—a sister's death, a mother's insanity? No, you did not think it was forgotten. What you thought was this: you thought that my nephew would hesitate to speak; and indeed even to me for ten years he has kept silent. But now—there, you need not fear a criminal charge. It was that you feared once, I understand, and it was on that account you went abroad. At this date, of course, no proof is possible; and, even were it otherwise, a charge would not be brought.

Linen of that kind is better washed at home."

"Mr. Dunellen, if you could know! It is the regret of my life."

"That I can believe; but I believe also that our natures never vary. We may mould and shape them to our uses, but beneath the surface they remain unchanged. I say this parenthetically. In regard to this incident there are in one particular certain excuses you might allege—youth for instance, inexperience, common attraction, love even. If you did, I could enter into them. I have been young myself, and I have no wish to imply that through the temptations of youth I passed unscathed. The man who asserts he has reminds me of the horseman who declares he has never been thrown. Nor because your victim happened to be my niece am I actuated by retrospective indignation. I am too old for that; and, moreover, the incident is too stale. No: my reason for forbidding my daughter to receive you, as I have done, is this: the man that can seduce a girl, and then, to conceal the effect, permit her to be butchered by a quack, especially when he could have protected her by marriage—that man, Mr. Mistrial, I tell you very plainly, is a scoundrel, and being a scoundrel will never be anything else." And as Honest Paul made this assertion he stood up and nodded affirmatively at his guest.

"You are very hard, Mr. Dunellen."

"I may be, but so is justice."

"If I could tell you all. It was so sudden, so unpremeditated even, at the first idea of a possibility of a catastrophe I lost my head."

"It was your honor you lost."

"Yes, and for years I have tried to recover it."

"That I am glad to learn, and I hope you have succeeded; but—"

"And will you not aid me?"

"In my sight you can never appear an honest man."

At this reproach, Roland, who had sat like Abjection, one hand supporting his head, his eyes lowered and his body bent, sprang to his feet.

"There are several forms of honesty," he exclaimed, "and frankness I believe is counted among them. That you evidently possess. Let me emulate you in it. I intend that your daughter shall be my wife. If you don't care to come to the wedding your presence can be dispensed with." And without any show of anger, but with an inclination of the head that was insolent in its deference, he picked up his hat and left the room.

Presently he found himself in the street. "Who is ever as stupid as a wise man?" he queried, and laughed a little to himself —"unless"—and he fell to wondering whether Dunellen could have told his daughter all. On the corner a cab was loitering; he hailed and entered it. A little later he was ringing at the door of Honest Paul's abode.

Yes, Miss Dunellen was at home. And as the servant drew the portière to the drawing-room aside, Roland was visited by that emotion the gambler knows who waits the turning of a card. Another second, and the expression of the girl's face would tell him what the future held. The drawing-room, however, happened to be untenanted, and as he paced its spacious splendors he still wondered was she or was she not informed. In a corner was a landscape signed Courbet—a green ravine shut down by bluest sky. The coloring was so true, it jarred. In another was a statue—a cloaked and hooded figure of Death supporting a naked girl. As he contemplated it, he heard the tinkle of the portière rings. It was she, he knew; he turned, and at once his heart gave an exultant throb; in her eyes was an invitation; he put his arms about her, and for a moment held her so.

She does not know, he told himself, and to her he murmured, "I have come to say good-bye."

"Wait, Roland." She led him to a seat. "Wait; I spoke to father last night; he has some objection—"

"I told you I was poor—"

"It is that, I suppose; he did not say—"

"He will never consent, unless—"

"There, Roland. I know him best." She closed her eyes, and as he gazed at her it seemed to him she had done so to shut some memory out. "It is money with him always; you do not know—" And between her parted lips she drew a breath he heard. "Last night he told me I must never see you again. Hitherto his will has ruled: it is my turn to-day."

With this there came a splendor to her he had never marked before; she looked defiant, and resolute as well. There was strength in her face, and beauty too.

"He is unjust," she added. "It was my duty to tell him, and there my duty ends. I am not a school-girl. I know my mind; better, perhaps, than he knows his own. I have obeyed him always. It is easy to obey, but now I will act for myself."

"He will never give his consent," Roland repeated.

"He may keep it, then."

Within her something seemed to rankle; and as Roland, mindful of the slightest change in her expression, detected this, he wondered what it could portend.

"Sweetheart," he ventured, "I have these two arms; they are all in all for you."

At this Justine awoke at once. "If I did not know it—feel it; if I were not sure of it, do you think I would speak to you as I do? No, Roland. I have something of my own; when we are married, believe me, his consent will come at once."

"It is not his consent I want—you know that; it is yours."

"You have it, Roland; I gave it you among the pines."

"Where is your hat, then? Let us go."

He caught her to him again, then suffered her to leave the room. And as the portière which he had drawn that she might pass fell back into its former folds, for a moment he stood perplexed. Somewhere a screw was loose, he could have sworn. But where? Could it be that Honest Paul was supporting a separate establishment? or did Justine think he wished to mate her to some plutocrat of his choice? The first supposition was manifestly absurd; the second troubled him so little that he turned and occupied himself with the naked girl swooning in the arms of Death.

"I am ready, Roland." It was Justine, bonneted and veiled, buttoning her glove.

"I have a cab," he answered, and followed her to the door.

VII.

When Roland and Justine re-entered the drawing-room that afternoon they found Mr. Dunellen there. With him was Guy Thorold.

During the infant days of photography family groups were so much in vogue that anyone with an old album in reach can find them there in plenty. They are faded, no doubt; the cut of the garments is absurd; even the faces seem to have that antique look which is peculiar to the miniatures of people dead and departed: yet the impression they convey is admirably exalting. That gentleman in the wonderful coat must have been magnificent in every sphere of life: his mere pose, his attitude, is convincing as a memoir. And that lady in the camel's-hair shawl—how bewitchingly lovable she surely was! There is her daughter, who might be her niece, so prettily does she seem inclined to behave; and there is the son, a trifle effaced perhaps, yet with the makings of a man manifest even in that effacement. Oh, good people! let us hope you were really as amiable as you look: the picture is all we have of you; even your names are forgot; and truly it were discomforting to have the impression you convey disturbed in its slightest suggestion. We love you best as you are; we prefer you so. I, for one, will have none of that cynicism which hints that had a snap camera caught you unprepared the charm would disappear.

Yet now, in the present instance, as Mr. Dunellen and his nephew stood facing Roland and Justine, a photographer who had happened there could have taken a family group which would in no manner have resembled those which our albums hold.

"I told you last night," Mr. Dunellen was shrieking, "that I forbade you to see that man."

And Justine, raising her veil, answered, "He was not my husband then."

"Husband!" The old man stared at his daughter, his face distorted and livid with rage. "If you—"

But whatever threat he may have intended to make, Thorold interrupted.

"He is married already," he cried; "he is no more your husband than I."

At this announcement Mr. Dunellen let an arm he had outstretched fall to his side; he turned to Thorold, and Justine looked wonderingly in Roland's face.

"What does he mean?" she asked.

Roland shrugged his shoulders, "God knows," he answered. "He must be screwed."

"You are married," Thorold called out. "You needn't attempt to deny it here."

"I don't in the least: this lady has just done me the honor to become my wife."

"But you have another—you told me so yourself."

Roland, who had been really perplexed, could not now conceal a smile. He remembered that he had indeed told Thorold he was married, but he had done so merely as an easy way of diverting the suspicions which that gentleman displayed.

Justine, still looking at him, caught the smile.

"Why don't you speak?" she asked.

"What is there to say?" he answered. "It is false as an obituary."

"Then tell him so."

But for that there was no time. Mr. Dunellen, trained in procedure, had already questioned Thorold, and found that save Mistrial's word he had nothing to grapple on.

"Leave the house, sir," he shouted, and pointed to the door.

"When he goes, father, I go too."

"Then go." And raising his arms above his head as though to invoke the testimony of heaven, he bawled at her, "I disown you."

"There's Christian forbearance," muttered Mistrial; and he might have asserted as much, but Justine had lowered her veil.

"Come," she said.

And as she and her husband passed from the room the old man roared impotently 'I disinherit you—you are no longer my child."

"Didn't you tell me he had been used to having his own way?" Roland asked, as he put Justine in the cab; and without waiting for an answer he told the driver to go to the Brunswick, and took a seat at her side.

In certain crises the beauty of an old adage asserts itself even to the stupidest. Roland had taken the bull by the horns and got tossed for his pains; yet even while he was in the air he kept assuring himself that he would land on his feet. The next morning the memory of the old man's anger affected him not at all. Passion, he knew, burns itself out, and its threats subside into ashes. The relentless parent was a spectacle with which the stage had made him so familiar that he needed no prompter's book to tell him that when the curtain fell it would be on a tableau of awaited forgiveness. And even though Mr. Dunellen and the traditional father might differ, yet on the subject of wills and bequests he understood that the legislature had in its wisdom prevented a testator from devising more than one-half his property to the detriment of kith and of kin. If things came to the worst Justine would get five million instead of ten ; and five million, though not elastic enough, as Jones had said, to entertain with, still represented an income that sufficed for the necessaries of life. On that score his mind was at rest. Moreover, it was manifestly impossible for Justine's father to live forever : there was an odor of fresh earth about him which to his own keen nostrils long since had betokened the grave ; and if meanwhile he chose to keep the purse-strings drawn, Justine had enough from her mother's estate to last till the strings were loosed.

Rents are high in New York, and to those bred in certain of its manors there is a choice between urban palaces and suburban flats. But Paris is less fastidious. In that lovely city a thousand-franc note need not be spent in a day; and in Italy the possibilities of the lira are great.

In view of these things, Roland and his wife one week later took ship and sailed for France.

PART II.

I.

To those that have suffered certain things there are forms of entertainment which neither amuse nor bore, but which pain. And this evening, as Justine sat in the stalls, the play which was being given, and which, as plays go, was endurable enough, caused her no pleasure, no weariness even, only a longing to get away and be alone. Now and then a shudder visited her, her hand tightened on her fan, and at times she would close her eyes, dull her hearing, and try to fancy that her girlhood was recovered, that she was free again, that she was dead, that her husband was —anything imaginable in fact, save the knowledge that she was there, side-by-side with him, and that presently they would return together to the hideousness of their uptown flat.

She had been married now a little more than two years, and during the latter portion of that time life had held for her that precise dose of misery which is just insufficient to produce uncertainties of thought in a mind naturally exalted. There had indeed been moments in which the possibility of insanity had presented itself, and there had been moments also in which she would have welcomed that possibility as a grateful release : but those moments had passed, the possibility with them ; and this evening as she sat in the stalls her outward appearance was much such as it had been two years before. But within, where her heart had been, was a cemetery.

Among our friends and acquaintances there are always those who to our knowledge have tombstones of their own. But there are others that evolve a world—one that glows, subsides, and dies away unknown to any save themselves. The solitudes of space appall; the solitudes of the heart can be as endless as they. In those which Justine concealed, a universe had had its being and its subsidence; a universe with gem-like hopes for stars—one in which the sun had been so eager its rays had made her blind. There had been comets gorgeous and tangential as aspirations ever are; there had been the colorless ether of which dreams are made; and for cosmic matter there was love. But now it was all dispersed; there was nothing left, one altar merely—the petrefaction of a prayer erected long since in the depths of her distress, and which for conscience' sake now and then she tended still.

And now, as the play at which she assisted unrolled before her unseeing eyes, one by one scenes from another drama rose unsummoned in its stead. First was the meeting with Mistrial at Tuxedo, then the episode at Aiken, the marriage that followed, and the banishment that ensued: a banishment, parenthetically, which at the time being she was powerless to understand. Her father's anger had indeed weighed on her ; but it was not wholly that—she was too much in love to let it be more than a shadow on her delight ; nor was it because of unfamiliar lands : it was that little by little, through incidents originally misunderstood and then more completely grasped, the discovery, avoided yet ever returning, came to her, stayed with her, and made her its own—that the man whom she had loved and the man whom she had married were separate and distinct.

The psychologist of woman has yet to appear, and if he keep us waiting may it not be because every woman he analyzes has a sister who differs from her ? The moment he formulates a rule it is overweighted by exceptions. Woman often varies, the old song says ; but not alone in her affections does she do so : she varies in temperament as well. And, after all, is it not the temperament that makes or mars a life? Justine, in discovering that the man she married and the man whom she loved were separate and distinct, instead of being disgusted with herself and with him, as you, madam, might have been, tried her utmost to forget the lover and love the husband that had come in his place. In this effort she had pride for an aid. The humiliation which the knowledge of self-deception brings is great, but when that knowledge becomes common property the humiliation is increased. The world—not the world that ought to be, but the world as it is—is more apt to smile than condole. There may be much joy in heaven over the sinner that repents: on earth the joy is at his downfall. And according to the canons we have made for ourselves, Justine, in listening to the dictates of her heart instead of to those of her father, had sinned, so grievously even that that father had bid her begone from his sight. She was aware of this, and in consequence felt it needful to hold her head the higher. And so for a while she made pride serve as fig-leaf to her nakedness. If abashed at heart, at least the world should be uninformed of that abashment.

This effort on her part Mistrial hindered to the best of his ability. Whether or not he loved her, whether save himself he was capable of loving anyone, who shall say? Men too are difficult to decipher. There were hours when after some écart he would come to her so penitent, so pleasant to the eye, and seemingly so afflicted at his own misconduct, that Justine found the strength —or the weakness, was it?—to forgive and to forget anew.

During this period they lived not sumptuously, perhaps, but in that large and liberal fashion which requires a ponderable rent-roll to support; and at that time, however Mistrial comported himself elsewhere, in her presence he had the decency to seem considerate, and affectionate as well. But meanwhile, through constant demands, the value of the letter of credit into which he had converted the better part of her mother's estate became impaired. Retrenchment was necessary, and that is never a pleasant thing. The man that passes out of poverty into wealth finds the passage so easy, so Lethean even, that he is apt to forget what poverty was ; but when, as sometimes happens, he is obliged to retrace his steps, he walks bare of foot through a path of thorns. To count gold, instead of strewing it, is irritating to anyone not a sage. And Mistrial, who was not a sage, was irritated ; and having a wife within beck and call he vented that irritation on her.

It was at this time that Justine began to feel the full force of the banishment. That her husband was, and in all probability would continue to be, unfaithful to her, was a matter which she ended by accepting with a degree of good sense which is more common than is generally supposed. At first she had been indeed indignant, and when in that indignation her anger developed into a heat that was white and sentiable, Mistrial experienced no remorse whatever, only a desire to applaud. He liked the force and splendor of her arraignment; it took him out of himself; it made him feel that he was appreciated—feared even; that a word from him, and a tempest was loosened or enchained.

But what is there to which we cannot accustom ourselves? Justine ended, not by a full understanding of the fact that man is naturally polygamous; but little by little, through channels undiscerned even by herself, the idea came to her that, if the man she loved could find pleasure in the society of other women, it was because she was less attractive than they. It was this that brought her patience, the more readily even in that, at her first paroxysm, Mistrial, a trifle alarmed lest she might leave him, had caught her in his arms, and sworn in a whisper breathed in her ear, that of all the world he loved her best.

Madam, you who do the present writer the honor to read this page are convinced, he is sure, that your husband would rather his tongue cleaved to the roof of his mouth than break the vow which bound you to him. But you, madam, have married a man faithful and tried. You know very well with what dismay he tells you of Robinson's scandalous conduct, and you know also how he pities Robinson's poor little wife ; yet when, in your sorrow at what that poor little woman has to put up with, you are tempted to go and condole with her, pause, madam—Mrs. Robinson may be equally tempted to condole with You.

There are—in Brooklyn, in Boston, and in other recondite regions—a number of clever people who have been brought up with the idea that Divorce was instituted for just such a thing as this. Yet in one hundred cases out of a hundred-and-one a woman who appeals to the law never does so because her husband has broken a certain commandment. If his derelictions are confined to that particular offence she may bewail, and we all bewail with her; but if she wants the sympathy of judge, of jury, and of newspaper-public too, she must be prepared to allege other grievances. She must show that her husband is unkind, that he is sarcastic, that he is given to big words and short sentences; in brief, that he has developed traits which render life in common no longer to be endured.

It was traits of this description that Mistrial unexpectedly developed, and it was during their development that the sense of banishment visited Justine. She was unable to make further transference of her affections; the lover had disappeared; the husband she had tried to love in his place had gone as well. For sole companion she had a man who had worn a mask and dropped it; where he had been considerate, he was selfish; when he spoke, it was to find fault; now that he could no longer throw her money out of the windows, he threw his amiability in its stead. By day he was taciturn, insultingly dumb; at night he was drunk.

Mistrial had served his novitiate where the pochard is rare. It is we that drink, and with us the English, the Slavs, and Teutons; but in the East and among the Latins sobriety is less a matter of habit than of instinct. And in lands where man prefers to keep his head clear, Mistrial, at that age, which is one of the most impressionable of all, had seen no reason to lose his own. But presently the small irritations of enforced economy affected his manners, and his habits as well. He took to absinthe in the morning, and, as he happened to be in France, he drank at night that brutal brandy they give you there. Not continuously, it is true. There were days when the man for whom Justine had forsaken her home returned so completely she could almost fancy he had never gone. Then, without a word of warning, at the very moment when Faith was gaining fresh foothold, the tragi-comedy would be renewed; he was off again, no one knew whither, returning only when the candle had been utterly consumed.

Such things are enough to affect any woman's patience, and Justine's became wholly warped. It was unaccountable to her that he could treat her as he did. She watched the gradual transformation of the perfect lover into the perfect beast with a species of sorrow—a dual sorrow in whose component parts there was pity for herself and for him as well.

The idea that he had married her uniquely because of her father's wealth, that he was impatient to get it, and that when he got it he would squander all he could on other women, occurred to her only in the remotest ways, and then only through some expression which, in his exasperation at the diminishing bank account and the unreasonable time which it took her father to forgive her, fell from him now and then by chance. For Mistrial had indeed counted on that forgiveness. He had even counted on receiving it by cable, of finding that it had preceded and awaited them before their ship reached France. And when, to use an idiom of that land, it made itself expected, he was confident that the longer it delayed the completer it would be. At the utmost he had not dreamed that the old man would detain it more than a few months; but when twenty-four went by, and not only no forgiveness was manifest, but through his own improvidence the funds ran low,—so low, in fact, that unless forgiveness were presently forthcoming they would be in straits indeed,—he dictated a letter, penitent and humble, one in which impending poverty stood out as clearly as though it had been engraved, and which it revolted her to send. Its inspiration, however, must have been patent to Mr. Dunellen, for that gentlemen's reply, expressed in the third person, was to the effect that if his daughter returned to him he would provide for her as he had always done, but in no other circumstances could he assist.

Had Justine been anyone but herself she might have acted on the invitation: but the tone of it hurt her; she was annoyed at having permitted herself to send the letter Mistrial had dictated, and to which this was the reply. Her pride was up—all the more surely because she knew her father had been right; and there is just this about pride—as a matter of penitence it forces us to suffer those consequences of our own wrongdoing which through a simple confession it were easy to escape. To Justine such confession was impossible. She had left her father in the full certainty that he was wrong, and when she found he was not, death to her were preferable to any admission of the grievousness of her own mistake.

At this juncture Mistrial's aunt assisted at the funeral of a sister spinster, sat in a draught, caught cold in her throat, and, the glottis enlarging, strangled one night in her bed. By her will the St. Nicholas Hospital received the bulk of her property. The rest of her estate was divided among relatives; to her nephew Roland Mistrial—3d no longer—was bequeathed the princely sum of ten thousand dollars in cash. At the news of this munificence Roland swore and grit his teeth. Had his circumstances been different it is probable that the ten thousand, together with some enduring insult, he would have flung after her to the eternal purgatory where he prayed she had gone. As it was, the modicity of the bequest sobered him. Through some impalpable logic he had counted but little on any inheritance at all; he had indeed hoped vaguely that she might die and leave him what she had; and it may even be that, had he learned that her will was in his favor, and had a suitable opportunity presented itself, in some perfectly decorous manner he would have hastened his aunt's demise. But concerning her will he had no information; moreover, during his visit to the States the old lady saw as little of him as she could help; and when she did see him, in spite of gout and the ailments of advancing years there was such a rigidity in her manner that the nephew told himself she might live long enough to see him hanged. As a consequence he had expected nothing. But when the news of her death reached him, together with the intelligence that instead of the competence he might possibly have had he was mentioned merely to the tune of ten thousand dollars,—this outrage, in conjunction with Dunellen's relentlessness, sobered him to that degree, that for a day and a night he gave himself to a debauch of thought. From this orgy he issued with clearer mind. It may be—though the idea advanced is one that can only be hazarded—it may be that had his aunt disposed of her estate in his favor he would there and then have washed his hands of the job he had undertaken, and left his wife to her own devices. As it was, he saw that, to keep his head above water, the only possible plank was one that Mr. Dunellen might send in his reach; and it was with the knowledge that before the present scanty windfall disappeared some conquest of Honest Paul's affection should be attempted that he determined to return to New York. Once there again, who knew what might happen? Surely, if the preceding year Mr. Dunellen had strength for violence, to the naked eye he was even then manifestly infirm. There was no gainsaying the matter—he at least would not live very long. As to the disposition of his property after death Mistrial was still assured. Whatever his attitude might be for the present, in the end he could not wholly disinherit Justine—at least one-half the property must come to her. On that fact Mistrial would have staked his life; after all, it was the one hope he had left; and an ultimate hope, we all know, is the thing we part with last.

Thereupon he recovered himself. He became amiable and considerate—a change of demeanor which gave Justine a chill. She consented nevertheless to the return trip, and the day after arriving called at her father's house. When she got back to the hotel where they had put up Mistrial was waiting for her. In answer to his questions she told him that her father was willing to receive her, but her alone. "You must take your choice," he had said, she repeated—"You must take your choice."

"And what is that choice?" Mistrial had asked.

"I have made it," she answered, "and by it I will abide."

But at this he had expostulated; and when, seeing at last what he meant—understanding that he would have her feign a compliance for the sake of coin which at her father's death she could come back and share with him—when, divining the infamy of his thought, she refused, he had struck her in the face.

Because a man is not Chesterfield, it does not follow he is Sykes. Mistrial had never struck a woman before, and in this initial assault it is probable that he was actuated less by a desire to punish than by that force which overmasters him who has ceased to be master of himself. By instinct he was not a gentleman; for some time past he had not even taken the trouble to appear one; yet at that moment, dancing in derision before him, he saw the letters that form the monosyllable Cad. The sense of abasement he displayed was so immediate and sincere, that Justine, who, trembling with anger and disgust, stood staring in his face, read it there and understood. Instead of separating them forever, the blow reunited their hands. During the week that followed they were nearer to each other than they had been for months before. The reconciliation was seemingly complete. Mistrial made himself the lover again, and Justine permitted herself to be wooed. They left their hotel and found a flat—a furnished apartment in the neighborhood of Central Park; and there the storm departing placed a rainbow in its stead.

A rainbow, however, is not a fixture, and this one went its way. While Justine closed her eyes Mistrial's were alert. He had no intention of suffering her to be disinherited, and though it was well enough to rely on the courts it was better still not to be forced to do so. Rather than run an avoidable risk he would have abandoned his wife, and forced her through that abandonment to return to her father's house, convinced that afterwards he could win her together with the estate back again to him. Meanwhile another interview could not in any way jeopardize the chances to which he clung. On the contrary, it might be highly serviceable. Mr. Dunellen, he had learned, was much broken; he had given up his practice, the the world even, everything in fact save perhaps the devil that was in him, and sat uncompanioned in the desolate and spacious emptiness of his house. It was only natural that he should wish to coerce his daughter into obedience; yet now that he saw she was steadfast, her pride unhumbled still, it was not improbable that he would yield; it was presumable even that he was then waiting, weak of heart, prepared at her next advance to welcome and forgive.

Of these things Mistrial made his wife aware, and it was then that the rainbow departed. His arguments were as revolting as the cynicism they exhaled. But she made no attempt to combat them. Since she had seen her father she had felt a sorrow for him that Mistrial's altered demeanor had given her time to heed. She knew that his attitude was due to her defiance of his express commands, but she had no reason to suppose that he had any other objection to her husband than such as his poverty might have caused or instinctive antipathy might bring. But now, her own experience aiding, she knew that he had been right; and, as he seemed feeble and dispassionate, in answer to Mistrial's arguments she tied her bonnet-strings and went. It was early in the afternoon when she started, it was night when she returned.

Mistrial had been waiting for her, and when she entered the room in which he sat he rose eagerly and aided her with her wrap. He was impatient, she could see; and she was impatient also.

"Why did you not tell me of Guy's sister?" she began, at once.

And as he answered nothing she continued: "Years ago I knew of what she died; it was only to-day I learned that it was you who murdered her."

"It is a lie."

"Oh, protest. I knew you would."

"From whom is it you heard this thing? Not from your father, I am sure." As Mistrial spoke he gazed at her inquisitorially with shrewd, perplexing eyes.

"What does it matter?" she answered. Her head was thrown back, her lips compressed. "What does it matter since the charge is true?"

"But it is false," he cried; "it is a wanton lie. Your father never could have stated it."

"Ah, but he did, though; and Guy was there to substantiate what he said."

"Guy!" As he pronounced her cousin's name there came into his face an expression which she knew and which she had learned to dread. "Madam, you mean your lover, I suppose. And it is his ipse dixit you accept in preference to mine?"

"Mistrial, you know he is not my lover."

"I know he was in love with you, and you with him."

"So he was; so he is, I think; and it was not until this night I saw my own mistake."
